Mr. Bethell, Mr. Willcock, and Mr. Amphlett, for the defendant, Mr. Jackson. — No shareholder in the company complains excepting the plaintiff, who has only just bought the shares, and doubtless with a view to this litigation. When Jackson and Graham ceased to be directors, they came to a settlement with the only parties with whom they could do so; namely, the committee of management. Having done so, there is a conclusive settlement binding on the company. No decisions relating to English companies have any bearing upon this case, which is a Belgian company, and governed by the laws of the country. The bill itself alleges that the company ever since its foundation was carried on in conformity with the rules; and on his own shewing, the plaintiff must be taken to admit that regular half-yearly meetings were held, and everything proper been done pursuant to the 31st article of those rules; that the accounts were duly passed according to article No. 38, and therefore that under article 39 the settlement of the account is binding on the company. Mr. Arnold, the solicitor of the committee of management, sanctioned on their behalf what was done, and under the same sanction the balance was paid to the bankers. Under any circumstances, as they stand, the plaintiff has no right to sue. This is a foreign railway company locally situate in Brussels, and the rights of its members are governed by the Belgian law—Earl Nelson v. Lord Bridport (15), Warrender v. Warrender (16); and as by article 28 all proceedings are to be taken by the chairman, the shareholders, and among them the plaintiff, are precluded from any manner of personal interference. The rules having prescribed arbitration as the means of settling differences is another objection. Unless some reason be shewn why the company does not originate such a proceeding, even by the English law an individual member cannot sue; and, moreover, as the plaintiff sues on behalf of persons who have approved of the acts complained of, and who could not themselves have instituted the suit, and adds himself as a plaintiff with them, he has made a misjoinder—The King of Spain v. Machado (17) and Graham v. the Birkenhead, Lancashire and Cheshire Junction Railway Company (18).

Mr. Malins and Mr. W. J. Bovill, for the assignees of Mr. Graham.

Mr. Shee, in reply.—Mr. Arnold had not and could not have authority from the committee of management, because that committee had no authority to do the acts themselves. To say that the plaintiff has no right to sue, that the proceedings ought to be in the name of the company, and that the only relief is by arbitration, is the same as saying there shall be a denial of justice; for here the principal defendants live in England and are accessible, while it is clear that he has no means of suing those in Belgium. He is of necessity driven to appeal to English tribunals, and ought to have the aid he asks to repair the mischief done. The answer to the objection that the company should be a party is simple; namely, the chairman is made a party, and that is the only way in which the company can be represented, as appears from the 28th article of the rules.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Whether upon the question of right, or the question of remedy, the law of Belgium or the law of England is regarded, this suit seems to us ill founded. According to the law of Belgium the plaintiff is incompetent to sue for the purpose for which he has filed this bill; and by the law of England it is not proved, or even alleged, that he has a right to sue on behalf of himself and the other shareholders. He has shewn no case for suing the directors in the manner he has done, even if some suit be proper. The pleadings and evidence seem to us to shew that in the year 1847, more than a year before the plaintiff filed his bill, an account had been stated and settled between the Conseil d'Administration, or committee of management in Belgium, who were authorized agents of the company, on the one hand, and Mr. Jackson and Mr. Graham on the other; which account, if fairly stated, must be considered destructive of the plaintiff's case. It appears to us to have been fairly and honestly stated and settled; that is, every fact was stated with full knowledge and without suppression, and the account so come to and stated was approved by the Conseil d'Administration, who were in our opinion competent to do so. If, possibly, on account of the existing trusteeship, if there was one, the confirmation by the Conseil d'Administration might have been insufficient, there must still be taken to have been a sufficient affirmance by the general meeting or assemblée générale. There is probably more than one other ground fatal to this case; but enough has been said to shew that this petition of appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Costs, Taxation of—Attornies and Solicitors' Act—Protest—Alleged Pressure—Costs of Appeal.

A receiver in a suit assigned dividends to which she was entitled for life, to her sureties as security for their bond. The receiver paid the balance found due from her into court, and the recognizances were ordered to be vacated. The sureties refused to re-assign the dividends. The solicitors of the sureties delivered bills of costs incurred by them in the suit. The receiver had borrowed money for her support, and for the support of her children, and had executed a warrant of attorney, upon which judgment was entered up. The creditor threatened execution, and in order to obtain the dividends the receiver paid the bills of costs out of the dividends which had accumulated in the hands of the trustees of the settlement, but gave notice that she did so under protest, and without prejudice to her rights. A correspondence had taken place between the solicitors of the parlies respecting taxation, which ended in the receiver agreeing to pay the costs of it. The payment was made on the 14th of August 1850, and on the 7th of June 1851 the receiver petitioned at the Rolls for an order under the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, for the taxation of the bill, alleging that it was paid under pressure, and with protest, but the petition was dismissed; and on appeal the decision below was affirmed, but without costs, the authorities being conflicting.

Amongst a multiplicity of allegations, a very long correspondence, and many conflicting affidavits, the following appear to be the facts of the case. By a settlement, dated in 1839, trusts were declared in favour of Mrs. Jefferies for her life, for her separate use, of 2,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consols. In 1844, after the death of her husband, Mrs. Jefferies appointed a new trustee of the settlement. A suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of her late husband, and she was appointed receiver. She was entitled to dower out of the real estate. By a deed, dated in 1845, she assigned her dividends in the 2,000*l.* consols and her dower to A. P. Brown and F. Mead, her sureties, as a security to them, they having entered into the usual bond for her. Notice of this deed was given to G. J. Foulger and C. Biggs, the trustees of the settlement, who retained all the dividends as they accrued until the 22nd of August 1850. The Master, to whom the matters were referred in the suit of Jefferies v. Jefferies, reported that a particular sum was due from the receiver, but after petitions and other proceedings, and after he had reviewed his report, he found 74*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* to be due from her, which report was confirmed, and by an order made on the 20th of December 1849, on the motion of Mrs. Jefferies, the same was directed to be paid into court, and her recognizances and those of her sureties were ordered to be vacated. This order was served on the sureties, and on the trustees, and the money was paid into court. Mrs. Jefferies required a re-assignment from her sureties of the property assigned to them, and payment from the trustees of the settlement of the dividends which had accumulated in their hands; but this was refused, although the balance due from her as receiver had been paid into court, and the recognizances had been vacated. On the 12th of January 1850 the London agents for Mr. John William Browne, the solicitor of the sureties, delivered a bill of costs, and after an order had been made in the suit dated the 3rd of June 1850, (which, because of some dispute before the Registrar, was not drawn up) for the taxation of the sureties' costs, in that month an additional bill was delivered, making the whole 105*l.* or thereabouts. In order to enable her to live and support her two children, Mrs. Jefferies borrowed money of Mr. W. Johnson, and gave him a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, whereupon the same was immediately entered up. Upon that person pressing for payment, and threatening to issue execution, she, in order to obtain money, consented to pay the 105*l.* bills of costs. The evidence was of a very conflicting character as to the protest at the time of payment, but it was shewn that the solicitors were willing that there should be a taxation, but it must be at her expense. The payment was made on the 14th of August 1850, by the trustees, by her direction; and in May 1851 a correspondence was renewed about the taxation, which ultimately did not take place. On the 7th of June 1851, Mrs. Jefferies presented a petition at the Rolls under the provisions of the Attornies and Solicitors' Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, praying the taxation of these bills. The petition contained allegations that she was advised not to pay the same, "as well on account of the extravagant and improper charges which they contained, as that she was not liable at law or in equity to pay the same;" that the solicitors were informed of the whole transaction with Mr. Johnson; and that neither of the bills of costs had been taxed, and also that she would not have consented to the payment of them, or either of them, without taxation, except and in order that by at once obtaining a release of her dower and dividends she might save herself from being taken in execution at the suit of the said Mr. Johnson. The petition did not contain any statement of specific items of overcharge; the allegation in that respect being confined to the advice she had received not to pay, on account of extravagant and improper charges contained in the bills. This petition having been dismissed, Mrs. Jefferies now appealed.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Lovell.—

That there was pressure in this case cannot reasonably be denied when the situation of the parties is considered, and although the pressure was not actively that of the solicitor himself, that gentleman must have been aware, even without the protest, that the payment was only made because the lady had no means of freeing herself from the difficulties in which she was placed, except by the money to be obtained from the Court, and that she could not obtain that money unless after payment of this bill of costs. In the case of Ex parte Wilkinson (1), before one of your Lordships, a firm of solicitors acted as solicitors for both mortgagor and mortgagee, and the bill of costs was presented for payment on the very eve of the completion of the conveyance of the estate, and then it was paid, as here, under protest. There it was laid down that protest combined with other circumstances might be a ground for a reference for taxation, and the bill was sent for taxation, without any regard to many of the items of the bill not being objected to. Lord Langdale, in In re Tryon (2), referred a bill for taxation, and there had been payment under protest, that payment having been insisted on as a condition for parting with a deed necessary to complete a purchase. In those cases the principle was fully recognized, and the Court will, therefore, send this bill for taxation. On behalf of the appellant we offer to deposit a sufficient sum of money to abide the issue of the taxation.

Mr. Bird, in support of the order of the Court below.—In the first place, there was no pressure as this Court understands the term; and secondly, if there were, and moreover if the payment were made under protest, later cases have decided that unless there be specific items of overcharge alleged in the petition there will not be a reference for taxation. The late Master of the Rolls, in In re Thompson (3), said, that amongst the special circumstances required by the act, "there must be a statement of some specific item which is erroneous, otherwise it is impossible to tell to what latitude the right of taxation after payment and settlement may be carried"; and His Lordship refers to the old practice, observing that he did not think the act of parliament had made any difference. In that case the question of pressure was only alluded to on the question of costs, and it would seem that had there been proof of pressure the petitioner, although he failed, might have had the costs of the petition. Then, in In re Harrison (4), a solicitor for the mortgagee refused to complete without full payment of his bill of costs, and although the mortgagee paid it under protest, Lord Langdale held that there should not be a reference for taxation, although there might be overcharges. His Lordship, in that case, denied the notion to be correct that a protest was sufficient, and said that protest by itself was of no value; and further, that the idea that if the bill contained items larger than a solicitor would be allowed on taxation that was a sufficient ground for a reference, was totally erroneous. For all these reasons, the order made by the Master of the Rolls was correct, and ought not to be disturbed; and the petition should be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Roundell Palmer, in reply, observed that neither of the cases of Ex parte Wilkinson, nor In re Tryon appeared to have been cited in the cases of In re Thompson and In re Harrison. Even if the Court should not think the present a fit case to be sent for taxation, it could not make the appellant pay the costs of the appeal, considering that there were authorities from the same Judge differing from each other.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I was about to say I regret that the order at the Rolls must be confirmed; though by saying I regret the conclusion to which I have come, it is not as to the law of the case, but as a matter of feeling for the parties themselves, for I think the order was both on principle and authority right. I do not mean to controvert the proposition, that there may be a taxation of a paid bill on the ground of pressure, or to question the correctness of Ex parte Wilkinson, decided by my learned Brother, for I think that case was rightly decided. There there was pressure; namely, pressure of such a nature as I think gave a right to the party seeking relief; but the pressure in the present case is not of that kind. In the month of January 1850, the solicitors delivered to the petitioner a bill for 84*l.* odd, and the rest of the bill, 20*l.*, was incurred between that and June. At the end of June a bill with the subsequent amount was delivered. In the middle of August the compound bill was paid under protest. All the parties must be taken to have understood that the payment was made under protest. It seems to me that the protest was concurrent with the payment of this bill. I have already stated that I do not think that the pressure leading to the payment was such as would warrant a subsequent taxation as a matter of course; but even had it been so, I should have been reluctant to aid a party who, lying by for more than nine months, comes, then, before the Court for the first time. In the hope of avoiding expense a correspondence was entered into, but that correspondence did not begin till May 1851, nine months after the payment. By thus acting the petitioner was, I think, excluded from a right to tax the bill. The order obtained at the Rolls was right, and I say this, assuming it could not be shewn that the bill contained extravagant and improper charges, I doubt whether upon that ground alone the matter would not be defective, for the nature of those charges should have been very specifically stated, and there should be shewn to have been such an excess of charge as would, in the language of Lord Eldon, have furnished a ground of fraud; nevertheless, I think there is no excuse for their not having taxed the bill. The ground, however, on which I proceed is, that there is no excuse for the petitioner's delay after having made the payment under protest.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—As it must be so, it is not necessary that I should enter fully into the grounds of the great doubts and difficulties that I happen to feel about this case—doubts and difficulties very probably ill-founded—inasmuch as there are such opinions as there are differing from me on the point. The 41st section of the Solicitors' Act provides that the payment of any such bill shall in no case preclude the Court to whom application shall be made from referring such bill for taxation, if the special circumstances of the case shall in its discretion appear to require the same, upon such conditions as to the Court shall seem right, provided the application for such reference be made within twelve months after payment. In the present case the application was made within twelve months after payment, though certainly not speedily. The question here is upon the special circumstances of the case. Now, the matter is such that I am clearly of opinion that it would not have been right to order taxation without making this lady deposit a sufficient sum to answer the costs of taxation. This deposit, as has been stated by her counsel, she is willing to make. If she had made that deposit originally, I am not satisfied that I should on have thought—the payment being made under pressure, though that pressure was not proceeding from the attorney himself, whose bill was paid, but he having notice of the pressure—the bill ought to be taxed. All the circumstances of the case taken together seem to me, according to my view, to justify the conclusion that it was the understanding between all parties that taxation should take place. This view, however, is, very probably, erroneous. I confess that I cannot regret that this will be the end of the litigation.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I think the general rule (5), that the costs abide the result of the appeal, does not apply to the present case. There are conflicting authorities. The petition will be dismissed, but without costs.

PARKER, V.C. }
 March 18, 19. } NEDBY v. NEDBY.

Baron and Feme—Deed of Gift by a Wife to her Husband—Practice—Master's Report—Affidavits.

Deeds of gift by a wife to her husband of property over which she has a power of appointment are regarded by the Court with jealousy, and inquiries will be directed as to the circumstances under which they were executed.

Where a wife makes a deed of gift to her husband of property over which she has a power of appointment, and the deed is afterwards impeached by her, the burden lies on her of shewing that the circumstances were such as ought to invalidate it, and the burden does not lie on the husband of shewing that the circumstances were such that it ought to be supported.

Property was settled on A, a married woman, for her life, with remainder to such uses as she should by deed appoint. A, by deed, dated in 1821, appointed the reversion to B, her husband; and in 1836 filed a bill to have the deed set aside. The circumstances relied on by A. were, that the deed had been prepared by B.'s solicitor, that it had not been read over at the time of the execution, and the evidence of one of the attesting witnesses that she was agitated and distressed at the time of the execution, and signed it in a reluctant manner:—Held, that these circumstances were not such as to invalidate the deed.

An inquiry was directed to be made by the Master; the Master made his report, which was not excepted to. The parties were held to be at liberty, at the hearing of the cause for further directions, to refer to the affidavits and other materials used before the Master on his inquiry.

James Keegan, by his will, dated the 1st of July 1820, bequeathed his personal estate to William Nedby and Thomas Anns, on the usual trust for sale; and directed them to invest the purchase-mones, and to pay one-half of the income to his wife for her life, for her separate use. The will then proceeded as follows:—

“And my will and meaning is that my wife shall have full power by any will, testament, or instrument in writing, to be by her duly executed, to bequeath and dispose of one half moiety of the monies so to be invested by my said executors and trustees, in manner and for the purposes aforesaid.” The testator appointed W. Nedby and T. Anns, and his wife, his executors and executrix, and died on the 7th of July 1820.

On the 7th of October 1820, Mrs. Keegan married William Nedby. By an indenture, dated the 9th of January 1821, and made between Mrs. Nedby of the one part, and Mr. Nedby of the other part, Mrs. Nedby, in consideration of love and affection for her husband, Mr. Nedby, granted and assigned to him one half part of the personal estate of the testator bequeathed to her.

Mr. and Mrs. Nedby lived together from the time of their marriage until August 1836, when they separated. In September 1836, Mrs. Nedby filed a bill, for the administration of the testator's estate, against Mr. Nedby and the other parties interested in it. The bill stated that Mr. Nedby claimed to be entitled to her share by virtue of an indenture, executed by the plaintiff, but charged “that she never executed any such indenture, or that, if she executed the same, she did so in ignorance of its contents and purport, and without professional advice or assistance, and upon the faith of a representation made to her by the said William Nedby, under whose influence she was, that the execution of such indenture was merely intended to facilitate the proving of the will, and the duly administering the estate of the said testator, and that she was deceived and imposed on in respect thereof, and that such indenture ought to be held fraudulent and void as against her.” In respect of this, the bill prayed that the deed, if any, might be declared to be fraudulent and void.

Mr. Nedby, in his answer, set up the indenture of assignment to him, and stated that the deed had been prepared by Mr. Vincent, a solicitor, who had acted as solicitor on Mrs. Nedby's behalf, and that the deed had been executed by her at Mr. Vincent's office.

By the decree made at the hearing in November 1844, it was referred to the Master to inquire whether the instrument in question was ever, and when, executed by Mrs. Nedby, and under what circumstances.

The Master, by his report, found that the deed had been prepared by Mr. Vincent, who was then, and previously had been, the solicitor of Mr. Nedby, and was executed by Mrs. Nedby at the house of Mr. Nedby, in the presence of Williams and Beale, two of Mr. Vincent's clerks, and that the deed was not read over to her at the time of the execution, and that, except as aforesaid, he was unable to state the circumstances under which the deed was executed, no sufficient evidence having been laid before him.

Williams, one of the attesting witnesses, made an affidavit, in the inquiry before the Master, that Mrs. Nedby at the time of the execution of the deed "was agitated and distressed, and that she signed it in a reluctant manner, with a dash of the pen."

Mr. and Mrs. Nedby both died, and the suit was duly revived.

The report of the Master was not excepted to. The cause now came on for further directions.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Greene, for the plaintiff, proposed to read the affidavit of Williams, made in the Master's office.

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Hoare, for the representatives of Mr. Nedby, objected to the reading of the affidavit. The report of the Master had not been excepted to, and must be taken as accepted, and it was not competent to the plaintiff to travel out of it. It would be imposing a great hardship on the parties if all the documents before the Master were to be considered as part of the materials for the hearing. At any rate, notice should be given beforehand by the parties intending to use such materials of such intention.

[PARKER, V.C. said that the plaintiff was at liberty to give any information to the Court as to the materials used before the Master, and that the plaintiff's counsel might, therefore, read the affidavit, or such parts as they pleased.]

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Greene, for the plaintiff.—It is clearly established that where A. stands in a certain relation to B, as his medical attendant or spiritual adviser, and B. makes a deed of gift to A, the burden lies upon A. of shewing that the transaction was perfectly fair—Huguenin v. Baseley (1), Dent v. Bennett (2), Gibson v. Russell (3). This principle ought to be held to extend to all deeds of gift from a wife to her husband—Pybus v. Smith (4), Milnes v. Bush (5). The circumstances of this case which shew that the transaction was not fair are, that Mrs. Nedby had no solicitor to act for her; that the deed was not read over to her; that Mr. Nedby, in his answer, states that the place of the execution of the deed was at the office of the solicitor, whereas it was at his own house; and the evidence of Williams that Mrs. Nedby was in a state of agitation and distress when she signed it.

Mr. Wigram and Mr. Hoare, for the representatives of Mr. Nedby, contended that the deed was prima facie valid, and that nothing had been adduced in evidence to affect its validity. They read the following passages in Lord Hardwicke's judgment in Grigby v. Cox (6):—"For the rule of the Court is, that where anything is settled to the wife's separate use, she is considered as a feme sole, and may appoint in what manner she pleases." * * *

"And this will hold, though the act done by the wife is in some degree a transaction alone with the husband: although, in that case, a Court of equity will have more jealousy over it, and, therefore, if there is any proof that the husband had any improper influence over the wife in it, by ill, or even extraordinary good usage, to induce her to it, the Court might set it aside, but not without that. The wife might have made an immediate appointment for the benefit of her husband, which would have stood, unless some such proof as before mentioned." They also referred to Collinson v. Patrick (7).

Mr. Glasse replied.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Nichols, and Mr. Bevir, for the other parties.

PARKER, V. C.—In this case Mrs. Nedby, by a deed, dated the 9th of January 1821, made an appointment, under a power, in favour of her husband, and the Court thought it right, under the circumstances, to direct an inquiry whether the deed in question was executed by her, and under what circumstances. The Master has made his report, containing nothing very material or decisive with respect to the circumstances. This gives rise to the question, on which side is the burthen of proof? Is the appointment to be invalid unless the husband can shew that the circumstances were such that the appointment ought to be supported, or is it valid unless the wife can shew that the circumstances were such as ought to invalidate it? By the instrument which created the power the wife was placed in the position of a feme sole. With respect to the particular subject thereof, she had a good power of appointment, the protection to her being that the act of appointment was to be by a deed duly executed, so that she had the protection that might be afforded by the formalities required for the execution of the power. I think that, on all the principles governing the Court, I am bound to consider the appointment good, unless those claiming against it could produce sufficient matter to invalidate it. No doubt the Court will regard such deeds with jealousy, and think it right to inquire into them, as in the case of Grigby v. Cox.

Now, what were the circumstances in this case? The Master has found, in substance, that the deed was prepared by the husband's solicitor, and was executed by the wife in the presence of two of the clerks of that solicitor, and was not read over to her. All these circumstances constantly occurred in perfectly proper transactions, and it would be a dangerous thing to say that the deed could not be supported merely on those grounds. It gives rise to suspicion, but it is not enough to invalidate it. The only other circumstance upon which the Court was asked to set aside this deed was, that one of the attesting witnesses said "that she signed it with agitation and reluctance." It is impossible to act upon that as a ground for setting aside the deed.

The costs of the general administration must come out of the entirety, except so far as they were increased by the inquiry as to the validity of this deed, which must come out of Mrs. Nedby's moiety.

PARKER, V. C. }
May 26. } MARTIN v. PYCROFT.

Specific Performance—Statute of Frauds.

Claim for specific performance by A. against B. The claim stated that B. had agreed, by writing, to demise a house to A. for a certain term, at a certain rent; and that, at the same time, A. had agreed by parol to pay B. a premium of 200l. The claim prayed that B. might grant A. a lease, A. offering to pay the premium agreed on by parol. Claim dismissed, as being in contravention of the Statute of Frauds.

In consideration of 200l. premium paid by A. a lease was granted to A. of a house at a certain rent for a certain term. This term expired. B. agreed to grant A. a lease for a certain term at a certain rent, under and subject to the same covenants, clauses, and agreements as were contained in the old lease:—Held, that this agreement did not include the term that A. should pay B. a premium of 200l.

Mrs. Pycroft demised the public house mentioned in the agreement hereafter stated to Mr. Calvert, for a term of years expiring on the 29th of September 1852.

By an indenture of lease, dated the 6th of April 1832, and made between Mr. Calvert of the one part, and Mr. Martin, the plaintiff, of the other part, in consideration of 200l. paid by Mr. Martin to Mr. Calvert, by way of premium, Mr. Calvert demised the public house to Mr. Martin for the term of twenty-one years, less two days, to commence from the 29th of September 1831 (which would, therefore, expire on the 27th of September 1851) at the rent of 70l. In this deed Mr. Martin covenanted to lay out 200l. in repairs and improvements.

Mrs. Pycroft's interest in the property became vested in James Pycroft, John W. Pycroft, and Joseph Pycroft.

An agreement dated the 1st of August 1849, and signed by Messrs. James Pycroft, J. W. Pycroft, and Joseph Pycroft, was in the following terms:—"The said James Pycroft, J. W. Pycroft, and Joseph Pycroft severally agree with the said William Martin, at any time hereafter, at his request, costs, and charges, by a good and sufficient deed, to demise and lease the messuage or tenement known by the name of 'The Ship Alehouse,' together with the messuage or tenement adjoining thereto, formerly used as a coffee-house, both situate in Chichester Rents aforesaid, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, (as the same are now in the occupation of the said William Martin, for the term of twenty-one years, wanting two days) from the expiration of the said lease under which the said William Martin holds the same, viz., from the 27th of September 1852, at the yearly rent of 70*l.* payable quarterly, and under and subject to such and the same covenants, clauses, and agreements, as are contained in the lease under which the said William Martin now holds the said premises."

This was a claim by Mr. Martin for a specific performance of the agreement.

The claim stated the lease from Mrs. Pycroft to Calvert, the lease from Calvert to Martin, and the agreement. The claim then contained the following statement:—"That it was agreed between the parties that 200*l.* should be paid by W. Martin as a premium, in consideration for the lease." The claim asked that, on the payment of 200*l.* by Martin, by way of premium, which payment he was ready and willing and offered to make, a lease might be granted to him according to the terms of the agreement.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Dauncy, for the plaintiff, admitted that the payment of a premium of 200*l.* was a part of the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants, and that a decree for giving a lease to the plaintiff could only be made on the terms of the plaintiff paying such premium. They then contended that this term, "the payment of the premium," was included in the agreement. It was "a clause" or "an agreement" within the meaning of the words of the agreement—"the same covenants, clauses, and agreements as are contained in the lease." All the terms, then, were provided for by the written agreement. The proper construction of the agreement was, that in consideration of 200*l.* premium, paid by Martin, the plaintiffs were to grant a lease having the same operative part as that contained in the lease of the 6th of April 1832.

Mr. Malins and Mr. W. R. Ellis contended that the term as to the payment of the premium was not contained in the written agreement. The case of the plaintiff, then, was this—a claim to have performance of a written agreement, with a parol addition. This he was precluded from obtaining by the Statute of Frauds.

PARKER, V.C.—I do not see how I can get over the Statute of Frauds. The agreement is for a lease "under and subject to such and the same covenants, clauses, and agreements as are contained in the lease under which the plaintiff now holds." These expressions seem to prescribe the terms upon which the property is to be held after the lease is granted, and are not applicable to the consideration to be paid before the lease is granted. The premium of 200*l.* is not a "covenant," a "clause," or "an agreement," to be contained in the lease. There is, then, a written agreement for a lease without a premium. But then the plaintiff says that it was always the intention of the parties that a premium should be paid, and he offers to pay the same premium as that which he had paid to Mr. Calvert. If Mr. Martin had refused to perform the agreement, the defendants would in vain have urged the Court that Mr. Martin should take a lease and pay a premium of 300*l.* A material part of the agreement has been omitted from the written agreement, and I do not see how the Court can decide in favour of the plaintiff consistently with the Statute of Frauds.

Claim dismissed, without costs.

Practice—Foreclosure Claims—Abandoned Issue.

At the hearing of a foreclosure claim, an issue was directed as to a question of notice, which issue was afterwards abandoned by the defendant:—Held, that before the claim could come on again for hearing, an order must be made on motion, that the issue should be taken pro confesso.

This was a foreclosure claim. At the hearing an issue was directed as to a question of notice. The defendants abandoned the issue.

This was an application on the part of the plaintiff that the claim might be restored to the paper.

Mr. Torriano, for the application.

PARKER, V.C. said that he thought the proper course was that the plaintiff should give a notice of motion that the issue should be taken pro confesso. On the motion coming on, an order would be made on it, the effect of which would be that the trial of the issue would be dispensed with, and the claim be put in the same situation as if the issue had been tried and found in the plaintiff's favour.

LORDS JUSTICES.	}	LORD JAMES STUART v.
1852.		THE LONDON AND
April 19, 20, 28;		NORTH-WESTERN RAIL-
May 4.		WAY COMPANY.

Railway—Landowner—Abandonment of Line—Specific Performance.

A railway company, about to make a branch line, agreed with a landowner to take so much of certain specified lands as should be required for the branch line, at a stated price per acre, which price, as to one part, was to include consequential damages, in consideration of his withdrawing his opposition to the bill in parliament. The opposition was withdrawn, and the bill passed in July 1847. On the 1st of September following, a formal agreement was tendered to the company for their execution, but their solicitors altered it into a contract conditional on the formation of the line, and did not return it to the landowner's solicitors until the 7th of December 1848. Before this, the landowner, on the 18th of March 1848, had died, and on the 14th of October in the same year the company gave notice of their abandonment of the line. A claim for specific performance was filed by the devisees in trust of the will of the landowner, on the 18th of June 1850, but it was not brought to a hearing until the 21st of February 1852. The compulsory powers of taking land given by the act expired on the 9th of July 1850, but the time for the completion of the line would not terminate until the 9th of July 1852. The Master of the Rolls (on the authority of Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company, since overruled) decreed specific performance; but on appeal,—Held, that the plaintiffs could have complete relief at law, if they were entitled to have any; that the principle of mutuality wholly failed; and that their laches either from the passing of the act, or, at any rate, from the time of notice of abandonment of the line to the time of the filing of the claim, was fatal to the suit, and that specific performance could not be decreed.

This was an appeal from a decree for specific performance, made by the present Master of the Rolls, on the 21st of February last. The facts were these:—In 1847 the London and North-Western Railway Company projected the formation of a branch line from their main line at or near Watford to St. Albans, Luton, and Dunstable, which line, if made, would pass through the property of the Marquis of Bute, in the parish of Luton. Other schemes for the same or a very similar line were projected, and the Marquis petitioned against the bill. In order to induce him to withdraw his opposition, the London and North-Western Railway Company entered into negotiations with him for the purchase of his land at stated prices, and the stipulations were, on the 1st of April, reduced to writing by a memorandum of that date, entitled "Watford and Dunstable Railway.—Heads of agreement for the purchase of the Marquis of Bute's land required by the above railway." The body of the agreement referred to a map at the end. There were four portions of land comprised in it, distinguished therein by the letters A, B, C, and D, which respectively referred to the map. As to A, the company were to give 400*l.* an acre for the land required for the railway, and an additional 100*l.* for making a particular road. As to B, which was land laid out for building purposes, and was called "The Seven Acres," the company were to give 1,250*l.* an acre, for seven acres, extending from Love Lane to the street called "North Street;" and as to C. they were to give 400*l.* an acre for what was required; and as to D. they were to give 250*l.* an acre: besides which, they were to pay 1,000*l.* for depreciation of homesteads, &c. The agreement then contained the following clause:—"The above prices refer to the quantities of land required for the railway, and to the contents of the roads and severed portions, which are respectively to be accurately measured." The agreement was signed by Mr. Edward Driver, as agent on behalf of the company, and by Mr. S. Collindon, as agent on behalf of the Marquis of Bute. Upon the execution of this agreement, the Marquis withdrew his opposition, and the bill passed on the 9th of July 1847, empowering the London and North-Western Railway Company to construct the Watford, St. Albans, Luton and Dunstable branch line, the powers for compulsory purchase of lands to continue three years from the passing of the act, and the time for completion of the line being limited to five years from the passing of the act. After the act received the Royal assent, a formal draft agreement was drawn up by Messrs. Roy & Co., the solicitors of the Marquis, and by them transmitted, on the 1st of September 1847, to Messrs. Parker & Co. the company's solicitors, accompanied by a letter requiring Messrs. Parker & Co. to carry "the heads of agreement" into effect. This draft agreement was detained by Messrs. Parker till the 7th of December 1848, when it was returned to the devisees of the Marquis, who had died, with such alterations as to convert what Messrs. Roy & Co. intended to be a draft of an absolute and unconditional agreement into an agreement contingent and conditional upon and only to be effective in case the London and North-Western Railway Company should construct the railway through Luton, though the Marquis would be bound to sell and convey the lands upon the stipulated terms. This matter led to a long and useless correspondence. The Marquis of Bute made his will, dated the 22nd of July 1847, whereby he devised his Luton estate to Lord James Stuart, Mr. O. T. Bruce, and J. M. Macnabb, upon trusts for sale, and appointed them his executors. He died on the 18th of March 1848. On the 14th of October 1848, the company gave notice to the devisees and executors of the will of their intention to abandon the branch line. On the 9th of July 1850 the compulsory powers of the company ceased; but the time for the construction of the line, being five years from the passing of the act, would only expire on the 9th of July 1852. The correspondence which had taken place between the solicitors of the company and the solicitors of the Marquis was continued after his death between the solicitors of the company and those of the devisees and executors under his will, down to the month of June 1850. On the 18th of that month, and three weeks before the compulsory powers under the act would cease, the devisees and executors filed their claim against the company, praying specific performance of the agreement of the 1st of April 1847, but (the case of Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company having been decided by Vice Chancellor Turner on the 9th of July 1851, of which notice of appeal was immediately given), it was not proceeded with until the 21st of January last, and was brought to hearing on the 21st of February following, when the Master of the Rolls made a decree for specific performance. From this decree the company appealed. The Master of the Rolls, as appears by his judgment(1), considered

(1) The judgment of the Master of the Rolls was in part as follows:—"I cannot distinguish this case from that of Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company, and I must decide accordingly. * * First, the contract is an absolute contract to be entered into immediately, and there is nothing in it shewing that it is conditional on the act passing. On the face of it it is an immediate and direct contract. There is a clause in it marked D, and in that the sum of 1,000*l.* is given for depreciation, and in Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company the same thing appears. In that case Sir George Turner, in an elaborate judgment, after taking time to consider, decreed specific performance, though there it was urged, first, that the agreement was conditional; secondly, that one undivided sum was given as a price for the land and compensation for consequential damages, and therefore that the price of the land could not be ascertained; thirdly, that the powers of the company had ceased, and they could not compel a sale; and, fourthly, the hardship of the case. Now those grounds of objection to the specific performance are all to be found in this case. * * In the first place, I do not find such ambihimself as bound by the authority of Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company. On that occasion the following cases were cited—

For the plaintiffs—

Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company, 9 Hare, 129; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 566.

guity as to make it impossible to perform the contract, assuming it to be a valid contract. I think a surveyor could ascertain the land required, and, of course, the price to be paid. The contract is for the land wanted for the present project, as contemplated at the time, and what was wanted for deviation was also talked of, and therefore I should have required something more on this point if the Vice Chancellor had not expressed an opinion in Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company. It was there said that 4,500*l.* was for the land and for consequential damage; and, therefore, there was no distinct price stated as the price of the land. And so here the same thing appears. The other objections are that Mr. Driver had no authority. I am not satisfied, from the evidence, that he had authority to enter into this particular contract; but it is clear he had authority to enter into some contract, and the company saw the contract after it was entered into, and adopted it, and allowed the Marquis of Bute to withdraw his opposition in pursuance of it; and it is not denied that it was in consideration of the agreement that the Marquis withdrew his opposition. Now, if a party employs an agent, and he exceeds his powers, yet if the principal acts on what has been done by the agent, and allows others to act upon it, the Court will not allow the principal to draw back, but will compel him to abide by the contract. The next point is, that the company had no power to contract; but the same objection was taken in Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company, and Preston v. the Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle Railway Company. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is nothing on that ground to prevent a decree for specific performance, and I am bound by the authorities. As to

A short preliminary discussion arose on the opening of the appeal, whether the suit being by claim, and the appeal being from the whole decree, the defendants should begin, but, by consent of the defendants, the plaintiffs began (2).

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Macnaghten, for the plaintiffs.—The present is stronger than Webb's case, for here the period for the formation of the line has not expired; there the company was insolvent and unable to complete the line, here the defendants are a wealthy corporation. The Master of the Rolls has righteously decided that it is not because the company no longer want the land that the plaintiffs are not to have the benefit of that contract, on the faith of which the late Marquis of Bute withdrew his powerful opposition to their bill. His Honour has also well answered the objection as to any uncertainty as to the land required. We say the meaning of the words "land required for the railway," is land which, at the time of the contract, as shewn in the map annexed to and referred to in it, was assumed would laches there is no difficulty. It is true that the rule is, and the cases shew, that parties must not delay, but must bring forward their claims with reasonable diligence, if they expect to succeed in obtaining redress; and I shall not be the first Judge to weaken that principle; but in all those cases the contract was given up at the time. Here, on the contrary, it was kept for a year and a half, and that is the laches, not of the plaintiffs, but of the defendants themselves. It is true no claim was filed till eighteen months after the draft-agreement was returned, but it was only then that the compulsory powers of the company ceased; and the plaintiffs did not know whether the company would or not take the land, and all this time the contract was insisted on as valid. I am of opinion, therefore, that the cases as to laches do not apply. As to the contract, or the enforcement of it being useless, it is the fault of the defendants themselves, for they might have done all they contemplated doing; and it would be a dangerous principle to say, that because one party to a contract has changed his mind, and now that he finds it of no use, refuses to carry it out, that, therefore, specific performance cannot be enforced. As to the hardship of the case, that question was discussed in Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company; and I adopt the views there propounded. The case is one in which I am bound by authority, and specific performance must be decreed, and there must be a reference as to whether, and when first, a good title was shewn."

be required for the formation of the line. The following cases, in addition to those cited in the court below, were referred to—

Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company (on appeal), ante, 337.

Peacock v. Penon, 11 Beav. 355; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 57.

Edwards v. the Grand Junction Railway Company, 1 Myl. & Cr. 650; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 47.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE, soon after the opening of the case, inquired of the counsel for the defendants, whether, if the Court should think an action ought to be brought, the company were willing to admit at the trial that the heads of agreement, dated the 1st of April 1847, were a contract under the common seal of the company, or to that effect. The question was answered in the affirmative, and it was said that the company would make any admissions which the Court should think necessary to meet the justice of the case.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Willcock and Mr. Speed, for the defendants.—The first and most material question for the Court to consider is, whether it will lend its aid to enforce specific performance at all in such a case; whether it will not adhere to its own determination in Mr. Webb's case, which practically adopted the principle lucidly laid down by Lord Redesdale in the case of Harnett v. Yeilding (3), both with respect to uncertainty in agreements, and also upon the question of the defendants being, or not being, legally competent to perform the act sought to be enforced. At page 553 he says, "I have bestowed a good deal of consideration upon this case, and particularly with reference to the jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity in decreeing specific performance of agreements. Whether courts of equity in their determinations on this subject have always considered what was the original foundation of decrees of this nature, I very much doubt: I believe that from something of habit decrees of this kind have been carried to an extent which has tended to injustice. Unquestionably the original foundation of these decrees was simply this, that damages at law would not give the party the compensation to which he was entitled; that is, would not put him in a situation as beneficial to him as if the agreement were specifically performed. On this ground the Court, in a variety of cases, has refused to interfere, where from the nature of the case the damages must necessarily be commensurate to the injury sustained." Then, after an instance in point, and a statement as to the propriety of conduct of a plaintiff being necessary to induce the Court to interfere, his Lordship adds, "He must also shew that in seeking the performance, he does not call upon the other party to do an act which he is not lawfully competent to do; for if he does, a consequence is produced that quite passes by the object of the Court, in exercising the jurisdiction, which is to do more complete justice." There is the sound principle of the Court. Here it is quite obvious that it is against public policy, against the policy of the law, to assist, nay more, to force a corporation, as is here asked, to obtain land which they never can hold for the purposes for which alone they were by the legislature created a corporation. To say that the period for the formation of the railway has not expired, and that, therefore, the company may have the land, involves a practical absurdity, for this line of railway must be formed between the day when this Court will pronounce its judgment and the 9th of July, a thing physically impossible to be done. Then, the land to be taken was not what was marked on the map, but what was actually wanted for the formation of the line, and as none is now wanted none should be paid for. At any rate, the words, if they do not bear this interpretation, are too vague, too uncertain to be enforced. Then the 1,000*l.* is to be paid for depreciation of homesteads. How can it be said what homesteads are depreciated, so long as it is uncertain what homesteads will be interfered with? And as no line is to be made no homesteads can be interfered with.

The case, if one to be entertained, is one for damages at law, and not for specific performance—Bland v. Crowley (4) and Gervais v. Edwards (5). The laches of the plaintiffs are not to be lost sight of, who, although they received notice of the abandonment of the line so early as the 14th of October 1848, did not file their claim until the middle of June 1850, nor bring it to a hearing until the latter part of February 1852.

Mr. Macnaghten, in reply.—There is no absurdity whatever in saying that the line can be formed, although the time limited by the act will expire on the 9th of July next, for there is ample time to obtain an act further extending the period for that purpose. On the question of laches the Master of the Rolls very justly said, that the contract was all along insisted on by the plaintiffs, as it had been by the Marquis of Bute, and that the draft of the formal instrument having been kept for a year and a half before it was returned altered by the solicitor of the company, shewed that the laches were on their side, not on ours.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This case was decided by his Honour the Master of the Rolls, on the authority of the case of Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company; not as that case now stands, it having been brought by appeal to this Court, but as it was after the decision of it by his Honour the Vice Chancellor Turner. As I understand from counsel, the Master of the Rolls seemed to intimate an opinion that but for that authority, probably, his decision might not have been such as, in fact, it was. If that be so, inasmuch as that case of Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company has since been decided otherwise than it was decided by Vice Chancellor Turner, we have not, in fact, the duty of substantially overruling anything that was meant to be decided by his Honour the Master of the Rolls, and we shall be acting in conformity with what would probably have been his opinion, but for a decision which he then thought binding upon him, though, in fact, that decision has since been overruled. Now, I confess I think that this is a weaker case than Webb's case, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, inasmuch as it was offered that this should be put into a train of inquiry at law. It is, perhaps, not necessary, and perhaps not proper, to give any opinion about what the construction of the agreement is, but it seems to me much more doubtful whether there was any binding contract at all, which was also the case in Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company. Upon that, however, I give no opinion. It may be that there was such a contract, or it may be there was not such a contract. The ground on which we proceeded in Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company was this: that whether it was a contract or not, the circumstances of the case made it such that it was not fit for this Court to interfere by way of specific performance, because these two circumstances conspired: first, that complete relief might be obtained at law, if the parties were entitled to any relief; and secondly, the principle of mutuality wholly failed, for it was impossible for the company to hold the land for their benefit in consideration of the money which they were to pay. Now, it appears to me that that principle applies precisely in the same way in this case as it did in that. Supposing that this was a contract by Mr. Driver, amounting to a positive contract that, if the railway act passed, these specific pieces of land (assuming them to be defined) should be taken, and a given sum paid for them; supposing that was so, then the only difficulty which the present plaintiffs are in is this: that it was a contract, not (as it was in Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company), binding on the defendants, because it was entered into by Mr. Driver, as agent, who had no authority to bind them. The interference, therefore, of this Court on the principle of the case of Edwards v. the Grand Junction Railway Company, and one or two others, which were decided on the same principle, is not to be entertained. Now, that may give a title to relief in this Court, but the only relief it could give would be to put the parties in the same situation as they were in the case of Webb v. the Direct London and Portsmouth Railway Company, where, in point of fact, the company, after the act of parliament had been obtained, entered into a contract binding themselves to adopt the contract entered into by the parties before the company came into existence. That is the course which appears to me, and, I think, to my learned Brother, proper to be taken, and will be the course that will do substantial justice in this case. It was agreed in the outset that the defendants would enter into any admissions or stipulations that might be necessary to enable the plaintiffs to raise the question at law, such as that the company will admit that an agreement dated the 10th of July 1847, was duly entered into by them under the common seal. The terms, however, of such admissions can be arranged, and the case be mentioned again.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Perhaps the time that the plaintiffs suffered to elapse after the passing of the act of 1847, or (if no time before October 1848, when notice of abandonment was given, ought to count, then) after October 1848 before they filed, in June 1850, the present claim, is fatal to it; but assuming that not to be so, I am unable to view the case as one for specific performance. In the first place, if the parties were reversed, could the defendants, as plaintiffs, have obtained a decree for specific performance? Against this, probably, the mere circumstance of the abandonment of the undertaking, for the purpose of executing which the land in question, or so much of it as in truth was proposed or agreed to be purchased, was purchased or agreed to be purchased, would have formed an insurmountable objection. If so, it may be thought to dispose of the actual contention; but, independently of any such consideration, I doubt whether to enforce specifically the terms, or any part of the terms, of the document before us, that of the 1st of April 1847, would not, in the actual condition of circumstances, be against public policy, or, in other words, contrary to law. But setting aside this point also, I am of opinion that the language of the document in parts of it necessary to be construed and acted upon, if there is to be a decree of any kind for specific performance against the defendants, is too vague, too uncertain, too obscure, to enable this Court to act with safety or propriety for any such purpose. For this vagueness, uncertainty, and obscurity, very possibly the intention of the agents concerned that a more formal document, not merely by way of conveyance, but by way of contract, should be prepared and executed, may account. But, however this may be, the plaintiffs must, I conceive, be left to proceed at law as they may be advised; they will have the benefit of the concessions for facilitating their proceedings there which the defendants have made by their counsel.

May 4.—The admissions finally arranged were as follows:—"The defendants, by their counsel, consenting and undertaking that, in the event of an action being, before the end of Trinity term next, brought against them by or for the benefit, or under the direction of the plaintiffs, for the purpose of obtaining damages for the breach of the alleged agreement of the 1st of April 1847, and such action being prosecuted with due diligence, the defendants will in such action, and for the purposes thereof, admit that, on the 10th of July 1847, a deed was duly executed by the defendants, under their common seal, whereby they covenanted for themselves and their successors, with the late Marquis of Bute, his executors and administrators, that they would perform all agreements, if any, entered into previously to the 9th of July 1847 by Edward Driver, acting, or purporting to act, as their agent for the purchase of any lands from the said Marquis, to be taken by them for the intended railway, and for compensation to be made for any damage to be occasioned by the said railway, in the same way as if such agreements or agreement, if any, had been duly entered into by them under their common seal on the day of the date thereof, and as if they had then been duly authorized by law to enter into such agreement or agreements, the defendants also consenting to dispense with profert in such action; and any of the parties are to be at liberty to apply to this Court as there shall be occasion."

G. P., a tenant for life of real estate, with remainder for all and every, or any one or more, to the exclusion of the other or others of his children as he should by deed or will appoint, made an appointment to trustees upon trust for his son G. S. P., his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and to be conveyed to him when and as he should attain the age of twenty-three years; and in case his son G. S. P. should die before he should have attained the age of twenty-one years, to the use of the second, third, and fourth, and every other son of the testator successively in tail, with remainder to his daughters in tail, with remainder to his brother in fee. And after directing the payment of two annual sums of money during the minority of his son, he directed his trustees to invest the clear residue of the rents and profits to accumulate until G. S. This was a special case under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35.

Shulldham Peard, by his will, dated the 15th of June 1829, gave and devised all his lands, tenements, and hereditaments wheresoever, unto and to the use of the defendants William Henry Whitehead and Deeble Boger, their heirs and assigns, upon trust as to one-half of whatever might be his estate and interest in the tithes of the parish of Budock and Falmouth, in the county of Cornwall, and as to certain other hereditaments therein particularly specified and described, upon certain trusts therein, in favour of his son John Whitehead Peard and his children : and as to all the rest and remainder of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments devised to his said trustees, upon trust for his the said testator's son George Peard and his assigns during his natural life, with remainder for all and every, or any one or more, to the exclusion of the others or other of them, of the children of George Peard, for such estate or estates, and in such manner and form as George Peard should at any time or times by any writing or writings, to be by him signed and sealed in the presence of, and attested by two or more credible witnesses, or by his last will and testament in writing to be signed and published as the law required for the devise of real estates, direct, limit and appoint; and in default of such direction, limitation, or appointment, or subject thereto, upon trust for all and every the children of the said George Peard in tail, such children to be entitled equally as tenants in common in tail, with cross remainders in tail between such children respectively as tenants in tail for the time being, to be always entitled if more than one as equal tenants in common, with remainder if there should be but one child for that one child in tail, with remainder for the said J. W. Peard, his heirs and assigns for ever; and the testator declared that such of the estates for life thereinbefore limited should be considered as without impeachment for waste; and the said testator declared that the estate and interest of all married women entitled under the limitations in his will should, whether the same were real or personal estate, be for their separate use and benefit independent of their husbands.

By a codicil, dated the 4th of June 1831, the testator, after stating that he had, since the date of his will, contracted to purchase of the representatives of Mr. Richards his moiety or interest in the tithes of Budock, gave and devised such moiety or interest to the above-named defendants, W. H. Whitehead and D. Boger, their heirs and assigns, to hold the same upon the trusts declared concerning the other moiety of the same tithes which he was then seised of or entitled to.

On the 27th of December 1832, Shulldham Peard died, leaving his two sons G.

Peard and J. W. Peard surviving; he was seised of real estates which were not in any way affected or disposed of by his will and codicil, otherwise than as his residuary real estate, of which trusts were declared by his will and codicil in favour of George Peard and his children.

By an indenture, dated the 5th of July 1833, between J. W. Peard of the one part, and G. Peard of the other part, J. W. Peard granted and released to G. Peard and his heirs the quarter of all that undivided moiety, which by the will and codicil of Shulldham Peard was devised to or in trust for J. W. Peard during his life, with limitations over in favour of his children, of and in the tithes in the parish of Budock, to hold the same unto the said G. Peard, his heirs and assigns, for and during the natural life of John Whitehead Peard, to the use of the said G. Peard, his heirs and assigns, during the natural life of the said J. W. Peard.

Before the date of the will of S. Peard, G. Peard had intermarried with Frances Cook Peard, and by her had two sons and three daughters, that is to say, G. Peard, born the 25th of July 1825, who died on the 2nd of August in the same year; the plaintiff G. S. Peard, born the 29th of June 1829, in the lifetime of S. Peard; the defendant Charlotte Kekewich, who attained twenty-one, and was the wife of the defendant Trehawke Kekewich; Francis Peard, who was born on the 30th of June 1832, and died the 3rd of June 1834; and the defendant Frances Peard, who was still an infant of the age of sixteen years.

G. Peard, by his will, dated the 30th of November 1836, appointed his wife F. C. Peard his sole executrix, and also appointed her during her life, and after her decease his trustees thereafter named, and the survivors and survivor of them, guardians of the persons and property of his children during their respective minorities; and after making various provisions respecting his personal estate, the testator thereby gave, devised, and bequeathed and appointed all that one-eighth part of the great tithes of Budock, in the county of Cornwall, or the sum of money equivalent to such eighth part, as the same might have been conveyed or secured to him under and by virtue of a deed under the hand and seal of his brother J. W. Peard, and also all and singular other the lands, tenements, tithes, and hereditaments, and parts and shares thereof to which he was in any way seised or entitled, or over which he had a power of appointment or disposal under or by virtue of the last will and testament of his father S. Peard, deceased, or otherwise howsoever, unto Hugh Middleton Ellicombe, William Henry Whitehead, and George Bradford Ellicombe, their heirs, executors and administrators, according to the nature and quality thereof respectively, in trust for his son G. S. Peard, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and to be respectively conveyed, assigned and assured to him when and as he should attain the age of twenty-three years; and in case his said son G. S. Peard should die before he should have attained the age of twenty-one years, to the use of the second, third, fourth, and all and every other son and sons of the said testator's body lawfully begotten, whether born in his, the said testator's, lifetime or after his decease, severally and successively and in remainder one after another as they and every of them should be in seniority of age and priority of birth; and of the several and respective heirs of the body and bodies of all and every such son and sons issuing, the elder of such sons and the heirs of his body issuing being always preferred, and to take before the younger of the same son and sons, and the heirs of his and their body and bodies issuing, and to be respectively conveyed, assigned, and assured to such respective sons when and as they should first attain the age of twenty-three years; and for default of such issue to the use of his, the testator's, daughters Charlotte Kekewich and Frances Peard, and of all and every other the daughter and daughters of his body lawfully issuing and to be begotten, equally to be divided between and amongst them, share and share alike, and they to take as tenants in common, and to the use of the several heirs of the body and bodies of all his several daughters respectively issuing; and in case of the death and failure of issue of the body and bodies of any one or more of his said daughters, then as to the part and share of her or them so dying without issue, to the use of the survivors or others of his said daughters, equally to be divided between and amongst them, share and share alike as tenants in common, and to the use of the several and respective heirs of the body and bodies of such surviving or other daughters lawfully issuing; and if there should be a failure of issue of all such daughters but one, then to the use of such only remaining daughter and the heirs of her body lawfully issuing; and for default of such issue to the use of his brother J. W. Peard, his heirs and assigns for ever. And the testator did thereby direct the trustees or trustee for the time being of that his will, by and out of the rents and profits of the lands, tithes, and hereditaments therein before appointed, to pay unto his wife and her assigns until his eldest son should attain the age of seventeen years a clear yearly sum of 50*l.* for or towards the maintenance and education of his son G. S. Peard, by two even half-yearly payments, the first payment thereof to be made at the end of six calendar months next after his decease; and the testator did thereby declare that on his son G. S. Peard attaining the age of seventeen years, or in case of his dying before that age, then his second, third, fourth, or any other son of his body lawfully issuing and attaining the age of seventeen years, it should be lawful for the trustees or trustee for the time being of that his will to allow and apply the sum of 250*l.* per annum out of the rents and profits of the lands, tithes and hereditaments, for the maintenance and education of his son G. S. Peard, or such other son as aforesaid, at one of the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, or otherwise for his or their benefit, support, or advancement in the world, in such manner in all respects as his wife if living, whether sole or covert, should direct, or if dead, as his trustees or trustee for the time being should think proper, it being his will and intention that no future husband of his wife should have any power or controul over George S. Peard or any other of her children or their property; and subject as aforesaid, the testator directed his trustees or trustee from time to time to invest all the clear residue of the rents and profits which should remain after satisfying and discharging the yearly sums of 50*l.* and 250*l.*, and all necessary outgoings in respect of the real estates theretofore appointed, in government or public securities to accumulate, and also to accumulate the accumulations in like manner, until his son G. S. Peard, or such other sons as aforesaid should first attain the age of twenty-three years, and on his or their first attaining that age, then upon trust to pay, assign and make over all such securities and accumulations unto G. S. Peard, or to such other sons as aforesaid who should live first to attain that age, his executors, administrators and assigns, for his and their own absolute use and benefit.

George Peard died on the 16th of February 1837; his will was proved by his widow and executrix, but he never exercised his power of appointment over the residuary real estate of the said Shuldham Peard, otherwise than by his will.

The construction of the will not being clear, questions were raised, first, whether the power of appointment given by the will of S. Peard to George Peard was duly exercised by the will of George Peard.

Secondly, what estate or interest G. S. Peard took under such appointment, if any, and in particular whether the same estate or interest was or not vested on the said G. S. Peard attaining the age of twenty-one years.

Thirdly, whether under such appointment, if any, the trust in the will of G. Peard contained for accumulating the surplus rents of the residuary real estate of S. Peard until G. S. Peard or such other sons of the said G. Peard should attain the age of twenty-three years, was valid or invalid, and if invalid, to what extent, and who were entitled to such surplus rent and the accumulations, and in what proportions.

Fourthly, whether the trusts of the will of G. Peard contained for accumulating the profits of the tithes granted to G. Peard, by the indenture of the 5th of July 1833, until G. S. Peard or such other sons of George Peard should attain the age of twenty-three was valid or invalid; if invalid, to what extent was the same invalid, and who were, or was, entitled to the profits of the tithes, and the accumulations thereof, and in what proportions.

Mr. Walpole and Mr. Amphlett, for the plaintiff G. S. Peard.—The limitations in the will executing the power must be read as if inserted in the will creating the power — Duke of Marlborough v. Lord Godolphin (1), 1 Sugd. on Powers, 498, 6th ed., 1 Jar. on Wills, 248. In this case the power was given that the appointee might appoint among children, but he gave it to his first son attaining twenty-one, and with a direction that it should be conveyed to such son at twenty-three; the interest, however, was vested at twenty-one, not only in the real estate, but also in the accumulation of the rents.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. J. H. Palmer.—The true construction of this will is, that such one of the sons of the appointor as should attain twenty-three should be entitled to the accumulations. In all cases of powers of appointment by will, it relates to the circumstances as they existed at the death of the testator, and not as they existed at the date of the will. The plaintiff G. S. Peard was one of a class. The testator directed that the first son attaining twenty-three should take. The plaintiff has not made out his title to the accumulations, as there was no gift to him except that contained in the direction to convey at twenty-three. The gift to his daughter, in default of such issue, referred to all the antecedent limitations, meaning that they should all attain twenty-three, until which time it was intended there should be no enjoyment of the gift. The words of conveyance were connected with the words of gift. In this case the construction must be made with reference to the will creating the power. It is, therefore, asked that so much of the gifts as exceeded the period allowed by law, might be declared void, and go under the provisions contained in the will of Shuldham Peard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Upon the first question, I think the will was a good execution of the power of appointment. With respect to the second question, the gift was made to trustees upon trust for George S. Peard, his executors, administrators and assigns. It has been contended that I must stop there, and that is my opinion. On the other hand, it is contended that I must construe it with reference to the succeeding sentence; but stopping at the first part, the sentence is complete, and no doubt exists that, if you give an estate to trustees upon trust for another person, his heirs and assigns, he will take an estate in fee simple upon the death of the original testator, and no further words are required to make the gift complete, as the words are complete in themselves. It is, however, said that the gift cannot be separated from the words which follow, and that they are mixed up with it: but that seems contrary to the grammatical sense of the sentence, as well as the authorities in which words analogous to these have been contained. There might possibly have been some question if it had gone on to say—"in trust for his son, his heirs and assigns, to be conveyed and assigned at the age of twenty-three years," but the word "and" makes a distinction and a separation between the two sentences. But giving it to the trustees in trust for the son, his heirs and assigns, and to be respectively conveyed, assigned and assured to him when and as he attains the age of twenty-three years, does make a distinction between the gift to him and the period when he is to have the enjoyment of the gift itself; and that is made consistent and clear with the subsequent gift by which the rents are directed to accumulate till the age of twenty-three years, and is made still more distinct by what follows, because it directs that in case the son should die before he attained twenty-one years of age, then it was to go over to the second, third, fourth and every other son. If, then, the construction contended for by the defendant in this case is admitted by the Court, what is to take place if G. S. Peard should die after having attained twenty-one and before attaining twenty-three? According to the argument, he would not have obtained a vested interest in himself, nor would the gift over take effect, and consequently it would be a case in which the testator, though he had evidently endeavoured to provide for every event, had manifestly failed to provide for this. But the whole is distinct and intelligible, if the gift is made to the son in fee simple, that it is to be conveyed to him, and that he is to have the benefit of it at the age of twenty-three with the accumulations in the mean time, but that there is to be a gift over if he should not attain the age of twenty-one.

In gifts of legacies similar cases constantly occur. The case of Porter v. Fox is no authority for a contrary decision. There an interest was given to trustees in trust to accumulate the rents for the benefit of certain persons. As soon, therefore, as a direction is made to accumulate the rents for certain persons, it shews that they are not to have a vested interest on the death of the testator, because if it were so there could be no accumulation, and then the testator himself must fix the period of accumulation; and in that case he fixed it at the age of twenty-five, the consequence of which was, that there was no gift to them until they attained the age of twenty-five, the period to which the rents were to be accumulated. In Leake v. Robinson the estates were given to trustees in trust to receive the rents and profits of the estates, and to apply such portion of the rents and profits as might be thought proper for the maintenance and support of certain persons. That is no gift to those persons; it is a mere trust to apply the rents for their benefit. When, therefore, is that trust to cease? When they attain the age of twenty-one the trustees are then to pay over to them certain shares, and Sir William Grant held, no doubt in accordance with all former and subsequent decisions, that there was no gift to them until they attained the age of twenty-one, and that the gift was only contained in the words of payment. Here, there appears to be a distinct gift independent of any words of payment; here there is no direction that the estates shall not be vested in G. S. Peard; but there is a direction that they shall be conveyed to him when he attains the age of twenty-three. I am, therefore, of opinion that G. S. Peard took an estate in fee simple upon the death of the testator, liable to be divested in case of his death under the age of twenty-one years (which event has not occurred), and with a direction that the estates should be conveyed and assured to him upon his attaining the age of twenty-three.

Upon the trust for accumulation, I am of opinion that it is governed by the principle and authority distinctly laid down in Williams v. Teale. There a gentleman gave a power of appointment over a fund, and directed the donee to divide it amongst a certain class. In such a case, the donee cannot give the fund to any person to whom the original creator of the power could not himself have given it. Here the testator gave a power to the donee of the power to divide the estate between one or more child or children, exclusive of the others, in such shares and proportions as he should think fit, by will. At the time when that power came into effect there was one son of his son alive. Why could not the original testator have given a limited estate to that son if he had thought fit, or directed that there should be an accumulation during the period, until that son attained the age of twenty-three, he being at that time of the age of twenty-three years and upwards? Thinking that he had the power of so doing, I am of opinion that the testator had the power of making that accumulation in favour of the elder son.

As no point arises with respect to the other sons, I express no opinion, though it is evident that I think it would not come within the same rule as the other; but that, to the extent of the accumulations, until the son then in esse attained the age of twenty-three, the trust for accumulation was a good, valid and subsisting trust. Such being my opinion, it will not be necessary to notice the fourth point, as it could only arise in case the trust for accumulation was considered invalid. My opinion, therefore, is, first, that the appointment was duly exercised; secondly, that G. S. Peard took an estate in fee simple upon the death of the testator, liable to be divested in case of his death under twenty-one; and thirdly, that the trust for accumulation was valid until G. S. Peard attained the age of twenty-three years.

The provisional committee of a projected railway company passed a resolution that fifty shares should be offered to each provisional committee-man. A, a provisional committee-man, applied for fifty shares. A. stated in an affidavit that no reply was given to his application, and that he never received any communication respecting it, and that he never attended any meetings, and did not pay anything by way of deposit or call. No evidence of any allotment of shares was given in opposition to A.'s statement:—Held, that A.'s case differed from Upfill's case, and that he was properly excluded from the list of contributories.

The Master having struck out the name of Mr. Conway from the list of contributories of this company, this was a motion on the part of the official manager that this decision should be reversed, and that Mr. Conway's name should be placed on the list.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Mr. Terrell, for the motion, relied on Hutton v. Upfill(1).

PARKER, V.C.—On the 22nd of July last, Sir William Horne, the Master to whom the winding up of the affairs of this company had been referred, made an order directing the name of Mr. Seymour Conway to be struck out of the list of contributories, and the official manager now moves that that order may be discharged. Previously to the month of October 1845, Mr. Conway had applied for shares in the company, and to be placed on the list of the provisional committee. On the 10th of that month the provisional committee or the managing committee passed a resolution in these words—"That the number of shares offered to the provisional committee be fifty, and that a letter be sent to each gentleman, requesting an answer on or before the 15th of October 1845, stating what number, if any, he is inclined to take." It appeared that this notice, with a letter from the secretary, was sent in pursuance of this resolution. There was no evidence of what the letter was, but it must have been a letter communicating the notice, for Mr. Conway, in his affidavit, states that "the qualification for a provisional director was the holding of fifty shares in the said company." On the 14th of October 1845 Mr. Conway wrote to the secretary of the company thus—"In answer to yours of yesterday, I beg to say that I have made application for fifty shares, and, as a member of the provisional committee, I shall be obliged if you will allot them to me."

It was said that this case is governed by Upfill's case in the House of Lords, which, no doubt, is binding on this Court, but, looking at the circumstances of the present case, as far as I have stated them, I find a plain distinction between the two cases. In Upfill's case there was an allotment of shares. Upfill was a provisional committee-man, and had accepted the shares allotted to him. In the present case there was no allotment. A resolution was passed that a certain number of shares (fifty) should be offered to each member of the provisional committee, and that a letter should be sent to each member requesting an answer, stating the number which he was inclined to take. The allotment was not to take place, if at all, until after the answer had been received. Mr. Conway's letter contained the request that the fifty shares might be allotted to him, that is, when the allotment of shares should take place. In Upfill's case, however, there was an actual allotment of shares. Here there was merely an offer of an allotment of shares to be, but not yet, allotted; and to bring the present case within Upfill's, I consider it incumbent on the official manager to shew that the offer to Mr. Conway was followed by a due allotment of shares to him. My view of Upfill's case is in accordance with the judgment in Barber's case, which was referred to in the course of the argument.

But how does the alleged allotment stand upon the evidence? The list of contributories appears to have been made out by the Master on the affidavit of Mr. Nalder, the secretary to the company. The affidavit is an extremely loose statement: it contains no reference to the books or to any records kept by anybody on behalf of the company as to what had actually been done. It contains no particular statement as to the letter sent to Mr. Conway, and it does not state in what way the letters represented to have been posted, were addressed.

The Master had put the names of all the provisional committee-men to whom such letters were addressed on the list. Mr. Conway, thereupon, moved that his name might be taken off the list upon this affidavit—"I say that the said secretary did not, nor did any other person, reply to the said letter; and I positively say that I did not receive any letter or communication on the subject, either assenting to my application or declining the same, or allotting any shares to me in the said company; and I, therefore, concluded that my said application was not granted, and that no shares were allotted to me, and that my name was not placed on the provisional committee, and I did not further interfere therein. And I further say that I did not pay any deposit or call or make any other payment in respect of any shares in the said company."

This affidavit of Mr. Conway in distinct terms denied that any allotment, with his knowledge, was ever made to him or communicated to him, and this put the official manager on proof of the allotment having been actually made. The proof tendered by him was the voir dire examination of the secretary of the company, who says, "I received a letter of application from Mr. Conway, and, in reply, sent him the usual letter of allotment, and a letter was received from him stating his readiness to accept those shares." There must be some mistake here. There must have been a letter written to Mr. Conway in answer to his letter of the 14th of October, and it could not have been the usual letter of allotment. This appeared from Mr. Conway's answer. In a subsequent part of his voir dire examination the secretary said that Mr. Conway's name was not struck out. I believe the only record of the proceedings is a prospectus a great deal used, and out of which a great many names have been struck. Mr. Conway's name has been struck out of this prospectus, but before the ink was dry, somebody's finger has been drawn across it to prevent his name being struck out. This is the only record of this important transaction which so much affects the interests of the provisional committee-men. The secretary said, "I believe the names struck out were struck out by the order of the directors, but Mr. Conway's name was not struck out." Perhaps it was not struck out, for, before the ink was dry, there appears to have been some alteration or change of intention in this respect. In answer to the question whether he sent any letters of the kind sent to Mr. Conway the secretary said "I have no doubt that I did, for I sent letters to every one whose names are on this list." And, again, he was asked, "Is that a copy of the letter written by you to Mr. Conway?" he said "It is a true copy so far as the printed portion, but the blanks are filled up according to the number of shares applied for, and in Mr. Conway's case the blank was filled up for fifty shares." Now, that which was produced as a copy was a blank form of a printed letter of allotment, having the date of December 1845, but the word "December" was struck out, and the 17th of November substituted in handwriting, and the blanks were filled up, not with reference to Mr. Conway, but to some person who was to take not fifty, but sixty shares. It was, therefore, a copy of nothing that was sent to Mr. Conway. There was no duplicate kept of any letter sent to Mr. Conway; there was nothing in any book or record, or in the vidæ voce examination of the secretary, to shew what was the address of the letter posted to Mr. Conway.

Nothing could be more loose than this state of things, and the Master, on this evidence, and on these grounds, appears to have come to the conclusion, and I think rightly, that the official manager had failed to prove that any allotment had been made to Mr. Conway, or that any communication had been made to him subsequently to October 1845. What is Mr. Conway's position? He was a member of the provisional committee who applied for shares, and said he would accept them if they were allotted to him, but no shares were ever allotted to him. It is not alleged that Mr. Conway took part in any proceedings of the provisional committee, or that he attended any of the meetings; and, as the case stands clear of Upfill's case, I am of opinion that, as the law now exists, Mr. Conway is not liable as a contributory, and that his name has been properly struck off the list. The motion must be refused, with costs, to be paid by the official manager; he obtaining them from the estate.

REECE v. TAYLOR.

Judgment—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 14.—
Judge's Order—Charge of Stock.

A. was entitled to a sum of stock carried over to his account in a suit. B, a judgment creditor of A, obtained a Judge's order under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, charging the stock, and then filed a claim against A. and served him with it. The claim was brought on, and A. did not appear:—Held, that B. could not obtain the stock without a petition to be presented in the suit, but that it was not necessary to serve A. with the petition.

An annuity was bequeathed to the defendant, Mr. Taylor, by the will of a testator, whose estate was administered under the direction of the Court, and a sum of stock was carried over in the administration suit to the annuity account of Mr. Taylor.

The plaintiff, Mr. Reece, a judgment creditor of Mr. Taylor, obtained a Judge's order under the 14th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, charging the stock.

This was a claim filed by Mr. Reece against Mr. Taylor, for the purpose of making the stock available to his debt.

The defendant Taylor had been out of the jurisdiction from the time of filing the claim, but he had been duly served with process.

The claim now came on to be heard.

Mr. Pole, for the plaintiff.

PARKER, V.C. made the order.

Mr. Pole then stated that it would be necessary that a petition should be presented in the administration suit, in order to make the annuity fund available, and raised the question whether it would be necessary to serve Mr. Taylor with it.

PARKER, V.C. said that he thought that such a petition must be presented, but that it would be a mere form, and that it would not be necessary to serve Mr. Taylor with it. The best course would be that the claim should stand over, that a petition should be presented in the administration suit, and that the cause and petition should come on together, and that one order be made on both.

Practice—Appointment of a Guardian ad Litem to infant Defendants.

Comparative expenses of the appointment of a guardian ad litem for infant defendants on motion in court, by commission, and on their appearance in court.

This was an application for the appointment of a guardian ad litem to infant defendants without a commission, and without their appearance in court. Two of the infants were resident in Herefordshire and the other in Shropshire.

Mr. T. C. Wright, for the motion.

PARKER, V.C. said—That before he made any order on this application, he desired to make some inquiries of the officers of the court.

PARKER, V.C.—This application was made on the ground that the appointment of a guardian without the appearance of the infants in court, and without a commission, would save expense. I have made strict inquiries of the officers of the court, and especially of the taxing Masters, on the point, and I find that the costs of appointing a guardian, on the motion of counsel, are actually greater than the costs of appointing a guardian on the appearance of the infants in court, or by means of a commission. It is very desirable that this should be generally known, as similar applications to the present have become frequent. The costs of appointing a guardian when the infants appear in court are 2*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*, and by commission, if executed in one place, 3*l.* 3*s.* 2*d.* It should be observed, too, that there might be but one commission for appointing a guardian and taking the answer of the infant. In the present case, if the appointment of a guardian were made by commission, it would be necessary to execute that commission at two places, and the expense would be 4*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* But the costs of an appointment of a guardian on motion are 5*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* It is, therefore, evidently desirable to adhere to the ancient practice of the court, and to appoint a guardian for these infants in the usual way.

A party to a matter may be examined vivâ voce by the Master on an inquiry directed to him.

By an order, made on the petition of Mrs. Kirby and her children, it was referred to the Master to make inquiries as to certain funds mentioned in the petition.

It was proposed to examine Mrs. Kirby in the Master's office vivâ voce. The Master doubted his power to take the examination.

Mr. Rasch stated the difficulty to the Court, and cited Phelps v. Prothero (1), Wood v. Homfray (2), and referred to the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99.

PARKER, V.C. said—The Master, under the General Orders of the Court, may examine any witness vivâ voce, and by the recent act amending the law of evidence, a party may be examined as a witness. There is, then, no difficulty in the way of the examination being taken.

Settlement—Construction—Limitation to Executor or Administrator of Settlor.

By a post-nuptial settlement, R. M. settled certain policies of insurance on his own life, in trust for his wife for life, and after her death, upon trust for the appointees of R. M. and in default of appointment for the children of the marriage. In 1821 R. M., by deed, appointed the monies to become payable on the policies to his executors and administrators. Under an order in a suit instituted for the purpose of carrying the settlement into effect, the policies were sold, and the proceeds invested, to accumulate during the joint lives of the husband and wife. In 1847 the wife died. In 1828 R. M. took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and in 1845 became bankrupt:—Held, that by the appointment, the money representing the policies became part of the general personal estate of R. M.

In 1809, Roderick Mackenzie, being possessed of certain policies of insurance upon his life, became bankrupt, and obtained his certificate, and his assignees renounced the policies. In 1816 R. Mackenzie, by deed, settled the money payable under the policies, upon trust, for his wife, Barbara Mackenzie, for life; and after her decease, upon trust for his appointees, and in default of appointment, in trust for the children of the marriage; and he thereby covenanted to keep the policies on foot.

In 1821 R. Mackenzie, by deed, appointed that the monies payable under the policies should, after the decease of his wife Barbara, go to his executors and administrators.

In 1821, by an order made in a suit, instituted for carrying the trusts of the settlement into execution, it was directed that the trustees should sell the policies, and that the proceeds should be paid into court, and invested, and the dividends be accumulated during the joint lives of Mr. and Mrs. Mackenzie.

In 1828 R. Mackenzie took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act; and in 1845

he again became bankrupt, and obtained his certificate.

In 1847 Mrs. Mackenzie died, leaving several children by the said R. Mackenzie. In 1850 the children presented a petition, praying a declaration that they, as next-of-kin, were entitled to the fund in equal shares, or, in the alternative, that the fund might be accumulated until the death of their father. An order was made upon this petition by the Vice Chancellor of England, that the fund should be accumulated until the death of the father. The assignees in bankruptcy appealed against this order; and the assignee under the insolvency, who had not been served with the petition of the children, also presented a petition, praying for the discharge of the Vice Chancellor's order, and for the payment of the fund to himself. Both petitions now came on for hearing before the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Osborne, for the assignee under the insolvency, contended that an appointment by a man to his executors was an appointment to himself: and they cited—

Mr. Follett appeared for the assignees under the bankruptcy.

The Solicitor General, for the children, cited the cases of Bridge v. Abbot (1), Palin v. Hills (2), and Bulmer v. Jay (3), to shew that the words "executors and administrators" might be construed "next-of-kin."

of-kin are designated by the appointment ; or, secondly, whether this is an appointment to the executors or administrators beneficially ; or, thirdly, whether the effect of the appointment is to make this property a part of the personal estate of the husband ; and, fourthly, (if the last is the true view,) whether the property passes presently to the husband's assignees.

I am of opinion that the next-of-kin of the husband are not designated by the appointment, nor are the executors or administrators to take beneficially, but that the effect of the appointment is to make this property a part of the personal estate of the husband. The authorities fully establish that the effect of a settlement by deed, limiting property to the executor or administrator of the settlor, is to make such property subject to the disposition of the settlor by will, or to be dealt with under the Statute of Distributions. The authorities to that effect are The Attorney General v. Malkin, Daniel v. Dudley, Hames v. Hames (4), Palin v. Hills, Collier v. Squire (5), and Holloway v. Clarkson ; and the case of Holloway v. Clarkson further shews that the settlor in such cases has a present controul over the property settled for his own benefit, or, in other words, the settlor has as unlimited a power of disposition as he had before the settlement. It is true that in Palin v. Hills and Bulmer v. Jay the words "executors and administrators" have been held to designate the next-of-kin. But the decision in these cases depended on special circumstances, which clearly do not resemble the circumstances of the present case. It is true also, that in other cases, such as Sanders v. Franks (6), executors or administrators have been held to take beneficially ; but it was so held by the force of the words "for their own use and benefit," which do not occur here. The natural meaning of the words "a gift to the executors or administrators" does not import a gift to the next-of-kin, even indirectly through the medium of the executors or administrators. And there is commonly a far greater probability that when a person limits property to his own executors or administrators, he means it to form a part of and to follow the destination of his personal estate, than to be given absolutely to his next-of-kin. For the usual purposes accomplished by giving it to his next-of-kin are accomplished by causing it to form part of his general personal estate, in case he does not afterwards choose expressly to give it away from the next-of-kin. And at the same time, if he adopts a mode of limitation by which he causes it to form part of his general personal estate, he thereby reserves to himself that power of giving it to whomsoever he chooses which it is natural for him to wish to possess. There is, indeed, one purpose not answered by the limitation which makes the property part of his personal estate, which is affected by a limitation in a deed to the next-of-kin, and that is to secure the property to his next-of-kin against subsequent creditors ; but that is not an honest purpose, and, therefore, not an object to be implied, or to be conjecturally imputed.

Again, as it has been observed in another case, it is extremely improbable that a person should give his property to his administrator beneficially, when it is unknown and uncertain who may claim to be his administrator, and who might be a small creditor.

The words naturally import, and the presumable intention in such cases is, that the property should go to the executors or administrators, to be applied by them as part of the general personal estate under the will or the Statutes of Distribution, as the case may be, subject, of course, to payment of debts. And as this property forms part of the husband's personal estate, so it appears clear that it passes to his assignees.

In deference, however, to the decision of the Court below, I have thought it advisable to consider on what grounds the claim of the assignees could have been allowed to be obstructed. The assignees would have been entitled to the fund in question if it had been the identical fund settled, and the settlor had afterwards appointed it, instead of the fund being a substitution for the monies which would have been payable at the settlor's death under the policies of insurance ; for it appears from Holloway v. Clarkson that in that case the settlor, after the death of the wife, might have required immediate payment to be made to himself. As the case stands, however, it has been contended that the Court cannot determine to whom the fund belongs till the death of the settlor, the time when the money would have been receivable, if the covenant in the settlement had been fulfilled by keeping up the policies.

As regards the children, I think they must be placed in a position in relation to this fund as nearly approaching their position with regard to the original fund as may be. This might be very important to them, as it is possible that before the death of the settlor he might pay all his creditors in full, and in that case the children might become entitled to the fund, as they might to the original fund. It is proper, therefore, to consider what would have been the position of the children even as regards the original fund. The policies might, after the appointment, have been sold by the settlor, as part of his personal estate, and what he might sell, the assignees would be able to claim. The children have no interest, entitling them to resist the claim of the assignees. In the first place, the children have no such interest under the limitation to them in default of appointment. They never had a vested interest under that limitation, inasmuch as the very subject of the settlement was necessarily a thing only existing inchoately; and even the executory interest which they took under the limitation in default of appointment was annihilated by the appointment.

Nor have the children such an interest as I have before mentioned as next-of-kin of the settlor, irrespective of any limitation in the settlement. Regarded in this light, their claim as next-of-kin is a mere hope or chance of succession. In this respect they have only a possibility, or less than what is technically termed a legal possibility, of an interest derivable through their father, and not an interest capable of being set up as an independent interest.

Nor have they an interest as next-of-kin under the settlement by means of the appointment itself. It may be urged, indeed, that the effect of the appointment as regards the destination of the property is to give the original fund to such person as shall be entitled to the settlor's personal estate at his death, either under his will or under the Statutes of Distribution, as the case may be; that the children are of the class so contingently entitled; that they have an interest under a limitation, as opposed to that mere hope or chance of succession which they have as next-of-kin, in respect of the general personalty of their father, independent of any limitation; that the subject of that hope or chance has only an ideal potential existence; for whether the father will have any general personalty at the time of his death is a matter of perfect uncertainty, and no act is done to secure the existence of such personalty, even if it should exist. But it may be said, that the original fund in question has an actual, though only an inchoate existence, and not a mere ideal potential existence; that an act has been done to secure its existence; that it inchoately exists as a fund tied up till the father's death, and then at least, if the policies are not before vacated, the fund will certainly form part of his personal estate by virtue of an express limitation, and the children will take if they survive, unless the property shall by will be given away from them; that though they have no vested interest, yet their interest is as certain to take effect in possession as that of the appointees under a revocable deed, except so far as the liability to the debts of the intestate is concerned; a liability which does not prevent a legatee from having even a vested interest; and, therefore, cannot prevent the next-of-kin in a case of this kind from taking an interest; and that in such case the children, long before the existence of the claim of creditors, may have ventured to marry, and have founded families in dependence upon an interest like this.

These arguments, however, do not, nor does any other which has been suggested, or which occurs to me, shew that the children take any interest, technically and properly speaking, under the appointment. The fact is, that the effect of the appointment is to add the money to the husband's personal estate, in the first instance, in the hands of his executors or administrators; and, when in the hands of his executors or administrators, it then becomes subject to the operation of any testamentary disposition of it, or in default of that to the operation of the Statutes of Distribution. The persons who take it beneficially do not take as purchasers under the instrument by which the property becomes added to his personal estate. They are not like the objects of a limitation particularly designated by that instrument. They have only the hope or chance, whatever it may amount to, of becoming entitled to the property, or some part of it, not under that instrument, but under the will or intestacy, as the case be.

The children, then, having no interest properly speaking, under the settlement or the appointment, the husband, after the death of the wife, could have sold the policy to the insurance office, or the assignees might have sold it, and would have been entitled to the proceeds. But in fact it has been sold, and, consequently, those are entitled to the fund which has arisen from the sale, who are now entitled to the settlor's interest.

The order of the Vice Chancellor must be discharged, with costs, and the fund must be carried over to the account of the estate of Roderick Mackenzie, with liberty to apply.

Company—Contributories — Transfer of Shares—Waiving Formalities required by the Deed of Settlement.

A. purchased fifty shares in a banking company from the directors of the company. No deed of transfer of these shares to him was executed, as required by the deed of settlement of the company, but the directors gave him certificates of the shares, and he received the dividends declared on them from time to time. The company was ordered to be wound up :—Held, that A. was properly put on the list of contributories in respect of these shares.

A. purchased of B, a shareholder of the company, thirty shares in the company. No deed of transfer was executed, as required by the deed of settlement, but the directors gave A. certificates, and he received the dividends declared on them :—Held, that the formality had been waived, and that the transfer had been complete ; and that A. had properly been put on the list of contributories in respect of the shares.

In January 1844, Mr. Bernard purchased of Mr. Johnson twenty shares in the North of England Joint-Stock Banking Company, and a regular transfer of them was made by deed, in pursuance of the deed of settlement.

In the same month, Mr. Bernard contracted to purchase thirty other shares from Gale's executors. No transfer of the shares was ever made to him, but the directors of the company gave Mr. Bernard certificates of the shares, and he received the dividends which were from time to time declared on them.

Mr. Bernard subsequently applied to the directors of the company to purchase of them some more shares, and, in May 1844, they sold him fifty shares for 200*l.* No transfer was ever made to him of these shares, but, as in the other case, certificates were given him, and he received the dividends on them.

The company was ordered to be wound up, and Mr. Bernard's name was placed by the Master on the list of contributories for 100 shares, without qualification.

It was admitted that all the capital of the company had been lost previously to 1837, and that in January 1844 the liabilities of the company exceeded their assets. It was alleged by Mr. Bernard that he had been induced to take shares from the false representations of the directors.

This was a motion by Mr. Bernard, that the Master's decision might be reversed, or that he might be placed on the list of contributories in respect only of the losses incurred subsequently to 1844.

The clauses of the deed of settlement, which have any bearing on the question argued in this case, are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. Hetherington replied.

PARKER, V.C.—I do not think that Mr. Bernard is entitled to the relief which he asks in respect of these shares. It appeared that there were 100 shares altogether. Of twenty of these he became a purchaser in the regular mode, the formalities prescribed by the deed of settlement having been duly observed. The question which has arisen here is as to fifty and thirty shares, which were purchased subsequently.

As to the fifty, the matter rests upon very clear grounds: he was a purchaser of them from the directors under the 25th clause of the deed of settlement, which gave the directors power to sell shares, and provides "that every purchaser of such shares shall, when and so soon as he shall have paid his purchase-money to the directors, and otherwise have complied with the provisions of the deed of settlement respecting purchasers of shares, or such of them as may be applicable to the case now in contemplation, receive from the directors a certificate or transfer of the same shares under the hands of two of their body, and be thereupon recognized as a shareholder in respect of the same shares, and invested with all the rights, privileges and qualifications incident to the complete ownership of such shares." Mr. Bernard bought these fifty shares from the directors, paid for them, received the certificates contemplated by this clause, and received the dividends on the shares. I find the following provision in the 24th clause, "Every purchaser or transferee of shares shall, in respect thereof, if required by the directors, either expressly, or by a general regulation in that behalf, execute a deed," &c. It appears that the directors did not require him to execute a deed of transfer as contemplated by this clause before the delivery of the certificate, or before the receipt of dividends, but the proceedings were treated as complete without that formality. He took these shares from the directors at that time, for better for worse, and put himself in the position of any other shareholder. It is impossible to suppose that every shareholder entered into a distinct contract with the directors, which was to have regard to the liabilities and the state of the concern at the time of entering into each contract. He was, no doubt, in precisely the same position as any other shareholder of the company, and it did not appear that there had been any irregularity in the proceedings as to these fifty shares.

With respect to the thirty shares bought by Mr. Bernard from Gale's executors, no deed of transfer was ever executed, but the directors gave him a certificate, and he also received the dividends upon them. The 34th clause is as follows:—"Upon every transfer of shares the certificate or certificates held by the former holder or transferor shall be given up to be cancelled, and shall forthwith be cancelled accordingly, and a new certificate shall be issued to the new holder in respect of the shares transferred to him." Hence the directors, in giving him the certificates, gave him what he was not entitled to, except upon having the shares transferred. By the 30th clause the dividends were to remain in suspense until the transfer of the shares should be completed. No doubt the previous clauses assumed that there must be a complete transfer, and there had been more or less irregularity, but it appears to me that the transfer had been waived by the vendor and the directors. There may be considerable inconvenience arising from the waiver, but the circumstance that there was not a deed of transfer, where there was no doubt as to the nature of the contract, cannot vary Mr. Bernard's liability to the company, nor the relation in which he stood to the vendor. The deed was looked upon as a formality more or less important, which they had here dispensed with. The 26th clause which has been so much relied on is this:—"Whenever, by any means whatsoever, any shares shall become actually forfeited, or shall be duly and effectually transferred to a new holder, then and in such case, and not before, the responsibility of the previous holder as a member of the company in respect of such shares shall (so far as the law will in that behalf allow) cease and determine, and such previous holder shall be exonerated and released from all subsequent claims, demands and obligations in respect of the same shares, and from all future observance and performance of the covenants, conditions, stipulations and agreements in the deed of settlement contained in respect of the same shares: Provided, nevertheless, that nothing in this article contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to release the previous holder of shares so forfeited or transferred as aforesaid from his proportion of the losses (if any) sustained by the company up to the period of his ceasing to be such holder as aforesaid." I consider that these shares have been effectually transferred for every purpose, and that the consequences of the transfer existed in this case. The liability of a vendor did not cease, even though there had been a regular transfer, and he was to remain liable for losses during his time of ownership. It would obviously be putting these parties in a different position from what was intended by the contract, if I were to hold that the transaction between them fell short of a complete transfer.

As to the argument that Mr. Bernard was induced to take these shares by incorrect representations, that point was taken in Dodgson's case, and the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce said that, whatever fraud there might be, if fraud there was, it was charged against the directors, who could not be the agents of the body of shareholders to commit a fraud. For these reasons, the motion must be refused.

Motion refused, with costs.

Copyright—Prints and Engravings.

Prints in books containing letter-press and prints, the prints being illustrative of the letter-press, are protected by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45.

The provisions of the 8 Geo. 2. c. 13. as to the date of the publication and the name of the proprietor being printed on every print, apply only to prints published separately, and do not apply to prints forming parts of books made up of prints and letter-press.

In 1851, Mr. Bogue published a book called "The Comical Creatures from Wurtemberg, including the History of Reynard the Fox, with twenty illustrations, drawn from the stuffed animals contributed by Herman Ploucquet, of Stuttgart, to the Great Exhibition."

The book consisted of stories, illustrated by a variety of wood-cuts.

In 1852, the defendants, Messrs. Houlston & Stoneman, published a book called "The Comical History and Tragical End of Reynard the Fox," being the first number of an intended series of like books to be called "Story Books for Young People, by Aunt Mary."

This book also consisted of stories, illustrated by a variety of wood-cuts. The stories were different from those in Mr. Bogue's book, but the wood-cuts, it was alleged by Mr. Bogue, were pirated from those in his book.

A motion was now made, on the part of Mr. Bogue, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling the wood-cuts alleged to be pirated.

By the 8 Geo. 2. c. 13. s. 1. it is enacted, "That from and after the 24th of June 1735, every person who shall invent and design, engrave, etch, or work in mezzotinto or chiaro oscuro, or, from his own works and invention, shall cause to be designed and engraved, etched or worked in mezzotinto or chiaro oscuro, any historical or other print or prints, shall have the sole right and liberty of printing and reprinting the same for the term of fourteen years, to commence from the day of the first publishing thereof, which (i. e. the day of publication) shall be truly engraved with the name of the proprietor on each plate, and printed on every such print or prints."

This act is extended by the 7 Geo. 3. c. 38. and 17 Geo. 3. c. 57.

By the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. s. 2, there is the following enactment:—"That in the construction of this act the word 'book' shall be construed to mean and include every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letter-press, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan separately published."

None of the illustrations in the plaintiff's book had the day of publication or the name of the proprietor engraved or marked on them.

Mr. Craig and Mr. Reilly, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. W. H. Bennet, for the defendants, contended that, as the act of the 8 Geo. 2. c. 13, which was now in force with reference to prints, had required that the day of publication and the name of the proprietor should be engraved on each print, and as this enactment had not been complied with, the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction.

Harrison v. Hogg, 2 Ves. jun. 323.

Colnaghi v. Ward, 12 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 1.

PARKER, V.C. said he had no doubt that the illustrations in the defendants' book were copies from the plates of the plaintiff's, and were not taken from originals; and that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction, subject to the question which had been raised with reference to the act of 8 Geo. 2. c. 13. On this, he reserved his judgment.

PARKER, V.C.—This was a motion for an injunction. The plaintiff published a book containing designs of a group of stuffed animals taken from the Exhibition of last year. To each of the designs was annexed a label descriptive of it, and these designs were illustrations of letter-press, consisting of stories in which the characters which appeared in the group were the persons of whom the stories were told. The defendants published a smaller book containing stories with the names of the same persons or dramatis personæ, but the stories were different from those of the plaintiff, although illustrated by the same designs, which the plaintiff alleged to be piratical copies of the designs contained in his book. This was denied by the defendants, who alleged that they, or the person for whom they published, had paid artists to make original drawings of the group of animals. But, upon an inspection of the designs themselves, and upon a careful perusal of the evidence, I have come to the conclusion that the drawings published by the defendants have been copied from those of the plaintiff. They have not only copied his designs, but they have copied the descriptive labels which the plaintiff had annexed to the designs. Under these circumstances, I entertain no doubt that the plaintiff is entitled to the injunction.

But, it was argued, that the plaintiff had not established his title to any copyright in the designs in question, inasmuch as he had not complied with the requisitions of the 8 Geo. 2. c. 13, the existing statute regulating the copyright in prints and engravings, which provides that the date of the publication and the name of the proprietor must be truly engraved upon the plate, and printed on every print. This act of parliament has been explained and extended by two other acts of Geo. 3. It was admitted on the part of the plaintiff that the act of 8 Geo. 2. c. 13, was the one which now regulates the law with respect to the copyright in designs. But the plaintiff said that his publication was a book, and that it was entered at Stationers' Hall in his name as the proprietor, and he referred to the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. as giving him the copyright in the book.

The definition of a book given in the interpretation clause of that statute is as follows:—"Every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letter-press, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan separately published." No doubt this does not extend to prints or designs separately published; but, where the prints or designs form part of the book, (and the book is no less a book because it contains, in addition to the letter-press, prints or designs or other illustrations of the letter-press), the statute vests in the proprietor of that book, of which he has been registered as proprietor, the right to restrain any invasion or infringement of his copyright. It appears to me that the term "book" must include every part of the book: it must include the engravings and designs which are a part of the book, as well as the letter-press, which is another part of the book. It may be very true that prints published separately are not within that act of parliament by express definition; but the case before the Court is not that of a print published separately, but of designs forming part of a book. I am not aware that there is any decision of a court of law or of this Court either way upon the point. There are some cases which were referred to by the defendants' counsel, but it does not appear that the question before the Court arose in any of them. In the absence of any decision, I think that the correct construction of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. is, that, where there are designs or illustrations forming part of a book, of which book a party has a copyright, that copyright extends to the designs as well as to the letter-press. I must, therefore, decide that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction in the terms of the notice of motion. The defendants have, however, a right to put the plaintiff to bring his action at law, and the injunction must issue on the plaintiff's undertaking, if the defendants require it, to bring his action at law.

A surgeon obtained from a poor patient, on a change of circumstances, his promissory note for an amount beyond what was due for medical attendance. The Court, in the absence of evidence to prove that the patient intended to pay more than what was justly due, ordered the note to be impounded, and directed an issue at law to try the amount actually due.

This was a suit against the defendant, a surgeon at Cambridge, to cancel a promissory note for 325*l.*, given by the plaintiff to him in 1848 in remuneration for his medical attendance. The defendant had brought an action on the note and obtained judgment by default. The defendant had pleaded fraud and covin, and obtained an injunction in this suit to stay execution on the judgment. The bill also prayed for an account of what was due to the defendant at the date of the note, and for an injunction to restrain its negotiation.

It appeared from the pleadings that the plaintiff was a shoemaker at Cambridge, in a very humble way, from 1840 to 1848, during which time he was very frequently attended by the defendant, and certain surgical operations were performed by the latter. In 1848 the plaintiff's daughter married a man of large property, and the plaintiff, previously to his then leaving Cambridge, gave the promissory note in question to the defendant. The bill charged that the note had been fraudulently obtained from the plaintiff, and in ignorance of the real amount for which it was signed, the plaintiff alleging that he thought the amount was for 25*l.* instead of 325*l.* It was also alleged that the average amount of the defendant's yearly bills was about 25*l.*; they had never exceeded 30*l.* or 40*l.*; and that there had been a settlement of account in 1843. The defendant stated by his answer that the plaintiff, on the occasion of his daughter's marriage, called upon the defendant and voluntarily offered to recompense him for his services, and executed and signed the promissory note in the presence of the defendant's footman. The defendant scheduled his visits and attendances from 1840 (and which were nearly daily) and the amount received from the plaintiff. The defendant charged at the rate of a guinea for every visit and claimed payment of the balance. The plaintiff went into evidence to prove that the charges were extortionate, and assuming that there was a settlement up to 1843, and taking credit for the payments made, that there was less than the amount of the note due at the time it was given.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Cole appeared for the plaintiff.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Rogers, for the defendant.

Mr. Cole replied.

Feb. 23.—TURNER, V.C., after referring to the pleadings and evidence, said—The question is, whether, under these circumstances, the plaintiff has made out a case entitling him to equitable relief. It is clear that he has not made out that he intended only to pay 25*l.*, and thought the promissory note was only given for that amount. It is clear that he knew the amount of the note at the time of giving it. It was argued on behalf of the defendant, that the case had been decided by the verdict at law; but if the plaintiff thought that he had a good equitable case, it was open to him to avail himself of it, and to make no defence at law.

The case on the merits is, that a medical attendant obtained from a poor patient a sum beyond the most extravagant charges as remuneration for his services, and obtained it at a time when the patient's position in life was about to change. There is no part of the jurisdiction of this Court more useful or better founded than that which assumes the controul over all transactions between persons occupying a confidential relation towards each other. This jurisdiction ought to be exercised, whatever be the circumstances and position of the parties between whom this confidential relation exists, whether attorney and client, guardian and ward, or surgeon and patient. There is no doubt, that in the present case, such a confidence existed, and no doubt that advantage was taken of that confidence. Why should a greater amount be sought to be obtained from the plaintiff for past services rendered to him, because his position in life was about to change? Why was not an account sent in in the usual way? It was said that the plaintiff did not intend to confine his liberality to merely paying the defendant his account, but that he intended to reward him, and was surely at liberty to do so. This is true; but intention imports knowledge; and liberty, absence of influence. There is not sufficient evidence to shew that the plaintiff intended to pay more than was justly due; and therefore the defendant will not be allowed to appropriate the whole of what he has thus obtained from the plaintiff. On the other hand, the defendant is entitled to receive so much as is justly due to him, and the Court in exercising jurisdiction in the case is bound to take care of the defendant's interests. Although the defendant, therefore, cannot be permitted to recover the full amount, the note cannot be immediately delivered up to be cancelled, but must be impounded as a security for the amount justly due to the defendant. I shall, therefore, direct an issue to try whether the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant in the amount of the note at the time of its date, (that being the form, I understand, in which the issue must be tried,) and direct that the amount, if any, which shall be found by the jury to have been actually due, shall be indorsed on the postea.

 March 6, 22. } WESTWOOD v. SOUTHEY.

Will—Specific Bequest—Leaving Issue living at Death.

*A testator bequeathed to his son William the dividends, interest and annual produce to arise from the sum of 3,000*l.* 3*¼*l. per cent. Bank annuities for his life: and after his decease he gave the said principal sum of 3,000*l.* to all and every the child or children of his said son, to be equally divided between them, or if only one child, then the whole to such only child, to be paid on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one: the interest in the mean time to be applied for their maintenance and education. The testator gave two further sums of 3,000*l.* to another son and daughter in similar terms: and upon the death of either of his said sons and daughter without issue, then he directed the interest, dividends and produce so given to him, her or them so dying, to be paid to the survivors and survivor in equal shares and proportions. The testator's son William had one child only, who died an infant during his father's lifetime:—Held, that the infant took a vested interest in the 3,000*l., liable to be divested by the death of his father without leaving issue living at his death; and that event having happened, the gift over took effect.

This case came on upon two petitions, and the question turned upon the construction of the will of John Westwood, dated the 12th of May 1830, by which the testator gave certain specific property to his eldest son, and then continued in the following terms:—"I give and bequeath unto my son Henry Frederick Westwood the dividends, interest and annual produce to arise from the sum of 3,000*l.* new 3½*l.* per cent. Bank annuities now standing in my name in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England for and during the term of his natural life, and from and immediately after his decease, I give and bequeath the said principal sum or stock of 3,000*l.* unto all and every the child and children of my said son Henry Frederick Westwood, to be equally divided between and amongst them, share and share alike if more than one, but if there shall be but one such child, then the whole of the said principal stock or sum of 3,000*l.* to such only child, the same to be paid or transferred to him, her or them on their severally and respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years, the interest and produce thereof to be in the meantime applied for and towards their maintenance and education." The testator then gave another sum of 3,000*l.* Bank annuities in similar terms to his daughter Eliza Westwood, and a third sum of the same amount to his son William Westwood also in precisely similar terms, and then followed this clause :—" And upon the death of either of my said sons and daughter without issue, then I direct that the interest, dividends and produce so as aforesaid given and bequeathed to him, her or them so dying, shall be paid and payable to the survivors and survivor of them my said sons and daughter in equal shares and proportions." The testator then gave two different legacies, and as to all the rest, residue and remainder of his property in the funds, and all other his estate and effects whatsoever, he gave and bequeathed the same to his daughter and his youngest son William Westwood, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, for their absolute use and benefit, and he appointed James Gray and John Southey executors and trustees of his will and guardians of his children.

The testator died on the 3rd of May 1838, leaving his said three children, Henry Frederick, Eliza, and William, him surviving, and the will was proved by John Southey alone.

William Westwood attained the age of twenty-one years on the 13th of July 1838, and in March 1844 intermarried with the petitioner Sophia Westwood, and there was issue of that marriage one child only, who was born in February 1846, and died in February 1847. W. Westwood died in November 1851, without having had any other issue, and by his will, dated the 16th of October 1851, gave and bequeathed all his estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever to his wife, her executors, administrators and assigns, and appointed her sole executrix of his will. The petitioner, Sophia Westwood, proved the will of the said William Westwood, her husband, and also took out letters of administration to her infant son, who had died, and thereby became his legal personal representative. The petition of Sophia Westwood alleged that she was entitled to the sum of 3,000*l.*, the interest of which was given by the will of John Westwood to her husband, William Westwood, for life, and the capital to his children as before-mentioned, and the petition prayed that the said sum of 3,000*l.* might be transferred and paid to her accordingly.

The second petition was presented by Henry Frederick Westwood and Eliza Westwood, the two surviving children of John Westwood, claiming the said sum of 3,000*l.* by virtue of the gift over in the will of John Westwood upon the death of William Westwood without leaving children living at his decease.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Welford appeared in support of the petition presented by Sophia Westwood, and contended that the child of W. Westwood, who died in his lifetime, took a vested interest in the capital stock of 3,000*l.* There was an immediate gift in remainder upon the death of W. Westwood, to all and every the child and children of the said W. Westwood, with a subsequent direction for the same to be paid or transferred to him, her, or them at twenty-one. The language imported no contingency whatever, and this construction was fortified by the direction to apply the whole of the interest for maintenance and education during the minorities of the children.

Judgment postponed.

March 22.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The question upon these two petitions turns upon the construction of the will of John Westwood. At the date of his will J. Westwood had three children, as appears by his will, all of whom were under age at the time he made his will—Henry Frederick Westwood, Eliza Westwood and William Westwood. The question turns upon a gift of a legacy of 3,000*l.* stock for the benefit of W. Westwood's children, and similar legacies were given for the benefit of the other children, and as one of the clauses in the will, upon which the question turns relates to the three legacies, it is necessary to consider the gifts of all these three legacies given for the benefit of the three children of the testator.—[His Honour then read the clauses in the will as above set forth].—In each case the legacy is specific, and so far there would probably not be very much doubt about the construction; but, after giving the three legacies, the testator proceeds thus:—"And upon the death of either of my said sons or daughter, without issue, then I direct that the interest, dividends and produce so as aforesaid given and bequeathed to him, her or them so dying, shall be paid and payable to the survivor or survivors of them my said sons and daughter, in equal shares and proportions." The testator afterwards gives the residue of his personal estate to his daughter and youngest son William, so that the two youngest children are the residuary legatees. Now, the facts upon which the question turns, which I have now to decide, are these. As I have already said, the question relates at present entirely to the legacy given for the benefit of William and his children.

The facts with respect to William are these: William attained the age of twenty-one and married, and had one child, and only one child, but that child died in early infancy, without leaving any issue in the lifetime of William. Then William died, having no issue living at his death. In that state of circumstances, the representative of the child of William, who is a petitioner upon one of these petitions, claims to have the legacy as having become vested in the child of William and not divested. Upon the other hand, the two other children of the testator, Henry Frederick and Eliza, who survived William, claim it by virtue of the gift over; they say it was not vested in the child, and they claim it by virtue of the gift over. There is a third alternative which might have been argued, but which has not been contended for on this petition, although the parties who might raise the question are before me, namely, whether the residuary legatees were not entitled; that is, whether the gift to the children gave no vested interest to the child of William, and that the gift over is void, and that, therefore, there was no gift at all before the death of William. That point has not been raised before me: still it is a possible construction of the will.

In order to determine the questions arising upon this will and this state of facts, the matter divides itself into the consideration of two points. The first is, whether under the prior gift the child of William took any vested interest at all, and if it did not, it is not necessary to consider what is the effect of the ulterior limitation over, upon the interest of that child; but if the child of William did take a vested interest under the prior gift, then it becomes material to consider the second point, which is, what is the effect of the gift over in the event that has happened—of William dying without having left any issue living at his death.

Now, with respect to the first point, as to whether the child of William took a vested interest or not, it has been contended that in this case there is no gift of the corpus of the legacy of the stock till the death of William; that the gift to William is only of the dividends; and that the gift to the children being to take effect after the death of William, and it being first the gift of the principal, it is contended that the child did not take a vested interest, and the cases of Batsford v. Kebbell and Billingsley v. Wills, which are two common vouchers upon cases of this kind, were cited. Batsford v. Kebbell was this case—The testatrix gave Robert Endly the dividends of 500*l.* 3*l.* per cent. annuities till he should arrive at the age of thirty-two years, at which time the testatrix directed the executors to transfer to him the principal sum of 500*l.* of her 3*l.* per cent. annuities for his own use. The question was, as R. Endly died before he attained the age of thirty-two years, whether he had a vested interest in the stock, and the Court decided he had not: and most justly and reasonably; because the Court saw that upon the true construction of that will, the testatrix did not mean R. Endly to take anything but the dividends unless he attained the age of thirty-two years; and the Lord Chancellor pointed out the distinction between the gift of the dividends and the gift of the principal. He says the testatrix meant to give the dividends whether he attained the age of thirty-two or not, as long as he lived, but did not mean to give the principal, which is a distinct gift, unless he attained the age of thirty-two years, and therefore the Court determined that R. Endly did not take a vested interest.

The case of Billingsley v. Wills is a case a little more complicated, but still the principle of it is easily to be perceived. The gift was in this form:—"I do further give and bequeath to my brother Capel Billingsley the interest of 1,500*l.* during his natural life; then from and after the decease of my brother Capel Billingsley, I give the said sum of 1,500*l.* unto and amongst all and every the younger son and sons, in case there be any younger sons, and all and every the daughter and daughters of my brother Capel Billingsley, now lawfully begotten or to be hereafter begotten, share and share alike; but in case he shall have only daughters lawfully begotten, then only unto and amongst the younger daughter or daughters; and to be paid to them all, every and each of them at and when they shall have obtained to their respective ages of one and twenty years. But my express will and meaning is, that no elder son, in case there shall be more than one son, nor any elder daughter, if there be only daughters of my brother Capel Billingsley living at his decease, shall have any part, share or interest in the 1,500*l.* But in case all the children of my said brother Capel Billingsley except one, either son or daughter, shall happen to die before their respective ages of twenty-one, then I give 1,000*l.*, part of the 1,500*l.*, to such surviving only child, whether son or daughter, and to be paid to him or her at their age of twenty-one." At the time the testator made his will Capel Billingsley had three children, a son and two daughters. Lord Hardwicke saw clearly that no child could possibly have a vested interest till the death of Capel Billingsley, because it was first of all the eldest son who was to be excluded; and if there should be no son, but only daughters, then the eldest daughter was to be excluded. Moreover there was this clause, "but no elder son, in case there shall be more than one son, nor any elder daughter, if there be only daughters of Capel Billingsley living at his decease, shall have any share or interest in the 1,500*l.*" Lord Hardwicke said these words "living at his decease" applied not only to the passage "if there be only daughters," but also to the passage "if there be any sons." Therefore, it comes to this, that it was a limitation over to persons as to whom it could only be ascertained who would answer the description at the death of Capel Billingsley; ex necessitate, it was not a vested interest until the death of Capel Billingsley.

These two cases of Batsford v. Kebbell and Billingsley v. Wills have been often supposed to establish the proposition which I am satisfied they are never meant to establish and have not been held to establish, namely, that merely because the dividends of a sum of stock are given in the first instance to A. for life, and then afterwards there is a gift of the capital of that stock over to his children, that is a vested interest, because there is a difference between the gift of the principal and a gift of the dividends. That is not the principle established by these cases; and to shew that it is not, I would refer to a case that was not cited in the argument, but which is an important case, or rather two cases of the same name, Chaffers v. Abell, both of which are reported in 3 Jurist, 577. The two cases relate to two different wills, and therefore were evidently two causes, though they seem to have been two parties of the same name. They follow each other in the volume of the Jurist to which I have referred. The first case is at p. 577. I read merely the marginal summary:—"A testator bequeathed certain sums of stock," that is, an aggregate sum of stock, "to trustees, to pay 40*l.* per annum to his daughter for life, and after her decease to pay, assign and transfer the sum of 1,000*l.* stock equally amongst all and every the child and children of his daughter, share and share alike, to be paid and transferred to them when and so soon as the youngest should attain his or her age of twenty-one years. At the death of the testator the daughter had four children, one of whom died before the youngest attained twenty-one. The youngest only survived the daughter, yet it was held that the four children took vested interests in the stock." Now, it might have been equally contended that there was no gift of the principal until the death of the daughter; and not only so, but there was actually no intermediate gift of the dividends of that sum of stock which was given to the children. It was only a direction out of the dividends of an aggregate sum of stock, to pay 40*l.* a-year to the daughter; and yet the Court held that it was a vested interest in the children. In that case, it is true, there was the gift of an aggregate sum of stock to the trustees in the first instance; but in the next case, of Chaffers v. Abell, p. 578, which, as I have said, is not only upon a different legacy but upon a different will, there was no gift to trustees at all, and therefore it is extremely like the case before me. I will read the terms of the will from the case itself rather than from the marginal note, as being fuller. "Ann Page, by her will, gave to her sister Mary Abell, wife of Francis Abell, the interest of 500*l.* 5*l.* per cent. Navy Stock, standing in the name of the testatrix, in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England," exactly so far like the case before me, "for her own separate use, not subject to the controul of her present or any future husband, and at her death the said 500*l.* stock to be divided between her children, share and share alike." Now, it is impossible to conceive a case more exactly at all fours with the case now before me. It was a gift, not to trustees at all, but a gift to the sister, during her life, of the dividends of a specific sum of stock, mentioned to be stock standing in the name of the testatrix only, without any gift of the principal; and after her death the said principal sum of stock was given over to her children. "The sister had three children at the death of the testatrix, but only one survived her; and it was held that the three children took vested interests." Now, it is seldom one finds a case so exactly at all fours with the case under consideration; but even if it were not here the case, I have no hesitation in saying that Batsford v. Kebbell and Billingsley v. Wills have been respectively misrepresented as determining this as an abstract proposition, that in all cases where there is only a gift of the dividends in the first instance to A. for life and then a gift over after the death of the tenant for life of the corpus of the stock, in all cases and under all circumstances, the effect of that is to make the gift over a contingent and not a vested interest.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the child of William, on its birth, took a vested interest in the stock; and I may here observe that the gift is to the children; and, then, there is another clause directing the time of payment to be at the age of twenty-one, which, in the ordinary way, makes it a vested gift; and there is the direction also with regard to the application of the interest and dividends, which is not material for the present question. Then, assuming I am right in saying that the child of William took a vested interest at its birth, the next point of consideration is, what is the effect of the limitation over upon the death of William without issue? Does that clause divest the interest that was vested in the children, and what was the effect of it?

Now, of course, the words "on the death of either without issue" are in themselves capable of three different constructions. The first is an indefinite failure of issue—failure of issue generally; the second is "dying without such issue," that is, the class of issue before mentioned (by interpolating the word "such"); and the third is, without issue living at the death of the person mentioned, the person dying. Now, upon the first construction, if that were the right one, if it meant an indefinite failure of issue, the gift over, of course, would be void. The gift over can only be made valid by assuming that the "dying without issue" means either "dying without such issue," or "dying without issue living at the death of the party." That is the only way, by one or other of the two constructions, that the gift over can be made valid at all; and I need not say that the Court will always, if it can, lean to that construction which shall make the gift over—which shall make, in short, every part of the will,—effective, if it can do so without violence. Now, let us see, does it here mean "dying without such issue," that is, am I to interpolate the word "such," or does it mean "dying without issue living at the death"? In order to give the just interpretation to this clause, we must have regard to the fact that the limitation over applies not merely to the particular legacy given for the benefit of William and his children, but that the clause is applicable to legacies given to all the three children, including William; and the language is this, "on the death of either of my said sons or daughter" (there being three of them at the date of the will) "without issue, then I direct that the interest, dividends, and produce so as aforesaid given and bequeathed to him, her, or them so dying, shall be paid and payable to the survivors or survivor of them, my said sons and daughter, in equal shares and proportions." So upon the death of either, without issue, the gift over is of the interest and dividends to be paid and payable to the survivors or survivor of the other two, that is to such one or two of the others as shall survive the party dying without issue. Now, it may be stated to be a general rule, I do not say without exception, arising, perhaps, out of a different context, but as a general and primâ facie rule, where there is a gift over to the survivors or survivor of several persons, after the death of one of them without issue, the words "without issue" are construed to mean without leaving issue living at the death. That may be stated as the general primâ facie rule. For the purpose of shewing that that is the rule, I refer to Ranelagh v. Ranelagh (1), first decided by Sir John Leach, and afterwards, upon appeal, it was decided by the Lord Chancellor, affirming his decision. Sir John Leach, in his judgment, says this, "I adopt the language of Sir William Grant in Massey v. Hudson (2), and take the rule to be, that primâ facie a bequest over to the survivor or survivors of two or more persons after the death of one without issue, affords the presumption that an indefinite failure of issue could not be in the testator's contemplation. In that case, Sir William Grant considered that the presumption was repelled, because the limitation over was to the survivor, his or her executors, administrators and assigns, and the testator, therefore, had not solely in view the personal enjoyment of the survivor. In this case," that is, Ranelagh v. Ranelagh, "there is no circumstance to repel the presumption; on the contrary, the presumption is here fortified by the fact that the legacies are in the first place given for life only," as here, "and the limitation over is upon the determination of the life estate, to which determination the survivorship must be referred. If this plain rule be adhered to there will be no confusion in subsequent cases."

In the present case there is no larger interest given to William than for his life. The limitation over is, in case he dies without issue, to the survivors, and it is a direction to pay the dividends, interest and produce to the survivors or survivor, sons and daughters of the testator, in equal shares and proportions. Here is no mention, as there was in Massey v. Hudson upon which Sir William Grant decided that case, of executors, administrators and assigns; and, moreover, it is not a simple gift of the stock, but it is a positive direction to pay the interest and dividends of the stock to the survivors or survivor of them. Now the words "survivors or survivor" clearly there must be used in their natural sense, that is, such one of them (or both of them, if both survive) as shall be living at the death of William. That must be the meaning of it; because, if it meant "the others of them" why say the survivors or survivor? He knew how many of them there were. They were his own children. He speaks of them nominatim, "his eldest son, his daughter, and his youngest son." He says, if either of them die without issue, then pay the dividends of the stock to the survivors or survivor. If both the others survive that one, then pay the dividends of that stock to those two in equal shares. If only one of them survive the party dying, then pay the dividends of the stock to that one; shewing as clearly as possible an intention of conferring a personal benefit on the survivors or survivor. I am of opinion, therefore, that the limitation over upon the death of any one of them without issue is to be construed, in that case, on the death of any one of them without leaving issue living at the death.

(1) 2 Myl. & K. 441; a. c. 1 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 183.

(2) 2 Mer. 130.

Now, having got thus far, and considering I have to interpret this will in the same manner as if the testator had used these words, that is, on the death of any one of them without issue living at his death, then pay the dividends to the survivors or survivor, the question is then, how does that apply to the gift to the children in the first instance? Now, it is perfectly true that where a legacy is given to one for life, and after his death to his children, with a gift over if he dies without issue, and there is nothing to restrict the "dying without issue" to "issue living at his death," it has been held that the words "without issue" shall be limited to the class of issue before mentioned, that is, the children to whom first the gift is made, as if the words had been "such issue," and that has been argued at the bar, and very tersely and correctly stated to be the rule. But what is the ground on which the Court has felt it could be justified in using that violence to the words and interpolating the word "such"? Why, the ground is this, that as there is nothing to restrict "dying without issue" to "dying without leaving issue living at the death," the limitation would be void if it were not that the interpretation which is applied to it means the particular issue before mentioned. This is commonly called the referential construction; that is, you refer the language of the "gift over" to the language of the "prior gift" in order to limit the general term "issue" to the particular class of issue mentioned in the prior gift. But as I have said, the reason is because the gift would be void if you did not do that. But where the "dying without issue" is in express terms, or, as in this case, by the proper construction of the will, limited to "dying without leaving issue living at the death," no reason then exists for interpolating the word "such."

The limitation over is valid without the necessity of resorting to that expedient of doing violence to the words; and I am not aware of any case in which a legacy being given to one for life, and after his death to his children with a limitation over, that if he dies without leaving issue living at the time of his death, the word "issue" has been restricted to the children, as if the words "such issue" had been used by the testator. I believe no case can be found in which a construction of that sort has been placed in the way I have mentioned; indeed such a construction might entirely defeat the testator's intention, for if the words were construed to mean "if he dies without leaving such issue," that is, without leaving children, only see what might happen; he might have a single child who might attain twenty-one, marry and leave a family, and die before the tenant for life, and then that child and the issue of that child would be entirely excluded, because the tenant for life would have died without such issue, that is, without children living at his death.

Upon the whole case, therefore, I am of opinion that the child of William Westwood takes a vested interest in the 3,000*l.* stock, but that that vested interest was liable to be divested by the death of William Westwood without leaving issue living at his death, and that event having happened the gift over takes effect.

I may observe with reference to the construction that I have put upon this will, that, in the first place, it does no violence to any one single clause in the will. It does not interpolate a single word into the will. It does not reject or refuse to any single word used by the testator, its primary, and natural, and legitimate signification, without any distortion whatever; and, moreover, the interpretation I have given to this will would not only in the event that has happened, but in any event that can happen, be far more in accordance with what one may fairly suppose to be the general intention of the testator than any other construction that can be put upon the words. These reasons alone, I apprehend, would be sufficient to recommend this construction to the consideration of the Court: but I think it is not only so recommended, but that it is entirely in accordance with the cases that have been decided. Therefore, the declaration will be to the effect, that the two children who survived, that is, the eldest son and daughter of the testator, are entitled to the stock which now represents the legacy in question; that is to say, on the two petitions I will make one order granting the prayer of the petition of the surviving son and daughter of the testator. The costs to be paid out of the fund.

Mr. Malins said the case of Billingsley v. Wills had been fully considered by the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, in a case recently decided by him, but not reported, and upon this point his Honour had come to the same conclusion as that now expressed by the Court.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—That is very satisfactory. I am satisfied that Billingsley v. Wills and Batsford v. Kebbell have been repeatedly misapprehended. I have cited them myself when at the bar a hundred times, and I think I may say, never with success.

Note.—This case was subsequently set down for hearing upon appeal before the Lords Justices, but an arrangement was come to between the parties which prevented the necessity of its being argued.

Nov. 8. } ROWLAND v. WITHERDEN.

Practice—Examination of a Co-defendant
—6 & 7 Vict. c. 85—Breach of Trust.

Trustees sold out trust stock and handed over the proceeds to J, their solicitor, for re-investment, who misapplied the money. In a suit by the cestuis que trust against the trustees and J, the plaintiffs examined J. as a witness, and the bill was dismissed as against him:—Held, that a decree might still be had against the trustees, on the ground that J. was not a necessary party to the suit in order to obtain the relief prayed against the trustees.

Quære—whether the effect of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85. is to enable the Court to make a decree against a defendant in equity who has been examined as a witness in the cause.

This was a suit instituted by Mrs. Rowland and her children, who were interested in certain stock, against the defendants Witherden and Morpeth, who were the trustees of that stock, and against Jenner, who had acted as the solicitor of the trustees in the sale of a portion of the stock; and the bill prayed that the stock so sold out might be replaced, &c., and for an account of what was due for interest to Mrs. Rowland; and that new trustees might be appointed in the place of the defendants Witherden & Morpeth. In 1838, so much of the stock was sold out by the trustees as produced the sum of 1,115*l.*; and the trustees paid over that sum to Jenner, for the purpose of its being invested on a mortgage. Jenner misapplied the money, but the trustees had no notice of that fact until April 1847. Jenner was in the habit of making remittances to Mrs. Rowland, as for the interest of the money received by him, and which he professed to have invested. In April 1847, the default of Jenner in making the usual remittance induced inquiries, which led to the discovery that Jenner had misappropriated the money; and, thereupon the trustees endeavoured to obtain security from Jenner; but before they were able to effect this, in February 1848, the present bill was filed against the trustees and Jenner. In the course of the proceedings in the suit, the defendant Jenner was examined as a witness; and the cause coming on to be heard before the Vice Chancellor of England, the bill was dismissed against all the defendants, on the ground that the plaintiffs having examined Jenner as a witness they could have no relief against him; and, consequently, none against the other defendants. The plaintiffs appealed against that decision.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Jervis, in support of the appeal.—Jenner was not a necessary party to the suit in order to obtain relief against the trustees—Ling v. Colman (1); and this distinguishes the present case from Champion v. Champion (2), upon which the judgment of the Vice Chancellor proceeded.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. G. W. Collins, for the defendants.—The bill prays that the accounts may be taken against the three defendants, treating them as all primarily liable. The decision in Champion v. Champion will, therefore, govern this case.

Mr. Bethell replied.

Nov. 8. — The LORD CHANCELLOR (TRURO).—It has been decided in several cases that the plaintiff by examining a defendant as a witness as to matters in which that defendant is interested, has precluded himself from a decree against him—Goold v. O'Keeffe, Nightingale v. Dodd (3), Champion v. Champion, Bernal

v. the Marquis of Donegal, Thompson v. Harrison (4), and The Attorney General v. Dew; and the reason of this is, as stated by Lord Hardwicke, in Nightingale v. Dodd, that if an adverse decree were allowed to be taken against a defendant who had been examined, it would be a great temptation to defendants to forswear themselves. The effect of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, which provides that a defendant in equity may be examined by the plaintiff, and that such defendant's interest shall not be a just exception to his testimony, has not been observed upon. It remains to be considered, as justly remarked by Mr. Headlam, in his edition of Daniell's Chancery Practice, p. 851, whether not only will the evidence be admissible, but whether a decree also may not be had against such defendant notwithstanding he has been so examined. It appears strange that the effect of this statute was not adverted to in the case of The Attorney General v. Dew. I should not feel justified in deciding so important a point upon the construction of that statute without argument. If the plaintiffs are desirous of having this point argued before me, I will give them an opportunity of having that done; otherwise I shall dismiss the bill as against Jenner.

The question remains, whether the dismissing the bill against Jenner on this ground will have the effect of inducing a dismissal of the bill against the other defendants, the trustees. A plaintiff, by examining a defendant, precludes himself from obtaining a decree against that defendant, and also against the other defendants, if, in order to the relief which the plaintiff is entitled to against those defendants, a decree against the defendant who has been examined is necessary. I am of opinion, however, in this case, that in order to obtain relief against the trustees, a decree against Jenner was not necessary. I do not feel called upon in this case to give any opinion upon the general effect of the 32nd Order of the 26th of August 1841 (5), nor upon the propriety of the cases prior to that Order—ex. gr., a suit against some only of a larger number of trustees charged with a breach of trust ; but I consider that the trustees in this case might have been sued without their agent being joined with them as a defendant. The plaintiffs were entitled to sue Jenner also, but they were equally at liberty to sue the trustees alone. The power of joining constructive trustees is rather a privilege than a duty ; and it might be productive of great hardship if cestuis que trust were compelled to sue the agents of the trustees as well as the trustees themselves. If the plaintiffs, then, were entitled to a decree against the trustees if they had sued them alone, I do not think the fact of their having elected to make Jenner a party ought to prevent them from taking a decree against the trustees alone.

Upon the merits I entertain no doubt. The trustees, instead of seeing themselves to the investment of the trust fund, delegated that duty to their solicitor ; the money was misapplied ; these facts, being admitted, establish the liability of the trustees. The trustees were bound to satisfy themselves in some other way than by the assertion of Jenner that the money was duly invested on mortgage. They never required a sight of the mortgage-deed ; but allowed their solicitor to receive the money, relying upon his integrity ; so that, in place of a mortgage of real estate, the cestuis que trust had to depend upon nothing more than the personal security of Jenner. The plaintiffs are entitled to a decree against the trustees in accordance with the prayer of the bill ; and also against Jenner, if they can succeed in shewing that by the effect of the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85. they are entitled to a decree against him, notwithstanding they have examined him as a witness.

Parent and Child—Settlement—Undue Influence—Evidence—Legal Estate—Re-vesting.

This Court will not support the re-settlement of family estates between a father and son when the father obtains extensive advantages to the prejudice of the son and his family, in the absence of unequivocal proof that the whole of the facts were known to the son, that the purposes of the deed were fully explained to him, and the operation of the respective provisions known to him.

But various arrangements for the relief of the family estates from existing burthens, though the father obtained some advantages, were supported, on the ground that the effect of the transactions were known to the son and even acquiesced in by him.

April 16.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
 —This is a suit, instituted by a son against his father, to obtain a declaration from the Court that a deed executed by both, re-settling the paternal estate, is void, and ought to be set aside. The questions raised and to be determined are of great importance, not so much on account of the very large amount of property depending upon them, as on account of the principles involved in them, which affect deeply the relations between parent and child, and go to the root of all their dealings with each other, whether they relate to a sale from one to the other, or to a re-settlement, or any other arrangement of the family property. Before I state what I conceive to be the principles of law applicable to cases of this description, and before I state the effect of the evidence relating to the transaction in question, a minute examination of which is essential for the purpose of arriving at a safe conclusion upon the questions at issue, it will be necessary to state shortly the principal facts of the case.

In the year 1820, Sir Henry Bold Hoghton, the defendant, and father of the plaintiff, married Dorothea Bold, the mother of the plaintiff. At the time of the marriage, the Bold estates, by a will which took effect several years before, were, in the event of the death of a sister of Dorothea without issue (which event took place), limited to Dorothea for life, with remainder to her first and other sons in tail male, with remainders over. It was not, therefore, possible upon this marriage to make any change in the limitation of this property, or to charge it in any manner for the benefit of the husband or younger children of the marriage. The Hoghton estates, on the other hand, were settled upon the marriage in the following manner: upon the death of Sir Francis to Sir Henry Bold Hoghton for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of the marriage in tail male; and the settlement contained a power to Sir Henry to grant to any wife he might have a rent-charge of 2,000*l.* per annum from and out of the rents of the estate, and also to charge it with 30,000*l.* in favour of the younger children. The Bold estate is said to have been of the value of 13,000*l.* and the Hoghton estate 8,000*l.* per annum, or thereabouts. The Bold estate was wholly unencumbered. The Hoghton estate was subject to mortgages amounting to 81,400*l.*, subject to which the limitations of the marriage settlement took effect.

There were five children of the marriage, who were all parties to the suit; the plaintiff being the eldest son, and born on the 2nd of August 1821. Lady Hoghton, the plaintiff's mother, died on the 7th of December 1840; and thereupon the plaintiff became tenant in tail in possession of the Bold estate. The change produced immediately by this event upon the income of Sir Henry was of the most serious character. For many years prior to the decease of Lady Hoghton, he had been in the receipt of a clear income of about 18,000*l.* per annum, and upon the decease of Lady Hoghton that income was reduced to about 5,000*l.* per annum. The plaintiff seems to have felt with pain the change thus produced upon his father's income, and to have been desirous to alleviate the consequences of it. He appointed his father his guardian, and as far as a person under the disability of infancy could sanction, he appears to have sanctioned an arrangement by which, as soon as he attained the age of twenty-one years, a portion of the Bold estate, called the North Meols estate, was to be sold to a gentleman of the name of Scarisbrick, and the proceeds were to be applied, as far as necessary, in the discharge of the incumbrances which affected the Hoghton estate. On the 2nd of August 1842 the son attained the age of twenty-one years; and on the following day he executed a deed disentailing the Bold estates and vesting them in himself in fee simple. Upon the same day he executed a bond, securing to his father an annual sum of 2,500*l.* for his life, with a proviso that this annuity was to cease as soon as the son should pay off the mortgages which then affected the Hoghton estate. Upon the 5th of the same month he executed a will, giving considerable benefits to his father; and in the month of October following he ratified, or rather entered into, the contract with Mr. Scarisbrick for the sale of the North Meols estate. In all this the plaintiff acted under the advice and with the assistance of Mr. Rowson, who had hitherto always acted as the solicitor to the family in all matters relating to the Bold estate, and no other solicitor was employed.

In February 1843 the contract for the sale of the North Meols estate was completed. The purchase-money consisted of 133,000*l.* 81,400*l.*, part of it, was applied in payment of the mortgages affecting the Hoghton estate, and the remainder of this sum of money was paid to the plaintiff. Up to this period, subject to a question respecting a sum of 1,600*l.*, part of the 81,400*l.* (which I shall notice hereafter), no part of the transactions which occurred between the plaintiff and his father is complained of. The voluntary engagement which the son entered into he considered to be due to his father's altered condition. He understood and intended to do all that had been thereby effected; and, except as explanatory of what subsequently occurred, and for the purpose of affording assistance in the due appreciation of the evidence, these events do not affect the decision of the question at issue.

The first question raised is this: the deeds executed by the mortgagees upon the redemption of their mortgages, on the 2nd of February 1843, were so drawn as to produce a merger of these charges. This is complained of by the plaintiff, who insists that, according to the terms of the arrangement he entered into, those mortgages ought to have been assigned in such a manner as to keep them up as valid and subsisting charges against the inheritance of the Hoghton estate, although coupled with a proviso that during the lifetime of Sir Henry no interest should be paid or should accrue in respect thereof.

This, however, is a subordinate question, and but slightly connected with the other and main question in the cause, which is this: on the 7th of July 1843, a deed of re-settlement of the Hoghton estate was executed by the plaintiff and Sir Henry. The plaintiff contends that his execution of this deed was obtained by misrepresentation, and that he was in ignorance of the material provisions contained in it, and that he executed it upon the faith and in the belief that it was an instrument necessary to the final completion of the transactions relating to the payment off of the mortgages, and that it did not alter or affect his interest in the Hoghton estate.

At the time this deed was executed, the plaintiff was tenant in tail male in remainder of the Hoghton estate, subject to his father's life interest therein. The deed is to this effect:—It contains, in the first place, a joint power of appointment vested in Sir Henry and the plaintiff: subject to this, the estate is limited to Sir Henry for life, then to the plaintiff for life, then to the first and other sons of the plaintiff in tail male, then to such uses as the father, if he survived the plaintiff, should by deed or will appoint; after which the estate is limited to the second and third sons of Sir Henry for life, with remainder to their first and other sons in tail male; after which the estate is limited to any other sons which Sir Henry might have in tail male; and subject to these limitations, the estates are limited to the defendant, Mrs. Mary Blackburn, the eldest daughter of Sir Henry, for life, with remainder to her first and other sons in tail male; after which the estate is limited to the defendant Miss Dora Hoghton, for her life, with remainder to her first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to all other daughters of Sir Henry in succession in tail male, with an ultimate remainder to Sir Henry in fee simple. The deed also contains a power to Sir Henry to appoint, by deed or will, a rent-charge by way of jointure to any future wife he might marry, to the extent of 2,000*l.* per annum, with a power to appoint 500*l.* per annum in favour of any stranger; in which case the jointuring sum was to be limited to 1,500*l.* per annum.

This is the instrument of which the plaintiff complains. He contends that, inasmuch as it is a voluntary instrument, not executed for a valuable consideration, it can be supported, if at all, only upon the ground of its being a proper and reasonable re-settlement of the family estates, knowingly and willingly entered into by him; and he submits that in this view it cannot be supported, both because the instrument itself is of an unreasonable character, and because he executed it without professional advice and assistance, and without receiving proper explanations of its nature and contents, of which he asserts that he was wholly ignorant. And he further asserts that he did so execute it under the influence and in obedience to the wishes of his father. The defendant, Sir Henry, on the other hand, contests all these positions. He submits that the instrument is not an improper or unreasonable re-settlement of the family property. He contends that the plaintiff was well aware of the contents of the deed; that it was fully and properly explained to him (the plaintiff), and that no influence or controul was resorted to to procure its execution; and the defendant insists that according to the principles on which courts of equity act in cases of re-settlement of family property and of family arrangements generally, this deed must be supported, and if it be not, transactions in families of daily occurrence and to a great extent will be disturbed, the consequences of which will be disastrous and extensive.

Before proceeding further, I think it desirable to state what I apprehend to be the principles which affect transactions of this nature, entered into between members of the same family; in doing so, it is important in the first place to point out the distinction between two classes of cases which afford contradictory analogies, and both of which have been relied on as applicable to the questions before me.

The first class is that where one person, by undue influence, obtains advantage from another. The other class of cases is that where arrangements are entered into for the peace of families and the security of family property. I am of opinion, as I held in the case of Cooke v. Lamotte (1), that wherever one person obtains, by voluntary donation, a large pecuniary benefit from another, the burthen of proving that the transaction is righteous—to use the words of Lord Eldon in Gibson v. Jeyes (2)—falls on the person taking the benefit. But this proof is given if it be shewn that the donor knew and fully understood what it was that he was doing. If, however, besides obtaining the benefit of this voluntary gift from the donor, the donor and donee were so situated towards each other that undue influence might have been exercised by the donee over the donor, then a new consideration is added, and the question is not—to use the words of Lord Eldon in Huguenin v. Baseley (3)—whether the donor knew what he was doing, but how the intention was produced; and though the donor was well aware of what he did, yet if his disposition to do it was produced by undue influence, the transaction would be set aside.

In many cases the Court, from the relations existing between the parties to the transaction, infers the probability of such undue influence having been exerted. These are the cases of guardian and ward, solicitor and client, spiritual adviser and pupil, medical adviser and patient, and the like; and in such cases the Court watches the whole transaction with great jealousy, not merely for the purpose of ascertaining that the person likely to be so influenced fully understood the act he was performing, but also for the purpose of ascertaining that his consent to perform that act was not obtained by reason of the influence possessed by the person receiving the benefit: not that the influence itself, flowing from such relations, is either blamed or discountenanced by the Court; on the contrary, the due exercise of it is considered advantageous and useful to society. But this Court holds as an inseparable condition that this influence must be exerted for the benefit of the person subject to it, and not for the advantage of the person possessing it. The case of parent and child is undoubtedly one of this class of cases. It is prominently put forward in all the cases illustrating this principle. "Every body"—says Lord Langdale, in Archer v. Hudson (4)—"will affirm in this court, that if there be a pecuniary transaction between parent and child, just after the child attains the age of twenty-one years, and prior to what may be called a complete emancipation, without any benefit moving to the child, the presumption is, that an undue influence has been exercised to procure that liability on the part of the child, and that it is the business and the duty of the party, who endeavours to maintain such a transaction, to shew, that that presumption is adequately rebutted; and" he adds, "that it may be adequately rebutted is perfectly clear."

(2) 6 Ves. 266.

(3) 14 Ibid. 273.

In Carpenter v. Heriot (5) Lord Northington lays down the same principle; Young v. Peachy (6), Heron v. Heron (7) and Hawes v. Wyatt (8), are other instances of the same principle.

On the other hand, in transactions between members of the same family, even though that relation subsists between them from whence the Court will infer the moral certainty of the existence of considerable influence and the probability of its having been exercised, yet if the transaction be one that tends to the peace or security of the family, to the avoiding of family disputes and litigation, or to the preservation of the family property, the principles by which such transactions must be tried are not those applicable to dealings between strangers, but such as on the most comprehensive experience have been found to be most for the interest of families.

In Frank v. Frank (9), a man seised in tail of freehold lands, with remainder to his elder brother, and of copyhold lands in fee, devised the freeholds to a younger brother, and the copyholds to the elder brother. The brothers agreed in writing that the lands should be enjoyed according to the will, on the supposition that the testator had suffered a recovery, which was not the case, nor was there any surrender of the copyholds to the uses of the will. The Court enforced the specific performance of the agreement, and restrained the elder brother from bringing ejectment against the younger.

In Beckley v. Newland (10), two persons having married sisters, presumptive co-heiresses of the testator, agreed to divide whatever should be given to either of them. The testator died, leaving nearly the whole of his property to one of them, and a decree was made for the specific performance of the articles of agreement.

In Stapilton v. Stapilton (11) the father was tenant of lands for ninety-nine years, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, remainder to himself in fee. He had two sons, Henry and Philip. The father and his two sons agreed by a deed to suffer a recovery of lands, to enure to such uses as that the estate, subject to the father's life, would be divided between Henry and Philip. Henry, the elder son, was illegitimate, so that the second son received no consideration for the destruction of the estate tail. Nevertheless, the Court decreed specific performance of the agreement, and Lord Hardwicke said,—“It was to save the honour of the father and his family, and was a reasonable agreement, and therefore if it is possible for a court of equity to decree a performance of it, it ought to be done.”

In Pullen v. Ready (12) a question arose, whether a forfeiture of a devise had not occurred, in consequence of the marriage of one of the three daughters of the devisee for life without the consent required by the will of the testator. Subsequently, an agreement was entered into by the three daughters and their husbands, whereby it was agreed that, on the death of the devisee for life, the property of the testator should be equally divided between them. The Court held that the articles ought to be specifically performed, and Lord Hardwicke said,—“There is nothing more mischievous than for this Court to decree a forfeiture after an agreement, in which, if there is any mistake, it was the mistake of all the parties to the articles, and no one of them is more under an imposition than the other.”

The cases are, if possible, still stronger when they relate to a re-settlement of the family property—Cory v. Cory (13) was unusually so. The question there was, whether an agreement should be set aside, one of the parties being drunk at the time it was entered into; but the Lord Chancellor refused to do so, and he principally laid weight on the circumstance “that this was an agreement to settle disputes in a family, and a reasonable agreement. So, if a son tenant in tail and a father tenant for life agree on something for the benefit of the younger children, and afterward the son complains of paternal authority being exerted, though there might be something of that sort, yet, if the agreement be reasonable, the Court will not set it aside.” And this case is cited by Lord Eldon with approbation for the general principles contained in it which I have stated.

Kinchant v. Kinchant (14) resembles the case before me in many of its circumstances. There, a mother, a tenant for life, with remainder to her eldest son in tail male, died, and the son, at the instance of the father, re-settled the estate on himself for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, and in default of issue, to his father for life, with remainder to his brothers and sisters in succession for life, with successive remainders to their first and other sons in tail male. Mr. Justice Gould supported the transaction, notwithstanding the benefits which the father derived from that new deed. The defendant gave evidence to shew that the plaintiff fully understood the transaction. The plaintiff went into no evidence, but rested his case on the presumption of undue influence and the contents of the deed which gave a life interest to the father. Notwithstanding which, Mr. Justice Gould supported the transaction, and in the course of his judgment stated his opinion, that if the father had exercised some personal authority it would not have been sufficient to set aside the transaction. Notwithstanding this opinion, Mr. Justice Gould recommended a compromise, by payment of 200*l.* to the son, which being rejected by him, the bill was dismissed, but the suit was finally compromised to avoid an appeal. This case has not, however, met with complete approbation. Mr. Richards (afterwards Chief Baron Richards), in arguing the case of Brown v. Carter (15), stated that Lord Kenyon, then at the bar, was much dissatisfied with Mr. Justice Gould's decision; and Lord Alvanley, in giving judgment in that case, observes,—“It is said the decision in Kinchant v. Kinchant did not meet the approbation of a noble Lord, and I confess I think with some reason.”

The facts of the case of Tendril v. Smith (16) are not stated in the report, but Lord Hardwicke states these propositions broadly. “Where a father and a child of full age come to an agreement to alter the limitations under a settlement, there is no ground of equity for a child to set aside such agreement, under pretence of being drawn into it by the power and authority of a father, and to restore the ancient limitations again. In a case in Lord Cowper's time, where a father prevailed upon a son, who was tenant in tail under a settlement, to take an estate for life only, with remainder to his first and every other son, his Lordship would not set it aside upon the suggestion of the father's having an undue influence over him." It does not appear, however, in this case, that after the settlement thus made at the suggestion and under the influence of the father, the father acquired any advantage. In the later editions of Aikyns, the entry in the Registrar's book is set forth, but it does not appear from thence whether the father derived any advantage from the limitations of the estates as re-settled.

The case of Wycherley v. Wycherley (17) is of great importance, as it draws very clearly a distinction which, I think, renders all the cases reconcilable, except that, perhaps, of Kinchant v. Kinchant. The father was tenant for life, with remainder to the son in tail male. The father and son suffered a recovery, by which the property was re-settled to the father for life, remainder to the son in fee, who executed a memorandum of agreement to secure 500*l.* to each of his sisters within six months after the death of his father. Lord Northington enforced the specific performance of that contract, although there was evidence that the father had exerted influence to compel the son to enter into it; but in doing so Lord Northington expressly states that if the father had gained any advantage by the limitations, he would not have allowed the transaction to stand. "In cases," says Lord Northington, "where a father unduly compels a child by paternal influence, the Court ought to be strictly rigid in guarding against it. But here I see nothing which the father might not properly do (though more properly, to be sure, if he had done it with less warmth of temper); for what reason could there be for the father to come in and give the son a marketable interest, and the son do nothing for himself or the family? It was said, nothing was intended but to vest the remainder in fee in this family. I thought in the opening that such had been the case; if so, and the remainder in fee had been limited to the father, I should have thought it a case of parental influence. But here, the father has only an estate for life, with a remainder in fee to the son."

The rule to be drawn from these cases, which is perfectly consistent with the rule which prevails in the first class of cases to which I have referred, may, I think, be thus stated: that if the settlement of the property be one in which the father acquires no benefit not already possessed by him, and if the settlement be a reasonable and proper one, the Court will support it, even though it may appear that some influence was exerted by him to induce the son to execute it. But it must also appear that there was no suppression of what is true or suggestion of what is false. The observations of Lord Eldon in Gordon v. Gordon (18), as applied to cases of family agreements, will also apply to this case of re-settlement. "Although," says he, "the parties may have greatly misunderstood their situation and mistaken their rights, a court of equity will not disturb the quiet which is the consequence of that agreement;" but where there is a mistake, though innocent, and the other party is accessory to it, this Court will interfere. The point of these observations is, that one party is as accessory to the mistake as the other. Where, however, the son confers on the parent, by the transaction, some advantage which he did not previously possess, then the principle which prevails in the first class of cases interposes, and then the Court (to use the words of Lord Langdale) "though it does not interfere to prevent an act even of bounty between parent and child, will take care that such child is placed in such a position as will enable him to form an entirely free and unfettered judgment, independent altogether of any sort of controul."

In order to apply these principles to the facts of the present case, it is necessary first to consider the nature of the settlement itself, and next the circumstances attending its preparation and execution. By the limitations of the settlement, Sir Henry Bold Hoghton obtains an advantage which he did not possess before its execution. If the plaintiff should die without issue male in the lifetime of Sir Henry, a general power of appointment, by deed or will, is vested in Sir Henry. In addition to this, he acquires an absolute power of appropriating 500*l.* from and out of the rents of the estate in favour of any stranger: and the ultimate limitation of the estate is in favour of Sir Henry, in fee, to the exclusion of any female heirs of the plaintiff. All these are direct benefits to the father, proceeding from the son, and which consequently raise that presumption of undue influence spoken of in Archer v. Hudson, which it is necessary should be adequately rebutted. In all cases of this description, the reasonableness of the settlement has been considered by various Judges to be shewn both by the preservation of the property in the family and by the conferring of benefits upon the younger children. If, in the absence of this settlement, the plaintiff had died without issue male in the lifetime of Sir Henry, the estate would have gone to the next son of Sir Henry, who might have survived him, in tail male. Under this settlement, if the plaintiff should so die, Sir Henry might sell or devise the estate to a stranger. The power of appointment of the 500*l.* per annum in favour of a stranger, is a power to take so much out of the estate belonging to the family. The ultimate limitation of the fee to Sir Henry would, in the event of the previous estates failing, enable him to dispose of the estates to strangers, although the plaintiff might have left a family of daughters and grandsons. In all these three specified cases the limitations of the settlement are prejudicial to the preservation of the estate in the family, and confer no benefits on the younger children. These defects in the settlement are not, in my opinion, counterbalanced by the circumstance that the estates tail in the sons of Sir Henry are cut down to life estates, and that they are consequently thereby prevented from disposing of the property away from the family, as they might now do if the property should vest in any one of them as tenants in tail in possession.

I am of opinion, therefore, that this deed was not a reasonable or proper mode of settling the property, if the interest of the family alone is to be regarded. It is not such a settlement as this Court would approve, if an estate had been devised to trustees in trust to be settled in such a manner as might be most for the benefit of the Hoghton family, and a suit had been instituted for the purpose of carrying that trust into execution.

I now proceed to examine the circumstances connected with the preparation and execution of this deed. In the first place, the evidence establishes conclusively that, so far as the preparation of this instrument is concerned, the plaintiff had no professional advice or assistance. Previously to the plaintiff attaining twenty-one, Mr. Rowson had been employed as the solicitor of the family in all matters relating to the Bold estates, and Messrs. Pilkington & Walker in the like capacity in all matters relating to the Hoghton estates. Before the plaintiff had attained twenty-one Mr. Pilkington had retired, and Mr. Walker alone carried on business, and was employed as the family solicitor in all matters relating to the Hoghton estate. As this matter related to that estate, Mr. Walker was employed to prepare the settlement in question, but no other solicitor was consulted, or saw the draft of the deed before its execution. The instructions for its preparation, as appears from the bill of costs of Mr. Walker, were given in December 1842 by Sir Henry. The draft was settled by Mr. Coulson in February 1843. It is true that Mr. Walker, in his answer to the eighth interrogatory, says that he considered that he laid the draft before Mr. Coulson on behalf of all parties to the indenture, but Mr. Walker had not seen or communicated with the plaintiff on the subject of it. The draft, when settled, was sent to Sir Henry. The correspondence respecting it, and the alterations to be made in it, were suggested by Sir Henry alone. No copy was sent by Mr. Walker to the plaintiff. He never saw the plaintiff on the subject of the preparation of it. Indeed, he had seen the plaintiff but once in his whole life before the deed was executed. He never made any other communication to the plaintiff. He says it is true he considered and believed that it had been seen by the plaintiff, but "I cannot say" (he continues) "that I considered that it had been examined and approved by me, as that circumstance did not occur to my consideration." It is alleged by Sir Henry in his answer that the draft was shewn to the plaintiff, but there is no evidence that it was, or that it was in any manner submitted to him, or to any person on his behalf, for his examination and consideration. It is obvious on the whole evidence that the first time the plaintiff ever saw anything in writing relative to this settlement of the Hoghton estates was on the day and at the time of the execution of the settlement, which was on the 7th of July 1843.

The circumstances relative to the execution of the deed are these. The deed was executed in the bed-room of Sir Henry, who had had an alarming attack of illness, and was still suffering from the consequences of it. The persons present were Sir Henry, who was then in bed, the plaintiff, Mr. Walker the solicitor who prepared the deed, and Mr. Pilkington the former partner of Mr. Walker, which last two gentlemen were the attesting witnesses. The first person admitted into the bed-room with Sir Henry was Mr. Walker. How long they were together does not appear. After this the plaintiff came into the room to them. How long they remained together does not appear, and finally Mr. Pilkington was admitted. The evidence relative to what then took place is most material. The only evidence on this subject is that of Mr. Pilkington in answer to the twelfth interrogatory, and that of Mr. Walker in answer to the ninth, tenth and twelfth interrogatories. When Mr. Pilkington was introduced into the room, Sir Henry, the plaintiff and Mr. Walker were there. Whatever the explanation of the deed which was given to the plaintiff was, it took place before Mr. Pilkington was introduced. "It was not" (he says) "read over to the plaintiff in my presence." That is distinctly the effect of the deposition. The evidence of Mr. Walker is to this effect. It is necessary I should read this. "I depose as follows:—The indenture, dated the 7th of July 1843, marked with the letter (A) in its present form was (as I considered and had every reason to believe) in conformity in all respects with the then wishes and intentions of the plaintiff, by reason that I read over the operative part of such deed to him before he executed the same, and he made no sort of objection to the deed. The indenture was executed by the plaintiff on the 7th of July 1843, being the day of the date thereof. He had attained his age of twenty-one years about ten or eleven months, as I understood from the defendant, Sir Henry Bold Hoghton, when he executed the indenture." The two next depositions I shall read when I come to the place where I comment upon them.

The most attentive consideration which I have been able to give this evidence raises grave doubts in my mind, whether the objectionable points of the settlement in question were ever brought to the attention of the plaintiff. The first deposition I have read states that the operative parts were read over to the plaintiff. If this were all the evidence, it would, in my opinion, be insufficient to shew that the plaintiff understood what he was doing. In the first place, it is not stated what the witness considered to be the operative parts of the deed, and whether he includes in this description the power of appointment to the father. From his answer to the twelfth interrogatory it would appear that he makes a distinction between the operative parts of the deed and the powers of appointment contained in it. In the next place the mere reading over of a deed would not be sufficient to satisfy me that the person hearing it read understood it. To an unprofessional person, however intelligent, and exerting the closest attention, the long and involved sentences and technical language of a deed render it frequently unintelligible, and even the Court not unfrequently misapprehends the limitations and effect of the provisions of a deed read in open court, when the greatest pains are exerted to read it clearly and intelligibly; in my opinion, unless accompanied with an explanation of the contents of a deed, the reading over to an unprofessional person is more likely to confound than to enlighten him.

To the tenth interrogatory Mr. Walker says:—"I had not had much opportunity of judging of the plaintiff's acquaintance with matters of business, having only seen him on one occasion previously to the occasion of his executing the deed of the 7th of July 1843; but from what I saw of him he appeared to me to be as much acquainted with matters of business as is usual at his time of life. When he executed the indenture dated the 7th of July 1843, I should say he was capable of judging of what he was doing; he appeared an intelligent young man, and I had no reason to think the contrary. I did so far explain to the plaintiff the effect of the indenture before he executed it, as that I explained shortly the joint power of appointment by him and his father over the estate, and that in default of such joint appointment the estate was held by his father for life, and then to him, the plaintiff, and his children. The plaintiff did appear to understand the effect of such indenture, as he made no objection to it. The plaintiff did before and in the month of February 1843, execute a deed of release." That latter part is not material. In his answer to the tenth interrogatory, Mr. Walker states that he explained to the plaintiff the power of appointment by himself and his father over the estate, and that in default of such joint appointment the estate was held by his father for life, and then to him, the plaintiff, and his children. This general explanation, as far as it goes, is inaccurate. The limitations after his father's life estate are not to the plaintiff and his children, but to the plaintiff and his sons, and the plaintiff's daughters are excluded. If this be a correct statement of the explanation given, it was, though no doubt unintentionally, a misrepresentation of the effect of the deed in a material point affecting both the interest of the plaintiff and that of the Hoghton family.

The answer to the twelfth interrogatory is that where Mr. Walker goes into great detail upon the subject. "The said indenture of the 7th of July 1843 was executed by the defendant Sir Henry Bold Hoghton and the plaintiff Henry Hoghton, and who are therein named and described as two of the parties thereto, in my presence. I am an attesting witness to the signing, sealing and delivery of the indenture by Sir H. B. Hoghton and the plaintiff H. Hoghton. The indenture was so executed as aforesaid on the 7th of July 1843, the day of the date thereof, and it was so executed by Sir H. B. Hoghton and the plaintiff in the bed-room of the defendant, Sir H. B. Hoghton, at his house situate in Park Crescent, Regent's Park, in the county of Middlesex; and the reason of its being so executed in that room was, that the said defendant Sir H. B. Hoghton was in ill health and then in bed, he having, as I understood, then lately broken a blood-vessel; and it was requested that the deed should be executed in his bed-room. The plaintiff did come into the bed-room, and he then found in the bed-room the defendant Sir H. B. Hoghton and myself, and afterwards W. O. Pilkington came into the bed-room. I did before the execution of the indenture read aloud parts of the indenture, viz. the whole of the operative parts thereof, the power to jointure and power to grant annuities given to Sir H. B. Hoghton and the plaintiff, and I also shortly explained the effect of the various other clauses as they occurred, omitting the recitals and the schedules altogether, as they were long, and I thought it unnecessary and that the reading thereof was mere matter of form. The parts of such indenture which I so read were, as I considered, the material parts thereof. The plaintiff was present during the whole time of my reading over the aforesaid parts of the said indenture as I did so read over. Sir H. B. Hoghton asked some questions with reference to the meaning or effect of the indenture, whilst the same was being read as aforesaid in the presence and hearing of the plaintiff, but I do not recollect that any questions were asked by any other person with reference thereto whilst the same was being so read. I did explain to the plaintiff, as before stated, the indenture, and the general purport and effect and operation thereof before he executed the same. The plaintiff did, before he executed the indenture, appear to understand the indenture, or the general purport or effect thereof. I did explain to the plaintiff that it would be necessary for him to go before the proper officer to acknowledge the deed," &c. That is the whole that relates to the execution of the deed. He specifies the parts he read aloud. Those were the operative parts, the power to jointure, and the power to grant annuities given to Sir Henry and to the plaintiff. It is to be observed, that although Mr. Walker specifies the power of appointment, he does not mention the power of appointment given to Sir Henry

if he survived the decease of the plaintiff without issue male. The witness further states, that he shortly explained the effect of the various other clauses as they occurred, and that he explained to the plaintiff as before stated (these are the words of the deposition) "the general purport, effect and operation of the indenture before he executed it." The general effect explained as before stated in the deposition, was erroneous. And this passage, where he states that he shortly explained the effect of the various other clauses as they occurred, is the only part of the evidence that would necessarily include the first two of the three objectionable provisions contained in the deed I have already pointed out, and which provisions ought to have been carefully and accurately explained, and their effect explained to the plaintiff before he should have been permitted to execute the deed. If this had been done I cannot doubt that Mr. Walker would have remembered it, and would have stated it in his evidence and in his deposition, in answer to an interrogatory very carefully framed, to extract an exact statement of what was read and explained, and what was left unread and unexplained in the provisions of the deed. The result is, that this cursory and general explanation stated in this evidence is all that is done to enable a son to understand the full contents and effect of a deed which, so far as the evidence goes, he had never seen before. And even this explanation, imperfect as in my opinion it would be if given anywhere, is given in a bed-room of a sick father, when the ordinary affection of a son would necessarily prompt him strongly to desire that the business should be concluded as speedily as possible, and that no greater trouble or anxiety should be given than was absolutely necessary to a person so closely related to him.

Mr. Walker, in a letter dated five days previously, had expressed his hope that Sir Henry would be so far recovered as to attend to the settlement of the business, which, he very considerably adds, "must not be made tiresome to you;" and a son, who more than a stranger, would fear that his father's health might be impaired by the fatigue occasioned by any considerable prolongation of such a business, would still more apprehend that his father's health might be seriously injured by the effect likely to be produced by any refusal on the part of the son to execute a deed, or even by the expression of any doubts of its propriety if he had fully understood its contents. The whole of Mr. Walker's evidence satisfies me that he treated this matter as if he considered and believed that the draft of the deed and all its provisions had been the subject of repeated consultations and discussions between Sir Henry and the plaintiff, and that, in fact, the reading of the deed itself was (as he says of the recitals and schedules) mere matter of form. In truth, unless he had so believed, he would, no doubt, have thought it fit not to have allowed the plaintiff to execute the deed without ascertaining that some professional gentleman had, on his behalf, maturely considered the various provisions of it, and ascertained that the plaintiff understood and wished to carry them into effect. The rest of the evidence in the cause, which is principally documentary, does not, in my opinion, alter the view which I have taken of this case. There is evidence to shew that the plaintiff told Mr. Rowson that the Hoghton estates were to be re-settled, but there is none to shew that the plaintiff ever contemplated a re-settlement of this description. It is true that no complaint was made until the month of September 1844, but if I am right in the view I have taken of the explanation given at the time of the execution of the indenture, it was not until then that the plaintiff knew and understood the contents of the deed of the 7th of July 1843. His conduct on that occasion is quite consistent with his case and the evidence in the cause; and in July 1845, his then solicitor, Mr. Rowson, expressly states that the plaintiff will do no act to acknowledge the settlement. In addition, therefore, to this being the case of a re-settlement, where the father gains material advantages, in addition, also, to its being the case of a re-settlement containing some material provisions which are of an unreasonable character, it is, in my opinion, proved that the contents of it were not properly made known to the son, and that he was left without the assistance and information which are indispensable to enable this Court to sustain such a transaction. The subsequent acts of the parties do not, in my opinion, vary their rights. The delay in filing the bill is explained by the fact that proposals for a compromise were pending; and if the correspondence contained (which, in my opinion, it does not) any admission affecting the plaintiff's rights, I should disregard such admissions made solely with a view to a compromise. I regret that such proposals have failed of success, and that the painful duty of deciding such a case as the present should have been cast upon the Court; but I am, in obedience to that duty, compelled to decide that, according to what I conceive the true principles of equity applied to the facts in evidence before me, this deed of the 7th of July 1843, as between the plaintiff and Sir Henry Bold Hoghton, must be delivered up to be cancelled.

The next question which arises is, that which relates to the defendant, Cecil Hoghton, the offspring of the marriage of the plaintiff with his late wife. Upon this marriage, a settlement was made which provided only for the younger children of the marriage, and it is contended on behalf of the infant defendant, that this was so limited because it was known that the settlement of the 7th of July 1843 provided for the eldest son of the marriage, and that inasmuch as the marriage proceeded on the faith of that settlement being valid, it cannot now be impeached so far as affects the interest taken under it by the eldest son of that marriage. In order to establish this fact affidavits were tendered in evidence under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, and were objected to by the plaintiff on the ground that they are produced in order to prove a matter directly in issue between the plaintiff and the infant defendant. They were, however, read de bene esse, but my opinion is that they cannot be received; and even if these affidavits were admissible, they do not shew that the marriage proceeded on the faith of the validity of the settlement of July 1843. The written instructions for the settlement are silent on the subject of any such settlement, nor is any reference made to the landed property of the plaintiff, except that in the commencement of the instructions it is stated that it is his desire to keep his landed estates free from any settlement or charge, and in the margin are written these words—“N.B. The eldest son will take the family estates,” which may apply as much to the Bold estates as to the Hoghton estates. The case of Brown v. Carter is cited as an authority on behalf of the infant defendant, and for the purpose of shewing that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is to be presumed that a person entering into the marriage contract communicates the state of his property to the other parties to the contract. But in my opinion this case does not establish that position. It only decides that after a lapse of thirty years, and loss of evidence, everything shall be presumed against the person who has delayed to bring the question before the Court for that period of time. In that case the settlement complained of had been executed by William Gapper in 1768. The limitations of it gave interests to any children he might have, with divers remainders over, and in 1779 he married. In 1799, William Gapper conveyed the property comprised in the settlement in trust for his creditors, who then filed a bill to set aside the deed of 1768. The words at the close of the judgment are conclusive as to this point. “The ground I go upon, without entering into the question how far relief could be given if all the circumstances were brought before the Court recently and during the father's life, is, that after a marriage by which the first and other sons were entitled to legal estates, protected by trustees to preserve contingent remainders, I cannot upon this bill, in the absence of persons who may claim, indeed, before their birth, interfere to have the legal estate taken out of them.” This is a principle which pervades all questions of equity, not merely family agreements and settlements, as in this case and the case of Stockley v. Stockley (19), but even in the case of direct and positive fraud acquiescence will bar the right to relief. If I were compelled in this case to presume that the plaintiff made a statement of the state of his property, I must presume that he made a true and not a false or fraudulent statement; and if so, he ought then to have said, and if he be presumed to have said anything, in the absence of direct evidence he must be presumed to have said—"There is a settlement of the Hoghton estates of the 7th of July 1843, under which my eldest son will be tenant in tail; but it is a deed of such a nature that in February last I stated that I would never acknowledge it. Proposals for a compromise are now pending to alter the limitations of that deed, but if they are not brought to a successful termination, it is my intention to seek the assistance of a court of equity to impeach the validity of it." If this were the statement, or the statement which must be presumed to have been made, it would evidently not entitle the infant defendant to any declaration or decree in his favour; and I am of opinion, therefore, that I cannot in this suit make any decree or direct any inquiry, with a view of afterwards making a decree which should afford any relief to the infant defendant Cecil Hoghton. While I say this, I have the satisfaction of considering that the decree I propose to make, which is to direct this deed to be cancelled, will not in the slightest degree affect the right which that infant defendant, or any person on his behalf, may have of filing a bill in this Court to compel the plaintiff to make good any representation made by him on his marriage in favour of any of the issue of that marriage, on the faith of which the marriage took place.

The next part is that relating to the merger of the mortgages in the Hoghton estate which I have already mentioned; and upon this point I have arrived at a conclusion unfavourable to the plaintiff. The plaintiff contends that these mortgages ought to have been kept on foot by assignment to trustees for his benefit, but he admits he did not intend that any interest should be charged during the lifetime of Sir Henry. In this question, Sir Henry has no immediate pecuniary interest; that is, he has none if the deed of the 7th of July 1843 should be held to be void. His only interest is that which he must feel for the continuance and prosperity of his family. But treating this question as one between the plaintiff and the persons who may succeed him in the Hoghton estate, if he should die without barring the entail, I must look simply at what the arrangement was that the plaintiff made on attaining twenty-one with respect to the discharge of these incumbrances. Whatever that was, the plaintiff admits that he was bound to perform it, and it is contained in and evidenced by the deed of charge of the annuity of 2,500*l.* on the Bold estate. There is nothing to be found in this deed which contains the idea that it was intended to keep these mortgages on foot. The words are, that the annuity is to cease upon the death of Sir Henry, or if the plaintiff, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns do and shall at any time during the life of Sir Henry pay off, satisfy and discharge the several mortgages. The Bold estate is afterwards declared to remain liable to pay this annuity during the natural life of Sir Henry, or until the discharge of the several incumbrances thereinbefore particularly mentioned. These passages point to an exoneration of the estates, and if the keeping alive of the incumbrances had been contemplated, some provision would have been introduced to that effect, and in order to provide for the non-payment of interest during the life of Sir Henry. It would be absurd for the annuity to Sir Henry to cease when the mortgages were paid off, if Sir Henry was to pay the interest to his son instead of paying it to the original mortgagees. But it was a reasonable and proper provision, and for the benefit of the family generally, that the estate itself should be exonerated by such means, the consequence of which would be, that all the persons who in succession might take the family estate would take it unencumbered and discharged from the mortgages which then fettered it. An arrangement such as in some of the cases I have already referred to, was treated as a reasonable and proper arrangement. This view of the case is confirmed by the will which the plaintiff executed on the 5th of August 1842, two days after the execution of the deed granting the annuity. This distinctly points to the exoneration of the estate, and under the will it would have been impossible to have kept the charges alive. This also appears to have been the view of the case taken by Mr. Rowson. The operative part of one of the deeds of re-conveyance of the mortgaged estates was, he says, hastily perused by him on behalf of the plaintiff. However hasty that perusal might have been, it would have shewn a professional gentleman as experienced in the matters as Mr. Rowson, that the charge was merged, and that it was not kept on foot; yet he made no complaint or representation to the plaintiff on the subject. He considered, evidently, and I think rightly considered, that this mode of conveyance only carried into effect the arrangement made in the month of August. Neither was this matter complained of by the plaintiff when he first discovered it. The real and substantial ground of complaint has been the frame of the deed of settlement of July 1843, on which I have already expressed my opinion.

The only remaining point in this case is the question relating to the sum of 1,600*l.* This sum formed a portion of the 64,000*l.* advanced by the Bank of England. It was secured upon an estate of which Sir Henry was seised in fee simple, and consequently forming no part of the Hoghton settled estate; and it is contended that this 1,600*l.* ought to be repaid, and that it was not intended that this should be paid off. The bill makes no complaint in this respect; and the fact appears by the answer, which sets out the particulars of the mortgages discharged, and the reconveyance of the estate charged therewith. There is no doubt that this 1,600*l.* is part of the 81,400*l.*, which was the amount of the mortgage money to be paid off; and although the sums are left in blank in the draft of the annuity deed, the original having been destroyed, yet this omission is supplied by the will executed almost contemporaneously with it, and leaves no doubt on this subject that the amount of the mortgages to be paid off was 81,400*l.*, and that if there was any mistake on the subject in not confining it to that amount of mortgages, provided the whole amount was charged on the Hoghton estate, still it was a common mistake on both sides, and that there was no intentional concealment or misrepresentation. I am of opinion, therefore, that upon this part of the case the evidence before me is not sufficient to enable me to say that, having regard to the arrangement entered into in the month of August 1842, which is not to be disturbed, and to the evidence of what that arrangement was, and the amount to be paid off, this Court ought to decree the repayment of that sum of 1,600*l.*

The result of the conclusion to which I have come on the parts of the case I have already stated, is, that a decree must be made declaring the deed of the 7th of July 1843 to be void, and ordering it to be delivered up to be cancelled; and that the bill must be dismissed so far as it seeks a declaration that the mortgages on the Hoghton estates are subsisting mortgages, and asks that a direction may be given for securing them for the benefit of the plaintiff.

I should be glad, in a case of this description, to be relieved from the necessity of giving any direction against costs.

Mr. Bethell.—On the part of the plaintiff, I am authorized to state that he does not desire any direction on the subject of costs. It will, however, be necessary to make a re-conveyance of the estate. The deed of the 7th of July 1843 passed the legal estate and created legal interests in other parties; and, therefore, although the deed is declared to be void and is directed to be cancelled, it must be accompanied with directions for a reconveyance, so as to re-vest the legal estate upon the uses and for the purposes existing at the date and execution of the deed of the 7th of July 1843, in order to restore the estate to the uses and interests which were subsisting immediately previous to the date of that deed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I am disposed to think that when by a decree of a competent court a deed is cancelled, that deed cannot be given in evidence, and that none of the estates created by it are in existence.

Mr. Bethell.—The deed of the 7th of July 1843 operated as a disentailing deed and is enrolled; and I do not see how we can render void the operation of that enrolment.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I should have thought the enrolment would be vacated on the deed being cancelled. I have certainly known many cases of deeds being delivered up to be cancelled without considering it necessary to have any deed for re-conveying the estate.

Mr. Bethell.—No difficulty arises unless the deed operated as a conveyance of the legal estate. If it did, the difficulty which suggests itself is, in what manner it is to be got back.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—My impression is, that if the deed is cancelled and the enrolment vacated, the legal estate remains as it was before the deed was executed.

April 24.—This case was again mentioned, when the decree taken was, to dismiss so much of the bill against Sir H. B. Hoghton as sought relief in respect of the mortgages. Declare that the deed of the 7th of July 1843 was void, and that it ought to be delivered up to be cancelled: and direct that it should be cancelled and the enrolment vacated.

Will—Interest—Vesting—Survivors or Survivor—Share and Share alike—Construction.

A testator gave a leasehold house, which was let for twenty-eight years, to trustees to pay the rents and profits for the benefit of his five children, whom he named, or the survivors or survivor of them, in equal shares and proportions, share and share alike:—Held, that the words "survivors or survivor" referred to the death of any of them in his lifetime; that the words "share and share alike" referred to those children who should survive him, and created a tenancy in common, and that the interests were vested in the children on the death of the testator.

William Parrington, by his will, dated the 21st of October 1830, gave and bequeathed to Henry Haines the elder, and Henry Haines the younger, and Benjamin Croot, his leasehold public house, called the Rose, with the appurtenances, then in the occupation of Thomas Cribb, under a lease for a term of twenty-eight years, from Christmas 1825, at the rent of 65*l.*, upon trust, after paying the ground rent, to pay or apply the clear residue of the rents and profits unto or for the benefit of his five children; the defendant, Catherine Hobson, the wife of William Hobson, but then the wife of Richard Bignell, deceased, William Parrington, since deceased, Henrietta, afterwards the wife of George Bignell, since deceased, the defendant, George Parrington, and the defendants, Emily Abigail, the wife of William Anstead, or the survivors or survivor of them, in equal shares and proportions, share and share alike; and after the expiration of the term of twenty-eight years to sell the said leasehold premises, and divide the monies to arise from such sale as in the said will mentioned.

The testator died on the 10th of June 1831, leaving all his children surviving. On the 11th of October 1839, William Parrington, in consideration of 45*l.*, assigned his fifth part or share in the rent of 65*l.*, bequeathed by the will of the testator, and all benefit of survivorship or accruer that might thereafter happen to arise to him under the bequest, to Richard Henry Ashford, his executors, administrators and assigns, for all the residue then to come of the term of twenty-eight years.

On the 24th of October 1839, George Bignell and Henrietta his wife, in consideration of 40*l.*, assigned all that fifth part or share of Henrietta Bignell in the rent of 65*l.*, bequeathed by the will of the testator, and all benefit of survivorship and accruer that might thereafter happen or arise to her, or to George Bignell in her right, under the bequest contained in the testator's will, to R. H. Ashford, his executors, administrators and assigns, for the residue of the term of twenty-eight years.

Henrietta Bignell died in 1840, and William Parrington died in July 1846.

The trustees, from the date of the assignments, paid the shares of William Parrington and Henrietta Bignell in the clear rents and profits of the premises to R. H. Ashford, but since their respective deaths the trustees refused to pay such shares or either of them to R. H. Ashford, on the ground that the interests of the children who had died ceased by their respective deaths, and had become payable among the surviving children.

On the part of the plaintiff, R. H. Ashford, it was submitted that the words "survivors or survivor" applied to the survivors or survivor at the time of the death of the testator, and that each of the testator's five children took an absolute vested interest in one-fifth part of the clear rents and profits of the premises during the whole of the term of twenty-eight years. It was, therefore, asked that the rights and interests of the children in the rents and profits might be declared, and that the plaintiff might be declared entitled to the respective shares of W. Parrington and Henrietta Bignell which had been assigned to him.

Mr. H. Stevens, for the plaintiff, insisted that the will created a tenancy in common in the children living at the death of the testator, and that it was not intended to create any subsequent right of survivorship.

Mr. Freeling, for the surviving children of the testator.—The words "survivors or survivor" created a joint tenancy in the rents and profits—Wordsworth v. Wood (1). It was, in effect, the gift of an annuity to a class, to be enjoyed by them jointly as they from time to time existed, and not an absolute gift of a specific part to those who might be living when the testator died.

Mr. Martineau, for the trustees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The gift was made to the children or the survivor or survivor of them. This evidently only had reference to the death of any of them in his lifetime. The words "share and share alike" referred to those children who should survive him, and they were sufficient to give an absolute interest, and to create a tenancy in common. In my opinion, therefore, the interests were vested in the children living at the death of the testator as tenants in common.

Nov. 10.

Composition Deed — Condition — Parol Agreement—Statute of Frauds.

W. D., by deed, agreed to guarantee a composition of 8s. in the pound to all the creditors of his brother who should execute a release of their debts by a day named. A, a creditor, failed to execute the release by the day named, in consequence, as he alleged, of a parol agreement between him and the agent of W. D. that he should be allowed to postpone his execution until certain legal proceedings had against third parties, the result of which might influence the amount of his debt. Upon bill by A, for specific performance, W. D., by his answer, denied any such agreement:—Held, that the condition not being performed, the agreement never took effect as to A; and, further, that the agreement being to pay the debt of a third person was within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and any alteration in its terms must be evidenced by writing; and no fraud being alleged, a parol agreement, if proved, would not be binding.

The bill in this case was filed by W. Emmet, the public officer of the Halifax Joint-Stock Banking Company, to compel specific performance of an agreement of the 12th of February 1848, by which the defendant, W. Dewhirst, agreed with Thomas Turney, on behalf of himself and all other the creditors of Isaac Dewhirst, (a brother of W. Dewhirst), in consideration of a fiat against Isaac Dewhirst being abandoned, and of all the creditors forthwith accepting the composition, to guarantee a composition of 8s. in the pound to all the creditors of Isaac Dewhirst whose debts exceeded 20*l.*, who should, before the 1st of March then next, sign a good and effectual release to the said Isaac Dewhirst of their respective claims on him. The condition was not performed by the plaintiff in point of fact; and the question raised was, whether the circumstances under which the condition was not performed (which circumstances are fully set out in the judgment,) entitled the plaintiff to equitable relief.

(1) 4 Myl. & Cr. 641; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 29.

The debt claimed by the banking company against Isaac Dewhirst was 1,970*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, and this debt included two bills of exchange for 300*l.* and 195*l.*, accepted by one Carter, and by the banking company discounted for Isaac Dewhirst. An accountant of the name of Hervey was employed by the solicitor of Dewhirst, to deliver the promissory notes for the instalments to the creditors, and to obtain from them the execution of the release. Hervey waited on Mr. Caw, the agent of the bank, with the promissory notes for the composition, calculated upon the whole amount of the debt, 1,970*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, but refused to hand them over unless the bank would deliver up Carter's bills. The bank had instituted legal proceedings upon the bills against Carter, and Mr. Caw declined to execute the release until the result of those proceedings should be known; but, otherwise, he expressed the concurrence of the bank in the arrangement. Subsequently Carter absconded to America before the bank could recover upon the bills. The bank then applied to W. Dewhirst to be let in for the benefit of the composition deed; and upon his refusal, the bank, in February 1849, filed the present bill to compel specific performance of the agreement.

The cause came on for hearing before Knight Bruce, V.C., who made an order referring it to the Master to inquire and state whether J. Hervey, in the pleadings mentioned, acted as agent for the defendant W. Dewhirst, in the matters in the pleadings mentioned, or any and what part thereof; and whether the defendant adopted or agreed to the said acts of the said J. Hervey, or any, and what part thereof; and whether the defendant did, under any and what circumstances, agree that the bank should, as a creditor of I. Dewhirst, in the pleadings mentioned, be admitted to participate in the benefits of the agreement of the 12th of February 1848, upon any and what other terms and conditions than therein mentioned.

The defendant appealed against the whole decree.

Mr. James Russell and Mr. Follett, for the plaintiff.—The bank acquiesced in the composition deed, and acted under it, and are bound by it, though they may not have signed it; and, therefore, are entitled to the benefit of it in this court—Spottiswoode v. Stockdale (1), Tomlinson v. Gill (2), and Gregory v. Williams (3). The bank would have signed the release but for the refusal of the agent to hand over the promissory notes, except upon the condition of the bank delivering up the securities of third parties, a condition unauthorized by the agreement—Thomas v. Courtney (4), Cullingworth v. Loyd (5), and Lee v. Lockhart (6). The evidence proves an agreement between the parties to wait for the result of the proceedings against Carter; and the plaintiff, therefore, is now entitled to be let in to the benefit of the composition deed.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Willcock, for the defendant.—The authority of Spottiswoode v. Stockdale is questioned in Collins v. Reece (7); but the bank did not assent to the composition, except upon the terms of retaining their securities, which they were not entitled to do—Bush v. Shipman (8). Nothing but a performance of the condition could give a creditor a right to the benefit of the composition, except it was clearly proved that the defendant consented to accept something else in lieu of the performance of the condition. This is not shewn, and whatever was said on the subject by the agent was clearly without the authority of the defendant.

side; certainly none is imputed to the defendant W. Dewhirst. The condition appears not to have been performed in consequence of a natural misapprehension by the parties of their respective rights. Hervey, acting for the defendant, required the bank to give up Carter's bills, considering that if the debt due to the bank was to be satisfied by the promissory notes and a release was to be signed, all securities were to be given up; but in this he was mistaken, for as the agreement made no provision for the giving up of securities, the bank would be entitled to retain them. The consequence of the misapprehension on both sides was, that the settlement was postponed; and the question arises, whether there be any relief in equity with reference to the old agreement, or whether any new agreement was made under the circumstances.

In considering whether any new agreement was made, it is material to ascertain Hervey's authority. The bill alleges that it was agreed, by and between Hervey and Caw, that Hervey should hold the promissory notes for the amount of the composition of the debt to the bank and also the deed of release, until it was seen what the result of the proceedings against Carter would be; that it was expressly stated by Caw, and that it was the fact, that the banking company fully agreed to and acquiesced in the agreement for the composition, and that they were willing and ready and intended most fully to act on the same; that they also fully agreed to and acquiesced in the deed of release, and held themselves bound by all the terms and provisions thereof, and that they were ready to execute the same whenever the result of their proceedings against Carter was ascertained. The bill further alleges that the banking company, under the circumstances and for the reasons therein mentioned, did not execute the deed of release, and that Hervey did not hand over to the banking company the promissory notes; that Hervey thereupon left the bank and forthwith proceeded to hand over to the other creditors of Isaac Dewhirst the promissory notes for securing to them the instalments of the composition payable upon their respective debts, and to procure the execution by them of the deed of release; that Hervey expressly informed the other creditors that the banking company had not executed the deed of release, but that they acquiesced in and agreed to the terms thereof, and were parties to the composition, and that all the other creditors thereupon accepted the composition and executed the deed of release. The bill also alleges that W. Dewhirst was in communication with Hervey while Hervey was completing the arrangement, and was informed by Hervey of what had passed with Caw, and that W. Dewhirst fully acquiesced in the arrangement.

The answer states that, in consequence of the proceedings of the plaintiff, the defendant's solicitor applied to Hervey for information as to what took place between him and the banking company, and that he was informed by Hervey that he called at the bank and saw Caw, and told him that he had called with Isaac Dewhirst's composition deed and promissory notes, and wished him to execute the deed and give up Carter's acceptances upon his handing to Caw the promissory notes signed by the defendant, but that Caw said that he would not give up Carter's acceptances until the bank saw what could be got from Carter's estate, and that, although a consenting party with the other creditors, he thought he had better delay signing the deed until he saw what could be got; and that Hervey stated that he believed that Caw also said that he would not sign the release without the consent of Isaac Dewhirst's guarantees to the bank for his general balance of account; and except as thereby appeared, the answer states that the defendant could not set forth as to his knowledge, information, remembrance or belief whether it was or not, or whether or not in consequence of the circumstances in the bill alleged, agreed by and between Hervey and Caw (save that if any such agreement was made it was without any authority given by the defendant, and was not binding on the defendant), that Hervey should hold the promissory notes for the amount of the composition of the debt of the banking company, or whether or not also the deed of release, until it was seen what the result of the proceedings against Carter would be.

Caw and Hervey have both been examined as witnesses; and Caw states that he believes that Hervey called at the bank on the 18th of February 1848, and stated that he had come with the deed of release to be executed by the creditors, and with the promissory notes for the instalments of the composition upon the debt of the banking company; the composition was upon the whole of the banking company's debt, including the amount of Carter's bills. Caw says, "he asked me to give up Carter's bills to him: I said, that I could not do so, as the banking company were endeavouring to recover on the bills (the real amount of the banking company's debt depended upon whether anything could be recovered on the bills); he said he could not hand over the promissory notes for the instalments, unless the banking company gave up Carter's bills to him; I said I could not execute the release without receiving the promissory notes for the instalments, but that the banking company consented to the arrangement, and would execute the release when they had ascertained whether anything could be recovered from Carter or not; he asked if he might give his personal assurance to the other creditors that the banking company would execute the deed, and that they agreed to the composition, and I said he most decidedly might do so; it was agreed between us that he should hold the promissory notes, and also the deed of release for the Bank until we had seen the result of the proceedings against Carter."

The witness Hervey states, that it was understood that the parties should give up any bills or acceptances before receiving their promissory notes for payment of the instalments. "My instructions were to receive Carter's bills held by the Bank before giving to them the promissory notes for the instalments. I was instructed by Mr. James Stansfield, who was Isaac Dewhirst's solicitor, to prepare the necessary promissory notes for the completion of the agreement, and to get such agreement completed; I had specified instructions from Mr. Stansfield not to give the promissory notes till the creditors had delivered up any bills they might hold. I called at the Bank a few days afterwards, and saw Mr. Caw; my object in calling upon Mr. Caw was to inform him that W. Dewhirst had renewed the security, and to get him to sign the release or composition deed, and deliver up all bills, or give an indemnity in the form supplied to me by Mr. Stansfield, and, upon that being done, to give him the promissory notes; he consented to the composition, but declined to give up Carter's bills. The amount secured by the promissory notes to the banking company was the amount of the instalments on their whole debt, without deducting the amount of Carter's bills. According to my previous instructions, I was to get in all bills before paying the composition; and, therefore, if I had got Carter's bills delivered up to me by the banking company, the amount of the notes to them would not have been altered. I took away with me the deed of release and the promissory notes because I did not receive Carter's bills; I held the promissory notes until the latter end of September following, as I understood, for the purpose of paying them to the bank upon their delivering up Carter's bills." On cross-examination he says,— "I cannot recollect that I had received any authority from W. Dewhirst to make any arrangement with the banking company, or with Mr. Caw, in relation to Carter's bills, or as to deferring the delivery of such notes and the execution of the release until such result should be known; I certainly had not authority in writing."

On the part of the plaintiff no evidence is given to shew that Hervey had any authority to make a new agreement; and the result seems to be that Hervey's authority is not proved. It may, however, be worth while to consider what would have been the legal conclusion from what took place, supposing that evidence had been given to shew that Hervey had authority to make a new arrangement. This agreement is within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2. c. 3.) It is, "a special promise to answer for the debt of another person;" it is not a promise upon a good consideration to take the debt exclusively upon himself. It professes, in terms, to be a case of guarantee; the composition notes were to be the joint notes of Isaac Dewhirst, the principal debtor, and of the defendant William Dewhirst, as his guarantee or surety. The agreement is clearly within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and must be in writing; and any alteration of it must also be in writing—Goss v. Lord Nugent (9), Stowell v. Robinson (10), and Marshall v. Lynn (11). The last of these cases refers to Stead v. Dawber (12), overruling Cuff v. Penn (13). Whether, therefore, what passed between Hervey and Caw could or could not be contended to be a variation of the old agreement, or as the formation of a new agreement, it ought to be evidenced by some writing; and it is clear that no such writing exists; and the important difference between the evidence of Hervey and Caw shews the wisdom and benefit of the rule.

If, then, the defendant be discharged from the performance of the original contract by reason of the non-performance of the condition, can he in the absence of fraud be charged upon a new parol agreement? It is an agreement to pay the debt of another; and it is an agreement with a condition annexed to it, which condition has not been performed; or, rather, as I before remarked, it is not a contract with the bank unless the release on their part was executed before the 1st of March. The release was not executed on the part of the bank before the 1st of March; the contract, therefore, never took effect, so far as the bank was concerned; and, in the absence of fraud, the authorities are distinct and decisive that no new parol agreement can be substituted. It is clear, that at law such an agreement as this, namely, to pay the debt of another person, cannot be made and cannot be varied by parol; and in this court, unless there be fraud, the same rule prevails; and there is not here even a suggestion of fraud. It is, therefore, immaterial whether any, and, if any, what parol agreement was entered into.

Has, then, anything occurred to preclude the defendant from taking the benefit of the statute? He insists in his answer that he is not bound by the contract, because the release was not signed, and he denies that he gave any authority on his part to make a contract, or that in point of fact any contract was made. There is no admission in the answer of any agreement to dispense with the condition, or to extend the time for performing it. If there had been such an admission, the Court might have enforced its performance; but there is not any such admission. The agreement, if any, must be proved; it cannot be proved by parol evidence, and the case affords no other; it cannot, therefore, be proved at all.

Such being the case, I think it unnecessary to make any reference to the Master; and to that extent the decree must be varied. I entirely concur with the Vice Chancellor, that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief under the original agreement. The bill, therefore, must be dismissed, with costs.

OSTELL v. LEPAGE.

Pleading—Pending Suit in a Foreign or Colonial Court.

Bill by A. against B. The bill stated that A. and B. carried on business in partnership at Calcutta and in England, and that A. had commenced a suit against B. in Calcutta, but that, from B. having left the East Indies and come to reside in England, the suit could not properly be prosecuted. The bill prayed the usual partnership accounts. To this bill B. put in a plea that a decree had been made by the Supreme Court at Calcutta, in the suit mentioned in the bill, whereby it was referred to the Master to take an account of the partnership transactions between A. and B, and that the inquiries were still pending. The plea was overruled.

A pending suit in a foreign or colonial court between A. and B. cannot be pleaded in bar to relief sought in a suit in Chancery in England between the same parties relative to the same matters.

The bill in this case was filed by Mrs. Ostell against Mr. Lepage. The bill stated that Thomas Ostell, the plaintiff's husband, had carried on business as a bookseller in England and at Calcutta, and had taken Lepage into partnership in the Calcutta business in 1840; that in November 1841 Mr. Ostell had died; that Mrs. Ostell was his administratrix; that in December 1842 Mrs. Ostell and Lepage had agreed to carry on the business in partnership, one of the terms being that a sum was to be carried from the old partnership to the account of the estate of Mr. Ostell; and that the business had been carried on for some time, but that no accounts had ever been rendered by Lepage.

The bill then stated that a bill had been filed against Lepage at Calcutta by Mr. Molloy, as the administrator de bonis non of Ostell, and as the attorney of Mrs. Ostell; that Lepage had put in an answer to the bill, and that, directly after the answer had been filed, he had left Calcutta for England, where he had ever since resided; that a decree had been taken pro confesso against him in Calcutta, but that, from his absence, it could not be successfully prosecuted. The bill then prayed an account of the different partnership transactions between Mr. Ostell and Lepage, and Mrs. Ostell and Lepage, and the payment by Lepage of the balance, if any, to be found due from him.

To this bill, except the allegation that, by reason of the defendant's absence from India, Molloy had been unable to prosecute the decree there, and except the interrogatory founded thereon, and so much of the charge and interrogatory to obtain discovery of documents as related to the above excepted matters, the defendant pleaded, that in February 1851 a decree had been made at Calcutta in the suit of Molloy v. Lepage, whereby it was referred to the Master to take an account of the different partnership transactions, and that the inquiries were still being prosecuted before the Master, and were depending and undetermined. For answer to the parts of the bill excepted from the plea, the defendant denied that Molloy had been unable to prosecute the decree in India, and insisted that the decree was a complete, binding, and final decree between the plaintiff and the defendant, and could be, and had been, prosecuted, and said that he was ready and willing to give any discovery and produce any documents required, and he denied the possession of documents referring to the matters thereby answered to, or any of them.

PARKER, V.C.—I cannot allow this plea. Passing by the question of the form of the plea, I will dispose of the case upon the substance. This is not a plea of a final decree of a foreign court. A final adjudication of a foreign court may be pleaded here in bar to relief for the same matters. This is well established. In the present case there is a plea of a pending suit in India. If both suits were in this country, and related to the same matters, the plea would be valid, and that with good reason. But where there are an action at law and a suit in equity relating to the same matters, the pending action cannot be pleaded to the suit, but the plaintiff must be put to his election between the two. How it is as to a suit in a foreign or a colonial court there is no precedent. The question has arisen in several cases, and in all of them the Court had found reasons for overruling the plea. In Bayley v. Edwards Lord Camden entertained a decided objection to the plea. In the present case, the plaintiff sued the defendant in Calcutta, and, pending that suit, the defendant came to England. By this plea it was sought to impose upon the plaintiff, having the defendant here, the difficulties of going on with the suit in India. These difficulties are very great. The plaintiff can have no direct process of contempt to carry into effect the suit in India. If an injunction were granted in India it would be good for nothing here, unless there were another suit here to enforce it, and it would be the same as to a receiver. In the face of these difficulties the defendant contended that the plaintiff was bound to prosecute the suit in India. Such would be an extremely inconvenient rule, and would amount in many cases to a complete denial of justice. The proper course will be to apply to stay proceedings in one or other of the suits, and the Court will have no difficulty in putting the plaintiff under terms. The plea must be overruled, with costs.

Trustee—Power to give Receipts.

A testator devised real estate to A. and B, their executors, administrators and assigns, for the term of 500 years, upon trust to raise by sale or mortgage the sum of 2,400l., and directed them to put out the same on Government or real securities, and call in and replace out the same from time to time, and to pay the income to C. for life, and after her death to pay the principal to such persons as C. should appoint by will, and in default of appointment to C.'s children. The will did not contain a power for the trustees to give receipts. A. and B. mortgaged the estate to C. for 2,400l., and C. assigned the mortgage to D. :—Held, that a power for A. and B. to give receipts for this sum might be implied, and that D. was entitled to the mortgaged premises as against the persons claiming under the trusts of the testator's will.

In this case, if C. had paid the money to A. and B. he would not have been bound to see to the application of it; and if the mortgage deed to C. was regular on the face of it, D. would not have been affected by any breach of trust in which A, B. and C. might have been implicated.

Isaac Wheeldon, by his will, dated the 18th of April 1816, devised the residue of his real estates to T. Lomas and W. Wood, their executors, administrators and assigns, for the term of 500 years from the day of his death, upon the trusts thereafter mentioned, with remainder to J. Wheeldon for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, with remainders over.

The trusts of the term were, that the trustees should by sale, demise, or mortgage of all or any part of the hereditaments comprised in the said term, for all or any part of the said term, or by other lawful ways and means, levy and raise (over and above the costs, charges and expenses of levying the same) the sum of 2,400l., and, when so raised, upon further trust that they should put and place out the same at interest upon Government or real security or securities, and call in and replace out the same from time to time as they should think proper, and should pay the interest, dividends and proceeds thereof as the same should become due unto Sarah Benton (the daughter of the testator) for her life, and should, after her decease, call in the said principal sum of 2,400l., and pay and apply the same unto and among such person or persons as the said Sarah Benton should by will appoint, and, in default thereof, unto and amongst the child and children of the said Sarah Benton living at her decease.

There was no power in the will authorizing Lomas and Wood to give receipts for the money so to be raised.

The testator died in 1822.

By an indenture, dated the 22nd of May 1828, in consideration of the sum of 2,400l. (the sum directed to be raised), and also of the sum of 50l. (for expenses) expressed to be paid by J. Williamson to the trustees Lomas and Wood, they, in pursuance of the trusts of the will, conveyed the premises comprised in it to J. Williamson for the term of 500 years, subject to the usual power for redemption. The usual receipt for the sums expressed to be paid was indorsed on the deed, and signed by the trustees.

This mortgage was duly assigned by Williamson to the plaintiffs.

In 1850 Mrs. Benton died.

This was a foreclosure suit, filed by the plaintiffs, against the persons interested in the mortgaged estates. Some of the defendants, by their answer to the bill, disputed the plaintiffs' right to foreclose, on the ground that the money expressed to have been paid by Williamson to the trustees had not been paid to them, but that it had been paid to persons not entitled to receive it, and had been lost.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Baggallay, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Russell, Mr. F. T. White, Mr. Kenyon Parker, Mr. Keene, Mr. Smythe, and Mr. Freeling, for other parties.

PARKER, V.C.—I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for foreclosure. This is a trust of real estate. The trustees were to raise, by sale or mortgage, 2,400*l.*, and, when raised, they were to hold it on these trusts:—"that they should put and place out the same at interest upon government or real security or securities, and call in and replace out the same from time to time as they should think proper." Then certain trusts are declared of the money. The trustees made a mortgage which, upon the face of the deed, was regular, and signed a receipt for the money. An important question then arises. The plaintiffs have not proved that the trustees received or properly applied the money, and the question is whether this is one of those cases in which a mortgagee is bound to see to the application of the money advanced. No doubt a mere trust to raise money by mortgage or sale does not give the trustees power to give a discharge. It is consistent with the intention of the parties that a trustee should not have authority to receive the money. He may be intended to be a mere machine to raise the money, and to have no power to give receipts. You must look at the nature of the trust to see whether such an authority may be reasonably implied or not. Now what authority was here given to the trustees? They were to invest the money, and, having invested it, they might sell it out again, and re-invest it in other securities, and so on, toties quoties. Is it reasonable to suppose that the testator, giving them authority to change the investments from time to time, should deny them authority to receive the money? It seems to me most reasonable to suppose that the trustees had this authority. In this case, without wishing to introduce exceptions to the general rule, I think that, from the nature of the trust, there was an implied authority for the trustees to receive the money, and then, they having given a receipt, it was not necessary for the mortgagee to shew that the money was invested. No doubt, if there had been a misapplication of the money, it might be shewn that he was a party to the misapplication.

The present plaintiffs are transferees of the mortgage, having the legal estate, and are not affected by the irregularities, if any, committed with respect to the application of the money by the trustees. I think, therefore, that they are entitled to a decree for foreclosure.

Infant—Appointment of Guardian ad Litem to infant Defendants.

Motion for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for infant defendants without their appearance in court, no reason being given for their not appearing, refused.

This was an application that a guardian ad litem might be appointed to six infant defendants without their appearance in court. There was an affidavit that one of the children was unable to attend the court from ill health, but nothing was stated as to the other five.

Mr. Allnutt, for the application, cited Drant v. Vause (1).

PARKER, V.C. said—That the appearance of the infants in court was not an unmeaning form, it being desirable that it should be shewn that they were under the care of the guardian who was to be appointed. He would make the order as to all the infants upon the appearance in court of the five who were in health.

Power—Appointment—Execution.

A lady upon the marriage of her son, H. S. B., settled several sums of stock for the benefit of him and his wife, and the issue of the marriage, and in case there should be one or more child or children, not being an only daughter, then the stocks were to become vested in such child or children respectively, or any one or more exclusively, to be transferred and assigned to him or them respectively, at such age or ages, and in such proportions as H. S. B. should appoint by deed or will, with remainder in default of appointment for the benefit of the children of the marriage. H. S. B., upon the birth of a son, appointed the stocks unto his son C. S. B. absolutely, and declared that the same should be a vested interest in him immediately after the execution of the deed, but he reserved to himself a power of revocation. His wife being again enceinte, H. S. B. executed another deed, revoking the former deed, and appointing the whole of the stocks to his son C. S. B., and all and every other child or children of the marriage who should be living at his death or born afterwards, equally to be divided. H. S. B. was at that time in very ill health, and he died shortly after, and after his death a daughter was born. C. S. B. survived his father about five years, and upon his death letters of administration were taken out by his mother, who had married again, and upon a bill filed by her and her husband to have the trusts of the settlement and the deed of appointment carried into execution:—Held, that the power in the settlement was duly executed, and that the children alone were the objects of the appointment for whom benefits were provided.

Caroline Susannah Browne, being possessed of considerable sums of stock, upon the marriage of her son Henry Sabine Browne with Isabel Harriet Anne Bremer, transferred into the names of Thomas Henry William Desbrisay, Alfred Henry Howard, Richard Morgan and John Perry Croke, the last two of whom were since dead, the sums of 16,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* consols, 13,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, and 1,000*l.* East India stock, upon trust, that they or the survivors or survivor of them, should out of the dividends and annual proceeds of the trust funds, pay to H. S. Browne and his assigns for the joint lives of himself and C. S. Browne the annual sum of 300*l.*, and should also during the joint lives of C. S. Browne and H. S. Browne pay all the residue or surplus of the dividends unto, or permit the same to be received by, C. S. Browne and her assigns for her and their own benefit, and after the decease of C. S. Browne upon trust to pay the whole of the dividends and annual produce of all the trust stocks, funds or securities unto, or authorize or permit the same to be received by, H. S. Browne and his assigns for his and their own benefit, but subject to the payment of an annuity of 300*l.* a year to I. H. A. Bremer or her assigns during her natural life. And as to the trust stocks, funds and securities after the decease of the survivor of them, C. S. Browne and H. S. Browne, upon trust, if there should be any child or children of the said H. S. Browne by his then intended or any future wife, that the trustees or the survivors or survivor of them should transfer and assign the several trust stocks, funds and securities, and every of them, to, between and among such child or children in manner thereafter mentioned, that is to say:—in case there should be issue of Henry Sabine Browne by Isabel Harriet Anne Bremer one or more child or children, not being an only daughter, then that the trust stocks, funds or securities should become vested in such child or children respectively, or any one or more exclusively of the other or others of them respectively, to be transferred or assigned to him or them respectively, at such age or respective ages, in such manner, and in such shares and proportions if more than one, the share and proportion or shares and proportions of any child or children together not being less than the value of the share to which an only daughter of the marriage would become entitled under or by virtue of the said indenture in default of the exercise of this power of appointment, as the said H. S. Browne should by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, with or without power of revocation, to be duly sealed and delivered by him, or by his last will and testament in writing, to be by him duly executed, direct or appoint, give or bequeath the same. And for want of any such direction, if there should be but one such child, and such only child should be a son, then that the trust stock, funds, or securities should vest in such only son at his age of twenty-one years, and be transferred and assigned to him at such age. But if there should be but one such child only, and such only child should be a daughter, then that such only daughter should be entitled to the sum of 16,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* consols only, part of the said trust funds or securities, which should vest in such only daughter at the age of twenty-one years or her marriage, with consent, &c., which should first happen, and be transferred to her on, or at the same age, day, or time. And if there should be two or more such children, then the trust stock, funds or securities in default of any such appointment should vest in and be transferred or assigned between such children in equal shares and proportions, the share or shares of such of them as should be a son or sons to vest in him or them respectively at his or their age or respective ages of twenty-one years, and the share or shares of such of them as should be a daughter or daughters to vest in her or them respectively at her or their age or respective ages of twenty-one, or day or respective days of marriage, with such consent as aforesaid, which should first happen, and be transferred to him, her or them respectively at the same ages, days, or times respectively. And it was provided that if there should be more than one child for whom portions were intended, and any one or more of them should die before he, she or they should acquire a vested interest in the trust stock, funds or securities, under or by virtue of the power or trusts therein contained, then as well the original share intended to be thereby provided for as the share or shares by virtue of the now stating indenture, surviving or accruing to each and every such child so dying, and so much thereof as should not have been applied for the preferment in the world of any such child or children being a son or sons, in pursuance of the power therein contained, should vest in, accrue, and belong to the survivor or survivors or other or others of such children, in equal shares if more than one, at such time or times and in manner as is declared of and concerning his, her or their original share or shares in the trust stock, funds and securities.

The deed then directed advances to be made for the maintenance and education of the children of the marriage, and directed the accumulation of the surplus, and if there should be no child of the said Henry Sabine Browne and Isabel Harriet Anne Bremer, who should become absolutely entitled under any of the trusts or powers to the whole of the trust stock, funds or securities, or to the sum of 16,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* consols, part thereof, then the same or such part thereof to which such child should not become so entitled, should go, and be held as to four equal fifth parts or shares thereof in trust for the defendants, Amelia Browne, the wife of W. S. Carter, Anna Maria Browne, the wife of T. Ingle, Harriet Browne and Juliana Browne, in equal shares and proportions as tenants in common, and their respective executors, administrators and assigns; and as to the remaining fifth part or share thereof, upon trust that the defendants T. H. W. Desbrisay, A. H. Howard, R. Morgan, and J. P. Crooke, and the survivors or survivor of them should, during the life of Caroline, the wife of James Power, pay the dividends or annual produce of such last-mentioned fifth part or share unto such person or persons as she should appoint, or into her own hands, for her separate use, with remainder for such person or persons as the said Caroline Power should by will appoint, with remainder to such persons as would have been entitled thereto if she had died intestate and without leaving a husband. The marriage between H. S. Browne and I. H. A. Bremer was solemnized in February 1840.

Caroline Susannah Browne died in March 1842. There were several children of the marriage between H. S. Browne and Isabel Harriet Anne Bremer,—Alice Sabine Browne, who was born in December 1840 and died on the 2nd of December 1841, Compton Sabine Browne, who was born in May 1842 and died on the 2nd of March 1849, and the defendant Isabel Henrietta Browne, who was born on the 20th of June 1843.

By a deed-poll, dated the 8th of September 1842, H. S. Browne did, in exercise of the power reserved to him by the indenture of settlement, direct and appoint the several sums of 16,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* consols, 13,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, and 1,000*l.* East India stock, unto his son C. S. Browne, his executors, administrators and assigns, absolutely, and expressly declared that the several trust funds, subject to his life estate therein, should be a vested interest in the said C. S. Browne immediately after the execution of the deed-poll. Provided, nevertheless, and he did thereby reserve to himself by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, to be sealed and delivered by him in the presence of, and to be attested by two or more credible witnesses, the power to revoke, annul and make void, wholly or in part, the appointment thereby made.

On the 17th of January 1843, his wife being again enceinte, H. S. Browne executed another deed-poll, in pursuance of the power contained in the indenture of the 8th of September 1842, and revoked the appointment made by him in favour of Compton Sabine Browne, and by virtue of and in execution of the power and authority given and reserved to him by the indenture of settlement of the 25th of February 1840, and of every other power and authority, did direct and appoint that all the stocks and funds in the deed-poll bearing date the 8th of September 1842, and the dividends and interest thereof, should, subject and without prejudice, as in the deed-poll expressed, remain, continue and be unto his said son, Compton Sabine Browne, and all and every other the child or children of him the said Henry Sabine Browne by Isabel Harriet Anne, his wife, who should be living at his death or be born in due time after, equally to be divided between them, if more than one, as tenants in common; and if he should leave but one such child, then he did direct and appoint the said stocks and funds and the dividends and income thereof, but so subject as aforesaid, to such one child, his or her executor or administrator, to be absolutely vested in him or them respectively on the day of the death of him the said Henry Sabine Browne, or as soon after as circumstances would admit; and the said Henry Sabine Browne reserved to himself a power, by any deed, &c. wholly or in part to revoke the appointment thereby made.

Henry Sabine Browne died on the 24th of February 1843, having by his will, dated the 8th of September 1842, given and devised unto his wife, her heirs, executors and administrators, all the estate and effects, both real and personal, of which he was then, or at the time of his death might be seised or possessed, and appointed her his sole executrix thereof, and sole guardian of the persons, estates, and fortunes of his child or children during their respective minorities; and the will was proved by the testator's widow on the 1st of May 1843.

Upon the death of Compton S. Browne, his mother and sister were his sole next-of-kin, and letters of administration were taken out to him by his mother.

In December 1849, the testator's widow intermarried with the plaintiff, Frederick George William Fearon; and by an indenture, dated the 28th of December 1849, she assigned to Frederick Henry Hastings Glasse and Robert Gatty all the shares, right, and interest to which she, as one of the two only next-of-kin of Compton S. Browne, or otherwise howsoever, was then or might be entitled in the several sums of 16,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* consols, 13,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, and 1,000*l.* East India stock, and in all accumulations of dividends and income for the benefit of her intended husband and herself, and the issue of the marriage.

John Perry Crooke died in 1844, and Richard Morgan had also since departed this life.

It was now insisted that, by virtue of the deeds-poll, or one of them, Compton Sabine Browne, deceased, upon the death of Henry Sabine Browne, his father, became entitled to a vested interest in the whole or some part of the Bank annuities and East India stock, and that such right had become vested in I. H. A. Fearon, as the legal personal representative of C. S. Browne; and this bill was filed by Mr. and Mrs. Fearon against the trustees of the settlement, and also against all the parties who were or who would have become entitled to the funds in remainder, in default of execution of the power, to have the trusts of the indenture of the 25th of February 1840 performed, and to have the necessary accounts taken.

The defendants, William Scott Carter and Amelia, his wife, and the other parties who would have become entitled, by their answers not only questioned the competency of Henry S. Browne to execute the deeds, but also disputed the validity of the execution of the power contained in the settlement of the 25th of February 1840, as it was made to take effect on the birth of the child and immediately on the death of the father, and they claimed a contingent interest in the trust funds in case the defendant, Isabel Henrietta Browne, the daughter of Henry S. Browne, should not live to attain twenty-one, or marry under that age with the requisite consent.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the plaintiffs, Mr. and Mrs. Fearon.—There could be no doubt upon the construction of the power, and prima facie the appointment was good, unless incompetency to execute could be proved, as the son dying a few years after the father could not be made a ground to defeat it. It was supposed that this case fell within those in which the appointment was made for the benefit of the donee.—

Mr. Walpole and Mr. E. F. Smith, for the sisters of H. S. Browne and their husbands.—The appointment could not be made to vest so as to defeat the purposes of the settlement creating it. It is, however, to be considered, whether the appointments were framed according to the power, it is for that purpose necessary to bear in mind from whom the powers came, the objects and intention of the settlement, and the circumstances under which it was executed, and it is necessary to bear in mind the fact whether the property came from a person other than the settlor, and then the Court will look to the end and intention of the settlement, and if its object was defeated by the appointment it was void—2 Sugden on Powers, p. 302, Lord Teynham v. Webb (1) and Lord Hinchinbroke v. Seymour. In these cases no distinction was made between portions and the settlement. In this case the settlement was intended to keep the property in the family of Browne, but if the appointments were to be upheld, they would destroy all right by survivorship in the sisters of the donee of the power.

Mr. Rousell did not reply.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I consider this to be a good execution of the power. But considering the state of health of the donee, and his debility in 1842, while in London; it was proper for the defendants to put the plaintiffs to proof of execution; at the same time, I think the competency of this gentleman is clearly and distinctly proved. That he was a person of very weak health and of no great capacity is, probably, perfectly clear; but that he understood at that time what the instrument was he was executing; that he had formerly executed a deed by which he appointed the whole to the only child he had then, and that he was executing a deed by which he appointed the whole amongst the two children he had then, because he speaks of the child in venue sa mère at the time, is I think clear. Both the medical gentlemen and the solicitor who allowed him to execute the deed at the time were persons of unquestioned respectability, who would not have allowed a person who was not aware of what he was doing to execute a deed at that period of time. If he had not understood it, those persons, who had no interest whatever in the matter, would undoubtedly have interfered to prevent it; and in cases of this description, where there is no direct evidence impugning the sanity or impugning the capacity of the person who executed the deed, it would unsettle all species of instruments if the Court were to direct further inquiry or set a deed aside because it was not proved that the donee was sufficiently competent at the time he executed it. The burthen of proof lies on the other side; here there is evident and distinct proof that he executed the deed. The question whether the power was well executed is of very great importance: and if I had thought it open to a reasonable amount of doubt, I should have taken time to look into the authorities. But the husband has a power of appointing amongst all the children of the marriage, provided there are more than one, I may say all the children of the marriage, in such shares and proportions, the one to the exclusion of the other, as he shall think fit, and to vest at such times as he thinks fit: that is my general impression of the effect of the power. He does execute the power upon the birth of a son, by giving the whole to that son; and when his wife subsequently became enceinte, he, being himself in a weak state of health, then executes the power, by which he gives the whole of the property equally amongst all the children whom he has or may have at the time of his death, or the survivor, to be divided equally amongst them. Whether that execution is good depends upon whether, in the first place, it is within the terms of the power; and, in the next place, whether, being within the terms of the power, it was executed bond fide for the purpose and intent of the settlement. That it is within the terms of the power there can be no question.

The property was to become and be vested in one or more child or children, exclusive of the others, and to be transferred and assigned to him or them at such age or ages, and in such shares and proportions, if more than one, as he should appoint. The words are express, that it is to become vested in the children, in any one of them at any age, in any manner and in any share which he shall appoint. There could not possibly be larger words; and if the donee of such a power cannot give the fund to one child, to be vested at any time he thinks fit, it would be totally impossible to construe any words to have a legal and intelligible meaning. It is quite clear, therefore, the words of the power are sufficiently large for the purpose. Then it is said, assume that the words of the power are sufficiently large, yet, nevertheless, the rule of the Court is, that you must not take advantage of the words of the power and execute it so as to give the property in such a manner that it may devolve either for your own advantage, or that it shall not bond fide be for the purpose and object of the settlement.

In the first place, before referring to the particular cases decided upon the subject, you must always ascertain the object and scope of the settlement, not merely from how the fund is to go in default of appointment, but also from the powers which are entrusted to the donee of the power. The settlement says the husband shall have an absolute and uncontrouled dominion in saying how this is to go, and if he does not think fit to exercise that, it shall go in the following manner. It is not a fair observation to make upon any instrument, that because it has specified the manner in which the fund is to go in case the donee does not exercise the power, it is properly and necessarily to cut down the manner in which the donee is to exercise that power, so as not to allow him to go beyond either the words or the spirit of that which the settlement has declared shall be the manner in which the fund is to be distributed, if no appointment whatever is made. In this case it is manifest that the husband could gain no personal advantage himself from it. All the particular cases of fraud which are referred to where the donee of a power has executed it for the purpose of obtaining a personal advantage to himself may be easily explained; because as the power is only to take effect amongst a class of persons to be ascertained at his death, it is totally impossible that he could obtain any advantage by reason of their dying intestate and the fund go over to him as one of the next-of-kin. Then, what other object are you to look at? If he has the absolute and uncontrouled disposition of the fund, and he executes the power in such a manner that he himself shall not obtain any possible advantage, in what reasonable way can it be said that he has not executed it in good faith, and that his execution of it is a fraud upon the terms of the power? What consequences would this lead to?

This execution cannot be considered to be good or bad from the mere circumstance of whether he died immediately afterwards or not. The mere circumstance of the event which has occurred cannot make the execution of the power good or bad. Suppose he had thought fit to say that the son ought to have double the proportion of the daughter—that he had given two-thirds to the son and one-third to the daughter,—exactly the same observation would have arisen, that a child might have died, and it would not go to the survivor, and there could be no advantage taken by the survivor. Could it be contended, on his death, that the daughter, who only took one-half of what the son took, could have said, “if they had both lived to the age of twenty-one, this was really a fraud upon the power, because the father might have died when they were both infants, and the son might have died also an infant, and, therefore, by reason of that, the mother might have taken one-third of that share, which would otherwise come to me”? It is obvious the argument on the other side must go to that extent, if it is held in the particular case that the execution of the power is bad. If the execution of the power is bad, would it have been bad if there had been a direction for survivorship between the children, which is omitted, so that in fact they would have taken it exactly in the same manner as they would in default of appointment. That must be contended for if it is held that the cases relating to portions which say the portion is not to vest before the time, or is not properly to be raised before the time when it ought reasonably to be raised, apply to cases of this description; because it is manifest, in that case, the vesting would have taken place at an earlier period than if there had been no execution of the power, and it had been allowed to go in default of appointment. I concur in the observation that in substance and effect the rules respecting powers must be treated exactly in the same manner as where there is a fund to be divided, or where there is a portion to be raised. It alters the case where there is a portion to be raised. There is an ingredient which may be a mark of fraud, and which does not arise in the other case; and therefore the person creates a fund for the purpose of obtaining a benefit from it, which does not arise in the other case; and though the rules respecting the execution of the powers are the same, yet there are circumstances connected with it which give a different colour to the transaction. If he were not to execute it so as to take effect during the infancy—(the argument must go to that full extent)—he cannot execute it so as to give a vested interest in them until they are twenty-one: if he cannot do that, it is manifest he cannot execute a power during his lifetime if he dies during the time they are infants. That appears to be totally at variance with the whole scope, object and view of the execution of the power. If I were to hold that this was not a due execution of the power, I should be unsettling titles to a very great extent, and introducing a very dangerous limitation with respect to powers which may be executed by donees of powers. In this case, it is exceedingly probable that the intention of the original framers of the settlement was, that the widow of the donee should not take any interest or benefit in it, and I am also of opinion that it was not the intention of the donee, when he executed this power, that she should take any interest in it. He gives the fund equally between the two children, and it was very probable that he would not have in his mind the possibility of one of the children dying.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that they are the objects of the bounty, and that they are the persons to whom he intended to give it; and I am also of opinion, if I were to hold that this was a fraud on the power—a false execution—I should be deciding that which would do very great injury, and unsettle titles to a considerable extent. I must make a decree according to the prayer of the bill.

Where errors in a decree are obvious, the Court will rectify them, even after it is enrolled.

This was a motion that the decree made on the hearing might be altered or varied by adding the words, “the defendants, William Scott Carter and Amelia his wife, Thomas Ingle and Anna Maria his wife, and Roger Kynaston and Juliana his wife,” after the words “cestuis que trust” in the direction that in taxing the costs the Taxing Master is to allow the several cestuis que trust and their trustees but one set of costs; and also by adding the word “General” after the word “Accountant” in the direction for sale of consols for payment of the duty on the grant of administration to the plaintiff, Isabel Harriet Anne Fearon, of the estate and effects of Compton

Sabine Browne, and of the costs of and relating to obtaining the same.

Mr. G. L. Russell, in support of the motion.—By the decree made in the cause the Taxing Master was to allow to the several cestuis que trust and to their trustees respectively but one set of costs. This direction was intended to apply to the defendants, Amelia Carter and others, who, on their respective marriages, had made settlements of their expectant shares, and their trustees were parties defendants to the suit; but the direction was not intended to extend to the defendant Isabel Henrietta Browne, who was entitled to three-fourths of the funds and a cestui que trust of the original settlement under which the matter in dispute arose. The Registrar would have amended the decree as being a mistake, the subsequent direction being for payment of the costs of the plaintiffs to their solicitors, and the costs of the defendant, Isabel Henrietta Browne, to Mr. Johnstone, her solicitor; but as the decree was enrolled he considered he had not the power.—

Will—Construction—Alienation—Insolvency—Life Estate—Gift over.

If there is a valid gift over on alienation by one entitled to a life interest in personally, it will take effect on insolvency, and the interest of the insolvent will not pass to his assignee.

This was a claim for the administration of the trusts of the will of William Rochford, deceased. The testator, by his will, dated in August 1822, gave all his residuary personal estate (and which was subsequently invested in the purchase of 3,800*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consols,) to trustees, upon trust for his wife for life, and after her decease upon trust to divide the same into four shares for his four sons for life, and their respective children as and when the latter should respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, and the shares of such of the testator's sons as should die without issue to survive and accrue to the others. The testator declared by his will that in case his wife or any of his sons should in any manner, sell, assign, transfer, or incumber or otherwise dispose of, or anticipate all or any part of his, her, or their share and interest, then and in such case, and from and immediately after such alienation, &c. the several bequests to or in trust for her, him, or them should cease, determine, and become utterly void as if the same had not been mentioned or made part of his will, or his wife or either of his sons were dead. After the death of the testator and his wife, two of the four sons died without issue, and Richard Rochford, one of the surviving sons, afterwards, and in December 1849, being insolvent and in prison, petitioned the Insolvent Debtors Court for his discharge, and upon his petition the usual order was made, vesting his property in the defendant English as assignee. Richard Rochford had, at the time the claim was filed, two children only; viz. Martha Ann, the wife of the plaintiff, James Rochford, and who had attained twenty-one years of age, and Richard Rochford, the younger, who was still an infant. The claim was filed by James Rochford and his wife against the executors of the testator's surviving trustee, English, and Richard Rochford, the younger. The plaintiffs claimed to have one half of the insolvent's moiety in the trust property paid to them, and the other half of the moiety secured for the benefit of the infant, Richard Rochford, the younger, if he should attain twenty-one years of age.

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood) and Mr. Shebbeare appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. De Gex, for the defendant, Richard Rochford, the younger, in support of the claim: and submitted that the effect of the insolvency of Richard Rochford, the elder, was an alienation of his life interest within the terms of the testator's will. They cited—

Mr. Shebbeare replied.

Feb. 12.—TURNER, V.C. stated the facts, and said—Under these circumstances it was contended by the plaintiffs, and by the defendant, Richard Rochford the younger, that the insolvent's interest had ceased, and that the plaintiffs are absolutely, and Richard Rochford the defendant is contingently, entitled to the sum of 1,900*l.* stock in which, but for his insolvency, Richard Rochford the elder would have had a life interest. But the assignee claims to be entitled during the life of the insolvent.

In determining this question, the first point to consider is, to see whether there are any fixed rules to guide the determination of the Court; and on examination of the cases there appear to be two rules laid down which are applicable to and sufficient to govern the present case:

first, that property cannot be given for life, any more than absolutely, with any restriction upon alienation, and that any such restriction is void if annexed to a life estate, just as if annexed to an estate in fee; and secondly, that although a life estate be expressly given by the first part of the will, it may well be determined by an apt limitation over in the subsequent part of the will.

The first proposition is fully supported by Brandon v. Robinson (1) and Graves v. Dolphin (2), in both of which cases there were estates for life given, with a restriction on alienation, but no gift over on alienation, and the doctrine laid down in these cases has not been contravened by any subsequent decisions.

The second proposition, that a life estate may be determined by an apt limitation over is equally well settled, and I need only refer to the cases cited in argument—Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, Cooper v. Wyatt, Brandon v. Aston and Churchill v. Marks. It was said at the bar, indeed, that a limitation over was unnecessary, and the case of Dickson's Trust was relied on. I do not think it necessary to decide this point at present; but I do not understand the case of Dickson's Trust as deciding that a life interest may be well determined merely by a proviso that it should cease in a certain event without any gift over. The true rule is, that the Court must collect the testator's intention whether the life interest should continue or not, from the whole will, and we must look to the primary disposition to see what estate the testator intended to give, and to the ulterior disposition to see in what events it is given over. If the Court finds that there is a limitation over, and that it meets the event in which the primary disposition was to cease, then it is clear that the testator did not intend the life estate to continue. If the Court, on examination, finds that the limitation over does not meet the event in which the previous gift was to cease, then there is not sufficient evidence of the testator's intention that the life interest should determine. This rule takes away all difficulty and falls in with the case of Dommett v. Bedford (supra), in which there was no gift over, but a proviso for ceaser; for it would be difficult to argue that more force was due to a gift over than to a proviso for ceaser.

Some expressions of Lord Eldon in the case of Brandon v. Robinson have been the subject of remark, and a few observations upon them may therefore be proper. "A disposition to a man until he shall become bankrupt," his Lordship says, "and after his bankruptcy, over, is quite different from an attempt to give to him for his life, with a proviso that he shall not sell or alien it. If that condition is so expressed as to amount to a limitation, reducing the interest short of a life estate, neither the man nor his assignees can have it beyond the period limited." Now, I do not understand Lord Eldon here to say that the law will not permit a proviso determining the previous gift; on the contrary, he expressly says, that if the proviso be so expressed as to reduce the interest previously given to one short of a life estate, neither the man nor his assignees shall have it beyond the period for which the gift is limited. Lord Eldon then passes to the case of Foley v. Burnell (3), and the old law on the subject; and entering on the question, whether the interest was assignable by the Commissioners in Bankruptcy, he says, "To prevent that, it must be given to some one else." But this does not mean that in all cases there must be a gift over, but that under that particular will the assignees took the life interest of the bankrupt in the absence of any gift over. This seems clear, both from what precedes and from what follows the particular gift.

But without determining that a gift over be in all cases necessary, I am of opinion that in this case the testator has not merely provided for the ceaser of the life interest, but has made a valid gift over. Some effect must, if possible, be given to all the words of the will, and if I were to hold otherwise in this case, no effect would be given to the proviso following the previous gift for life. Some observations were made on the terms in which this proviso was framed, but on looking to the previous part of the will, as well as to the ulterior provisions, I think there is no difficulty if we refer to the different expressions, "as if the same had not been mentioned in or made part of this my will," and "as if my said wife or either of my sons were then dead," to the different persons and different events to whom and upon which the interests are given over, in the previous part of the will.

I am also of opinion that the event which has occurred is an event which the testator intended should determine the interests given in the previous part of the will.

I think that the views I have thus taken are in accordance with Brandon v. Aston and Shee v. Hale, (supra,) and are not affected by Lear v. Leggett and Pym v. Lockyer, (supra.) A learned text-writer has expressed some doubt as to the soundness of the distinction taken in Shee v. Hale, and other cases, between alienation under a bankruptcy and under an insolvency, but I see no reason for the doubts.

My conclusion is that the life interest of the insolvent is determined, and the only remaining question is, whether the capital should be now divided. I think that the capital is not yet divisible, for the determination of the life interest does not alter the class who are to take on that event, and a division of the fund at the present time might carry it beyond its objects, for after-born children, if any, will be equally entitled to come in. At present Mrs. Rochford, the plaintiff, takes under the will a vested interest in one moiety of the 1,900*l.* stock, and the defendant, Richard Rochford, the younger, takes a contingent interest in the other moiety, depending on his attaining twenty-one years, but both these interests would open so as to let in after-born children (if any) becoming entitled under the will. Their interest would be on the same footing with that of vested interests in a fund which is subject to a power of appointment, and which are, therefore, liable to be divested by the exercise of that power, in which case the parties entitled to the vested interests are entitled to the dividends and interest in the mean time. The fund must, therefore, be brought into court and kept entire.

Voluntary Settlement—Contract—Recital—Family Arrangement—Subsequent Mortgage—Stat. 27 Eliz., c. 4.

A charge created by C. S. upon his estates to secure the payment of a sum of money borrowed for S. H. S. is a good consideration, not only for a collateral charge upon the estates of S. H. S. to indemnify C. S. and his estate from the payment of the money borrowed, but also for a settlement of the S. estates upon his family.

*A. H., being a trustee for the younger children of S. H. S., advanced a sum of 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* upon the security of certain estates in Berkshire, which C. S. on the 20th of January 1832 demised to A. H. for 300 years, to secure the repayment. The money was borrowed for S. H. S., who was tenant in tail of the S. estates in remainder expectant on the death of his mother, the tenant for life; and on the 21st of January 1832, S. H. S. demised the S. estates to C. S. for 2,000 years, to indemnify him and the Berkshire estates from the 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* and interest, secured to A. H.; and by deeds dated the 23rd and 24th of January 1832, in further compliance with an agreement recited in this deed, he settled the S. estates upon various uses, for the benefit of his family. On the death of the tenant for life, S. H. S., being greatly indebted to G. S. F., executed a disentailing deed, and conveyed the S. estates to G. S. F., giving him a power of sale over the estates as a security for the money due: this was subsequently confirmed by another deed; and in a suit instituted by G. S. F., insisting that the settlement of the 23rd and 24th of January 1832 was voluntary and void against the subsequent alienation for value made to G. S. F., who had notice of the settlement,—Held, that the agreement made by S. H. S. with C. S. to indemnify him against the 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* and to settle the S. estates, was such as this Court would specifically perform, and that it was a consideration sufficient to support the settlement; that the recital in the deed of the 24th of January 1832 of the agreement between S. H. S. and C. S. was sufficient evidence of the contract, and that it was doubtful if* evidence to disprove it could have been entertained; that S. H. S. and C. S. were, by executing the deed, estopped from alleging that the recital was false; that the plaintiff G. S. F. was in the same position as S. H. S.; that the deeds of the 23rd and 24th of January 1832 were valid, and not voluntary and void against a subsequent purchaser for value; and the bill was dismissed with costs against the children of S. H. S. and the defendants resisting the plaintiff's demand, but without costs as against S. H. S. and the defendants supporting the plaintiff.

The facts of this case, with the several questions raised in argument, are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — The question in this case is, whether a deed of the 24th of January 1832 is valid against a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration, who bought with notice of the deed. The deed was a settlement executed by Sir Simeon Henry Stuart, whereby the family estates, situate in the county of Essex, were conveyed upon certain trusts for the benefit of his family. By a settlement made in the last century, Dame Frances Maria Stuart was tenant for life of the family estate, and, subject to her life estate, Sir Simeon Henry Stuart was first tenant in tail male. On the 25th of October 1815, Sir Simeon married Dame Georgiana Stuart, on which occasion a settlement was executed, by which a sum of 5,000*l.* was secured by the bonds of George and Robert Gun, to be paid within six months after the death of Lady Rossmore, to Samuel Pryer and Arthur

Henry as trustees, to be invested by them in trust for the benefit of the younger children of the marriage in such manner as Sir Simeon and his wife should jointly appoint, and in default as the survivor should appoint, and in default of any such appointment, equally amongst the other children of the marriage, and at the same time Sir Simeon covenanted to settle a jointure or rent-charge of 800*l.* on his estate in favour of his wife. On the 23rd of July 1823, Sir Simeon, without the concurrence of the tenant for life, Lady Stuart, conveyed the estates to uses to secure the jointure of 800*l.* to his wife Dame Georgiana Stuart; and subject thereto to such uses as he should appoint, and in default, to himself in fee. By this indenture, he acquired a base fee in the hereditaments in question. In the year 1828, the bond for 5,000*l.* was paid off, and the money was invested in the names of Samuel Pryer and Arthur Henry in the purchase of 6,339*l.* consols, upon the trusts of the settlement of 1815; and in January 1832 it was standing in the name of Arthur Henry, the surviving trustee of the settlement.

In January 1832 the transaction in question in this suit occurred, and the deeds which effected it are four, and their dates respectively are the 20th, 21st, 23rd and 24th days of that month. The first deed, bearing date the 20th of January 1832, was an indenture of demise by way of mortgage made between Sir Charles Saxton of the first part, Richard Samuel White of the second part, John Hudson of the third part, and Arthur Henry, the surviving trustee of the settlement of 1815, of the fourth part, by which, in consideration of 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* paid by Arthur Henry to Sir Charles Saxton, Sir Charles Saxton, and Richard Samuel White, and John Hudson, his trustees, demised divers estates and hereditaments in the county of Berks, the property of Sir Charles Saxton, to Arthur Henry, his executors, administrators and assigns, for a term of three hundred years, for securing the repayment of the money so advanced, with interest at 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. By this indenture, standing alone, the effect was, that Sir Charles Saxton borrowed from Arthur Henry, the trustee for the younger children under the settlement of the 25th of October 1815, the sum of 5,000*l.* invested for their benefit, and secured the repayment thereof with interest by a mortgage on his Berkshire estate. On the following day, that is, on the 21st of January 1832, the following deed was made between Sir Simeon H. Stuart of the first part, William Frederick Hewer Stuart of the second part, Sir Charles Saxton of the third part, and Richard Samuel White of the fourth part. It recited that the 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* paid to Sir Charles was, in fact, borrowed for the use, and at the request of, and was wholly paid to Sir Simeon, and that Sir Charles Saxton executed the deed of the 20th of January at the request and only as security for Sir Simeon, and that in consideration of his so doing, Sir Simeon had executed the indemnity thereafter contained, and accordingly Sir Simeon and W. F. H. Stuart, his trustee, granted and demised the Stuart family estates, subject to the life estate of Dame Frances M. Stuart therein, and subject to the rent-charge of 800*l.* in favour of Dame Georgiana Stuart, to Sir Charles Saxton, for a term of two thousand years, for the purpose of indemnifying Sir Charles Saxton, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and their estate and effects, against the repayment of the sum of 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* and interest so secured to Arthur Henry as aforesaid, and against all losses, costs and expenses on account of the same.

In this state of things, the indentures of lease and release of the 23rd and 24th of January 1832 were executed. The parties to the indenture of release of the 24th of January are, Sir Simeon H. Stuart of the first part, Dame Georgiana Stuart of the second part, Vernon Dolphin and R. S. White of the third part, William Brown Ramsay and Thomas Pargeter Dickinson of the fourth part, and Sir Charles Saxton of the fifth part. It recites the deed of the 23rd of July 1823, it recites the deed of the 20th of January 1832, and it then contains a recital in these words, "and whereas the said Sir Charles Saxton consented and agreed to guarantee the payment to the said Arthur Henry of the said principal sum of 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* and the interest thereof in manner aforesaid, and to give and execute the said mortgage security of the 20th of January instant of his own real estate therein comprised, in consideration not only of receiving such indemnity as aforesaid, but also, in consideration of an express understanding and agreement by the said Sir Simeon Henry Stuart to settle and assure the manor, messuages, lands and other hereditaments hereinbefore referred to and hereinafter described, and also appointed and released, or intended so to be, with the appurtenances, subject nevertheless, and without prejudice as hereinafter mentioned, to the uses, upon and for the trusts, intents and purposes, and with, under and subject to the powers and provisos hereinafter contained, in order to secure some certain provision for the children and issue of the said Sir Simeon Henry Stuart by the said Dame Georgiana Stuart his wife, or otherwise as hereinafter mentioned." The deed then recites that there was issue of Sir Simeon by Dame Georgiana three sons and three daughters only, mentioning their names, after which it is by this indenture witnessed, that in pursuance of the said agreement and in order to secure a certain provision for the issue of Sir Simeon by the said Dame Georgiana Stuart, and in consideration of the said Sir Charles Saxton having so as aforesaid made and executed the deed, indenture or mortgage of the 20th of January 1832, and having by his covenant rendered himself liable to pay the sum of 5,185*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, Sir Simeon appointed and conveyed the messuages, lands and hereditaments subject to the life estate of Dame Frances M. Stuart, and subject to the jointure of 800*l.* per annum in favour of Dame Georgiana Stuart, and subject also to the term of one thousand years for securing the jointure, and the indemnity to Sir Charles Saxton, to Messrs. Vernon Dolphin and R. S. White, their heirs and assigns for ever, in trust for Sir Simeon for life, with remainder to W. B. Ramsay and T. P. Dickinson, for the term of three thousand years, with remainder to the first son of Sir Simeon for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the second son of Sir Simeon for life, with remainder to the first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the third in like manner, with remainder to all other sons of Sir Simeon by Dame Georgiana Stuart in tail male, with an ultimate remainder to Sir Simeon in fee. By this settlement, the trusts of the term of three thousand years, vested in Messrs. Ramsay and Dickinson, are declared to be for the purpose of raising 5,000*l.* and interest at 4 per cent. for the younger children of the marriage, other than a child entitled in possession to the hereditaments under the limitations before mentioned. This sum is to be divided among such younger children in such manner as Sir Simeon and Lady Georgiana or the survivor should appoint, and in default of appointment, equally.

Subsequently to this indenture, and beginning in the year 1842, and extending down to the year 1849, Sir Simeon borrowed considerable sums of money and incurred debts to a large amount to the plaintiff. These sums and debts were secured by various deeds executed by Sir Simeon and charged upon those estates. In the month of January 1848, Dame Frances M. Stuart, the tenant for life, died, and Sir Simeon became entitled to the estates in possession. In the month of March of that year, he executed a disentailing deed, and conveyed the property to the plaintiff for ninety-nine years to secure the money due to him, and gave him a power of sale. In December 1848, the original bill was filed. On the 22nd of December 1848, Sir Simeon conveyed the fee simple of all his estates to trustees for the plaintiff, to secure the money due to him, and on the 22nd of April 1849 he executed a further deed, which was duly enrolled, confirming all the alienations for value which he had already made. These deeds, which however I do not think it necessary more particularly to refer to, are put in issue by subsequent supplemental bills.

The question is, whether the deeds of lease and release of the 23rd and 24th of January 1832 are voluntary, and consequently void under the 27 Eliz. c. 4. as against a subsequent alienation for value. The plaintiff, when he advanced his money, had full notice of the settlement of January 1832; but this, as it is admitted, is immaterial, if in truth this deed cannot be supported by any valuable consideration. It is admitted also by the plaintiff, that the estates of Sir Simeon are liable to make good the guarantee to Sir Charles Saxton, and consequently that the appointment of an apportionment of the 5,000*l.* made in July 1842 on the marriage of one daughter with Mr. Long, and another similar appointment made in November 1845 on the marriage of another daughter with Mr. Gale are valid and effectual charges on the estate, in priority to any claim by the plaintiff. But it is contended, that subject to this charge of 5,000*l.*, and subject also to the jointure of 800*l.* per annum, which is now at an end by reason of the decease of Lady Georgiana Stuart in 1840, all the limitations of the estate are voluntary and void as against subsequent purchasers. In support of this view, it is contended, first, that no valuable consideration was given for the settlement of the 24th of January 1832, by Sir Charles Saxton; and, secondly, that even if a valuable consideration was given by Sir Charles Saxton, this would not support the settlement in favour of the children, because they are not to be treated as purchasers; and Johnson v. Legard and other cases of that description were referred to for the purpose of supporting that proposition.

I will consider the latter of these propositions first. There is no doubt a large class of cases which establish indisputably that persons collaterally related to the husband and wife are not within the consideration of the marriage contract, and there is no question either, that the consideration of marriage is the highest known to the law; but these cases do not, in my opinion, apply to the case of a purchase for money. If one man purchases land from another for value, the seller, having received the value for it, cannot contend that the sale is voluntary because the purchaser directed a conveyance of the estate to be made to a person who has not contributed towards the purchase-money. It is true that such a transaction may create various questions, such as that of advancement between a parent and child, but these are all questions between the purchaser and the person to whom, or for whose use, the estate is conveyed; and whatever may be the rights subsisting, or the questions which may arise between the purchaser and the person to whom the estate is conveyed, the seller, who has received his price for the land, cannot complain or contend that the sale is not for a valuable consideration. I know of no principle of law or equity which would have prevented Sir Charles Saxton from purchasing the estate and causing it to be conveyed by the vendor, to uses for the benefit of Sir Simeon Stuart and his family; nor could the vendor, if he had received valuable consideration for the conveyance, be heard to complain of that part of the transaction which gave the conveyance to one who had paid nothing. This distinction is well drawn in the case of Heap v. Tonge, by Sir George Turner, who points out that in the case of marriage, the wife cannot be considered to purchase anything on behalf of the husband's relations, but that if there is a person who distinctly purchases on behalf of collaterals, the limitations so purchased are good and binding against subsequent purchasers for value, as in the case of Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft.

I am, therefore, of opinion that, if it shall appear that Sir Charles Saxton gave a valuable consideration for the settlement, the settlement itself will be supported in favour of the objects of that settlement against a subsequent purchaser for value, with notice of its existence.

This established, it is, on the part of the plaintiff, contended that it gives peculiar force to the argument urged on his behalf, that the nature of the consideration to Sir Charles Saxton to support this deed must be such as would have supported it if it had been a conveyance of the Stuart family estate to him, Sir Charles, in fee simple; and that in such a case it would have been set aside on the ground of inadequacy of consideration. It will, in my opinion, be convenient to consider the question in the first place without reference to the plaintiff, and to examine how the matter would stand between Sir Charles Saxton and Sir Simeon Stuart alone, and on the assumption that the recital contained in the deed of the 24th of January 1832 is a correct statement of the agreement made between them. Could, in that case, Sir Charles Saxton have maintained a bill for specific performance of that contract as against Sir Simeon Stuart? This Court will not assist a volunteer; and, consequently, if the agreement was voluntary, no suit for the specific performance of it could have been maintained. The state of the case was this:—on behalf of and for the benefit of Sir Simeon, Sir Charles had borrowed 5,000*l.*; he had made his Berkshire estate liable to the repayment of it with interest; and he had by his covenant made himself personally liable to pay it. He had agreed to do this in consideration of Sir Simeon undertaking to indemnify him against the consequences, and also in consideration of his settling his estate upon his sons in manner already stated. No doubt could be entertained that if the contract had stopped with the agreement to indemnify Sir Charles Saxton against the consequences of his having borrowed this money for the benefit of Sir Simeon, and by which he had actually obtained the 5,000*l.*, and if the agreement had not in addition contained the subsequent provision for the settlement of such an estate, no doubt could have been entertained that such a contract would have been enforced by Sir Charles. But no matter is more fully settled in this Court than that a contract cannot be specifically performed in part. It must be wholly performed, or not at all; and a part of a contract may be of such a nature as to vitiate the whole. Is then the circumstance that in addition to the indemnity to which Sir Charles Saxton was entitled, he had contracted for a settlement to be made on the family of Sir Simeon, such a circumstance as to deprive Sir Charles Saxton of the rest of his contract, and to make him a loser to the extent of 5,000*l.* and interest which he had borrowed for the benefit of Sir Simeon and paid to him? I am of opinion that it cannot be so regarded; but that Sir Charles would, in the case I have supposed, have been entitled to a decree, enforcing in specie the whole of the contract he entered into. This Court could not have permitted Sir Simeon to resist the performance of it on the ground that this ulterior part of the contract is a matter in which the other party to the contract had not any interest or concern; and that, though he had contracted for it, he was not to have it performed.

It is, however, contended that as soon as Sir Charles obtained the indemnity from Sir Simeon, which was completed on the 21st of January 1832, from that moment Sir Charles was placed in the same position as if he had never borrowed the money, and that in truth nothing further remained to restore him to his former condition, and that all beyond this is voluntary. But this does not appear to me to be so. It is not, I think possible to sever the different parts of the transaction, and to regard them as forming separate and distinct contracts. The four deeds, though bearing date on consecutive days, are necessarily connected together, and, in my opinion, form one transaction. Nor is the position of Sir Charles, even in substance, the same after the deed of the 21st of January was executed as it was before, when he borrowed the money. He still remained liable to an action at law from the trustee of the 5,000*l.* His Berkshire estates were still liable to make it good, and were fettered by that charge upon them so as to render them less marketable and less available for all the purposes connected with the transfer of land or the raising of money. The next day, the trustee might have commenced an action upon the covenant against Sir Charles. The trustee might besides have brought ejectment to obtain possession of the Berkshire estates, and he might in addition have filed a bill of foreclosure in this Court. The expenses of all these proceedings, and of raising the money necessary to defray them, would have fallen on Sir Charles. It is true that he is indemnified out of the Stuart estates, but those estates were in the possession of the tenant for life, who might live a great length of time, and who did in fact survive this transaction sixteen years; and in attempting to make the base fee vested in Sir Simeon, subject to that life estate, available for the purpose of enforcing the indemnity given to him, Sir Charles might have been compelled to embark in long and complicated legal proceedings, the expense and delay of which no experience could adequately predict. It is impossible to say, in such circumstances and with the difficulties which might arise with respect to the title of the Stuart property or any portions of it, that it is certain that the indemnity would be perfect. Still less could it compensate for the temporary loss and anxiety which might have been occasioned by Sir Charles having to repay the sum so borrowed from Mr. Henry before the Stuart estate could be made available for that purpose.

It is to be observed that by reason of Sir Charles consenting to become bound and joining in this transaction, great advantages also were derived to Sir Simeon—greater facilities and more advantageous terms were afforded to him than he could otherwise have obtained. He had no estate in possession. When he afterwards borrowed money, he was compelled to do so on very disadvantageous terms. Arthur Henry could not have lent the trust money to Sir Simeon on those terms on which he obtained it, or indeed on any terms which did not give the trustee a present ample security to which he might resort, if called upon to divide the 5,000*l.* between the younger children of the marriage before the death of the tenant for life.

Taking all these matters into consideration, and having regard to the objections which I have already referred to relative to the adequacy of the consideration, and without expressing any opinion on the question, not that I think that there is much doubt upon the point, whether it would have been sufficient to support a sale to Sir Charles Saxton for his own benefit; considering also the nature of the transaction, and that it was one in which a proper and reasonable settlement was made of the family estate—I am of opinion that the consideration, even if it were inadequate for the purpose of supporting a sale between strangers, is sufficient for the purpose of supporting the settlement so made; and consequently that as between Sir Charles Saxton and Sir Simeon Stuart, upon a bill filed for that purpose, if after Sir Simeon had received the 5,000*l.* he had refused to execute the deed of the 24th of January 1882, this Court would have made a decree compelling the specific performance of the agreement stated in the recital to the deed,—assuming it to have been proved that that agreement was duly made and entered into by Sir Charles on the one side and Sir Simeon on the other.

If I am right in the view I have taken as between Sir Charles Saxton and Sir Simeon Stuart, the next question is, whether the plaintiff can stand in a higher position than Sir Simeon would have done, and I am of opinion that he could not, and that the determination of this question is involved in the conclusion to which I have already arrived. This Court could not have compelled Sir Simeon to have made a settlement, for he could on the next day have defeated it by selling the property to a purchaser for valuable consideration. In this case the plaintiff does not complain of any fraud. He was perfectly well aware of the existence of the contents of the settlement of the 24th of January 1882, when he advanced his money, and though this does not affect his right, it is satisfactory to reflect that he has not through misrepresentation been induced to advance his money upon a security supposed to be free from question. The cases which have been cited do, on the whole, support the view I have taken in this case. Doe d. Baverstock v. Rolfe is, I think, explained in Heap v. Tonge, and the case of Roe d. Hamerton v. Mitton is a strong case in favour of the view I have taken, and is cited with approbation by the Lord Chancellor in Myddleton v. Lord Kenyon.

Hitherto, I have assumed that the recital to which I have referred contains a correct statement of the facts between the parties. I have to consider whether this be so in fact, and if it be not, whether Sir Simeon or the plaintiff, as claiming under him, can dispute the correctness of that recital. The defendants have gone into no evidence except putting in the deeds in question. The plaintiff has gone into evidence, but no part of it negatives the fact that Sir Simeon had entered into such an agreement with Sir Charles Saxton as is stated in the recital in question. It is contended that the evidence of the deeds themselves disprove that agreement as stated in that recital, but I am not of that opinion; and even if evidence had been given on behalf of Sir Simeon or the plaintiff to disprove the fact of any such agreement having been entered into, I should have been of opinion that I ought not to have attended to it on their behalf,—at least I should have entertained very serious doubt whether I ought to have entertained it on their behalf. I have not considered it so fully, as there is no evidence upon it. The fact of whether such an agreement had been entered into between Sir Charles and Sir Simeon must have been known to them at the time they executed the deed of the 24th of January 1832, and they both executed a deed containing a solemn assertion on their part that they had entered into that agreement; and both are, I think, from that time, and in a matter relating to this deed, estopped from alleging that recital to be false, unless they can shew the recital was introduced into the deed executed by them under circumstances which would not make it binding against them. The plaintiff does not, I think, in this respect stand in a different position from that in which Sir Simeon stands under whom he claims; and the result of this is, that in my opinion the deeds of the 23rd and 24th of January 1832 are valid and binding deeds, and that they are not void against a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration,—and consequently that this bill fails, and that it must be dismissed as against the first set of defendants and their trustees with costs, but without costs as against Sir Simeon Henry Stuart and the other defendants who support the plaintiff's view of the case.

LONG v. STORIE.

Pleading—Usury—Mortgage—Principal and Interest—Abated Suit—Second Suit—Costs.

It is not usury to reserve interest on a mortgage debt secured on real estates at 5l. per cent. per annum from a day anterior to the day of actual payment of the principal, if from delay not occasioned by the mortgagee the payment of the principal is postponed, and if it was the bonâ fide intention of the parties to have paid and received the principal on the day from which the interest is reserved; and, à fortiori, if, under the circumstances, less than the legal amount of interest has been paid.

Thus where a proposed mortgagee agreed to advance a certain sum to pay off two existing incumbrances, upon having, amongst other securities, a transfer of those incumbrances, and accordingly duly paid off the second incumbrancer and took a transfer from him, but from delay in the execution of the transfer from the prior incumbrancers he did not pay off their incumbrance until six weeks after the day of payment to the second incumbrancer, as and from which day it was agreed between the mortgagor and proposed mortgagee the deed of transfer from the prior incumbrancers should be dated and interest calculated, it being the bonâ fide intention of all parties that both the incumbrances should have been then paid off, and the proposed mortgagee, under an agreement in the mortgage deed to accept interest at the rate of 4l. per cent. on punctual payment, having received less for the first half-year's interest than the amount would have been at the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum from the day on which the prior incumbrancers received their principal,—it was held that the transaction was not usurious within the statute of 12 Anne, c. 16.

A mortgagee instituted a foreclosure suit, in which he was ordered to pay the costs of an interlocutory motion, but died before payment and before the hearing of the cause. His representatives filed an original bill of foreclosure without noticing or reviving the abated suit of the mortgagee. The Court refused to allow the plaintiffs their costs in the second suit unless they submitted to pay the costs of the motion in the first suit ordered to be paid by their testator.

This was a suit for foreclosure by the executors of Capt. John Long deceased. The defendants were thirty-eight in number, and a prior suit for foreclosure had been filed by Capt. Long in his lifetime, which had become abated by his death, and had not been revived, nor was it referred to by the plaintiffs in the present suit. The principal points in the argument and judgment related to the several questions of usury and costs.

It appeared from the pleadings that the defendant, the Rev. John George Storie, by indenture of mortgage of the 15th of May 1843, appointed the advowson of St. Giles, Camberwell, (except as therein excepted) to secure the repayment of 7,500*l.* with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum to trustees for the Norwich Union Assurance Society. By another indenture of mortgage of the 29th of the same month, the defendant conveyed the advowson to Mr. Cockell for securing the repayment to him of 5,000*l.* and interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum. By an agreement of the 26th of December following, Capt. Long agreed with the defendant Storie, for the purpose of paying off the above mortgages, to advance for ten years the sum of 12,500*l.* at interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum (reducible to 4*l.* per cent. if regularly paid within one month after it should from time to time become due) on the security of a mortgage, with power of sale, when the interest should be in arrear for two months, of the advowson, transfer of the above mortgages, and assignment of certain policies on the life of the defendant Storie for assuring 12,000*l.*

On the 25th of March 1844 notice was given that Capt. Long had deposited with his solicitors his cheque for the 12,500*l.* to be paid upon the execution of the transfer of the existing mortgages. The payment of the 5,000*l.* and interest to the second mortgagee (Mr. Cockell), and the transfer by him of his security to Capt. Long, were respectively made and executed on the 29th of March 1844; but in consequence of some delay in the preparation and execution of the deed of transfer by the trustees of the Norwich Union Assurance Society, the 7,500*l.* and interest were not paid to them until the 4th of May following. The deed of transfer from the trustees of the society bore date the 29th of March 1844, pursuant to an agreement of that date between the defendant Storie and Capt. Long, whereby, after reciting that a deed of transfer to Capt. Long of the mortgage debt due to the society had been prepared but not then executed, and that Capt. Long was prepared with the amount of the debt (which was the first charge on the advowson), the defendant Storie undertook that the deed of transfer should bear date, and that interest should be calculated and payable to Capt. Long from that day, and that interest on the 7,500*l.*, according to the rate mentioned in the said deed, should be calculated and payable to Capt. Long as and from that day. The mortgaged debts and securities were transferred by separate instruments, and the provisoes for redemption in both of them were made subject to the payment of the respective principal sums and interest at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum; the transferee covenanting by each deed to accept interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum if paid within thirty days of the 29th of March and the 29th of September in every year.

It was proved in the cause that the 7,500*l.* was paid by Capt. Long to the trustees of the society on the 4th of May 1844, and that interest up to that time was then paid to them by the defendant Storie. Capt. Long duly received the first half-year's interest (due at Michaelmas 1844) on his principal at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum.

The transaction, so far as it related to the transfer from the society to Capt. Long, was impeached by some of the defendants as usurious, on the ground that interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, notwithstanding it was reducible to 4*l.* per cent. on punctual payment, was reserved from a day six weeks anterior to the day on which the principal was actually advanced.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Follett and Mr. Bazalgette appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Roll, Mr. Tripp, Mr. Shebbeare, Mr. J. H. Palmer and Mr. Schomberg, for the several defendants.

Mr. Follett replied.

Feb. 18.—TURNER, V.C.—after a preliminary statement of the facts—said—Such being the state of circumstances on the 29th of March 1844, and Capt. Long being unable, in consequence of the deed of transfer not being executed, to pay the mortgage money with safety to the trustees of the Norwich Union Assurance Society, the memorandum of that date was given and signed by Storie. Here the matter rested until the 4th of May following, when, the deed being then executed, Capt. Long paid the 7,500*l.* to the Norwich Union Assurance Society, and the securities were duly transferred to him. It was argued that the non-payment of the 7,500*l.* until six weeks after the day of the date of the deed and the reservation of interest from the date of the deed, brought the transaction within the terms of the statute of Anne (1). Now, it is to be observed that Captain Long did not, in the result, take more than 5*l.* per cent. interest. He actually received, on the 29th of September 1844, under the terms of the deed, interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. from the 29th of March; and the greatest amount which by the Statute of Anne he was entitled to take was interest at 5*l.* per cent. from the 4th of May, which would be a greater sum than what he actually received, and, therefore, there was no taking of usurious interest within the Statute of Anne; and whatever interest may have been reserved there was not a larger amount actually taken than the statute permits. Then, was there a larger, i. e. an usurious, interest reserved? The words of the statute are, that all bonds, &c. whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken above the rate of 5*l.* for every 100*l.* for a year, are to be void. It is clear that on the face of the deed itself there is no reservation of usurious interest; no reservation above 5*l.* for every 100*l.* for a year; because the clause of redemption stipulates for the legal amount of interest, viz. 5*l.* per cent. per annum. But it was said that the deed does not represent the real, or at least the entire, contract between the parties, because no money was paid until May; and that the real contract was to be found in the agreement contained in the memorandum of the 29th of March 1844, which stipulates that the interest to be paid shall be calculated according to the rate mentioned in the deed. This is the same contract as the contract in the deed, except as to the period from which the interest is to run, and, therefore, on the face of the contract there is no usury.

Now, what is the meaning of the word "reserved" in the statute? The cases ~~have~~ perfectly settled this point. In Floyer v. Edwards (2) Lord Mansfield says (p. 599), "An actual borrowing of money, with a penalty on forbearance, is no usury, if the party borrowing can discharge himself by payment within the time. And the case in Croke (3), which says, this, is much stronger than the present case, by the difference of the penal sum which is greater. In Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, book 1, ch. 29, sec. 36, it is expressly laid down, that where it is in the election of the party borrowing to discharge himself, and so avoid paying the increased interest, it is not usury." And so in Burton's case (4), it being in the election of the grantor to have paid and frustrated the rent, this is not usury. Another important case (not cited in the argument) is Tate v. Wellings (5). There the obligor of a bond had applied to the obligee for the loan of a sum of money, which the obligee agreed to let him have, but said he should expect the same interest which he was receiving in the short annuities, viz. 8*l.* 10*s.* per cent., which being assented to, it was agreed that the money should be raised by a sale of short annuities to the amount of 912*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, and a bond was drawn up, dated the 1st of September 1784, by which the obligor was bound to replace that amount in the same stock on the 1st of September 1785, but that if it were not replaced by that time, he was to repay 912*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* on the 1st of January 1786, and to pay in the mean time such interest as the stock would have produced; and it was held, that because he had in the first year the option to replace the stock, and so relieve himself, it saved the ulterior contract, by which after the first year he was bound to replace the principal and interest beyond 5*l.* per cent. The Lord Chief Justice says (p. 537) "I have had some doubt in my mind in the course of the argument, whether, as the defendant had no power to replace the stock after the expiration of the year, it did not become a loan of money from that time, with a reservation of usurious interest, and that the pretence of transferring the stock was merely a colour for the usurious transaction. But my doubt is now removed; for this case ought not to have a colour imputed to it which is expressly negatived by the finding of the jury. If, then, this transaction were legal during the first year, is there anything superadded to make it usurious? I think not." And Mr. Justice Buller says, "In order to support the defence set up, it must be shewn that the contract was usurious at the time when it was entered into; for if it were legal at that time, no subsequent event can make it usurious." I therefore am of opinion that neither in the deed nor in the memorandum in this case is there a usurious reservation of interest within the statute. I do not say that such a construction might not be put on the deed and agreement if there were any evasion, if this were a mere contrivance, if there had been an agreement that the money should be paid at the day of the date of the deed, or if there had been anything to indicate an intention to secure or to take more than the legal rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum. There is, however, nothing in support of such a case; on the contrary, the whole evidence is against it. In Banglay's case (6) a warrant of attorney was given for securing repayment of 600*l.* and interest from the 25th of March. It was said by Lord Eldon, that if the 600*l.* was not paid on the 25th of March, but was, in fact, advanced in parcels at different times, the last of which was on the 1st of June following, it would have been impossible to say that the transaction was not usurious. But in the present case the evidence clearly shews that the intention was to advance the money immediately, and that the only reason why the money was not advanced on the execution of the deed was, because the borrower was unable to carry out his part of the agreement. This brings the case within the subsequent expressions of Lord Eldon, which explain what was meant by the part just quoted—"It has been said that Banglay had the 600*l.* ready, that the bankrupt might have had it, and the case has been assimilated to that of a banker: and if that was in fact the agreement, and the transaction was bond fide that the money being as it were paid to the bankrupt, and repaid by him to the lender, or left in his hands to be drawn out as he [the bankrupt] wanted it, I do not think that the money not being ready at a subsequent time, though a breach of the contract, would affect it with usury." And here the money was left in Capt. Long's hands (if in his hands at all) for the express purpose of being paid to the Norwich Union Company at the time.

(1) 12 Anne, stat. 2. c. 16. Section 1. enacts to the following effect:—That no person, after the 29th of September 1714, upon any contract which shall be made after that day, shall take, directly or indirectly, for loan of any monies, wares, merchandise or commodities whatsoever, above the value of 5*l.* for the forbearance of 100*l.* for a year, and so after that rate for a greater or lesser sum or longer or shorter time; and that all bonds, contracts and assurances whatsoever, made after the time aforesaid for payment of any principal, or money to be lent, or covenanted to be performed upon or for any usury, whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken above the rate of 5*l.* in the hundred as aforesaid, shall be utterly void; and that all persons who shall, upon any such contract, take by way or means of any corrupt bargain, loan, &c., or by any deceitful way or means, or by covin, engine or deceitful conveyance, a larger amount of interest than 5*l.* per cent., shall forfeit treble value.

Independently, however, of the grounds upon which it may be held that the deed itself is not usurious, the effect of the agreement and the dealings of the parties might be that the contract might be void although the deed itself was not usurious. Now, if we look at the position of the parties, we find Capt. Long to have procured a transfer of the second mortgage from Cockell for 5,000*l.*, but that the first mortgage for 7,500*l.* was still subsisting in the trustees for the Norwich Union Company. The effect would be, that interest on the first mortgage was running on and erecting itself into a charge on the land as against those claiming under the second mortgage. A stipulation, therefore, that the deed of transfer of the first mortgage should bear date on the day of the date of the transfer of the second mortgage would not necessarily be a usurious stipulation. It might have this construction, that Storie undertook to pay this interest so as to prevent it being a charge on the land; and it is evident that something of this sort was intended, for otherwise, why is any mention made of the second mortgage? What is the meaning of the recital of there having been that security entered into, and of the transfer of it, and then the agreement that the deed of transfer of the first mortgage for 7,500*l.* shall bear date as of that day, namely, the 29th of March, and that interest thereon shall be payable from that date, not under the deed, but calculated according to the rate mentioned in the deed?

Objections were also taken to the frame of the suit, and it was contended that no relief could be given in it under the following circumstances:—It appears that Capt. Long had in his lifetime instituted another suit for foreclosing the mortgages; that in that suit a motion had been made for a receiver, which had been refused, the costs of the motion being reserved; that an appeal from that decision had been dismissed with costs. These costs have never been paid, Capt. Long is dead, and the suit is therefore abated, and the present bill, taking no notice of these proceedings, is filed by his executors. Now, to this bill, thus instituted, two objections have been taken; first, that no decree can be made in this suit, because the proper mode of proceeding was to have revived the original suit; and, secondly, that at any rate no steps will be allowed to be taken, and all proceedings taken will be set aside as irregular, until the costs ordered to be paid by the decree on appeal in the abated suit have been satisfied. In the first place, what would have been the course if the existence of the first suit had been pleaded in bar to the present suit? (I say nothing on the question, whether an abated suit can or cannot be pleaded.) There would have been a reference to the Master to inquire whether the two suits were for the same object, and then if the first suit had been after that report proceeded with, it is true that all the expense of the present suit would have been avoided. But if the defendant Storie had pleaded the previous suit, it would have been in the power of the Court to have dealt with both suits, according to the justice of the case; and if the second suit had been found better adapted to the justice of the case, the Court would have ordered payment of the costs in the first suit already directed to be paid, and stayed all further proceedings in it; and the second, the present suit, to be proceeded with. The existence of the old suit, therefore, is not necessarily a bar to the prosecution of this suit, and I cannot dismiss this suit on the sole ground of the pendency of the former.

Then, on the question of expense, the defendants allowed all, or nearly all, the expenses in the second suit to be incurred before they took the objection that the first suit was still pending. They have not, therefore, made the proper use of the objection, such as it is. On the other hand, the line of conduct of the plaintiffs is certainly not such as ought to be encouraged. They might have revived the old suit, and, for all that appears to the contrary, might have obtained in it all the relief which they seek by their new bill. The plaintiff in the old suit had made two motions, the costs of one of which were reserved, and the costs of the other the present plaintiffs would have to pay. In order to avoid that, they filed the present bill. They had power to do so, but I shall give them no costs in this suit unless they submit to pay the costs ordered to be paid by the plaintiff in the original suit.

MONRO v. TAYLOR.

*Specific Performance — Sale of Lands
"partly Freehold, partly Leasehold"—Uncertainty of Boundaries—Renewal of Lease.*

In a contract for sale the lands were described as partly freehold and partly leasehold. The title deeds did not clearly define the boundaries and extent of the two properties; but the uncertainty did not arise from an instrument incapable of legal construction in that respect:—Held, that such an uncertainty was not an objection to a decree for specific performance.

The vendor of leaseholds, held under an ecclesiastical corporation, previously to his contract for sale was in treaty with the lessors for a renewal of the lease, and continued such treaty after the contract:—Held, that this did not throw upon him the obligation of procuring such renewal for the benefit of the purchaser.

The bill was filed for the specific performance of a written agreement, dated the 31st of July 1845, in the following words:—

"Memorandum, that G. L. Taylor, of &c., agrees to purchase of Robert Monro, of &c., the premises called Belmont House, partly freehold and partly leasehold, for the sum of 7,750*l.*, the purchase to be completed on the 1st day of November next, possession to be given on signing the formal agreement, to be drawn up agreeably to the terms of this minute, when the sum of 2,750*l.* is to be paid by Mr. Taylor on account of the purchase-money. [Provision, that the residue is to be secured by mortgage on the premises]. Mr. Taylor agrees to take the same title as Mr. Monro took on purchasing from the devisees and executors of the late Duke of Brunswick. [Provision, that Mr. Taylor should also purchase certain stables, fixtures, barges, &c., and have the option of purchasing any part of the furniture at a valuation]. Mr. Monro to bear such expenses as are usually borne by a vendor, and Mr. Taylor those usually borne by a purchaser; and each party to pay the expense of his own surveyor."

No other agreement was signed, nor was any part of the purchase-money paid.

In the conveyance of the premises from the Duke of Brunswick to the plaintiff in December 1832, the freehold portion was described as a "messuage or tenement, being one of the two into which the capital messuage called Belmont House was formerly divided [describing the appurtenances], situate and being on the north-west side of the road leading from London to Wandsworth, near Vauxhall aforesaid, and abutting south-east upon the said road; and also all that plot, piece, or parcel of land or ground, being part and parcel of a large piece or parcel of ground formerly occupied," &c.; "which said plot, piece, or parcel of land or ground, containing in front towards the east, next the turnpike-road leading from Vauxhall to Wandsworth, twenty-nine feet by admeasurement, little more or less, bounded on the south by the messuage hereinbefore described, and the forecourt and garden thereof, and on the north by the said premises, formerly occupied," &c. The leasehold portion was described as "all that piece or parcel of ground situate, lying, and being at the back part of the freehold messuage or tenement and premises, now or late in the occupation of Enos Smith, at Vauxhall, called Belmont House, and forming part of the garden belonging to the said premises, extending down to the River Thames, and on the north side thereof next and adjoining ground and premises heretofore belonging to," &c.; "and then running in an oblique direction across the said garden, at the upper end thereof, next and adjoining the freehold part of the lawn or garden late of the said Enos Smith, then running in a line down the River Thames on the south side of the said premises, abutting on the wall dividing the said premises late of the said Enos Smith from premises late belonging to D. Pratbernon," &c., "which said premises were some time since sold by the devisees in trust of Sir J. Mawbey," &c.; "and were, with certain other parcels, demised by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury to the said Sir J. Mawbey and D. Pratbernon respectively, comprised in Lot 4 of the particulars of sale." The description in the lease of June 1831, under which the premises were then held, and in the lease of June 1838, under which the same premises were held at the date of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, was substantially the same as that contained in the assignment to the plaintiff. The term in each lease was twenty-one years, reserving a yearly rent of 2*s.* The premises were not assignable without the licence of the dean and chapter.

The plaintiff had applied for a renewal of the lease by the dean and chapter before the contract with the defendant, and the dean and chapter had required that in the proposed new lease a plan of the demised premises should be inserted, shewing the boundaries and dimensions thereof. Whilst the correspondence with reference to the plan was going on, it was discovered that, in an old surrendered lease of the same premises, of the date of 1810, there was a plan, drawn on a scale of a chain to an inch, stating the superficial quantity to be two roods. Two surveyors, one for the plaintiff and the other for the dean and chapter, thereupon met, and a plan, marking the boundaries of the leasehold premises, so as to make the same contain exactly two roods, was prepared by such surveyors, on the 13th of May 1846. By comparison of the boundaries set out in the plan thus prepared, with the boundaries in the plan on the lease of 1810, measured according to the scale there stated, it appeared that the superficial contents of the demised premises were represented as greater in the old than in the new plan. The dean and chapter were advised that the quantity of two roods mentioned in the old plan was an approximation only, and that the actual dimensions ought to be determined by admeasurement, according to the scale; and that, therefore, in any renewed lease, the plan should be drawn in strict conformity with that of 1810, but omitting the superficial quantity of two roods.

A correspondence had taken place between the solicitors of the plaintiff and the defendant on the subject of the negotiation with the dean and chapter. On the 17th of June 1846 the plaintiff's solicitors informed the defendant's solicitors that the dean and chapter having declined to accede to the plan settled by the surveyors, they feared there was no alternative but to accept the lease as tendered by the dean and chapter, and obtain the licence to assign. The defendant's solicitors, on the 9th of July, replied that they would advise their clients, the Western Gas Light Company (on whose behalf the defendant stated that he had purchased), to complete the purchase if the plaintiff would obtain a renewed lease in all respects the same as the lease of June 1838, except as to dates. The dean and chapter objected to grant the renewed lease in the form thus required, and intimated that the licence should be conditional on the new lease containing the approved plan. On the 21st of July the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors:—"If you can obtain a licence for assigning to our clients the existing lease without any condition, so that we may hereafter object to any unreasonable deviation, we think they ought to be satisfied, and therefore we shall recommend it." On the 6th of August 1846 the defendant's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors, "that as the leasehold and freehold portion of the property have not been defined as requested, and as the licence to assign has been refused, the company have no alternative but to abandon the contract and hold your client responsible for compensation." The plaintiff declined to accede to the abandonment of the contract, and intimated that the licence would be forthwith obtained. Various modes of settlement, during the months of September, October and November, were proposed but not acted upon; and in December 1846 a bill for specific performance of the contract was filed. The cause was heard before Wigram, V.C., who made a decree, dated the 26th of June 1848, declaring that the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance, subject to his making a good title; and the usual reference was directed.

The Master by his report found that the plaintiff could make such good title, and that he first shewed such good title on the 3rd of November 1849, the day when an attested copy of the lease of 1810 and the plan thereto annexed was produced by the plaintiff's solicitor and left in the Master's office. To this report the defendant excepted, on the ground that a good title could not be shewn; and on the other hand, the plaintiff excepted, on the ground that a good title was shewn, and that before the filing of the bill.

The cause came on to be heard before Vice Chancellor Wigram on these exceptions and further directions; and a decree was made on the 20th of February 1850, whereby the exceptions of both parties were overruled; and the Master was directed to compute the purchase-money due to the plaintiff, and to compute interest on the 5,000*l.*, part of the purchase-money, for three years, commencing from November 1845, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. and on the residue of the purchase-money for three years, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent., and the whole of the purchase-money from the expiration of the three years from the date of the report, according to the agreement; and the Master was to take an account of the rents and profits from the 1st of November 1845, and that what should be coming on the account of rents and profits should be deducted from what should be due to the plaintiff for interest; and upon the plaintiff executing a proper conveyance, it was ordered that the defendant should pay to the plaintiff what should remain due for principal and interest. Against this decree the defendant appealed.

Feb. 26. — The LORD CHANCELLOR (THURBO), after stating the facts of the case, proceeded as follows :—It has been objected that the agreement ought not to be enforced on account of the generality of the expression “partly freehold and partly leasehold;” but I think this objection is groundless. I am not aware that it ever has been held that a contract for the purchase of a freehold and leasehold property must define the precise boundary of what it is of each; nor do I think, on principle, the indefiniteness of such a description in the contract ought to be deemed a justifiable reason for not enforcing it. If the boundaries are known to the parties at the time of the contract, the indefiniteness of the description is manifestly immaterial; and even if it is not known at the time, and the purchaser should find the quantity of freehold is less than he expected, and this should be prejudicial to him, still if, as in the present case, there is no proof of concealment or misrepresentation on the part of the vendor, the purchaser would only have to blame himself for his own imprudence in not inquiring what were the relative quantities of the freehold and leasehold premises before he entered into the contract. As to the statement that representations respecting the boundaries were made prior to the contract, I think there is no sufficient proof of that. But it is alleged that the correspondence shews that the original contract had been abandoned, and a treaty for a new agreement had been entered into. This, however, I do not think is the case. The letters merely amount to a mode of obviating the difficulty, which, in the opinion of the purchaser, stood in the way of completion of the purchase.

It is further said, that the defendant gave notice of abandonment of the contract, and that notice had the effect of putting an end to the contract: but it appears to me, from a passage in the evidence, that that notice was afterwards waived by the subsequent conduct of the defendant’s solicitors; but besides, the circumstances of the contract were not such as, in my opinion, to entitle the defendant to give a notice of abandonment.

It is objected that this dispute respecting the division between the freehold and leasehold portion of the estate, is a reason why this Court should not enforce the agreement: but I cannot assent to that. I will assume for the purpose of the argument that a vendor, who contracts to sell property described as “partly freehold and partly leasehold,” and in the absence of specific stipulations relieving himself from the obligation, is obliged to shew the purchaser what part is freehold and what part is leasehold; and that in the present case, the stipulation that the purchaser should take the same title as the vendor had from the devisees and executors of the Duke of Brunswick does not remove that obligation, for a knowledge of the tenancy of the different portions of the estate may be of the utmost importance as regards the beneficial use of the property. But, assuming this to be the law, I think that by the production of the lease of 1810 the vendor sufficiently fulfilled his obligation to shew what part was leasehold and what part was freehold, even supposing it to be wholly uncertain whether the specification of “two roods” is to be taken as against the dean and chapter, or whether the dimensions ought to be determined by the application of a scale, and the larger quantity be thereby determined to be leasehold. I put out of the question the argument that the uncertainty is only an uncertainty in law, and an uncertainty that could be determined by a decree when pronounced, which would determine what the contract was from the beginning, and

I will assume that there is an uncertainty which could not be thus determined, and assuming this, is it such an uncertainty as ought to be raised as a ground for refusing specific performance under the circumstances of the case?

It is agreed on all hands that the leasehold part occupies the whole of the river frontage, and that the freehold occupies the whole boundary of the turnpike road. The only uncertainty is what is the exact position of the division line between the freehold and leasehold, and consequently, whether the leasehold is only two roods, or somewhat more—say two and a half roods. I lay no stress on the smallness of the quantity claimed by the dean and chapter, and I will suppose it to be of the utmost importance to the purchaser that the leasehold should consist of two roods only. Supposing this to be so, and assuming, nevertheless, that the additional part which is claimed by the dean and chapter really is freehold, and assuming what certainly may not be more prejudicial to the purchaser, that it is wholly uncertain whether that part is freehold or leasehold, and such an uncertainty can never be removed, the purchaser has sustained no damage—he has all that the vendor had and all that the purchaser contracted to buy; for, considering the value of the good-will of a tenant holding under the dean and chapter, he was satisfied to take the estate without stipulation as to the respective quantities of freehold and leasehold. All he has to do is, to see that the leasehold embraces the larger rather than the smaller of the two quantities of which it is admitted to consist, and to deal with the estate accordingly for the purposes to which he might think fit to apply it. After such a contract as that entered into, if two and a half roods had been the quantity mentioned in the body of the plan of the lease of 1810, it cannot be contended that the purchaser would be entitled to resist the specific performance, when it was under a general description which did not define the relative positions of the freehold and leasehold, and when there is no proof that any representations were made to him as to the quantity of the one or the other, or the boundaries between them: and how then can it be maintained that the purchaser is entitled to resist the specific performance, merely because the quantity mentioned in the body of the plan was two roods, while the scale on the plan from the dean and chapter gives about two and a half roods when he purchased under a general description of “partly leasehold and partly freehold,” and when there is no proof that at the time of the contract he was ever led to suppose, or had any reason to suppose, that the leasehold consisted only of two roods, or the boundary line between the freehold and leasehold was of the one portion rather than of the other? To resist the specific performance upon these grounds, when it could not have been resisted if the quantity specified in the body of the plan had been two and a half roods, is to resist the specific performance merely on account of the possibility of the quantity of the freehold being greater, and the bargain somewhat more beneficial in the present case than it would have been if the quantity mentioned in the body of the plan had been two and a half roods, and there had been no doubt that the leasehold consisted of as great an amount.

As to the notice mentioned in Mr. Finch's (the agent of the dean and chapter) letter of the 25th of July, which was to this effect:—“That the fine set and paid for the renewal of the lease was expressly on an understanding that the new lease should contain such a description and plan of the proposed premises as should be approved by the dean and chapter:”—that furnishes no reason why the contract should not be performed; for independently of the consideration that the defendant purchased without any stipulation as to the relative quantities of the leasehold and freehold, the letter of Messrs. Phillips & Son (the defendant's solicitors) of the 1st, renders that notice immaterial: for they say—“If you can obtain a licence for assigning to our client the existing lease without any condition, so that we may hereafter object to any unreasonable deviation, we think they ought to be satisfied, and shall, therefore, recommend it.” If the dean and chapter should hereafter insist, when a renewal is applied for, that the plan in the lease of 1810 should be adopted, omitting the specification of the quantity, and that the leasehold should be stated to amount to the quantity for which the dean and chapter has contended, that would merely be a demand which the defendant would be prepared to expect, and notwithstanding the expectation of which in this case, his solicitors expressed their willingness to accept the assignment of the lease.

But it is further contended that the delay which has taken place, and the position of the company on whose behalf the defendant purchased, furnishes a reason why the Court should not enforce the agreement. It is submitted by the answer that by reason of the serious and prejudicial delay that had arisen previous to the month of August 1846 in the completion of the purchase, which would prevent the company from commencing the manufacture of gas, and proceeding with building operations which were absolutely necessary, and which had been determined on by the company on the defendant entering into the contract, the defendant was justified in abandoning the contract, and the more especially as the company had been compelled by reason of such delay to purchase other and less advantageous premises for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of gas. There does not appear to me to be any evidence of this, or that the plaintiff or his solicitor was aware of the purpose for which the defendant or the company made the purchase. But even if that were otherwise, the defendant might have at once put an end to the delay by assenting to the claim of the dean and chapter, which he might have done without having any stipulation or understanding as to the quantity of the leasehold.

Another objection urged by the defendant is, that the plaintiff contracted and was bound to procure a renewed lease for the defendant. But this is not so. It is true the plaintiff, prior to the contract, was in treaty for a new lease, and he made an exertion to procure it; but the contract itself is silent in respect of any renewal, and the plaintiff in the absence of express words must be taken only to have assigned what he himself had, either in law or in equity, unless there were special circumstances creating an obligation independent of the contract. It was expected that the plaintiff would endeavour to procure a renewal, if it were only with a view to his own benefit in the event of the contract breaking off. But admit he did so for the benefit of the purchaser alone, (and from the general tenor of the correspondence, that would appear to be the case), that did not create an obligation on the part of the plaintiff to procure such a renewal. There is no proof of its being for any consideration; and, therefore, it is not one which a court of equity would enforce even if it had not been waived by the defendant, as it seems to me to have been by the letter of 1846.

With reference to the defendant's exceptions, I am of opinion, for the reasons I have already given, that a good title is shewn notwithstanding the uncertainty as regards the boundary line to which I have adverted.

With regard to the plaintiff's exception to the report as to the time when a good title was shewn, I think the exception ought to be allowed. Looking at the correspondence, I conceive that the defendant or his agent must be deemed to have known in the course of the correspondence, before the institution of the suit, what was the precise point in dispute between the plaintiff and the dean and chapter; and, consequently, for the reasons I have already given, the dispute did not shew that a good title could not then be made, and I think that interest ought to be allowed from the time fixed for the completion of the contract.

With regard to the costs, even supposing that a good title was not shewn until the attested copy of the lease of 1810 was produced in the Master's office, I agree with the Vice Chancellor that the same kind of litigation would have arisen, even if the lease of 1810 had been produced before the filing of the bill, and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to the costs of the suit.

Appeal of the defendant dismissed, with costs; and the plaintiff's exceptions to the Master's report allowed.

Longridge v. Dorville, 5 B. & Ald. 117, 123.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The plaintiff in this case seeks to restrain the defendants from enforcing execution on a judgment entered up on a bond and warrant of attorney, given by him in November 1841 and February 1842 to Charles Marnell, the brother of the defendant, Mrs. Jorden. The plaintiff brings forward two distinct grounds for the relief which he seeks: first, he alleges that the defendant, Mrs. Jorden, the legal personal representative of the obligee in the bond, is estopped from enforcing any money due upon it, by reason of her solemn declarations and assurances that she would never attempt to do so, and on the faith of those assurances irrevocable obligations have been entered into between him and third persons, in which all the parties to these obligations have acted on the truth of such declarations and assurances. Secondly, the plaintiff alleges that the father of the plaintiff, and the defendant, Mrs. Jorden, then Miss Marnell, entered into an agreement by which, in consideration of his giving up to her a house at Midnapore in the East Indies, of which she received the benefit, instead of settling it upon his son's marriage, she agreed not to attempt to enforce payment of anything from the plaintiff on this bond or warrant of attorney; and a third point is brought forward by the plaintiff, which is subordinate to the other two,—that in case the Court should be of opinion that the defendant is entitled to recover on the judgment, the plaintiff then insists that the amount to be recovered ought to be limited to one-third of the sum nominally secured by the bond and warrant of attorney. The facts, so far as I consider it necessary to refer to them for the purpose of explaining the conclusion to which I have come, are as follows:—

The plaintiff in the year 1841, then a young and inexperienced man, was induced by two persons, of the names of

Patrice Gougis and Crouy Chanel, to engage in a speculation in the stock market for the purchase and subsequent sale of Spanish bonds, in the expectation of a rise in those securities. At the same time, a gentleman of the name of Hooper, who was a friend of Mr. Marnell, was induced to concur in the transaction. Mr. Marnell, the brother of Mrs. Jorden, then Miss Marnell, was applied to, to furnish funds for this speculation, which he agreed to do to the extent of 1,200*l.* on the condition that at his option he should either have interest on his advance at the rate of 30*l.* per cent. per annum, or one-eighth of the profits realized. According to this arrangement, I see nothing to countenance the idea that he was in any event to be liable for any loss, if any should be incurred by the transaction. He subsequently elected to take the one-eighth of the profits. The speculation turned out a failure, and the profits nothing, and consequently he was entitled only to be repaid the 1,200*l.* capital he had advanced. He applied to have this money repaid, and three bills of exchange for 500*l.* each, drawn by Hooper on and accepted by the plaintiff, were indorsed by Chanel and were given to Marnell. In November 1841, Marnell insisted on the plaintiff and Hooper giving him a joint and several bond for the 1,200*l.* due, which they accordingly did on the 23rd of November 1841, and the three bills were given up, and on the 4th of February following, Mr. Marnell obtained from the plaintiff a warrant of attorney, on which, shortly afterwards, on the 23rd of that month, judgment was entered up against him for the amount due. Mr. Marnell was the intimate friend of the plaintiff's father, whose family had, as it is alleged, and seems to me to be proved, received considerable benefits from him. During the whole course of the transaction the father was absent in Spain, and many observations have been made on the supposed advantage taken of this young man, inexperienced in the ways of the world, and deprived of that protection which his father's presence would have afforded. I am, however, of opinion that I cannot regard any such observations. Mr. Marnell had advanced the 1,200*l.* to the four persons engaged in this transaction, and he was entitled to be repaid this amount by them, and they, on the facts as they appear before me, were jointly and severally liable for the whole amount.

The case made by the bill is not, although it contains a suggestion to that effect, that the securities given by the plaintiff ought to be delivered up and cancelled, on the ground that they were obtained from him by any of the means which induce a court of equity to interfere to prevent deeds from being made available against the persons who execute them, nor, in truth, if such a case had been brought forward, could it have been successfully maintained on the admitted facts. Whether, having regard to his intimacy with the family and the youth and inexperience of the plaintiff, Mr. Marnell ought not to have warned this young man against the transaction he was about to embark in, instead of lending him money to carry it on, whether there was want of delicacy, or whether even threats and pressure were employed in the mode in which the bond and warrant of attorney were obtained from him, are questions on which I express no opinion. Whatever opinion I may entertain, looking at them in a moral aspect, I cannot for the reasons I have stated on the present occasion regard them judicially, except so far as they may throw a light on the subsequent acts of Miss Marnell, and assist in explaining the motives by which her conduct seems to have been guided. Mr. Marnell did not long survive this transaction. He took no steps to enforce the payment of the amount due on the securities.

At that time the plaintiff was possessed of no property beyond his commission; some negotiation took place after his return from Spain between the father of the plaintiff and Mr. Marnell, for the delivery up of the bond on payment of one-third of the principal sum due, but this negotiation ended in nothing, and on the 28th of January 1843 (in less than a twelvemonth after the warrant of attorney had been given) Mr. Marnell died. By his will he left all his property to his sister, now the defendant Mrs. Jorden, and he made her and the father of the plaintiff the executors of his will.

The will was proved by Mrs. Jorden, who made no attempt to recover any money from the plaintiff on this bond or judgment until the commencement of the year 1850, and after her marriage with the defendant Mr. Jorden, which took place in 1848. In August 1845 the plaintiff married a Miss Poore, and it was in anticipation of this event, and previously to its taking place, that the declarations of the defendant, Mrs. Jorden, are alleged to have been made, on which the plaintiff rests his first ground.

Before I examine the evidence on this subject, I think it is desirable to state what I consider to be the principles of equity which govern cases of this nature, and I shall then consider whether the evidence brings the case within the principle on which relief can be granted. It is a principle of the common law, to be discovered in the earliest cases, and more particularly in the action for deceit, that a man is responsible for the truth of the assertion which he makes, and if a man makes a statement to another knowing that statement to be false, and with the view of thereby inducing the person to whom he makes the statement to do an act whereby that person receives an injury, an action will lie at his suit against the person who made the statement, although he derived no profit or advantage from it, or from the act he thereby induced the other to perform. This was the case of Pasley v. Freeman (1) which has been followed by a long series of decisions. It does not affect the principle I am now considering that a statute, 9 Geo. 4. c. 14, was subsequently passed, which, in order to prevent the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. 2. c. 3, from being rendered nugatory, enacted that in certain cases the statements must be made by writing, and unless so made an action could not be maintained upon them. The principle of the law was, that a man was responsible for his solemn statement, if made with a view of inducing another to act upon it. The doctrine of the common law in matters of warranty is but another branch and illustration of the same principle. Equity in following this doctrine of the common law has, I apprehend, done so to this extent. It does not stay to inquire whether in such cases the statements made were false or true, but if a deliberate statement be made by one person to another, who believing that statement to be true, and upon the faith of it, enters into engagements, the person who made the statement shall not be permitted by any act of his to falsify it: nay more, he shall be compelled, so far as lies within his power, to make good the statement he has asserted to be true. The cases on this subject are numerous. I will refer shortly to some of them.

In Gale v. Lindo (2), where a man had given a sum of money to his sister in order to make her a portion sufficient to induce a man, who afterwards became her husband, to marry her, and had taken her bond for the payment of the sum so lent, although the husband had died without issue and ignorant of the transaction, the Court would not allow the brother to enforce this bond against his sister, the widow. In Montefiori v. Montefiori (3), which is cited somewhat differently from Mr. Filmer's notes in Neville v. Wilkinson, in order to assist his brother's marriage, a man stated he owed his brother a sum of money on the balance of a partnership account, and gave a note for that amount to be shewn to the friends of the lady, on the faith of which the marriage took place. Shortly afterwards, the brother of the husband reclaimed the note, and the matter having been referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators having directed the note to be delivered up, two applications were made to the Court of King's Bench, one for an attachment for non-performance of the award, and another to set it aside. Lord Mansfield discharged the rule for the attachment, and made absolute the rule for setting aside the award. His observations are very pertinent. They are to this effect:—"The law is, that where, upon proposals of marriage, third persons represent anything material in a light different from the truth, even though it be by collusion with the husband, they shall be bound to make good the thing in the manner in which they represented it. It shall be as represented to be; and the husband alone is entitled to relief as well as when the fortune so misrepresented has been specifically settled on the wife, for no man shall set up his own iniquity as a defence, any more than as a cause of action. The arbitrators, therefore, being clearly mistaken in point of law, the award must be set aside." In Neville v. Wilkinson, the defendant being employed to make out a full and complete list of all the debts and liabilities of the plaintiff, and to deliver it when made out to the father of the lady whom the plaintiff was about to marry, consented at the request of the plaintiff (who stated his apprehension that the disclosure of the whole truth would prevent his marriage) to omit from the list the amount due from the plaintiff to himself, the defendant. The marriage having taken place, the Lord Chancellor granted an injunction to restrain the defendant from enforcing payment of that debt, and declared his opinion that the defendant could never recover against the plaintiff, Mr. Neville. In The Vauxhall Bridge Company v. Earl Spencer (4), Lord Eldon, speaking of Neville v. Wilkinson, says he "remembers arguing the case with obstinacy, but Lord Thurlow thought, that having made a misrepresentation, a court of equity must hold him to it, and that although the plaintiff was a particeps criminis." The case of Scott v. Scott (5) and many other cases might be referred to illustrating the same subject, and establishing the principle I have already stated, that a man who, by his deliberate assertion, induces another to enter into obligations, cannot afterwards by his acts negative the truth of that assertion.

The next point I have to consider is, whether the evidence in this case establishes that Miss Marnell, now Mrs. Jorden, did, on the marriage of the plaintiff in 1845, make such solemn assertions and declarations respecting her own conduct and intention as to bring her within the rule of equity enforced by this Court which I have already stated. I may observe that the evidence of the intention of Miss Marnell, previously to the marriage of the plaintiff, is material only so far as it corroborates the evidence respecting the statements of Miss Marnell at the time of the plaintiff's marriage, on which this case must stand. It is also to be observed that no statement is alleged to have been made by the defendant directly to the plaintiff, or to Lady Poore, or to any relative of the lady about to be made the wife of the plaintiff. In order, therefore, to support the plaintiff's case, it is necessary that the statements relied on should have been made with the knowledge, or in the belief, that they would be communicated to the plaintiff and his intended wife, or to the mother of the lady.

I proceed to consider the evidence for the purpose of considering whether it establishes, first, that the defendant, then Louisa Marnell, did, at the time when the treaty for the marriage between the plaintiff and his present wife was pending, make any statement to the effect that she would never sue the plaintiff on the bond or enforce the money due from him on that security. Secondly, whether such declarations were made in the belief and expectation, and with the view and for the purpose of their being communicated to the plaintiff and his intended wife, or to Lady Poore and the friends of the lady, previously to his marriage; and thirdly, whether such declarations were, in fact, so communicated and the marriage contract regulated upon them and on the belief of their truth. Unless these three propositions are established, the case of the plaintiff on this head, at least, must fail.

With regard to the first of these propositions, the material part of the evidence is to this effect. The defendant Pulcherie Money states, in answer to the thirtieth interrogatory, "That on the occasion of a morning visit of Louisa Jorden to me, on her being about to quit Brighton, in August or September 1844, I had a conversation with her on the subject of the bond and my son William Money's then intended marriage; when I said to the defendant, Louisa Jorden, 'You have long given up the debt, so it's only a nominal thing, and it's no use your keeping a paper you have long since promised you would never enforce.' She replied, 'I will be trusted;' to which I replied, 'Who talks of not trusting you? But you may marry, and then you will be at the command of your husband.' She then said that she wanted to keep the bond in case she could ever use it against Hooper. I replied, 'If you will give it to me I shall ensure it never can be used against William, and I promise to return it to you if ever you require to use it against Hooper.' To this she said, 'I give you my word of honour that I will never use it against William, but I will be trusted, and I will keep it; besides,' she added, 'you know very well that I have made my will, and that William is heir to everything I possess.' The evidence of this witness is distinct as to the making of such statements. The account given by the defendant in her answer of the same conversation is to this effect. The defendants say, "They admit that in the year 1845 the plaintiff was engaged to be married, and that prior to the marriage, Pulcherie Money, the mother of the plaintiff, had some, but not many, conversations with the defendant Louisa Jorden, with reference to the marriage of the plaintiff; but the defendant Louisa Jorden says, and the defendant William Prue Jorden believes, that Pulcherie Money had not many or any conversations with the defendant Louisa Jorden with reference to the worldly interests of the plaintiff, or with reference to the fortune of his then intended wife, or with reference to, among other things, the said bond; and that Pulcherie Money did not ask the defendant Louisa Jorden why, since she had long since given up the said debt, she did not execute a formal release to the plaintiff of the said debt; but the defendant Louisa Jorden says, and the defendant William Prue Jorden believes, that the said Pulcherie Money on one occasion referred to the said bond and debt, and to the expressed intention of the defendant Louisa Jorden not to distress the plaintiff, and to the subject of her will in his favour, and urged the defendant Louisa Jorden to give up the bond to her, Pulcherie Money, to keep, which the defendant Louisa Jorden refused to do; and stated in the course of such conversation that she would not be doubted (meaning as to her intention not to distress the plaintiff), and also stated, in the course of such conversation, that she should retain the said bond as a security against John Hooper."

(4) Jacob, 64.

This passage is, in my opinion, after carefully comparing the two, a strong confirmation of the evidence of Mrs. Money; in fact, it differs little from it except by clothing it with that species of qualification and explanation which arises from its passing through the hands of counsel. It derives, also, strong confirmation from various other circumstances. It is obvious, up to that time (being upwards of two years after the death of her brother) Miss Marnell never intended to enforce payment of that debt. She had before that period expressed such to be her intention to no less than seven witnesses, who all depose to that fact. That fact is still further confirmed by the circumstance that she made an affidavit, on the 30th of July 1845, for increasing the amount of duty on the probate of her brother's will, being one day before the marriage of the plaintiff; and she omits from such affidavit all notice of this debt as forming part of her brother's estate; and she passes the residuary account on the 8th of August following, being seven days after the marriage, omitting all reference to this debt, and thereby gives further evidence of her opinion and intention, corroborating that this debt did not form and was not to be treated as forming any portion of her brother's property. That she and her family had been under considerable obligations to the father of the plaintiff, that she had always expressed herself grateful for such obligations and desirous to repay the debt of gratitude; and, actuated by those feelings, she looked with favour on the plaintiff and with disfavour on the persons who had induced him to incur the liability in question, are facts proved beyond all doubt and question. In this state of circumstances, being made acquainted with the intended marriage of the plaintiff, it is no improbable circumstance that she should, with a view to that event, repeat her former and still subsisting intention. Mrs. Money distinctly swears that she did so, and she did so with reference to this marriage. The statement of the defendant herself is the admission of a conversation on the subject; an admission that she never expressed any intention to sue the plaintiff, an admission that one of the reasons she gave for her refusal to give up the bond, was that she would not be doubted, "meaning" (says the answer) "as to her intention not to distress the plaintiff." Those words,

"not to distress the plaintiff," have no sensible meaning unless they refer to not enforcing payment of the debt; and lastly an admission that the other reason which she gave for her refusal to give up the bond was, that she wished to retain possession of it as a security against Hooper. This admission of the defendant, Mrs. Jorden, as well as the evidence of Mrs. Money, and the other evidence in the cause to which I have referred, concur in my mind in establishing the first proposition, and in satisfying me that the defendant, Mrs. Jorden, did at the time when the treaty for the plaintiff's marriage was pending, make a statement to the effect that she would never enforce from the plaintiff payment of the debt due on the bond.

The observations I have already made, and the evidence I have stated in support of the first proposition do, at the same time, establish the second proposition. It is proved that Mrs. Jorden was one of the first persons informed of the proposal of the plaintiff to Miss Poore; and the evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Money is distinct as to conversations having taken place with Mrs. Jorden with reference to the proposed marriage of the plaintiff. The passage in the answer of Mrs. Jorden, to which I have already referred, states the conversation in question as having occurred on the occasion of one of those conversations which the defendant admits took place between herself and Mrs. Money prior to the plaintiff's marriage, and with reference to it; the natural and necessary inference, or rather meaning, is, that the conversation which took place with reference to a marriage, took place with a view to the arrangement to be made on the marriage; that is, to enable the plaintiff himself and the friends of the lady to know what was his real situation in life, his means of support, and his future prospects, and to enable them to deal with the property both of his intended wife and that which his father might settle on him in accordance with such knowledge. I cannot doubt that this was the mutual feeling on both sides, and that on both sides this was the understood object of the communication that took place.

With regard to the third proposition, the evidence of the various members of the family of the plaintiff shew, that the declarations of Miss Marnell were communicated to the plaintiff, and that the arrangements of the marriage were settled on the faith of their truth; and this proposition is further conclusively established by the evidence of Lady Poore, who, in answer to the 32nd interrogatory, deposes to this effect:—"I depose that a settlement was executed on the marriage of my daughter with the plaintiff in August 1845. The first life-interest in the property of my daughter was settled on the plaintiff by such settlement. I had on various occasions previously to the plaintiff's marriage with my said daughter heard of the bond in the pleadings mentioned, and the particulars connected therewith, and of the abandonment of the debt in such bond mentioned. I first heard of such abandonment of the debt from the plaintiff, and afterwards from his brother George Money; and I spoke to the plaintiff's father on the subject, who informed me that the debt was entirely at an end, and that the said Louisa Jorden had given up or abandoned the debt in consequence of the kindness George Money, the father, had shewn to Louisa Jorden and her brother when they were in India; and I was so informed by the aforesaid persons, at my residence at Cuffnells, and afterwards at Wetham, in the county of Wilts, the residence of George Money, the father. The plaintiff did marry on the faith of the abandonment of the debt, as I know from the statements he and his father and brother made to me at the time and previously to the preparation of the settlement, and it was upon the faith of the debt being so abandoned that I consented to the first life-interest in the property of my daughter being settled upon the plaintiff, and I would not have permitted such settlement to be executed if I had not confided in such abandonment."

In my opinion this evidence proves clearly that the declarations of the defendant, Mrs. Jorden, were communicated to Lady Poore; and acting on the belief of the truth of these representations, the settlement made on the marriage was made so as to confer on the plaintiff property which otherwise would have been protected from all liability to payment of any portion of the debt secured by the bond and judgment in question. In truth, the strong inclination of my opinion is, that so far as concerns Mrs. Jorden, she has never intended to put this bond or judgment in force against the plaintiff, and that but for a communication made by the plaintiff in 1849 to Mr. Jorden, neither the proceedings at law nor the suit in equity would have ever been heard of. I entertain, therefore, no doubt that Mrs. Jorden was quite sincere when she expressed her intention not to enforce the payment of the debt; but this circumstance is not material to be inquired into, as it does not alter or affect the principle of equity, which is, that as the plaintiff and other persons have acted on the faith of those representations, and as trusting to their truth they have entered into irrevocable engagements, the defendant who has knowingly induced or permitted them so to act cannot afterwards repudiate her assurances, and by her conduct negative the truth of the statement she so made.

I forbear to express any opinion on the second ground on which the plaintiff rests his case for relief in equity, namely, the father's forbearance to settle the Midnapore property on his son's marriage, in consideration of the defendant Mrs. Jorden's agreeing never to enforce from the plaintiff any payment in respect of the bond and judgment. As in my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to the decree on the other point, into which I have gone at length, it would be needless to discuss the matter. I forbear doing so more readily, because if this case should go to a higher tribunal I should not then have prejudiced the case, by an expression of opinion on a point on which I have not rested my judgment.

This is a case in which, if possible, I should avoid giving the costs of the suit on either side, but I cannot discover any principle which would enable me to do so, and the costs must follow the usual course, and be paid by the unsuccessful to the successful party.

Dec. 6, 20. } THE GENERAL LYING-IN HOSPITAL v. KNIGHT.

Legacy—Misdescription of Legatee—Evidence.

*A bequest of 500*l.* to the Westminster Asylum for pregnant women,—Held, upon extrinsic evidence, and the context of the will, without any inquiry, a gift to "The General Lying-in Hospital."*

William Jacob Sandrock, by his will, dated the 31st of January 1850, gave legacies of stock to several charities, and among them said—"I give and bequeath unto the Westminster Asylum for pregnant women the sum of 500*l.* stock, from the 3 per cent. reduced annuities." The testator further said, "I direct that public notice may be given for the information of the charities herein named," and he appointed John Knight and David McNeil his executors. The testator died on the 31st of January 1850.

This claim was now filed by the president, vice-presidents and governors of the General Lying-in Hospital against the executors, stating that they were constituted a body corporate by charter or letters patent of His Majesty George IV. dated the 18th of January 1830, called the President, Vice-Presidents and Governors of the General Lying-in Hospital, and by that name to have perpetual successors, and by the same to sue, &c. in all actions, &c.

That the corporation was a charity which was instituted in 1765, under the name of "The Westminster New Lying-in Hospital," in the Westminster Bridge Road, in the parish of Lambeth, and had continued from that time to be an asylum for &c., but that on the 21st of July 1818, it was resolved at a meeting of the governors that the Hospital should, after the 1st of January 1819, be named "The General Lying-in Hospital," though it was still frequently called "The Westminster Lying-in Hospital."

That there was no other hospital of that name, and no hospital or asylum for pregnant women by the name of the Westminster Lying-in Hospital, or by any other name within the city or liberties of Westminster.

The corporation alleged that they were the legatees, and asked for payment of the legacy with interest, or otherwise for an account and administration of the estate.

The statements in the claim were verified by several affidavits and exhibits, and also by an extract of proceedings before the Master in a suit of West v. Lockley, in which, under a bequest in the will of Anne Stevenson, they were declared entitled to a legacy given by descriptions in the will of "The Westminster Lying-in Hospital," and in the codicil of "The Westminster New Lying-in Hospital."

Mr. Campbell and Mr. Dickinson, for the plaintiffs.—The description of this charity is erroneous owing, no doubt, to their having changed their original name; but where the description of a legatee was erroneous, but no reasonable doubt existed as to the legatee, whether a corporation or an individual, who was intended to be described, then the mistake will be rectified by the context, and will not be allowed to defeat the bequest. In this case the name was wrong, but the description in the will expressed the purposes of the charity, and there was no similar charity in Westminster.

Mr. Winstanley, contra.—The name of the plaintiffs differed altogether from that in the bequest. The purpose of the charity could not be allowed to controul the gift. It was applicable to any similar charity within the city or suburbs; presumptions were not to be made for ever, because at some distant period a particular name had been used. In this case there was nothing in the evidence to connect the mind of the testator with the General Lying-in Hospital; the context of the will supplied merely the purpose of the charity; the locality was not in Westminster, and any charity in the suburbs would as well satisfy the description and entitle such a charity to the gift: an inquiry therefore ought to be directed.

No reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—There being no similar charity in Westminster, and the plaintiffs having at one time borne a name something similar to that by which the gift is made, I think without further inquiry I may declare that the General Lying-in Hospital was intended by the testator when he made the bequest to the Westminster Asylum for pregnant women, and make a decree for payment of the legacy, with costs.

LETHBRIDGE v. THURLOW.

Annuity—Legacy—Satisfaction—Income Tax.

An annuity of 500l. given by a father to a son, by will, and made payable generally out of the rents of real estate,—Held, to be no satisfaction of an annuity given by deed and charged upon real estate.

The gift of an annuity "clear of legacy duty and every other deduction whatsoever," or "without any deduction for legacy duty or otherwise," will not authorize the payment of the income-tax out of the testator's estate.

This was a special case under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35.

On the 20th of January 1838, Sir Thomas Buckler Lethbridge, by deed, granted to his son, Ambrose Goddard Lethbridge, the plaintiff, and his assigns for life, an annuity of 100l., payable out of the impropriate rectory and tithes of Ash Priors, in the county of Somerset, to commence from the 20th of January 1838, and covenanted for its payment; but as the plaintiff and his servant occasionally resided and boarded at Sandhill Park, free of expense, it was agreed that the annuity should not be, and it was not, required of Sir T. B. Lethbridge during his life.

Sir T. B. Lethbridge, by his will, dated the 28th of December 1848, devised and appointed all his manors, messuages, lands and hereditaments whatsoever and where-soever, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy (except trust and mortgaged estates in Cornwall), unto

Sir Francis Astley, Charles Tynte, and the Rev. W. Barnard, their heirs and assigns, upon trust, out of the rents and profits of such estates to pay the following annuities :—To his wife, Dame Anne Lethbridge, and her assigns during her life, if she should so long continue his widow, an annuity of 700*l.* a year, "clear of every deduction," over and above the clear yearly rentcharge of 600*l.*, secured by her marriage settlement; unto his eldest son, the defendant, Sir John Hesketh Lethbridge, and his assigns, during his life, an annuity of 1,000*l.*, over and above such sum or sums of money as he, the said testator, might, at his decease, be under engagement, by settlement or otherwise, annually to pay to him, the same to be payable half-yearly, "clear of legacy duty and every other deduction whatsoever." Unto his second son, the plaintiff, and his assigns, an annuity of 500*l.* during his life, the same to be payable half-yearly, "clear of legacy duty and every other deduction whatsoever." Unto his grandson, the defendant, John P. Lethbridge, and his assigns, (the eldest surviving son of Sir J. H. Lethbridge,) during the joint lives of himself and his father, an annuity of 200*l.*, the same to be payable half-yearly, "clear of legacy duty and every other deduction whatsoever;" and in case both should survive the testator, and his said grandson should outlive his father, an additional annuity of 100*l.* during the then remainder of his life, by like half-yearly payments, and "clear from deductions as therein aforesaid." The testator, then, after giving some special directions respecting his estates, bequeathed unto Lucy, the wife of the defendant Hugh Fitzroy, Fanny, the wife of the defendant Charles Augustus Thurlow, and Emma, the wife of Sir F. Astley, an annuity of 100*l.* each, for their respective lives, and to his granddaughter, Agatha, the wife of J. Pratt, an annuity of 50*l.*, and to his granddaughter Annette, the wife of Gerard Rugbye Collins, an annuity of 50*l.* for their respective lives; and his will was, that the five several annuities should commence at his decease, and be paid half-yearly, "without any deduction for legacy duty or otherwise." The testator also bequeathed to Sir F. Astley, Charles Tynte, and W. Barnard the sum of 100*l.* each, and to the defendants, Hugh Fitzroy and C. A. Thurlow, the sum of 500*l.* each, and to each of his servants living with him at the time of his decease, who might have been in his service three years and upwards, one year's wages, "free of legacy duty," over and above their wages, and to Anne Edwards an annuity of 25*l.* for her life, to Samuel Woolcott an annuity of 20*l.* for his life, to George Wright an annuity of 10*l.* for his life, and to Robert Vincent an annuity of 10*l.* for his life; the said four last-mentioned annuities to be paid half-yearly, "free from legacy duty and every other deduction." The testator then gave the residue of his personal estate and effects to his executors, to be applied in payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the charges and incumbrances on his estates, and in payment of his legacies, and of the duty on such of them as he desired to be paid duty free; and next in keeping down the several annuities given by his will, which he had not expressly directed to be paid out of the rents and profits of any part of his real estate, and of the duty on such of them as he had directed to be paid duty-free, and then in keeping down the annuities and other annual sums which he had directed to be paid out of the rents and profits of his real estate.

The testator appointed the plaintiff and T. P. Lethbridge his executors, and died the 18th of October 1849, and questions were raised whether the plaintiff was entitled to the annuity of 500*l.* given to him by the will, and also to the annuity of 100*l.* a year granted to him by the deed of the 20th of January 1838, or whether the annuity given by the will was in satisfaction of that given by the deed, and whether the legacies and annuities were bequeathed free from legacy duty, and whether the annuities were to be paid by the executors and trustees, without deducting the proportion of property or income-tax to which the same would respectively be otherwise liable.

Mr. Kinglake, for the plaintiff.—When a parent provides an income for a son, he must be considered to do so in the performance of a duty, and not for the purpose of dispensing a bounty; and where the benefit is pecuniary, it has been held to be redeemed by the subsequent gift of a legacy, but this does not apply to the gift of a residue or to a devise of real estate. If, also, a parent gives furniture to his son, a subsequent gift of money could not deprive him of that. In this case the father has given an annuity by deed, duly delivered, charging it on real estate; this, therefore, cannot be redeemed by the bequest of a legacy—Davys v. Boucher (1); there is also no apparent intention to alter the arrangement—Wood v. Wood (2), Hales v. Darrell (3): the gift of the 100*l.* a year, therefore, was complete; it was not susceptible of ademption, and the provision in the will was incapable of satisfying it; and, lastly, there is upon the face of the will no indication that the legacy was considered to be in satisfaction.

Mr. Piggott, for Sir F. Astley and others.—The provision made for the plaintiff by the testator in his lifetime was voluntary, and was never paid, and this Court will lean against such voluntary gifts; the presumption of law is against double provision.

Mr. Engleheart, for the other defendants contingently interested in the estates, said it was of consequence to them that no more than necessary should be paid out of the rents and profits—Bellasis v. Uthwatt (4). In Earl Glengall v. Barnard (5) a gift by will was held to be a satisfaction of a portion secured by settlement, though the limitations were different from the deed, and in this case the legacy must be held to have redeemed the annuity granted by deed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—This is not a case in which I can hold that the annuity given by the deed is satisfied. The testator had executed a deed under which, by agreement, no benefit was to be received during his life: the grant was secured upon real estate, and the personal estate of the grantor was made liable to pay it. By his will the testator made all the trust estate liable to pay all the annuities which his estate was liable to pay, of which this 500*l.* was one, and the general words apply to it as if he had specified them all, and gave annuities out of all for each of his sons; he then provides that they shall be paid generally until the debts and legacies are paid, and so it was to be until they were to cease; but by express words he has directed the first annuity granted by deed to be paid out of his general estate. I think, therefore, that the first annuity was not satisfied, and that both must be paid.

Mr. Kinglake.—The words "clear of all deductions" will, no doubt, exempt the annuities from the payment of legacy duty; but the question is, whether they will not also free them from the income-tax; the gift is free from legacy duty and every other deduction whatsoever. What was the operation of this statute? The tenant was first to pay out of his rent the landlord's income-tax, and he was to deduct it from the landlord, who was compelled to allow it, and the statute was so graspingly anxious, that it makes it penal—nay, in fact, criminal—to refuse: thus, every person was bound to allow the payment by another on his behalf; it was thus an annuitant was taxed, and he was bound to allow it. A testator, however, was not restrained from counteracting the expressed words of this statute, which being highly penal, must be construed strictly, and he may prevent that traverse of the money which makes it income. He may say, "You shall not allow income on so much rent payable to me, but you shall, if he is liable, pay it upon the annuity, and make the deduction as a charge upon the estate, and not as income to me." It was, therefore, open for the testator to portion out his income, and leave the statute to draw the tax from other sources; and the question was, whether the testator had not used words to that effect. Were it not for the case of Wall v. Wall (6), decided in 1847, there was not much doubt; but there the annuitant was in possession of the estate, so that the testator had nothing with which he could deal, as the tax fastened itself upon the property.

Mr. Piggott and Mr. Engleheart also insisted that the income-tax was not payable by the annuitant.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The property-tax was not a deduction which the act permitted to be dealt with; the legacy duty, on the other hand, might be paid out of the property, and the executors would have to pay it under the words used by this testator, as they related to the purposes of the will and the administration, but the income-tax was itself a charge upon the property out of which he takes the annuity, and to say that it could be deducted under general words would restrict the operation of the act; it would, however, have been included if it was among the taxes which could be excepted, but it falls here on the property taken as income, and it also in like manner falls upon the property of the party out of whose hands it comes; I, therefore, think that the legacy duty is not payable, but that these bequests are not free from the income-tax.

March 27. } CLARINGBOULD v. CURTIS.

Vendor and Purchaser—Chattel—Specific Performance—Contract.

Specific performance of a contract for the sale of a barge, stores, &c., decreed in equity upon a claim.

Joseph Curtis, by an agreement in writing, dated the 25th of October 1851, contracted to sell to Alfred Claringbould, on conditions contained in printed particulars specifically referred to in the agreement, a barge, called the Providence, of London, for the sum of 40*l.*; and by the third of the conditions it was provided, "that the purchaser shall immediately after the sale pay into the hands of the auctioneer a deposit of 20*l.* per cent. on the amount of and in part payment of his purchase, and sign an agreement for paying the remainder of the purchase-money to William George Westlake, of Sheerness, on or before Saturday the 1st of November next, when the purchaser will be entitled to full possession of the vessel and her stores, agreeably to inventory as she now lies, alongside the pier, with all faults, hazards, damage, and risk from the day of sale."

In compliance with this condition, the plaintiff paid 8*l.* by way of deposit, and by his agent, duly authorized, signed an agreement to pay the remainder of the purchase-money. On the 27th of October 1851 the defendant's alleged agent gave possession of the barge to the plaintiff, with all her papers, including the certificate of registry.

An application was made to the defendant before the 1st of November 1851, requesting him to execute a bill of sale of the barge, &c. to the plaintiff, which he refused to do, and in consequence this claim was filed for a specific performance.

The defendant by his affidavit said, that being sole registered owner of the barge, he, on the 22nd of November 1850, in consideration of 100*l.* then paid, executed a bill of sale of the barge and stores to William Smerden, which was duly registered at the Custom Office on the 23rd of November, and that he had not since exercised any act of ownership over the barge, &c. on his own behalf. That William Smerden, soon after the sale, allowed the defendant, Joseph Curtis, to look after the barge, and that he appointed James Rains, a mariner, to navigate it, and that in October the barge went aground off Sheerness batteries, and was taken possession of by the boatmen, who, by throwing out a part of the cargo, floated her and kept possession till the sale; that a Mr. Edgecumbe had authorized the sale, and that he believed it was not a bond fide sale.

There was no evidence by whose authority or on whose behalf the sale was ordered, or by whose authority or on whose behalf the contract was signed.

Mr. Wickens, for the plaintiff.—After the sale to the plaintiff, upon an apparently clear certificate of registry, the plaintiff was informed that a previous sale had been made to Mr. Smerden, but that was no answer to the contract.

Mr. Rudall, for the defendant.—Joseph Curtis was the owner until the 22nd of November 1850, but he was not the owner at the time of the sale. William Smerden was then the owner under a bill of sale, which had been registered nearly a year before. The barge, &c. was worth much more than 40*l.* and had been in the management of the defendant on behalf of W. Smerden, but he had never authorized a sale. Whatever had been done was under a mistake, and as specific performance is a subject for the discretion of the Court, it will not entertain this claim, and as a bill will not lie for the recovery of a chattel, so neither will a claim.

Mr. Wickens was not heard in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—No decree that I make can affect William Smerden, who is no party to this claim. I think, however, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for the specific performance of the contract with costs, and I must refer it to the Master to settle the bill of sale in case the parties differ (1). *

June 25, 28. } HAIG v. GRAY.

Evidence—Original Suit—Admissibility in cross Suit.

Evidence taken in an original suit may be read in a cross suit under the common order, the Court having judicial notice of both causes.

The bill in this case was filed by Mr. Gray to obtain an account of dealings and transactions in which the plaintiff had been engaged as agent for the defendants, Messrs. Haig & Son, in the sale of malt and grain spirits, and in this suit Mr. Rikey was examined as a witness for the defendant to prove allegations of fraud. Mr. Haig also filed a cross bill, charging Mr. Gray with frauds in the transaction, and Mr. Rikey's examination was taken in the original suit after the institution of this cross suit, but before replication. Mr. Haig obtained the common order to read this evidence at the hearing in the cross cause.

Mr. Lee and Mr. Williams, for Mr. Gray, objected to this evidence being received in the cross suit on the ground that it was not taken in the cause, and had no relation to matters alleged and charged in the cross suit.

Claim—Multifariousness.

The joining in a claim parties whose interest is contingent, to ask for the preservation of a fund is not multifarious, or a misjoinder of parties.

Quære—If an objection to a claim is to be raised by motion to take it off the file.

This was a motion to take a claim off the file for irregularity, on the ground of multifariousness and for misjoinder of parties.

The claim was filed by Peter Thomas Davies on behalf of himself, and as the next friend of his children, against the widow and executrix of his brother, who was also tenant for life under the will of the testator, David Peter Davies, which contained the following bequest:—"On the death of my beloved wife, and on the death of my father and mother, I will that all my property may be divided among my four sisters and brother, if either be alive, or their children, share and share alike." And it asked to have the property got in and secured. The testator's father and mother were both dead.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Elderton, for the defendant, Anne Davies.—The present application is a substitute for a demurrer; the interests of the parties are inconsistent, as while the father lives he represents the fund.

Fulham v. M'Carthy, 1 H. L. Ca. 703.

Witherden v. Mercer, 14 Jur. 613.

Mr. James, for the plaintiffs.—The whole of these parties have an interest in this fund and in its preservation, but assuming the mode of taking the objection regular, the objection itself is nothing. The motion ought, therefore, to be refused.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I do not think that the interests of the parties, or the claims made by them, are inconsistent, or that it is incumbent upon them to consider whether others are entitled. They all have an interest in having the funds ascertained and secured, as until the death of the tenant for life no question can arise respecting the division. I also doubt whether this is the proper mode of taking an objection to a claim, assuming it to be wrong. In the case of Witherden v. Mercer there were other objections besides multifariousness.

July 24. } JONES v. BEACH.

Principal and Surety—Promise to pay—Liability extending.

A surety, upon being informed that proceedings are contemplated against himself and his principal, states by letter his intention to pay the debt:—Held, after his decease, that the letter was a promise to pay; that his undisputed right to payment was a sufficient identity of the plaintiff, whose address was not set out in the claim; and that the forbearance to sue was a sufficient consideration for the promise.

This was a claim by Andrew Jones against Milborough Beach, the executrix of John Beach, deceased, to obtain payment out of the estate of J. Beach of the sum of 300*l.*, secured by three several promissory notes, given and signed by J. Beach, deceased, and W. Stubbs for the sum of 100*l.* each, bearing date respectively the 2nd of June 1842, the 1st of August 1842, and the 2nd of March 1846, upon which interest had been paid to A. Jones down to the 8th of July 1850.

J. Beach died in August 1850, and the defendant, M. Beach, was his widow and executrix.

The facts as stated in the claim were echoed by the plaintiff in his affidavit: he also swore that J. Beach in his lifetime repeatedly promised to pay the debt, with interest, particularly in a letter dated the 21st of June 1850.

The signature of the notes was admitted by M. Beach, but she said that J. Beach was only a surety, and that he did not receive any of the money or any advantage. That Charles Pumpfrey, the plaintiff's solicitor, wrote to J. Beach as follows:—

"Droitwich, June 20th, 1850.

"Sir,—Mr. Stubbs is here, and I am about making him a bankrupt, but I find I cannot proceed against him without coupling you in the affair. I have no desire to proceed against either, and in order to avoid this I ask you whether you will join Mr. Stubbs in a fresh note for 300*l.*, payable jointly and severally. As the notes in my possession are made payable on demand, and are not jointly and severally, you had better see your solicitor hereon immediately. I shall await your reply a post or two, and if I have no reply I shall at once proceed against both of you. Yours, &c.

"Charles Pumpfrey."

"Hereford, June 21st, 1850.

"Sir,—Mr. Beach of this city has brought me your letter, and has instructed me to inform you that it is his intention to pay off the 300*l.* due to your client, on the joint note of himself and Mr. Stubbs. I shall be glad if you will let me know the amount due for interest, and Mr. Beach will be prepared to remit the money in the course of a post or two. I presume you have the notes. I remain, &c.

"John Gwillim."

That further negotiations were stayed by the death of J. Beach, and finally the claim was filed either to obtain payment of the debt, or for the administration of the estate of the deceased.

It also appeared that Mr. Stubbs had become insolvent.

Mr. J. H. Palmer, for the plaintiff, insisted upon his right to have the estate administered in this court for payment of the demand.

Thorp v. Jackson, 2 You. & C. 553.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. C. Hall, for the defendant.—A joint security will not be extended in equity beyond the legal operation, there being no previous equity to entitle the party to a several security from each—Sumner v. Powell (1). And where the surety is jointly bound with the principal, nothing will be done to extend it as against the personal representative of the surety. The rule against extending the liability against a surety is stringent, and in this case the letter was no proof that there was any debt owing, and no consideration was given for it.

Mr. J. H. Palmer, without reply.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I think the plaintiff is entitled to a decree upon the letter without further reference to the original notes. Mr. Beach was told that it was intended to make Mr. Stubbs a bankrupt, and that he was an interested party, but that there was no desire to proceed if he would join in giving a several as well as a joint liability, and in order to correct the defect he was asked for a joint and several note: the answer through a solicitor was, that he intended to pay all that was due upon the joint note of himself and Mr. Stubbs. If there is any difficulty upon the form of the claim, the Court will allow the claim to be amended; it is not so strict with these forms of proceeding as with bills: it did not, however, appear necessary. It was said that the plaintiff was not sufficiently described, but I think he was, as the right of the plaintiff to payment was admitted. Then as to the consideration, forbearance to sue was quite sufficient; had it not been for the letter, proceedings might have been commenced, and at the death of Mr. Beach final judgment might have been obtained, and he might have been made liable in a manner which would have been binding upon his personal representative. Upon the whole, I think the plaintiff has a right to recover.

M.R. 1851. Dec. 16, 17, 18, 19, 22, 23. 1852. Jan. 12.	}	COCKELL v. TAYLOR. PRESTON v. COLLETT. COLLETT v. PRESTON.

Mortgage — Sub-mortgages — Notice — Chose in Action — Necessitous Borrower — Expectancy — Loan of Money on Conditional Purchase.

The purchase of a piece of land at an exorbitant price will not be allowed to stand when made the condition of a loan of money to a party whose necessities compelled him to borrow.

*A mortgage of a fund in court in a suit of Collett v. Maule, by W. G. C, the purchaser of the land, to secure 6,000*l., the purchase-money, to G. W. F, the vendor, set aside, on the ground that the transaction was fraudulent.

An assignment of a chose in action must be taken, subject to all prior claims. Sub-mortgages of the fund in court, made without noticing G. W. F, were therefore set aside, as his title was either void or subject to the prior equity of W. G. C, notwithstanding he had been induced to create or countenance such sub-mortgages.

The acts of W. G. C. in joining to create the sub-mortgages were not a recognition of or an acquiescence in the sub-mortgages, as they were done in entire ignorance of his rights, and under the idea that the original transaction with G. W. F. was unimpeachable.

The suit of Collett v. Preston was instituted the 14th of January 1850, by W. G. Collett, to set aside an agreement, dated the 25th of October 1848, for the purchase of a piece of land near Hammersmith Bridge, and a deed of the 13th of December 1848, conveying the same land to him, and also the mortgage of the one-fourth share of W. G. Collett, and Sarah his wife, in the personal estate of Sarah Hyatt, deceased, which was in question in a suit of Collett v. Maule, and asking that the mortgage might be delivered up to be cancelled, and that the claims of various sub-mortgagees in the mortgage debt of 6,000*l.*, created by an indenture of the 14th of December 1848, were void as against W. G. Collett and Sarah his wife; or if they should be declared entitled to anything, then that Messrs. Preston & Finch might pay it, or that the plaintiffs might pay it and hold the land in the conveyance of the 13th of December 1848 as a security.

The suit of Cockell v. Taylor was instituted in March 1850, by Edward Whitehead Cockell, to redeem a mortgage, dated the 10th of May 1849, made by Henry John Preston and George William Finch, to secure the repayment of a sum of 573*l.* 6*s.*, which they had borrowed of George Taylor. This mortgage comprised the sum of 6,000*l.*, which William George Collett and Sarah his wife had secured to Henry John Preston, by the indenture dated the 14th of December 1848, assigning the one-fourth share of the personal estate of Sarah Hyatt to secure the payment, and which share was also assigned to George Taylor in the mortgage made to him. The plaintiff E. W. Cockell also asked that W. G. Collett, and Sarah his wife, Henry John Preston, G. W. Finch, Joseph Ivimey, and Frederick Harrison might redeem a mortgage made to him on the 1st of March 1849, by H. J. Preston, with the consent of W. G. Collett, of the fourth share of W. G. Collett, and Sarah his wife, on the personal estate of Sarah Hyatt, to secure the repayment to him of a sum of 2,700*l.*, and interest, and in default that they might be foreclosed, or otherwise that accounts might be taken, and that the other defendants might redeem them.

The suit of Preston v. Collett was instituted on the 27th of June 1849, by Henry John Preston, under the agreement dated the 25th of October 1848, and another dated the 15th of December 1848, to obtain from W. G. Collett an assignment of a sum of 1,884*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and interest, which was secured to William Piercy Dimes upon trust for W. G. Collett.

The facts of these several suits, together with the arguments, are so fully stated in the course of the judgment, that it is deemed unnecessary further to set them out.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—These three suits are separate and distinct, by different plaintiffs, seeking separate and independent relief; yet they all arise out of the same transaction, and the relief to be afforded or the decree to be made in each must, in a great measure, depend upon the validity of a deed of mortgage, which is impeached in the suit of Collett v. Preston. As the burden of proof lies upon the person contesting that validity, and as, unless the plaintiff W. G. Collett can succeed in proving that mortgage deed to be invalid, the persons claiming relief in respect of it are entitled, as a general consequence, to the relief they ask, I shall first express my opinion in the suit of Collett v. Preston.

In this suit the plaintiff seeks to set aside a transaction for the sale of land at Hammersmith, in the course of which and as a consideration for such sale, a mortgage deed was executed by the plaintiff, William George Collett, to the defendant, George William Finch, by which 6,000*l.* was charged upon the share to which W. G. Collett claimed to be entitled of a fund in court in a suit of Collett v. Maule. If the plaintiff succeeds to this extent, he then, in the second place, seeks to have two mortgages, one to the defendant Edward Whitehead Cockell and another to the defendant George Taylor, declared to be void on the ground that those mortgages were a purchase of a chose in action, and that being such it must be taken by the persons who bought it, subject to the equities which attached to it.

The first and main question is, whether the transaction which constituted the original mortgage is fair and valid; if that cannot be impugned, all the subsequent dealings with the interests so created are valid and effectual. If, however, the original mortgage is set aside, it will still remain a question to be decided, whether the sub-mortgages of their interests to persons ignorant of and in nowise implicated in the original transaction can be touched. The original mortgage was given by W. G. Collett to G. W. Finch as the consideration for the purchase of a plot of land near Hammersmith Bridge, belonging at that time to G. W. Finch, which he had purchased as part of a larger portion from the West Middlesex Waterworks Company two years before. The plaintiff, W. G. Collett, alleges that this mortgage deed was obtained from him under such circumstances and by such means that this Court will declare it to be void, and order it to be cancelled; and this is the issue which he undertakes to prove.

The position of W. G. Collett at this time was this: he was in a humble rank of life; he had formerly been in the employment of Mr. Cubitt as bricklayer; he afterwards kept a greengrocer's shop, and is described last as being out of employment. His wife, the other plaintiff, was distantly related to a gentleman of considerable property, who had died intestate, and to whose estate the Crown had taken out administration. W. G. Collett had instituted a suit in this court, claiming a fourth portion of the estate of the intestate. His resources for carrying on the suit were none, except such assistance as might be derived from persons who were convinced of the correctness and ultimate success of his claim; and accordingly he, together with the other plaintiffs, early created a charge on the gross fund expected to be recovered, for the purpose of paying the expenses of the suit. This want of funds was possibly the reason of the change of solicitors, which occurred twice in the conduct of the cause; it being obvious that a solicitor, whom the law does not permit to take security for costs hereafter to be incurred, cannot be expected to make large advances for an indefinite time, on the strength of his client being likely or even being sure ultimately to succeed.

In 1848, previously to the transaction in question, Mr. Leate was the plaintiff's solicitor in the cause of Collett v. Maule. The contest in that suit before the Court was so far concluded that the Master, although he had not made his report, had expressed his opinion that the plaintiff had made out his case; but the Master found it might and probably would be contested both by the Crown and by an adverse claimant of the name of Susannah Brassington. The opposition of the Crown might be disposed of if the Court should express its concurrence in the opinion found by the Master, and the opposition of the adverse claimant might probably be bought off; but, if not, great additional expense would necessarily have to be incurred in the trial of the issue.

This was the state the parties themselves conceived matters to stand in, as appears by an opinion of counsel on the case of the plaintiff. It was evident in this state of things that money was essential for prosecuting the plaintiff's case; and that, except his right to a portion of the fund in court he had no security to give or means of obtaining any advance of money. The rule of court I have already referred to made it impossible for Mr. Leate himself to advance the funds required; and accordingly Mr. Collett applied to Thomas Collingwood Ker, a solicitor of this court with whom he had formerly had dealings, to advance or procure for him the money required. Whether this was done with or without the knowledge of Mr. Leate does not appear, nor is it very material. T. C. Ker, through the instrumentality of W. G. Collett, applied to G. W. Finch, who was then and is now a solicitor of this court; he was the real owner of the eighteen acres of land on the south side of Hammersmith Bridge, which he had purchased from the West Middlesex Waterworks Company in the year 1846 for the sum of 5,000*l.*, although the conveyance had been taken in the name of Henry John Preston, who was the nominal owner of it and agent for G. W. Finch in this matter. Before any arrangement was come to, G. W. Finch took the precaution of ascertaining from the counsel for W. G. Collett in the suit of Collett v. Maule the probability W. G. Collett had of succeeding in that suit. I see no impropriety in his taking that course. If the transaction was a simple loan of money on the security of the share of W. G. Collett in the fund in court, it was a prudent and proper course to ascertain that such fund existed, and that W. G. Collett had and probably would speedily establish a right to it. The answer he obtained from the plaintiff's counsel was conclusive as to the ultimate success of W. G. Collett, but doubtful as to the amount of expense which might be required for that purpose; which expense would depend on the extent of resistance which might be offered by the Crown and by the adverse claimant, Susannah Brassington. Having obtained this opinion, the position of the parties was this: both the plaintiff and John Leate, his solicitor in the cause on one side, and G. W. Finch on the other, knew that an advance of money was essential to enable W. G. Collett to succeed in establishing his right. They also knew that W. G. Collett had applied for and was in every way endeavouring to raise money for this purpose, and that he had no security to give except his share of the fund, his right to which was to be established by means of this very advance of money.

This was the state of the case when the agreement of the 25th of October 1848 was entered into between G. W. Finch, nominally, as the agent for H. J. Preston on the one part, and the plaintiff, on his own account, on the other part. It does not appear to be very material that G. W. Finch did not communicate to W. G. Collett the fact that H. J. Preston was not the party really contracting, but that he, G. W. Finch, was himself the contracting party, which was, undoubtedly, the case. It is, however, of great importance, bearing in mind the state and condition of the plaintiff, and his wants at this time, to examine the nature and effect of the agreement itself. The document bears date the 25th of October 1848; it recites that W. G. Collett is desirous of raising 1,000*l.* for his immediate use, to be secured upon the after-mentioned funds, and is also desirous of purchasing from Preston the after-mentioned piece of ground; that Preston agrees to lend or to procure to be lent to Collett 1,000*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent., to be secured upon a certain sum of 1,884*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*, which, by the indenture dated the 8th of May 1845, is secured to be paid to William Piercy Dimes, in trust, for W. G. Collett, out of certain shares in the funds in the Chancery suit; that sum of money is the charge before mentioned as having been made by the persons interested in this fund, for the purpose of carrying on the suit. Then the agreement proceeds subsequently thus: to agree that it should be carried into effect; that this sale should take place, and that the mortgage should be made upon the fund in court to the extent of the purchase-money. The formal recitals in this document seem to me to point to the raising of money as a primary and leading object, and my opinion derived from the circumstances I have already referred to, and those to which I am about shortly to refer, is, that in this affair the plaintiff was simply desirous of raising money to prosecute successfully the suit of Collett v. Maule; he had no funds at his disposition to buy land, or to enter into any building speculation, and he was much pressed for money to establish his rights in the suit of Collett v. Maule. Whatever might have been his disposition to indulge in projects of that description, to do so before he had realized the funds in that suit, would have been folly, little below insanity. That he did entertain any such disposition, or that he either desired or took any active steps to procure land and enter on a building speculation, is not supported by any evidence in this cause; on the contrary, all the evidence before me, and the construction and form of the agreement itself, confirm the view of the case I have already stated, and leave no doubt that the real object of the agreement of the 25th of October 1848, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, was not to buy land, but to obtain an advance of money to carry on the suit of Collett v. Maule; or, in other words, that the transaction was one of loan, in which the purchase of the land was not the primary object on the part of the plaintiff, but was made by G. W. Finch a condition for advancing the money required. In regarding this transaction, therefore, I do not look upon it as a simple case of purchase and sale of land between two persons, one willing to sell, and another desirous to buy, but as a transaction in which one party is desirous to borrow, and the other consents to lend, provided the borrower will consent also to become the purchaser of a particular parcel of land; a transaction involving elements for consideration distinct from those which would enter into the simple case of the purchase and sale of land.

On the 13th of December 1848 the conveyance of the land was executed, and on the following day, the 14th of December 1848, the mortgage was executed of the fund to be recovered in Collett v. Maule. Why the final completion of the transaction was delayed until this time—seven weeks after the date of the contract—does not distinctly appear. It is suggested that the reason for the delay was that which occurred in the Master's office, whose report in Collett v. Maule, in favour of the plaintiff, was not signed until the 11th of December 1848. No money passed at the time of the transaction. 1*l.* had been paid by G. W. Finch to W. G. Collett on the 12th of December 1848; 10*l.* on the 21st of that month; and 12*l.* on the 6th of January following, for which the plaintiff gave G. W. Finch his I O U. This appears from documents in the handwriting of the plaintiff given in evidence on the part of the defendants.

G. W. Finch appears not only to have paid W. G. Collett no money at or before the time of the execution of the deeds, but so far as can be gathered from the facts of the case, he does not appear to have had the means of doing so, for with the exception of these three sums, amounting to 23*l.*, it was not until he obtained money from G. Taylor and E. W. Cockell, on the security of the plaintiff's mortgage, that he paid him the further instalments, making up the sum of 1,000*l.* The last of these instalments was paid on the 10th of March 1849. The land itself, the condition and consideration for making this loan, was sold at a price greatly exceeding its real value. The evidence on this subject is all on the part of the plaintiff, and although the defendant, G. W. Finch, must have been advised that it was a material part of the case, he has not gone into any evidence on the subject. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff puts the real value of the property sold at about one-tenth part of the price contracted to be paid for it. It is true the Court looks with suspicion at evidence of value derived from mere opinion given by surveyors, unsupported by any other circumstance; but in this case that evidence is not without corroboration. In the first place, the plaintiff's witnesses, three in number, give the grounds on which they proceed, and agree tolerably nearly in the result. In the next place, the result of their valuation agrees with the value of the price given by G. W. Finch for the property, or if it varies therefrom, it does so only in the manner most favourable to the defendants by putting too high a value on the property sold. Two years before the transaction in question, Finch had given 5,000*l.* for the eighteen acres, sold by the West Middlesex Waterworks Company; there is no evidence given or circumstances suggested to shew that the land had either been sold by the company at an under value, or that it had become enhanced in value in 1848. If each acre of land were of equal value, the fair price per acre would be about 278*l.*: and of one acre and a quarter, the extent of the property sold to the plaintiff, the value would be 347*l.* There is some evidence that this portion of the land, by reason of its having a river frontage, was more valuable than the rest, and accordingly the surveyors of the plaintiff estimate the value at sums varying from 600*l.* to 700*l.* Taking all these circumstances into consideration, this does not appear to be an under estimate of the value of the acre and a quarter sold to the plaintiff; and if so, as I have already stated, the price given for the property was little less than ten times its real value.

Now, coupling this inadequacy of price with the circumstances of the case, the question I have to determine is, whether this is a transaction which the Court will allow to stand. It is not my intention to lay down that any inadequacy of price, unaccompanied by other circumstances, will avoid a contract, unless perhaps it is similar to the case referred to by Lord Hardwicke in Chesterfield v. Janssen (1), as having occurred in the case of James v. Morgan (2), where a man who supposed he was buying a horse for a few barleycorns had in reality contracted to give 500 quarters of barley for a horse worth 8*l.* It is, in fact, evidence of a fraud, though, standing alone, by no means conclusive evidence, and if a purchaser with his eyes open, without concealment or deception on the part of the seller, chooses to give ten times the value of the property, it is far from my intention to say anything that can lead to the supposition that the transaction can be impugned in a Court of Chancery. That, however, is not now the case. The purchase here is the condition for the loan. The plaintiff had neither the means, nor, as far as any proof goes, the inclination, either to buy land or to embark in any building speculation. What he wanted was money for the purpose of prosecuting this suit of Collett v. Maule. He was in humble circumstances, without the power of obtaining money, except so far as his claim to one-fourth of the fund in court enabled him to give security, and this a very unmarketable one. And although no imputation can be cast upon his capacity, yet the document proved to be in his handwriting bears marks of his being an illiterate person; coupled with those circumstances, the evidence of over-price is of great weight. And if the case had stood here the transaction could not be supported.

(1) 1 Atk. 352.

(2) 1 Lev. 111.

But there are additional circumstances which confirm my view of the case. In the first place, Mr. Leate was the solicitor of Collett in the cause of Collett v. Maule; he knew that W. G. Collett was endeavouring to raise money for prosecuting the cause. G. W. Finch had communicated with him upon the subject, and wrote two letters to him; one on the 26th of October 1848, and another on the 3rd of November following, and in neither did he hint a word about the purchase of the land, nor does it appear at any time that any person other than T. C. Ker was consulted on the part of the plaintiff in the transaction; and the real nature of it appears to have been kept back and concealed from Mr. Leate.

I say nothing about the form of the conveyance or the circumstance that the document was executed in the name of H. J. Preston, who was the agent for G. W. Finch in the matter. I see nothing in that part of the transaction which would have induced me to have come to that conclusion; neither do the observations made by counsel on the delivery or examination of the abstract of title weigh with me. But upon the other facts on which I have commented, I am of opinion that this was a transaction in which advantage was taken of the necessities of the plaintiff, and that so far as regards the contract subsisting between the plaintiff and the defendant G. W. Finch, it is wholly void, and must be set aside, except so far as money may have been actually advanced to the plaintiff by G. W. Finch, upon the security of the indenture of mortgage of December 1848.

I stopped the argument upon the objection raised to this transaction on the ground of champerty; and little need be said upon the subject. If this were the case of the sale of a right to sue, as for instance, if the plaintiff W. G. Collett had, before the institution of this suit of Collett v. Preston, sold to another any right he might have to set aside the deed of December 1848, it might have been affected by the rule of law which relates to champerty. But this deed is the sale by a person of his interest in a fund in court. The distinction between those cases is pointed out in Prosser v. Edmonds. The right of selling or mortgaging interests such as that which was mortgaged by the deed of December 1848 has been recognized and established in Wood v. Griffith (3) and numerous other cases. If there had been nothing in this case but champerty, I should not have felt any difficulty in supporting the deed of the 14th of December 1848.

Having decided that this indenture is void as between those persons, it becomes necessary to consider whether the sub-mortgages must fall with the original mortgage, or whether they can be supported on separate grounds. The validity or invalidity of the sub-mortgages must be considered separately as, to some extent, they rest on different or distinct facts. They, or at least all that remain now to be adjudicated upon, are two in number, namely, the mortgage to Edward Whitehead Cockell and that to George Taylor; all the others which existed at the commencement of the suits having been settled during the prosecution of them.

I will consider the case of George Taylor first, principally because that is not embarrassed by any complication of circumstances, but rests upon legal principles, deducible from a few plain facts. On the 10th of February 1849, George Taylor advanced the sum of 500*l.* to G. W. Finch and H. J. Preston, on the security of the indenture of mortgage of the 14th of December 1848, which was deposited with him as a security, and of this 500*l.* 300*l.* was afterwards advanced by G. W. Finch to the plaintiff, and it formed one of the instalments of the 1,000*l.* paid to the plaintiff. The defendant, G. Taylor, was not in the slightest degree cognizant of any fraud or irregularity having been practised towards W. G. Collett; he had no notice of anything doubtful or questionable in the transaction creating the mortgage, and it is not alleged that he either knew or was set upon inquiry whether the transaction was a good or a bad one; and he, therefore, contends that he is entitled to hold the original mortgage security as valid and effectual for the sums advanced by him to G. W. Finch, on the security of that deed.

On the other hand, it is contended, that admitting the facts as above stated to be correct, still that the rule of equity is, that a man who purchases a chose in action does so subject to all the equities which attach to it, and that consequently he bought G. W. Finch's interest in the share of the plaintiff in the fund of Collett v. Maule, subject to the possibility of its being proved thereafter either that another person had a better title to this fund than G. W. Finch or that his security was itself worth nothing. The rule relative to the equities which attach to a chose in action has been discussed and established in many cases. It has not been disputed here, nor can it be doubted, that a purchaser of a chose in action does not stand in the situation of a purchaser of real estate for valuable consideration without notice of any prior title; but that the purchaser of a chose in action takes the thing bought subject to all the prior claims upon it. If, therefore, the share of the plaintiff, W. G. Collett, in the fund in court had been charged with another sum to another person unknown to Mr. Taylor, he would have taken the interest in the fund subject to that charge. The question here raised arises from the circumstance that the prior equity is an equity in the assignor of the chose in action to dispute and set aside that assignment on the ground of fraud. And it is suggested that although there is not any doubt or question as to the general rule, yet that this must be taken with some qualification when the person himself who asserts the equity has created the interest under which the assignee of the chose in action claims it. But I have not come to that conclusion. I cannot, on this ground, draw any distinction between the different sorts of equities affecting a chose in action or alter their priorities. Assuming, as I do, for the purpose of the present argument, that the plaintiff, W. G. Collett, had a prior equity to this chose in action, and that the title to it of the person through whom G. Taylor claims is either void or subject to that of the plaintiff, the circumstance that the plaintiff has been induced to create or countenance such a title by an instrument which the Court holds to be void, will not postpone or alter his original title. In saying this, and in assuming that the plaintiff has this equity now subsisting, (and I must for this purpose assume that the conduct of the plaintiff has not affected this right, which is a question still remaining to be considered; but,) assuming that I am right in my decision, that the original mortgage of the 14th of December 1848 is void as against the plaintiff, and that he has done nothing to countenance any subsequent dealing with it, I am of opinion that third persons cannot, by innocently dealing with the person who improperly obtained the mortgage, acquire any equity against the plaintiff. This was decided in Bridgeman v. Green (4), which is cited with approbation by Lord Eldon in Huguenin v. Baseley (5). "There is no pretence," says Lord Chief Justice Wilmot, "that Green's brother or his wife was party to any imposition or had any due or undue influence over the plaintiff; but does it follow from thence that they must keep the money? No; whoever receives it must take it tainted and infected with the undue influence and imposition of the person procuring the gift. His partitioning and cantoning it out amongst his relations and friends will not purify the gift and protect it against the equity of the person imposed upon. Let the hand receiving it be ever so chaste, yet, if it comes through a corrupt, polluted channel, the obligation of restitution will follow it." I am of opinion, therefore, that in the absence of any conduct on the part of the plaintiff prejudicing his right, his title is paramount to that of G. Taylor.

I will now consider how far the conduct of the plaintiff may have affected his right, that is, whether the plaintiff has done or has omitted to do anything by which his title is impaired, or that of G. Taylor is to be preferred. As regards G. Taylor, the conduct of the plaintiff if it has such an effect must consist in what he has omitted to do, for there has been no action proceeding on his part. Doing nothing, however, may in certain circumstances have made it inequitable for W. G. Collett to contest the title of the defendant G. Taylor. I have decided that at the close of the year 1848 the plaintiff had a right to set aside the mortgage deed of the 14th of December 1848, or, in other words, that his right to the fund in court was not affected by that instrument. If, being aware of this, he allowed any person to advance money to G. W. Finch on the security of the deed which he knew or believed could not avail against him—if he did this, then, on the ground of his own personal conduct, this Court will not allow him to set up this title against the person whom he has permitted to be misled by the belief that no such title existed. As between G. Taylor and the plaintiff I am unable to find any such case established. I attended carefully to the evidence, and I have since perused it with a view of discovering when the plaintiff first became aware that the deed of the 14th of December 1848 might be set aside, but I have found nothing to lead me to the conclusion that he was aware of the imperfection of that instrument before his solicitor in the cause was made acquainted with its existence, and the circumstances connected with its execution. Now, the earliest period at which it appears that the solicitor in the cause of the plaintiff became acquainted with the deed of mortgage was in May 1849, when the petitions were presented in the cause of Collett v. Maule, for the purpose of obtaining stop orders on the fund in that suit. Mr. Leate knew that Collett was raising money: that the mortgage deed itself or the circumstance that the money secured by it was the consideration for the purchase of land at Hammersmith was never disclosed to him or to J. C. Dalton, and nothing is even suggested to have occurred in the interval between the execution of that deed and the presentation of the petitions, which could have induced the plaintiff to believe the deed was not a valid or effective instrument.

It has, it is true, been argued before me, that it is immaterial to consider when W. G. Collett first knew that deed of the 14th of December 1848 was impeachable, for that every man is to be held to be cognizable of the law; that the deed is by law either void on account of the circumstances attending its execution, or that it is not; that if it is not void the plaintiff confessedly has no case; that if on the other hand the law is that the deed is void, W. G. Collett must be taken to have been cognizant of that fact, and by his subsequent acts to have acquiesced in the validity of it notwithstanding such knowledge. It is evident, however, that this argument proceeds on a misconception of the principles of our jurisprudence which attributes to a man a knowledge of the law. It is no more than that every man shall be held to be cognizant of the legal consequences of the act which he does, which is correctly expressed in the maxim ignorantia legis non excusat. Unless that were so, crimes would remain unpunished, contracts broken with impunity, and civil obligations remain unperformed from the impossibility of establishing beforehand that every man knew the legal consequences of his acts. But this doctrine is inapplicable to the case where equity forbids a man to contest the validity of an act which, knowing he had the means to prevent, he has permitted to be done. Equity so interposes on the ground of personal misconduct or quasi fraud of the person who stands by, and this misconduct or fraud consists in his abstaining from preventing that to be done which he knew he could prevent. Without that actual knowledge, misconduct does not exist. To hold a man guilty of an active fraud by fixing him with constructive knowledge, or knowledge with intent to defraud, would be to pervert the rule of equity, which enforces a high principle of moral conduct, into a barren technicality. I am of opinion, therefore, that as regards G. Taylor, the plaintiff has not been guilty of any acquiescence or laches which can affect or impair his title to the fund.

I now come to consider the case of Edward Whitehead Cockell. That stands partly on different grounds from those on which the mortgage of G. Taylor rests. So far as it rests on any conduct of the plaintiff consisting in what he has omitted to do, the cases are the same, and the observations I have made on G. Taylor's mortgage will apply equally to the case of Cockell's mortgage. But in addition to those, the plaintiff has done various acts with relation to E. W. Cockell's mortgage, which are relied upon as establishing his title as against the plaintiff. Those acts are, first, and principally that he has executed the deed of the 1st of March 1849, by which E. W. Cockell advanced 2,700*l.* to G. W. Finch on the security of the mortgage of the 14th of December 1848. And further, besides doing so, that at the time when the deed of March was executed, and for the purpose of the execution of that deed, he admitted the validity of the deed of mortgage. Further, that he was asked separately and distinctly, first by James Cockell the brother of E. W. Cockell, and by Joseph Ivimey, his solicitor, whether it was true that he owed Finch 6,000*l.*, and that in answer to such questions he affirmed that he did, and he also said at the time of the execution of the deed of mortgage that he supposed he was not charging his property beyond the 6,000*l.*, thereby again admitting or affirming the fact that the charge of 6,000*l.* was a valid or subsisting charge on the fund in court.

In examining the effect of those expressions, and his act of executing the deed, it is most material to ascertain and consider whether at the time of so speaking or acting W. G. Collett knew or believed that the deed of the 14th of December 1848 was a valid or an invalid deed. As I have already observed with reference to the arguments addressed to me as to the constructive knowledge to be imputed to W. G. Collett, the value of those expressions depends principally on whether they were uttered with the knowledge that the deed of the 14th of December 1848 could be impeached. If the plaintiff sincerely and bonâ fide believed that he was bound by that deed, his conduct in saying that he owed 6,000*l.* to G. W. Finch on the security of the fund in court is neither reprehensible nor fraudulent, but it is merely a statement of what he believed to be the truth. I have already stated that up to this time I see no reason for supposing that W. G. Collett believed himself not to be bound by the whole transaction of December 1848; and at this time, when he was about to concur in the sub-mortgage to E. W. Cockell, and when he was using expressions intended to bind him as admissions of the validity of the transaction of 1848, the real nature of that transaction by which he became, or believed that he became, a debtor to Finch for the sum of 6,000*l.* is not inquired into. He is not even asked whether the whole sum of 6,000*l.* had really been advanced to him, or whether any equivalent in lieu of money had been given as a consideration. In fact, no inquiry is made for the purpose of ascertaining whether the original charge is valid. The execution by W. G. Collett of the deed of the 1st of March 1849 in the situation in which he was placed, and in the belief that the deed of the 14th of December 1848 was valid, is a natural, and indeed a necessary, consequence of that belief.

In order to bind W. G. Collett by his acquiescence, according to the rule of equity I have already referred to, and which cannot be laid down too strongly, it is necessary, as I before stated, to shew that W. G. Collett understood what it was he assented to, and that if his confirmation of the deed of the 14th of December 1848 is relied upon, it must appear that he thought he was doing something beyond the mere formal act, or that without such confirmation the deed of December 1848 would not be available against himself.

With reference to this subject it is also to be observed, that the plaintiff had no solicitor in this transaction: that E. W. Cockell did not even know that the deed of the 1st of March 1849 had been fully explained to him, but rested satisfied with the statement to that effect by G. W. Finch, who had obviously, on any hypothesis, the strongest motive to avoid any suggestion of doubt as to the validity of the deed of the 14th of December 1848. If that deed was valid, the plaintiff joining in the deed of March was useless, unless for the purpose of confirming it. If the deed of the 14th of December 1848 was invalid, the concurrence of the plaintiff in March 1849 is not material for the purpose of confirming it, unless he knew or believed, or with reasonable and proper diligence he might or ought to have known, that the deed of the 14th of December 1848 could be successfully impeached. The facts of the case in my opinion negative the proposition, that the plaintiff stood in any such position, or had any such means of knowledge; and that being my opinion, I am bound to regard this transaction of March 1849 exactly in the same way as I should have looked at it if the deed of the 1st of March 1849 had been the first and only deed in the transaction, and to consider whether it could then have bound the plaintiff's interest in the fund in court to the extent of 2,700*l.*, or, indeed, to any extent beyond the money he actually received. I am of opinion that it could not, and that this deed of the 1st of March 1849 is of no effect as against the plaintiff.

I have already stated that the deed of the 14th of December 1848 ought to stand as a security for the sums actually advanced to W. G. Collett, and I have had to consider whether G. Taylor or Edward Whitehead Cockell are now entitled to rely on their securities for the amount of so much of the money advanced by them as was actually received by the plaintiff. But I am of opinion that they neither of them advanced any money to the plaintiff,—neither of them dealt with the plaintiff. They both dealt with G. W. Finch, and with him only, and it is only as regards him that they have any right or claim. G. W. Finch might have employed the money as he thought fit, but as he has paid a portion of it to the plaintiff, as between himself and the plaintiff, G. W. Finch is entitled to rely on the deed of December 1848, for so much money as was actually advanced by him to the plaintiff, but this does not apply either to G. Taylor or Edward Whitehead Cockell.

The result is, that in my opinion the plaintiff W. G. Collett is entitled to relief, and that the decree must “declare that the agreement of the 25th of October 1848 is void, and it must be delivered up to be cancelled.”

Declare that the indenture of the 13th of December 1848 being a conveyance of the hereditaments comprised in the said sale is void, and ought to be set aside.

Decree the plaintiff to re-convey the estate to G. W. Finch, or as he shall direct, the conveyance to be settled by the Master in case the parties differ.

Declare that the mortgage indenture of the 14th of December 1848 is to stand as a security only for the sums which have been advanced to the plaintiff by the defendant G. W. Finch, and which remain unpaid.

Refer it to the Master to take an account of what is due to the defendant G. W. Finch in respect of the sums so advanced in case the parties differ as to the same, and let the Master also inquire who has been in receipt of the rents of the hereditaments sold since December 1848, and if the plaintiff has been in such receipt let an account be taken of the rents received, and if the plaintiff has been in the actual possession of the land, or of any part of it, then the Master must fix an occupation rent, and upon that there must be the usual redemption decree against G. W. Finch on payment of what shall be found due to him from the plaintiff on taking that account.

Declare that the sub-mortgage of the 1st of March 1849 to the defendant E. W. Cockell is void as against the plaintiff, and that the defendant G. Taylor is not entitled to any charge or lien on the fund in court in the suit of Collett v. Maule, as against the plaintiff W. G. Collett in respect of the deposit made to G. Taylor by G. W. Finch of the deed of the 14th of December 1848.

With respect to the costs, I am of opinion that G. W. Finch must pay the costs of the suit up to and including the hearing. Subsequently to that period I will make the usual redemption decree, and if the state of the account cannot be agreed upon the further costs will abide the event in the usual manner in suits for redemption.

W. J. Preston was a necessary party to the suit in respect of his legal estate in the land, but no case of fraud is established against him; I am of opinion, therefore, that he must have his costs, and that the bill must be dismissed as against him, but that the plaintiff is to add those costs to his own costs, and have them over again against the defendant G. W. Finch.

I am of opinion, also, that I must make the decree against Edward Whitehead Cockell with costs, so far as the costs of the suit have been increased by his insisting on the validity of his sub-mortgage of the 1st March 1849 as against the plaintiff, and that I must make a similar decree as against the defendant George Taylor.

The defendants Joseph Ivimey and Frederick Harrison were made parties in respect of certain charges on the fund of which the plaintiff contested the validity, and which the defendants by their first answer both insisted upon. Those charges have since been paid off, and those defendants now disclaim all interest, and therefore no evidence has been adduced or issue raised on this subject at the hearing, and, consequently, I have no means of ascertaining whether their claims were well or ill-founded; the question, in truth, having been withdrawn from the consideration of the Court pending the progress of the suit. The bill must, therefore, be dismissed without costs as against J. Ivimey and F. Harrison.

As against J. Connop, T. C. Ker and J. Cockell the case is different. They do not, and never have claimed any charge on the plaintiff's fund, or any interest in the subject-matter of the suit. The first two have been made parties, being participators in the transaction by which the mortgage of December 1848 was obtained from the plaintiff. Whether the charges for this purpose are or are not struck out of the bill is immaterial. The evidence fails in proving that they were parties to any fraud practised on the plaintiff. I fully concur in the rule laid down by Lord Cottenham in Attwood v. Small (6). Those parties are, in truth, nothing more than persons who might have been called as witnesses in the cause on the one side or on the other. It does not appear that they derived the least advantage from the transaction. J. Cockell is even still less connected with any part of it, for all that he did, or is alleged to have done, is, that he asked a question of the plaintiff, whether he executed the indenture of the 1st of March 1849. The bill must, therefore, be dismissed with costs as against J. Connop, T. Collingwood Ker, and J. Cockell; and the plaintiff is not to be at liberty to add these costs to those which he is to have against the defendant G. W. Finch.

In stating that I consider myself bound to make the decree with costs to the extent I have already stated against E. Whitehead Cockell and George Taylor, that is, so far as the suit relates to the setting aside of their sub-mortgages, I think it right to repeat that I do not consider either of those gentlemen in the least degree connected with the original transaction, which I have considered fraudulent and void.

The bill in Cockell v. Taylor must be dismissed with costs.

The bill in Preston v. Collett was good so far as regards the 1,000*l.* advanced to W. G. Collett; but this having been paid, and there being, in truth, nothing now remaining to be done in that suit, that bill must be dismissed, but without costs.

Will—Condition—Substitution—Words
"Then living," "Dying," "Shall die."

A testatrix gave her real and personal estate to trustees, in trust for her niece for life; and after the decease of her niece, without issue, (which happened,) and of her niece's mother, she directed the real estate to be converted; and as to one moiety of her residuary estate she gave it amongst the child and children of A. A. and the issue then living of any child or children of A. A. dying in the lifetime of the niece, and to their respective executors, administrators and assigns; and in case all or any of the children of A. A. should die without issue in the life of the niece, the share of him, her, or them so dying was to go "amongst the child and children of M. H. living at the decease of the niece, and to their respective executors, administrators and assigns." The niece died in 1830 unmarried and without issue, having by will given her personal estate to her mother, who died in 1850. A. A. had seven children, but two alone, H. C. and M. H., married and had issue. H. C. was alive at the date of the will, but died in 1847, leaving J. C. her husband and J. A. C. and R. L. her two only children. M. H. died in 1820 in the life of the testatrix and of both the niece and her mother. Seven of her children were still living, and this moiety of the residuary estate was claimed by J. C. as the husband and personal representative of H. C., by J. A. C. and R. L. as children of H. C., by the children of M. H. and the personal representative of the niece:—Held, as to one-half of this moiety that the children of M. H. were entitled, and as to the other half of the moiety that it was undisposed of, and passed to the next-of-kin of the testatrix.

This was a special case under the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35.

Eleanor Wainman, by her will, dated the 15th of December 1825, devised and bequeathed to John Nicholas Coulthurst, William Sedgwick, and Thomas Kendall, since deceased, all her real estate, and also all her personal estate not specifically disposed of, to hold to them and the survivor of them, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust, to pay debts, &c. out of the personal estate and invest the remainder; and pay or otherwise permit the testatrix's niece Mariana Wainman during the term of her natural life, and from and after her death her (Mariana Wainman's) mother during the term of her natural life (if she should survive her daughter and she left no issue her surviving) to receive and take the rents arising from the testatrix's real estate, and the interest of the residue of her personal estate, the same to be paid and payable to or received by her niece, and after her death without issue, to or by her mother during their respective lives when and as the same should from time to time be received or payable, and after the decease of her niece, and also after the decease of her mother, in case the estate limited to her mother should take effect, upon further trust that the said trustees or the survivor of them, or the heirs, executors, or administrators of such survivor, should sell the testatrix's real estate.

The will then proceeded as follows:—
“And I do hereby direct that the money to arise by such sales shall become part of my residuary personal estate, which I dispose of as hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, in case my niece shall die leaving issue, then I give and bequeath my said residuary personal estate, and every part thereof, unto, between, and among all and every the child and children, and the issue of any deceased child or children of my niece Mariana Wainman living at her decease, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike, and to their respective executors, administrators and assigns, the issue of such deceased child or children nevertheless taking only the share or shares to which their parent or parents would have been entitled if living at the decease of my said niece. And I order and direct that my said trustees and the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors and administrators of such survivor, do pay and deliver and transfer the same accordingly. And in case my niece Mariana Wainman shall die leaving no issue” (which happened), “I will and direct that my said trustees and the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors and administrators of such survivor, shall and do within six months after the death of the survivor of my said niece and her mother, pay out of my personal estate the legacy of 100*l.* among such of the children of Abraham Margerison as shall be then living equally, share and share alike. And as to all the residue of my said personal estate and effects whatsoever in the event of the death of my said niece leaving no lawful issue her surviving, I give and bequeath the same from and after the death of the survivor of them my said niece and her mother as follows, namely, one undivided moiety for the children of Richard Margerison, deceased, as therein mentioned, and the other undivided moiety unto, between, and amongst the child and children, then living, of Ann Armitage, deceased, the sister of my late father,” and “the issue then living of any child or children of the said Ann Armitage ‘dying’ in the lifetime of my said niece, and to their respective executors, administrators and assigns, share and share alike, the issue of any such deceased child or children of the said Ann Armitage nevertheless taking only the share or shares that their respective parent or parents would have taken if living at the death of my said niece. And in case all, or any one or more of the children of the said Ann Armitage ‘shall die’ without issue in the lifetime of my said niece, then I give and bequeath the share or shares of him, her, or them so dying, unto, between, and amongst the child and children of Mary Haigh, niece of my late father, who shall be living at the decease of my said niece, and to their respective executors, administrators and assigns, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike. And I order and direct my said trustees to convey and assure, pay, deliver and transfer the same accordingly." And the testatrix appointed her trustees executors of her will.

The testatrix died on the 27th of December 1825, and her will was proved by all the executors on the 27th of March 1826. She was the owner of some freehold and copyhold estates, all of which passed by her will.

Mariana Wainman was the niece and heiress-at-law, and also the heiress according to the custom of the manor of which the copyhold estates were holden. She was also her sole next-of-kin at the time of her death.

On the 15th of July 1830 Mariana Wainman died without ever having been married.

On the 13th of January 1850 her mother Ann Wainman died.

There were seven children of Ann Armitage: four sons and a daughter died without issue before the 15th of December 1825; but of the other two children, Hannah Armitage became Hannah Carter, and Mary Armitage became Mary Haigh, and she was mentioned by that name in the will. Hannah Armitage was the only child of Ann Armitage living when the testatrix made her will; she married the defendant John Carter on the 11th of August 1805, and died on the 7th of March 1847, leaving two children her surviving, John Armitage Carter and Rebecca, who became the wife of the Rev. W. Lisle, and died in September 1850.

The defendant John Carter took out letters of administration to his late wife. The defendant William Lisle, who was in Australia, had not taken out administration to his late wife, and there was no representative of Rebecca Lisle.

Mary Haigh died on the 19th of September 1820, having had eight children, seven of whom were the defendants James Haigh, John Haigh, George Armitage Haigh, William Haigh, Mary Haigh, Richard Haigh, and Joseph Armitage Haigh. The eighth child, Ann Haigh, died on the 21st of March 1849. There was no personal representative of Ann Haigh, and her seven brothers and sisters were her only next-of-kin at the time of her death.

Mariana Wainman, by her will, dated the 30th of August 1829, bequeathed to her mother Ann Wainman all her personal estate and effects whatsoever, and appointed her sole executrix and residuary devisee and legatee, and she proved this will on the 30th of January 1831.

On the 2nd of May 1846 Ann Wainman, by her will, appointed the defendants Robert Maillard and Thomas Pulvertoft Thirkill the executors, and on the 29th of January 1850 they proved the will.

J. N. Coulthurst and W. Sedgwick sold all the real estate of Eleanor Wainman, and got in all her personal estate; and the entire residuary fund amounted to 2,086*l.* or thereabouts, one moiety of which was now claimed, first, by John Carter as the personal representative of his late wife; secondly, on behalf of John Armitage Carter and William Lisle in right of Rebecca his late wife, on the ground that John Armitage Carter and R. Lisle were the only children of Hannah Carter who survived her and Ann Wainman; thirdly, on behalf of the defendants the children of Mary Haigh; fourthly, on behalf of the defendants Parnell Robert Maillard and Thomas P. Thirkill, as the personal representatives of Mariana Wainman; and the question was, who was entitled to this moiety of the testatrix's residuary real and personal estate secondly given by her will.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Wickens, for the trustees.—Before the children of Ann Armitage could take any interest in this moiety of the residue, it would seem that they must survive both the testatrix's niece and her mother; if it is so, neither Hannah Carter nor her children can take any interest; but with respect to the children of Mary Haigh the question is more difficult.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Hardy, for John Carter.—Some of the parties insist that there was an intestacy with respect to Hannah Carter's share, but the construction depends upon the event to which the word "then" refers; whether it applies to the death of the niece without issue, at which time Hannah Carter was living, or, as other parties contend, to the death of the survivor of the niece and mother: but it must be borne in mind that this bequest was to dispose of a residuary estate, which was to include the proceeds of a real estate to be sold at the death of the survivor of the testatrix's niece and her mother.

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The objects of the testatrix's bounty were the children of Ann Armitage living at the death of the niece and her mother. The word "then" fixing the period, made it a condition that they should survive. Hannah Carter survived the niece, but not the mother, and she had no right to take; and as she died during the life of the niece her children could not take, as they were not children of a child dying in the life of the niece. As to the children of Mary Haigh the question is different.]

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. J. T. Humphry, for the children of Mary Haigh.—In point of time the testatrix put herself in the situation of the legatee and looked upon the events most likely to occur, and it is manifest that the issue was not intended to take by substitution but concurrent with their parent. The expression "dying" in the lifetime cannot mean dying at a period subsequent.

Mr. Walpole and Mr. Turner for the next-of-kin of Mariana Wainman.—The will contained no general gift over until this moiety of the testatrix's estate was actually payable. Does the word "dying" mean any more than dead? It evidently implies prospective death; if it did not, it was superfluous. The children, therefore, of Ann Armitage dead at the date of the will, could not be entitled to this fund, and as Hannah Carter and her children took no interest in the whole it must go to the next-of-kin—Waugh v. Waugh (1).

March 29.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I stated my opinion at the hearing that, as Hannah Carter, the daughter of Ann Armitage, had not survived both Ann Wainman and her daughter Mariana Wainman, she was not entitled to any interest in the moiety of the residue; at the same time I decided that neither Rebecca Lisle nor John Armitage Carter could take any interest in the residue, for though issue of a child of Ann Armitage, they were not issue of a child who had died in the life of Mariana Wainman, and the fact of Hannah Carter surviving Mariana Wainman and dying before Ann Wainman excluded them from all interest in the residue; but I reserved my judgment upon the question whether the children of Mary Haigh, a child of Ann Armitage who was dead at the date of the will, were excluded.

It is a settled rule that children of a deceased parent who form some of a class, cannot take by substitution where the parent could not have taken according to the terms of the will. Mary Haigh was dead at the date of the will: had she lived till the period of distribution she could have taken only as one of the children of Ann Armitage; she therefore could not have taken under the bequest to the child and children then living of Ann Armitage, the reference being to the death of the survivor of Ann Wainman and Mariana Wainman; so, if it was the proper construction that the issue of a child of Ann Armitage could only take by substitution for their parent, these children of Mary Haigh were not entitled to any interest in the share of the residue. This principle was established by Peel v. Catlow (2), Waugh v. Waugh and Christopherson v. Naylor. But if the construction was that the issue of a deceased child of Ann Armitage did not take by substitution for the parent, but as passing objects of the gift, the case was varied, and then if the only condition expressed by the words of the will was that they shall be issue of a child of Ann Armitage who died in the lifetime of Mariana Wainman, and which issue shall be living at the decease of the survivor of Mariana Wainman, then the children of Ann Haigh answer the conditions; and the circumstance that Ann Haigh died before the date of the will could not affect the right of her children;—such was the principle of the cases of Tytherleigh v. Harbin, Giles

v. Giles (3) and Jarvis v. Pond (4), which held that if there was a substantive gift to the child of a particular person, and to the issue of such of them as should be dead leaving issue, the issue of a child dead at the date of the will would be entitled to a share. The condition here to entitle the children of Ann Armitage was that they should have survived Ann Wainman and Mariana her daughter; and the condition which was to entitle the issue of the children of Ann Armitage was, that the children should have died in the lifetime of the daughter Mariana Wainman, and that the issue of the children should have survived the niece and her mother. The first part of the gift is to the children "then living" of Ann Armitage and to the issue "then living" of the children of Ann Armitage dying in the lifetime of the niece. The objects, therefore, according to the import of the word "and" are both the children of Ann Armitage living at the decease of the niece and her mother, and the issue of the children of Ann Armitage who might have died in the lifetime of the niece. If this stood alone and uncontrouled, my opinion would have been that there was an original and independent gift to the issue of a child of Ann Armitage who was dead at the time of the distribution, and that consequently the issue of Mary Haigh, having survived the mother and daughter, Ann and Mariana Wainman, would be entitled though Mary Haigh was dead before the date of the will. Upon the words taken alone this appears to be the meaning. The word "dying" does not here import futurity, or require, as a condition to entitle the issue of a deceased child, that the child of Ann Armitage should die after the date of the will, but simply that the child shall have died in the lifetime of the niece, Mariana Wainman.

Is, then, this construction contracted by subsequent words? The latter part of the clause coupled with the state of the family existing at the date of the will, gives rise to doubt. There was only one child of Ann Armitage alive, and of the other children of Ann Armitage who had previously died, one alone, Mary Haigh, had left issue. My impression at first was, that the bequest to the children of Mary Haigh must receive the construction put on the other clause, but upon consideration I think the words "shall die" in the subsequent part of the clause do import futurity, that is, death after the date of the will, while in the prior part of the clause the word "dying" has not any such effect, but simply imports death at any time prior to the decease of the niece Mariana Wainman, whether before or after the date of the will. The result of this construction is, that the testatrix, when making her will, contemplated that her estate was to be divided into as many shares as there were children of Ann Armitage then living or dead having left issue; that in case a child of Ann Armitage then living should die leaving issue before the niece, the issue who survived the niece and her mother would take that child's share, but that if a child died before the niece without leaving issue, the share would go to the issue of Mary Haigh. To explain this in the actual state of the family, if it were present to the mind of the testatrix when she made her will, would be that her estate was, in the event of the death of Mariana Wainman without issue, to be divided into two portions, one of which was to go to the issue of Mary Haigh who survived Mariana Wainman and her mother, and the other portion was to go to Hannah Carter, but that if she died before the niece, leaving issue, it was to go to the issue, but if she left no issue, that share was to go to the issue of Mary Haigh, who should be then alive. The intention of the testatrix has, no doubt, been defeated by the words used, which, in the case of a child of Ann Armitage living at the date of the will, have made it a condition that the child should have died in the lifetime of the niece before the issue of such children could take. It is obvious she neither anticipated nor provided for the event that has occurred—of the niece Mariana Wainman dying before her mother, and of Hannah Carter, the child of Ann Armitage, surviving Mariana Wainman and dying before Ann Wainman. The words used plainly import a gift over only in the event of Hannah Carter dying in the lifetime of Mariana Wainman. There is, therefore, an intestacy as to the half of the moiety which Hannah Carter would have taken had she survived both the niece and mother, and it must go to the next-of-kin of the testatrix; but as to the other half of this moiety, it went to the children of Mary Haigh who survived Ann Wainman.

Will—Vesting—Substitution.

A testator, who died in June 1837, by a will made in 1819 directed, after the decease of his wife, that one moiety of his residuary estate should be divided into five equal parts, which he gave to five several parties, whom he named, and in case of the death of any or either of them before his wife, then their respective shares to go to their respective husbands or wives; and if none, to their respective children; and in failure of children, to the survivors of them, share and share alike. And as to the other moiety, he gave 10l. thereof to A. E., should she be then living; and as to the remainder of the moiety, he gave it to five parties whom he named, and in case of the death of any or either of them, then their respective shares to their children; and if none, then to the survivors of them, share and share alike. The testator's widow died in 1849. It appeared from the inquiries directed as to the first moiety, that all the five persons named as legatees were alive at the date of the will; three died in the life of the testator, leaving children, six of whom were still living, and defendants to this suit. The remaining two legatees survived the testator, but died before the tenant for life. They both left children, seven of whom were now living, and defendants to this suit. As to the second moiety, A. S., one of the legatees, died before the date of the will, leaving four children, all now living, and defendants to this suit. Two others died in the life of the testator, one without issue, and the other leaving children, two of whom were now alive, and defendants to this suit; and H. K., the fifth legatee, was the only one of the legatees named in the will who had survived the tenant for life:—Held, that the legatees took as tenants in common: that children of legatees who would have taken if they had survived the tenant for life, were entitled to their parents' share: that the gift to A. S., who was dead at the date of the will, and in case of her death, to her children, passed her share to her children who were living at the death of the tenant for life: that the legal personal representative of a son of one of the legatees was entitled to participate with the other children of the legatee: that the children of a deceased legatee took vested interests in the parent's share whenever the class of those children was to be ascertained: and that upon the death of C. K., one of the legatees of the second moiety, in the life of the testator, the other legatees then living took vested interests in his share.

John Deverill, by his will, dated the 26th of February 1819, devised a freehold estate at Horsmoor Green to his wife Elizabeth for her life, and bequeathed the dividends from whatever stock he might die possessed of in the public funds, the use of his furniture, and the residue of his estate and effects, after payment of his debts, &c. to his wife for her life, and after her death he devised the Horsmoor Green estate, stock, furniture, and residuary estate to William Ive and Thomas Ashton, upon trust to convert the same into money and retain their expenses, and a legacy of 15l., which he gave to each of them out of the fund, and he then bequeathed his residuary estate as follows:—
“Whatsoever may be then remaining in their hands, I direct may be divided into two equal parts; the one moiety or half share thereof I give in five equal shares; that is, one share to Elizabeth, the widow of my late brother George; one share to my brother William; one share to my brother Thomas; one share to my sister, Mary Merrick; and the remaining share to my sister, Elizabeth Edwards; and in case of the death of any or either of them before my wife Elizabeth, then their respective shares to go to their respective husbands or wives, if any, and if not, then to their respective children; and in failure of children, then to the survivors of them, share and share alike. And the other moiety or half part thereof, I give as follows:—10l. thereof to Ann Edwards, sister of Edward Edwards, of Slough, Bucks, baker, should she be then living, as a token of my wife's friendship for her; and the remainder of the said moiety or half part to my wife's sister Ann Smith, her brother Charles King, her brother John King, her brother Henry King, and her brother Thomas King; and in case of the death of any or either of them, then their respective shares to their children, if any, and if not, then to the survivors of them, share and share alike." The testator appointed William Ive and Thomas Ashton executors of his will.

The testator died in June 1837; and Thomas Ashton having died in his lifetime, the will was proved by William Ive alone, who died in 1847, having made a will, by which he devised all estates vested in him as trustee to the plaintiff, John Goodwin Ive, whom, together with James Wells Taylor, the defendant, he appointed his executors.

Elizabeth Deverill, the widow of the testator, died in 1849, and on her death this suit was instituted; and in August 1849 a decree was made, directing preliminary inquiries, and the usual accounts. The cause now came on for further directions.

The facts with respect to the first moiety were as follows:—

Elizabeth, the widow of George Deverill, died in the testator's lifetime, leaving three children still living.

William Deverill died in the testator's lifetime, leaving no widow, but leaving three children, two of whom survived the testator's widow; the other survived the testator, but died in his widow's lifetime, and was represented by the defendant, Ann Deverill.

Thomas Deverill survived the testator, but died a widower in the lifetime of the testator's widow. He left six children, all of whom survived the testator's widow. He had another child, who survived the testator, but died in his father's lifetime.

Mary Merrick survived the testator, but died a widow in the lifetime of Elizabeth Deverill, his widow, and she left two children, both of whom survived the widow.

Elizabeth Edwards died a widow in the testator's lifetime leaving two children,

Thomas Edwards, who survived the testator's widow, and another child, who survived the testator, but died in the widow's lifetime, and was represented by the defendant, Susannah Gray.

As to the second moiety:—

Ann Edwards, the legatee of 10*l.*, died in the testator's lifetime.

Ann Smith was dead at the date of the will; she left four children, all of whom were parties to the suit.

Charles King died a bachelor in the testator's lifetime. John King survived Charles King, and afterwards died in the testator's lifetime, leaving four children, three of whom survived the testator, but two only survived the testator's widow.

Henry King was still living.

Thomas King survived the testator, and died in the widow's lifetime, leaving four children, all of whom were still living.

Mr. Smythe, for Thomas Edwards.—

The children alone who survived the tenant for life are objects of the gift, and they take by way of substitution—Cripps v. Wolcott (2). The gift to children was made to them as joint tenants. In every view, therefore, no children who did not survive the tenant for life could take any interest in their parent's share.

Mr. Fane, for Susannah Gray.—Notwithstanding Elizabeth Edwards died in the lifetime of the testator, the gift over took effect; it was not essential for children to survive the period of distribution to become the objects of a gift. Mr. Baggallay, for Henry King.—The second moiety was given in joint tenancy, and the children of legatees took by substitution, but children of a legatee who died in the testator's lifetime could not take. The whole of the second moiety was consequently divisible per stirpes between Henry King and Thomas King's children. If the gift of the second moiety was to the legatees as tenants in common, it took effect as if Ann Smith had not been named.

The representatives of Thomas King were entitled to participate in the share of Charles King. There was no ground to refer survivorship to the period of distribution. Cases like Cripps v. Wolcott did not apply to the present, as they had no reference to the gifts over of the shares of the respective legatees, or their dying under particular circumstances, but to the gift of the entire fund to several persons, or the survivors or survivor of them as tenants in common, in which case "survivors" was of necessity held to mean those who survived some one period.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—As to the second moiety, that was given to the five legatees as tenants in common, in equal shares; by alluding to respective shares the testator's intention that each should take a distinct share was evident. Upon the other questions I shall take time to consider.

March 29.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

—As this and the case of Coulthurst v. Carter (4) illustrate differently the rules governing the cases in which one legatee in case of death is substituted for another, whether they are prior legatees or legatees specifically named, or whether it is one of a class to be ascertained, I desired to give the judgment in each at the same time.

In the present case the testator died on the 8th of June 1837; his widow, the tenant for life, died on the 24th of January 1849; the five persons named as legatees of the first half of the residue were alive at the date of the will, three died in the life of the testator, leaving children, six of whom are still living and defendants to this cause. The remaining two legatees survived the testator, but died before the tenant for life; they both left children, seven of whom are now living and defendants to this suit. Of the legatees of the other moiety, one of them, Ann Smith, had died before the date of the will, leaving four children, who are all alive and parties to this cause; two others died in the life of the testator, one without issue and the other leaving children, of whom two are living and defendants to this suit; the fifth legatee, Henry King, is the only one named in the will who has survived the tenant for life. It is obvious, therefore, that there are four classes claiming as legatees, and a fifth class claiming the personal estate as undisposed of, as next-of-kin of the testator. The first class is that of the legatees who survived the tenant for life, this is confined to Henry King. The second class consists of the children of the legatees who survived the testator, but died during the life of the tenant for life; in this class are the two children of Mary Merrick, and the four children of Thomas King. The third class consists of the children of the legatees who died before the testator; this class includes three children of Elizabeth Deverill, two of William Deverill, two of Elizabeth Edwards and two of John King. The fourth class consists of the children of a legatee named in the will, but who in fact was then dead: this is confined to the four children of Ann Smith.

It was contended in the first place, on behalf of Henry King, that these were gifts in joint tenancy; but at the hearing I expressed my opinion that the legatees took as tenants in common. Henry King is entitled to one-fifth of half the residue, but he is not, either on the ground of joint tenancy or survivorship, entitled to a larger share.

With respect to the second and third classes, the children of the legatees, who would have taken if they had survived the tenant for life, are entitled to take their parents' share. The gift is not to a class of persons to be ascertained at any particular period, in which case, as the class would not be ascertained till a late period either at the death of the testator or the tenant for life, the children of one of that class could have taken by substitution only in the event of its having been possible that the parent could have taken. But this is a case where there are two moieties of the residue, each of which is given in five shares to five named and specified legatees, with a direction that if any one should have died, the wife or husband of the deceased

legatee should take the legatee's share, and that if there should be no wife or husband then that the respective children of the legatees should take the legatee's share. The distinction which is to be found in cases of this description is to this effect—If a testator gives a legacy to a class of persons, such as the children of A, and goes on to provide that in case of the death of any one of the children of A. before the period of distribution, the issue of such child shall take their parent's share, such issue cannot take unless the parent might have taken, and consequently if a child of A. be dead at the date of the will, or at the death of the testator, the issue of that child cannot take anything. This was the principle of Peel v. Callow (5), Waugh v. Waugh (6), and Christopherson v. Naylor. But if the original legacy is not to a class, but to a person named, with a direction that in case of the death of the legatee before payment the legacy is to go to another person, although the death of the legatee occurs before the death of the testator, the gift over takes effect, upon the presumption that such ulterior legatee was substituted in order to prevent a lapse of the legacy. This is decided in Miller v. Warren, Darrel v. Molesworth, Haughton v. Harrison (7), and Mackinnon v. Peach (8). It is this latter principle which applies to the cases of this will, and the terms of this residuary bequest bring it within the case of Le Jeune v. Le Jeune. I could not exclude these children in the second and third classes from the share given to the prior legatee without infringing upon this class of cases. In every case, therefore, where the testator specified some individual legatee who was alive at the date of the will, but who had died before the tenant for life, leaving children who survived the tenant for life, in all these cases the children of the legatee are entitled to take the share which the legatee would have taken if then living. It is proper to notice a difference which occurs in the wording of the gift over of the two moieties of the residue: one is, "In case of the death of any or either of them before my said wife Elizabeth," and the other is "In case of the death of any or either of them" without specifying any period within which the death was to take place, and which period, therefore, might have reference to the death of the testator or to the death of the tenant for life. But these words in both cases must be held to apply to the same event—the contingency of death before the death of the tenant for life, and no just argument can be deduced from the absence of the words "before my said wife Elizabeth" in the disposition of the second moiety of the residue.

The next question is, how far these observations and principles apply to the case of the children of Ann Smith, who was dead at the date of the will. The cases of Tytherleigh v. Harbin, Giles v. Giles (9) and Jareis v. Pond do not apply. In those cases, the gift to the children was original, and not as substituted legatees; and it was on that principle that I considered the words of the will in Coulthurst v. Carter. I held the issue of a child dead at the time of the will, to take the parent's share. But in this case there is no gift to the children as original legatees; nothing is given to them except by way of substitution, and only in the case of the failure of the gift to Ann Smith. I have not been able to find an authority, but I am unable to draw any distinction between the case of a gift to a person known by the testator to be alive, and in the event of his death to his children, and a gift to a person whom the testator may suppose or believe to be living, but who is in fact dead, with a gift over to his children in case of his death. The principles and reasons applicable to the case of the designated legatees dying in the lifetime of the testator, and which in that event give effect to the gift, apply equally to the case of the legatee being, although it may be unknown to the testator, dead at the time of making his will. In this case, the testator gave one-fifth of one-half of the residue to Ann Smith, and directed that in case of her death her share was to go to her children. The cases which shew that her children would be entitled under this bequest if Ann Smith had died the day after the will was made, apply equally to the case of her having died the day before, and consequently in the events which have happened the children of Ann Smith who have survived the tenant for life are entitled to the share which Ann Smith would herself have taken if she had survived the tenant for life.

There are two other questions. One is whether the legal personal representative of William Deverill, the son of William Deverill, one of the legatees of the first moiety of the residue, is entitled to share with Mary and John, the other children of William Deverill the father; and also whether the legal personal representative of John Edwards, the son of Elizabeth Edwards, another legatee of the first moiety, is entitled to share with Thomas Edwards, the surviving son of Elizabeth Edwards,—and I think they are. I have decided that the children of a deceased legatee take the parent's share in case of the death of that legatee before the death of the tenant for life, at whatever time that death of the legatee may have taken place: but in case the legatee died before the testator, the class of children of the legatee to take the parent's share is to be ascertained at the death of the testator, and that they then take vested interests in reversion expectant on the decease of the tenant for life as the parent's share, but that when the legatee has survived the testator and died in the lifetime of the tenant for life then that the class of the children of the legatee so dying is to be ascertained on the death of the legatee, and that they then take vested interests in reversion in their parent's share expectant on the decease of the tenant for life. In other words, the children of a deceased legatee take vested interests in the parent's share whenever the class of those children is to be ascertained, and the class of the children of each legatee dying before the tenant for life is to be ascertained at the death of the survivor of the testator and the specified legatee.

(9) 8 Sim. 360; s. c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 176.

This only applies to the case of the two persons I have mentioned, and I am of opinion that in the case of William Deverill, his legal personal representative takes one-third of the share which his father would have taken had he survived the tenant for life, and that in the case of John Edwards his legal personal representative takes one-half of the share which his mother would have taken had she survived the tenant for life.

The remaining question arises on those words of the will which direct that the shares are to go in the case of death of any or either of them, without children to the survivors of them. The words clearly apply to the five designated legatees, and Charles King, one of them, who died, left no children, and the question is, whether his share is to go to Henry, who was the sole legatee who survived the tenant for life, or whether it goes in part to the representative of Thomas King who survived Charles King and also the testator; and I am of opinion that upon the death of the survivor of Charles and the testator, the legatees of this half of the residue then living took vested interests in the share of Charles King, and consequently in the events which have happened that Charles King's share is divisible between Henry King and the representative of Thomas King.

April 2.—The case was again mentioned.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—Where one of the legatees named in the will dies in the life of the testator, the class of children to take by substitution must be ascertained at the testator's death; but where a legatee survived the testator and died in the life of the testator's widow, the class of children to take by substitution must be ascertained at the death of the legatee; so that in each case the share of a legatee dying before the period of distribution vested in such of his children as survived both their own parent and the testator. And such children took as tenants in common, and their respective interests were not liable to be divested by their deaths during the lifetime of the widow. Where a legatee died childless before the period of distribution, his share vested indefeasibly in such other of the legatees of the same moiety as survived him and the testator, the class entitled to a share under the gift to the survivor being to be ascertained at the death of the legatee whose share went over, or at the death of the testator, whichever last happened.

Solicitor and Client—Authority to institute Suit.

If a suit be commenced by a solicitor without the authority of his client, it will be dismissed on motion, with costs as between solicitor and client, including the costs of the motion to dismiss.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff to dismiss, with costs as between solicitor and client, the claim filed in this suit without his authority; and to tax the costs as between solicitor and client of the defendants who had appeared to the writ of summons, such costs and the costs of the present application, if paid by the plaintiff, to be repaid to him by the solicitor who had filed the claim in the plaintiff's name.

The affidavit of the plaintiff, in support of the motion, was to the effect that the claim had been filed without his knowledge, consent or authority (in writing or otherwise), and had never been acquiesced in or adopted by him.

The affidavit, in reply, of the solicitor and one of the defendants stated that the plaintiff had agreed that the claim should be filed in his name, but that he was not to be liable for the costs. This statement was contradicted by an affidavit of the plaintiff filed in answer.

Mr. Prendergast, in support of the motion, cited—

Wiggins v. Peppin, 2 Beav. 403.

Allen v. Bone, 4 Ibid. 493.

Mr. Bagshawe, for the solicitor, contended, first, that the authority was sufficiently proved; secondly, that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs as between solicitor and client.

Mr. Piggott appeared for one of the defendants.

Mr. Prendergast replied.

TURNER, V.C., being of opinion that the authority was not proved, said that the claim must be dismissed, with costs, including the costs of the present motion, to be paid as between solicitor and client by the solicitor who had filed the claim in the plaintiff's name,—the order to be in the terms of that made in Allen v. Bone (supra).

Order accordingly.

New Trustees—Statute 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 13.—Construction—Legacy Duty.

A testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to his executors, in trust for his wife for life, and, after her decease, for his nephews and nieces, whereby legacy duty would be payable at the death of the wife:—Held, that under the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 13. the executrix of the surviving executor might, during the life of the widow, transfer the trust fund to new trustees of the will appointed by the Court.

This was a petition for the appointment of new trustees. The testator named in the petition bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate to Mr. Hughes and Mr. Bowers, the trustees and executors of his will, upon trust, to convert and invest the same, and to pay the income to his wife for life (who was still living), and, after her death, to divide the principal among his nephews and nieces.

Both the executors had proved the will, and had since died, Mr. Hughes, the survivor, having appointed his wife Mrs. Hughes his sole executrix.

The residuary estate of the testator had been duly invested in consols, and there was not any power in the will for the appointment of new trustees.

Mr. C. J. Simpson appeared in support of the petition.

Mr. Benedict Chapman, for Mrs. Hughes, raised the question whether she could safely retire from the trust, as legacy duty would be payable on the residue at the death of the testator's widow, and Mrs. Hughes was personally liable to pay the proper legacy duty. He referred to the 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 13. (1), and suggested that the words "trustees or trustee or other persons to whom the same shall be payable or paid in trust for the persons entitled in succession," meant the trustees named in the will, and did not apply to those subsequently appointed.

TURNER, V.C. said that the trustees named in the will would be the persons to whom the money was payable. There was also the word "paid," and from the insertion of that word, he thought that the clause took in not only the trustees named in the will, but trustees subsequently appointed.

Order as prayed.

(1) This section, so far as it relates to the present question, is to the following effect:—Where the duty chargeable upon any bequest of residue for the benefit of different persons in succession, shall be chargeable at different rates, so that the same cannot be paid at one and the same time, but must be paid in succession as aforesaid, then and in such case, all and every the person and persons having or taking the burthen of the execution of the will or testamentary instrument in which such bequest shall be contained, shall be chargeable with such duties in succession, in the same manner as such persons would be chargeable with the like duties, in case of immediate bequest; unless the property bequeathed shall have been paid or otherwise satisfied to or vested in any trustees or trustee or other person or persons to whom the same shall be payable or paid, in trust, or for the benefit of the persons so entitled thereto in succession, in which case such trustees or trustee, or his, her, or their representatives, shall be chargeable with the duties for and in respect of such property so vested in him, her, or them respectively, in such and the same manner as if he, she, or they had taken the burthen of the execution of the will or testamentary instrument by which such bequest shall have been made.

Costs—Security for Payment—Taxation—Feme Covert—Separate Estate.

An order of course to tax solicitors' bills of costs obtained by a married woman without the intervention of a next friend,—Held, irregular, and though the solicitors held some security from her for costs, it was discharged, if further security was not given.

This was a motion to discharge an order obtained, by Rosetta Waddell, on the 15th of December 1851, for irregularity, or that security might be given for payment as well of the costs of the application for the order as of the amount which might be found due to Messrs. Waugh & Mitchell upon the taxation, and that in the mean time proceedings might be stayed, and that she might pay the costs.

On the 15th of December 1851, Rosetta Waddell, describing herself as formerly Rosetta Bagster, of Warwick Square, in the city of London, the wife of John James Robert Waddell, obtained an order of course upon Messrs. Waugh & Mitchell, to deliver their bill of costs within a fortnight, and for a reference to the Master to tax the same, and, upon payment of what should be found due, that they might deliver up on oath all deeds, books, papers and writings in their custody.

This order was served on the 19th of December.

It appeared that Messrs. Waugh & Mitchell had for some time acted as the solicitors of Rosetta Waddell, and from notices served it appeared that they had obtained some securities from Rosetta Waddell upon her separate estate, for costs due to them, that the income was about 900*l.* a-year, and was mortgaged to secure 5,000*l.*

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Greene now moved to discharge this order, on the ground of irregularity, because, being a married woman, it was obtained without the intervention of a next friend—In re Williams (1), In re Taylor (2).

(2) 10 Beav. 221.

Mr. Roupell, contrà.—The intervention of a next friend on behalf of a married woman is merely as a security for costs; when, however, she has a separate estate and has given security for costs she may present a petition herself, as there is no occasion for a next friend.

[The MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — In answer to a question I sent to the Secretary's office, I am informed that it has been the practice for married women to petition without the intervention of a next friend.]

It is the reasonable practice; if a married woman has no property, there is then nothing out of which to pay costs; but where there is separate estate and money set apart out of it to answer costs, what pretence is there for these gentlemen to require further security? It is assumed that the order was merely waste paper; but if her separate estate goes to pay, she is as to that a feme sole, and has a right to tax the bills.

Mr. R. Palmer, in reply. — A next friend is necessary. The separate estate might not be sufficient to liquidate the amount. The application to tax those bills should have been specially made.

March 30.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS. —It is settled, as in the case of Murray v. Barlee (3), that a married woman's separate estate is liable for costs. It has also, I think, been the usual practice in cases of this kind to allow a married woman to apply without a next friend; but the practice is nevertheless erroneous, and, as in all other cases, it is necessary to appoint a next friend to answer for the costs to the party sued, so in this a similar precaution must be taken. There is no intelligible reason why, if this had been the case of special petition, there should not have been a next friend, or why it should be unnecessary where a common order only has been obtained. Whether there are special circumstances in the case, or it is such that a common order is sufficient, the petition in either case must be by a next friend. The liability, however, of the next friend is not extended beyond what it would have been in the case of a special petition, but is confined to the costs incurred by reason of the petition. I must, therefore, either direct security for costs to be given or discharge the order. As it has been the practice for many years to give orders of course without the intervention of a next friend, I will give no costs of this application; but will, if it is desired, make the costs abide the result of the taxation.

Costs—Suit instituted on the Authority of existing Decisions.

A bill was filed on the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from proceeding under the compensation clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was refused, and the bill was dismissed, without costs; but on appeal, (the cause, by consent, being considered as regularly on for hearing,) the defendant had leave given him to apply to the Court as to the costs of the suit if he should, before a given day, establish a right to compensation.

Where a suit is instituted on the authority of a case, and the doctrine upon which the same was founded has been since got rid of, the plaintiff is entitled to have his bill dismissed without costs.

After the appeal in this case on the motion for an injunction had been disposed of by the Lords Justices (1), the defendant gave notice of motion before the Master of the Rolls to dismiss the bill, with costs. The plaintiffs gave a notice of motion to dismiss, without costs. The motions were heard together, whereupon the Court made no order on the defendant's motion, but on the plaintiffs' motion dismissed the bill without costs. From this order the defendant appealed. On the hearing, an arrangement was made, with the sanction of their Lordships, that the cause should be considered as if on for the hearing, the affidavits being treated as depositions, it being admitted on the part of the plaintiffs that they were not in a condition to ask for a decree, the case on the authority of which the bill had been filed having been dissented from, and therefore that the argument should be confined to one of costs.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Terrell, in support of the motion of the defendant to dismiss the bill with costs.—It is said that the case of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith (2) was a sufficient justification for the filing of this bill. However that may be, on the mere ground of the decision in that case, the present is so manifestly distinguishable on the point of amount, that the Court ought to visit the plaintiffs with the costs. Perhaps the best commentary on the impropriety of the institution of the suit will be found in the judgment of one of your Lordships, as reported in the Law Journal, on the appeal motion of the injunction, where it is said, "Looking at the facts of this case, considering all its circumstances, and seeing that I have come to the conclusion that more litigation, more expense, more delay, more entanglement, and more difficulty will be incurred by interfering than by declining to interfere, I am of opinion that there ought to be no interference, and that there ought to be no injunction." And my Lord Cranworth is stated to have said, "When the legislature has laid down a particular mode of proceeding, it ought to be a strong case to induce us to direct another. It is to be observed that, in the present instance, the amount of compensation claimed is only 15*l.* above the minimum amount for which an arbitration could have been resorted to. I cannot yield to the idea of the naming an arbitrator being conclusive, as suggested during the argument. In Smith's case—with the reasoning in which I confess I am unable to concur—the sum was large,—it was 2,000*l.* and upwards; and it might be worth while to see whether there was or was not a claim for anything at all. I admit that, although there is that distinction, it is not a distinction in principle."

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. C. Hall, for the company.—The case of Smith was quite sufficient to authorize the filing of this bill. Wherever that case has been spoken of in terms of supposed disapproval, the learned persons who have remarked upon it have always distinguished between it and each case before the Court, and in every instance there has been an express disclaimer of any intention to overrule it. The decision to which your Lordships have come is the first which may be considered as having overruled Smith's case; and certainly it would be a hard measure of justice to say that a party who finds a reported case decided by the highest tribunal except the House of Lords, and relying on that, institutes a suit, which fails because subsequent decisions have shaken the authority of that case, that, therefore, his bill being dismissed, he shall be visited with the costs of the suit. A directly contrary principle is recognized by one of your Lordships in Robinson v. Rosher (3), where a bill was filed on the authority of the well-known case of Flight v. Bentley, which was subsequently overruled, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to dismiss his bill without costs. The principle deduced from the case seems accurately stated by the reporter in the following words, "If a bill is correctly filed on the authority of a reported case, there being no authorities in conflict with it, and the decision in the reported case is afterwards reversed, the plaintiff in the suit, filed on its authority, is entitled, on motion, to have his bill dismissed without costs" (4).

Mr. Terrell, in reply.—This case and Smith's case are not alike; and besides, if the smallness of the amount is considered, it is clear the bill ought never to have been filed.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—We think that the order of the Master of the Rolls was quite right, except that the defendant ought to have had the costs of his motion to dismiss, and with the qualification which I shall mention; for we think that the bill was filed upon the authority of existing much considered decisions, which were sufficient to warrant the plaintiffs in filing the bill, and so to entitle them, as was held by my learned Brother in Robinson v. Rosher, to have their bill dismissed without costs. It was argued that this was a special case, and not within the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, but we look in vain for any valid distinction between them. The cases are as nearly similar as two such cases can be expected to be. It has been said that the smallness of the demand ought to induce the Court to say that the bill ought never to have been filed. That, however, is always a difficult question to deal with, and it seems that there were many other persons besides the defendant who would be affected by the question. We think the case was within the authority of The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Smith, and as the doctrine on which that case proceeded has been since got rid of, the defendant is entitled to have the bill dismissed, but without costs, so far as that case warranted the institution of the present suit. But there is nothing in that case to lead to the inference that the defendant there would not have had his costs if the case had proceeded, and he had obtained compensation in the action which the Court there held must be brought. And in the present case, if the defendant should establish a right to compensation, he will be in a different position from that in which he now stands. We propose, therefore, to vary the order of the Master of the Rolls, by giving the defendant the costs of his motion to dismiss, and to affirm the order in other respects; but to give the defendant liberty to apply as to the other costs of the suit, if he shall, before the last day of Trinity term next, establish his right to compensation.

COOPE v. CARTER.

Practice—Trustee—Wilful Default—Further Directions.

A bill was filed against trustees, praying that the amount of the trust fund which the trustees "had, or but for their wilful neglect or default might have, received, might be ascertained." At the hearing, the bill was dismissed as against one trustee, and the amount and particulars of the trust fund were directed to be ascertained. Nothing was said about wilful default, nor did the trustee ask that the bill might be dismissed as to wilful default. The Master made his report, which stated certain facts, and referred to certain documents, from which it was alleged that it would appear that there had been wilful default. At the hearing upon further directions, a decree was made referring it to the Master to inquire whether the trustee "could with due diligence, and without wilful neglect or default, have received" more than a particular stated fund, but upon appeal it was held, that the direction as to wilful default should be struck out of the decree.

As a general rule, in order to obtain a direction for inquiry as to wilful default against an executor or trustee, the bill must allege a case, pray for it, and one case at least must be proved; and Semble—that if from admission or proof a suspicion arises whether wilful default has or not been committed, and it appears likely that further evidence can be obtained, the Court ought to direct an inquiry short of directing wilful default, but in such a way as to call the defendant's attention to it, with the view to ground thereon a new order, at a future stage, directing an inquiry as to wilful default.

This was an appeal, in three suits, from a decree of the late Vice Chancellor Wigram, made on the 16th of February 1850, at the hearing, upon further directions. The facts are these.—Samuel Walbank, by his will, dated the 21st of November 1803, bequeathed to Dr. Townsend and J. Pitt 2,000*l.*, upon trust to pay the interest of the same to his wife for her life; then, after giving some specific legacies, he bequeathed the residue of his personal estate and the capital of the 2,000*l.*, after his wife's death, to his children, in equal shares. He appointed his trustees executors of his will. The testator died, leaving his widow and five children surviving; and on the 13th of February 1807, Dr. Townsend and Mr. Pitt proved the will. On the 13th of May 1815 a settlement was executed on the marriage of one of the daughters of the testator, Miss Frances Walbank, with Mr. Edmund Cresswell. By this deed, of which Dr. Townsend and Mr. R. Carter were trustees, the young lady's one-fifth of the residuary estate was assigned to, and vested in, Dr. Townsend and Mr. R. Carter, upon certain trusts, for investment in securities, and trusts were declared of the same for the lady, her intended husband, and the children of the marriage. Of this deed, Dr. Townsend was the sole acting trustee, Mr. R. Carter never having interfered at all. Mrs. Cresswell died in August 1829, and in April 1830 a general release was executed by the testator's four surviving children, and by Edmund Cresswell, to Dr. Townsend and Mr. Pitt as the executors and trustees of the will; and 500*l.*, 4*l.* per cent. annuities, was transferred into the sole name of Dr. Townsend as trustee of the settlement. This stock was afterwards converted into 3½*l.* per cents. Dr. Townsend appointed Mr. R. L. Townsend and Mr. J. Haines his executors, and died in June 1830. In April 1842, the Rev. J. R. Coope and Mr. H. M. Daniel were appointed new trustees of the settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Cresswell. On the 24th of January 1843, the Rev. Mr. Coope and Mr. Daniel, as trustees of the settlement, and the persons beneficially interested under the same, filed a bill against Mr. R. Carter, one of the original trustees of the settlement, and against Mr. R. L. Townsend and Mr. J. Haines, the executors of Dr. Townsend, the other original trustee, which alleged that they (Dr. Townsend and Mr. R. Carter) were, and acted jointly as, the trustees of such settlement, and prayed that the amount of the fortune of Mrs. Frances Cresswell, which had been received by Dr. Townsend and R. Carter, or which but for their wilful neglect or default might have been received, might be ascertained; and that it might be declared that Mr. R. Carter personally, and Mr. R. L. Townsend and Mr. J. Haines as the executors of Dr. Townsend, out of his personal estate might be decreed to pay or make good the whole or such part of the fortune of Mrs. Frances Cresswell as should not have been duly invested pursuant to the trusts of her settlement. Before the cause came to a hearing, Mr. R. Carter died, and the suit was revived against Mr. W. Carter, his executor. At the hearing on the 19th of January 1846, before Vice Chancellor Wigram, it was shewn, although the allegation in the bill was that both Dr. Townsend and Mr. R. Carter acted jointly as trustees of the settlement, that in fact the latter never did interfere. The decree made was—"Dismiss the bill as against the defendant W. Carter, with costs, to be paid out of the fund and cash in court: refer it to the Master to inquire and state to the Court the amount and particulars of the fortune of Frances Cresswell assigned by the indenture of settlement of the 13th of May 1815, which had been received by the said Dr. Townsend, or by any other person or persons by his order or for his use. And the Master is to be at liberty to state any circumstances specially with regard to the matters aforesaid." At the hearing, no direction of an account was asked as to wilful default, nor was any directed. No application was made on behalf of the executors of Dr. Townsend that the bill might be dismissed so far as it prayed wilful default. In this state the matters went before the Master, who made his report, dated the 7th of May 1849, in which he made various statements, and set forth several documents, and then proceeded to say he found that the amount and particulars of the fortune of Frances Cresswell assigned by the settlement, "which had been received by Dr. Townsend, or any person or persons by his order or for his use," consisted of the 500*l.* stock, appearing by the deed of the 1st of April 1830, to have been transferred into his tions were taken to this report by the plaintiffs, but they were abandoned. The cause was heard by Sir James Wigram on further directions, on the 16th of February 1850, when the plaintiffs by their counsel insisted that the facts stated and the documents set forth in the report shewed that there had been an unequal distribution among the testator's children, and that if Dr. Townsend had acted properly in the execution of the trust, the share of Mrs. Cresswell would have amounted to 1,000*l.* They, therefore, asked an inquiry in the Master's office as to wilful default, alleging that the Master (Sir William Horne) had been requested to enter into the inquiry, but he had refused, as he considered the liberty to state any circumstances specially was limited by the last words of the order of reference, namely, "with regard to the matters aforesaid,"—none of the matters aforesaid extending beyond an account of the fortune, and therefore not giving him authority to inquire as to wilful default. On that occasion, Sir James Wigram referred it back to the Master to inquire of what the fortune of Frances Cresswell, assigned by the settlement, consisted, "and in case the said Master should find that the said fortune consisted of any other particulars than 500*l.* 3*¼l.* per cent. annuities in his report, dated the 7th of May 1849, mentioned, then it is ordered that the said Master do inquire and state to the Court whether Dr. Townsend could, with due diligence and without wilful neglect or default, have received any and what part of such particulars." This was to be without prejudice to any question in the cause; and the Master was to be at liberty to state any circumstances specially, &c.; and the Court reserved the consideration of all further directions and costs until after the said Master should have made his report, with liberty for any of the parties to apply. From this decree the executors of Dr. Townsend appealed.

Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. T. H. Hall, for the appellants (1).—In a case where the pleadings were framed precisely as they are here, Lord Langdale refused to direct any inquiry on further directions as to wilful default, on the ground, that as the plaintiffs had taken only a common decree for an account, nothing would be more unjust than to have a new case made in the Master's office—Garland v. Littlewood (2). Also in the case of Green v. Badley (3), the same Judge, where a bill alleged a breach of trust, and on the decree accounts only were directed, refused, on further directions, to send any inquiry on the subject of the breach of trust.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Daniel.—It is to be remembered that no relief is now asked beyond what was asked by the prayer of the bill, and it is to be assumed that the Court intended that the inquiries it would ultimately send would depend on the answers contained in the Master's report to the original inquiries sent, and with that view gave liberty to state circumstances specially. Where a prayer for relief has not been exhausted by the original decree, the Court may on further directions, on materials contained in the Master's report, send inquiries to work out the remainder of the relief asked by the prayer of the bill, and which has not been touched by the original decree. In the present case, the new matters appearing upon the Master's report furnish ample materials for the inquiry as to wilful default, and the Vice Chancellor exercised a proper jurisdiction in making the decree upon further directions.

The learned counsel cited and commented on the case of Rowley v. Adams (4).

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This suit relates to a case of a trustee who died in the summer of the year 1830, and the suit was not instituted until the month of January 1843. As the bill was framed, it did not state this deceased gentleman (Dr. Townsend) to have been sole trustee, or sole acting trustee; it represented him and Mr. R. Carter to have been, and to have acted as, trustees jointly. The error in the statement would have been of little importance had Dr. Townsend been alive, as he would have known the facts and circumstances of the case, but his personal representatives could not be supposed to know the facts or circumstances equally well, if at all. They were brought to a hearing, thinking that the acts complained of were the acts equally of Mr. R. Carter and the deceased Dr. Townsend. At the hearing, they find that Dr. Townsend is alone to be made the object of attack; Mr. R. Carter, or his estate, which is the same thing, being dismissed, on the ground, it is to be supposed, that Mr. R. Carter had never accepted the trust. I am not quite sure that, as Dr. Townsend had died before the suit was instituted, that circumstance to which I have just referred, namely, the dismissal of Mr. R. Carter, is not of itself sufficient to support the present appeal. But I would rather not decide the case upon that ground.

When the case came on at the original hearing, an account was directed, of which no complaint was made. Dr. Townsend was a trustee, and he was properly directed to account. Nothing more was done. Of this, though Dr. Townsend's representatives could complain, they did not complain, nor did they take the course which they might have done, namely, that of having the bill dismissed, so far as it prayed wilful default; but no direction was given on that subject. The account was taken, everything was duly accounted for, no complaint was made against Dr. Townsend or his representatives, but certain facts and documents were brought forward in the Master's office, and in consequence, on further directions, the Court sent the inquiry now complained of, which was not founded on any adjudication. Whether the inquiry as to wilful default ought to have been directed, is the point now before us. To go back to the original hearing: I apprehend Lord Eldon often to have said that, as a general rule, in order to obtain a direction for wilful default against an executor or trustee, you must allege a case, pray for it, and prove one act at least of wilful default; and, doing so, you may have a general decree as to wilful default; that is the course of the Court. But this state of circumstances may arise; namely, a case of wilful default may be alleged, and a prayer founded on it; but circumstances appearing, by admission or proof, may raise a case of suspicion in the mind of the Court on the question, whether an act of wilful default has been committed or not. In such a case, I can conceive that the Court, if it is likely that further evidence may be obtained, ought to direct an inquiry, short of directing wilful default, in order to ground upon that a new order directing an inquiry as to wilful default at a future stage; but then the inquiry should be directed in such a way as to call the defendant's attention to the facts to be investigated. For instance, if the allegation be that a sum of 1,000*l.* be lost by wilful default, the inquiry ought to be under what circumstances it was lost, and as to the facts bearing on the loss, and as to the nature of the transaction. Then the evidence will be supplied, and when it comes back to the Court, an inquiry as to wilful default may be directed. I can conceive the propriety, or even the necessity, of such a case, but it is not the habit of the Court, that a trustee, who, although he has acted erroneously, has acted in good faith, should be treated with severity.

(4) Ibid. 395.

That, however, was not the case here. The course taken was tantamount to an adjudication;—it not appearing that there was any wilful default:—that there was no wilful default to be inquired into, because the account was only a general account of the receipts of the trustees. It is said that there was a direction to report circumstances specially, but Sir William Horne, a Master of great learning and experience, said, and said most truly, that with regard to special circumstances, they must be stated with respect to the "matters aforesaid," that is to say, the question of receipts and allowances. All other questions were not before him, and the danger of the consequences of perjury in the event of false evidence being given by witnesses in this case would not arise, because the evidence would not be material, as not addressed to matters in issue. It is said the evidence was documentary here; but the rule is the same; nor were the defendants called upon to address themselves to the evidence before the Master, because the Master was not to inquire as to wilful default. This decree was so worded as not to enable the Court on further directions to look at the new evidence produced before the Master, inasmuch as it was not evidence for such purpose; the consequence is, in my judgment, without denying that a case may exist in which on further directions an inquiry as to whether wilful default has been committed may be directed, this is not such case, and, in my judgment, if there was nothing more in the case than this, the inquiry had better be erased from the decree. But, assuming that, according to the ordinary practice of the Court, there is nothing to prevent an inquiry being directed, it still remains to consider whether there was matter enough on the facts and documents stated in the Master's report to render the inquiry before the Master probably useful. I am of opinion that, at the utmost extent, they raised a doubt as to an obscure matter, as to which all the persons who could have given information have passed to their graves, and is more or less matter of conjecture. There would be great hazard of a miscarriage of justice if this matter should be gone into. I am of opinion, therefore, that the inquiry had better be struck out.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH—after an elaborate statement of all the facts of the case, and of the statements in and documents referred to by the Master's report—concurred in the judgment already pronounced, chiefly on the ground that, assuming the state of the pleadings and the practice of the Court warranted the inquiry, the facts of the case led irresistibly to the inference that the accounts had been properly taken, and a proper distribution had been made of the testator's estate; and that Dr. Townsend had had transferred into his name the whole of the fortune of Frances Cresswell assigned by her marriage settlement, namely, the 500*l.* 4*l.* per cent. annuities; and that, therefore, there had been no ground shewn for an inquiry as to wilful default.

Trust and Trustee—Unauthorized Management of Trust Estate.

J. H. being possessed of the moiety of an estate in Jamaica, by his will appointed J. P. his executor and trustee, with power to manage, conduct, carry on, and improve his estate. In 1830 J. P. took a lease of the other moiety and covenanted to keep it in the same cultivation, order, repair, and condition, and thenceforward managed the entirety on account of the trust estate. In 1835, in a suit by the cestuis que trust under the will of J. H. Patey & Co. were, by an order of Court, appointed managers and receivers, and both moieties were managed for the trust estate until 1842. No rent had been paid since 1835, and the estate was in a state of utter ruin. Upon petition in the cause by the owners of the other moiety,—Held, that though the taking of the lease was not authorized by the will, yet as it was concurred in by the cestuis que trust and sanctioned by the Court, and had proved beneficial to the trust estate, it must be considered as binding on the cestuis que trust, and that the trust estate was liable for the rent in arrear and the dilapidations.

This was an appeal from an order made by the Vice Chancellor of England. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

There were two petitions of appeal, the one, the petition of the original petitioners, complaining that the order did not give them all the relief they were entitled to; the other, the petition of the plaintiffs in the suit, insisting that no relief ought to have been given.

Mr. Roll, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Malins, Mr. Teed, Mr. J. Parker, Mr. Hallett, Mr. J. Baily, Mr. Piggott, Mr. Terrell, Mr. Hardy and Mr. Eddis appeared for the different parties.

Nov. 4. — The LORD CHANCELLOR (TRURO).—This is an appeal against an order made by the Vice Chancellor of England, on the petition of the present appellants. The facts of the case are as follows:—John Hiatt, the testator mentioned in the pleadings, was, at the time of making his will as well as at the time of his decease, seised of one undivided moiety of an estate in Jamaica, called the "Fellowship Hall Estate," and the slaves, stock, and plantations, utensils and implements therein, and of other estates in the same island; and the appellants were seised, and are still seised, of the other undivided moiety, called the "Byndloss" moiety. John Hiatt appointed John Pink executor and trustee of his will, with power to manage, conduct, carry on, and improve his residuary estate, to the best advantage. From the death of John Hiatt down to the commencement of the lease, which I shall presently mention, the estate was worked by John Pink, as representing Hiatt's moiety, jointly with Philip Jacquet, the person employed on behalf of the appellants, as the owners of the Byndloss moiety. But dissatisfaction having been expressed by them at the small amount of produce derived from their moiety, John Pink, in a letter to Jacquet, dated the 11th of November 1828, proposed to take a lease of that moiety for the benefit of the claimants under the will of John Hiatt; and by an indenture, dated the 4th of June 1830, John Pink took a lease of the Byndloss moiety for three years, from the 1st of January 1830, at the rent of 600*l.*, and thereby covenanted to keep the demised property in the same cultivation, order, repair, state, and condition. The lease so taken was not, on the face of it, granted to John Pink as trustee of the will of John Hiatt, and, indeed, it contained no reference whatever to the trusts of that will; but, on the face of it, it appears as if it were granted to him in his individual capacity; but it clearly appears that it was, in reality, taken by him in his character of trustee of the will of John Hiatt. Before the expiration of that lease, John Pink proposed to take a new lease for a further term of three years, from the 31st of December 1832, at the rent of 400*l.*, such new lease to be an exact copy of the old lease, with the alteration of the date and the difference of rent. No lease was executed, but the appellants accepted the terms contained in this letter, and John Pink continued, as such trustee, to hold the Byndloss moiety. John Pink died in September 1833, and thereupon the trusts of the will of John Hiatt devolved on Edmund Pink, as heir-at-law of John Pink; but Edmund Pink never acted as such trustee, and Williams and Mackenzie, the executors of John Pink, entered into possession of the trust estate of John Hiatt and of the Byndloss moiety of the Fellowship Hall estate; and they and their consignees, Davidson and Barkley, always treated that moiety as part of the trust estate of John Hiatt.

In April 1834, the parties interested under the will of John Hiatt filed a bill in this court against the executors of John Pink, praying that the plaintiffs might be let into possession and management of the estate of John Hiatt, and for the appointment of new trustees, and of a manager in Jamaica and of a receiver and consignee in this country. On the 15th of February 1835, in pursuance of an order, dated the 9th of December 1834, Patey, Sewell & Marshall were appointed managers and receivers in Jamaica of the trust estate and premises of John Hiatt, and J. H. Palmer was appointed consignee and receiver in this country. In pursuance of the suit in this court, and in order to enable the receivers to obtain possession of the trust estate, a suit was instituted in the Court of Chancery in Jamaica, in April 1835, by the plaintiffs in the suit in this court, against the defendants to the same suit; and by an order on a petition in the suit so instituted in Jamaica, it was ordered that the mercantile house of Patey, Sewell & Co. and R. H. N. Hemming should be appointed joint receivers and managers of the trust estate and premises of John Hiatt, and that Williams and Mackenzie should deliver up possession of the trust estate and premises to the said receivers, and that the receivers should be at liberty to ship the produce to J. H. Palmer or to sell it, and account for it to him. In pursuance of this order, the executors delivered up to the receivers possession of the trust estate of John Hiatt and of the Byndloss moiety, with the privity of the solicitors of the plaintiffs in the suit in this Court, and the receivers always treated that moiety as held by them for the benefit of the trust estate of John Hiatt; and in all the reports in the Jamaica suit of the transactions of the receivers in relation to the Fellowship Hall estate (which reports were not made up, filed, or confirmed until all the parties there had been served with the usual notices, giving them ample time to make objections thereto), the following statement is contained as to the Fellowship Hall estate: "One moiety being the property of the trust estate of John Hiatt, and the other moiety held by the said receivers for the said trust estate, at an annual rent of 400*l*." Towards the close of the year 1837 an agreement was come to between the receivers and the attorneys of the appellants that the receivers should continue to pay the rent of 400*l*. a-year, in respect of the Byndloss moiety, from June 1835, until either the terms of a new lease should be agreed on or the appellants should resume possession, subject to certain deductions not necessary to be here stated. No rent has been paid for the Byndloss moiety since June 1835. In September 1838, the appellants commenced an action in Jamaica against the receivers for the recovery of the rent then due, and obtained a verdict, and judgment was entered up in the action. But such proceedings being considered to be a contempt of the Court of Chancery, execution was not taken out; but two applications were made to the Court of Chancery in Jamaica by the appellants in the suit instituted there, for payment of rent, and to be let into possession of their moiety; and by an order of the Court of Chancery there, in January 1842, it was ordered that the appellants might enter into possession, and that rent at the rate of 400*l*. per annum should be paid from the 1st of June 1835 to the 31st of December 1839, (subject to a certain proviso); and that a proper compensation, to be ascertained by the Master, should be paid for the use and occupation of the Byndloss moiety since the 31st of December 1839. Owing to the neglect and mismanagement of the receivers in Jamaica, the Fellowship Hall estate, at the date of the Master's report, which I shall presently mention, was in a state of utter ruin, although at the date of the lease it was in excellent condition, but the amount of the dilapidations has not been ascertained. The appellants were let into possession in June 1842. But the rent from June 1835 is still due, and there appears to be no fund standing to the credit of the cause in Jamaica; and the Master has certified his opinion to be, that it is impracticable for the appellants to recover in Jamaica any part of the amount due to them in respect of their moiety of the Fellowship Hall estate. There are now standing to the credit of the cause in this Court two sums, arising from the produce of the Fellowship Hall estate, and from compensation money in respect of slaves on the estate of John Hiatt. In June 1845, the appellants presented their petition to this Court, praying that a certain agreement for a compromise might be carried into effect, or for an inquiry as to what was due to them in respect of the matters aforesaid from the estate of John Hiatt, and that the amount thereof might be paid to them out of the fund standing to the credit of the cause; and thereupon an order was made for a reference to inquire whether any and what sum paid into the Bank to the credit of this cause by J. H. Palmer had been paid in respect of the produce and profits derived since the 1st of June 1835 from the Byndloss moiety of the Fellowship Hall estate. On the 13th of July 1849, the Master made his report, to which I have already alluded, whereby he certified to the effect of what I have stated, and that 2,800*l.* was due to the appellants, with interest at 6*l.* per cent. for rent, without including anything for dilapidations, the amount of which was not ascertained by him. No exceptions have been taken to this report. In July 1849, the appellants presented another petition in this cause, praying for payment of the sum so found due; and that the sum of 2,600*l.* claimed by them for dilapidations might also be paid, or that it might be referred to the Master to inquire what ought to be allowed in respect of such dilapidations; and by an order made thereon, the said sum of 2,800*l.* was ordered to be paid, with interest thereon at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. from the 1st of December 1846. The petitioners have appealed from the order made on their petition, on the ground that the same does not provide for or extend to the whole of the relief prayed by their petition; while the respondents contend that the order in question goes too far.

It being perfectly clear, from what the Master has found, that the Byndloss moiety of the Fellowship Hall estate has, from the time when John Pink took the lease of June 1830 down to the time when possession was delivered up to the appellants, been occupied in trust for John Hiatt's estate, the only question that is necessary to be determined as preliminary to the decision of the present case is this—was that occupation authorized by the will of John Hiatt? or, if not, was it sanctioned by the Court, so as to bind the parties interested in the trust estate of John Hiatt? His will contained no power to take a lease of the Byndloss moiety, and the taking the lease was a speculation not authorized by the general power of management conferred by the will. Still, when I consider that the occupation of the Byndloss moiety was, in itself, a fair transaction, and one which appears, from what the Master has found, to be beneficial to the trust estate of John Hiatt; that it was entered into by the receivers, who are the officers of the Court; that the parties not under disability were apprised of and acquiesced in it; that it was never opposed on behalf of any of the parties who were under disability; that it was in a manner sanctioned by the Court of Chancery in Jamaica, in a suit which was ancillary to a suit in this Court, I am of opinion that the transaction is binding on the parties interested in the trust estate. Such being the case, I think that the order made by the Vice Chancellor as to the rent was right.

But, upon the same principle, I think he should also have given relief in respect of the dilapidations. There was a covenant in the lease to keep the estate in the same cultivation, order, repair, state and condition; and the intended second lease was to be like the first, except as regards the amount; and I conceive that a continued obligation on the part of the receivers to keep up the estate must be implied, and that it would be contrary to common honesty to allow the appellants to suffer so enormous a loss through the neglect and mismanagement of the receivers. If the persons interested in the trust estate must, for the reasons I have stated, be held responsible for the acts of the receivers in regard to the rent, I consider they must be equally responsible in regard to the dilapidations. There must, therefore, be a reference to the Master to ascertain the amount of dilapidations.

It has been objected that the Master went beyond the terms of the reference. With respect to this, I think that the reference in the first order ought to have been in terms as general as those which are contained in the prayer of the first petition. But I consider that the liberty to state special circumstances authorized him in making the statements he has made. Indeed, to restrict the Master to special circumstances, relating to the precise subject of the specific inquiry, would be, in many cases, needlessly to prevent him from stating circumstances essential to the due administration of justice, and would, in fact, nullify the design of the Court in inserting such words in a decree.

KEKEWICH v. MANNING.

Voluntary Settlement—Contract—Assignment of Equitable Reversionary Interest—Trustee and Cestui que Trust—Notice of Settlement—Complete Alienation.

*Stock was standing in the names of A. and B, mother and daughter, as trustees for A. for life, remainder for B. absolutely. B, in contemplation of marriage, assigned her interest, subject to A.'s life interest, to trustees, upon trust for the benefit of herself and her intended husband, for life, and then upon trusts for the issue of the marriage, and for C, a niece of B, and her issue, as B. should appoint, and in default of appointment, among them equally. And it was provided that, if there should be no issue of the marriage, or none who should attain a vested interest, then as to 5,000*l., part of the fund, *and 600*l.* long annuities, subject to a life estate, the same should be in trust for C. absolutely, to be vested at twenty-one. A. had notice of the settlement, but was not a party to it. No transfer of the fund was made. The marriage was solemnized, but no issue was born, and the husband died. B. contracted a second marriage, and in contemplation of it she assigned her interest, subject to A.'s life interest, to trustees upon trusts for her benefit for life, and then upon trusts for C. (the niece) and the issue of the second marriage, as she (B.) should appoint by will, and in default of appointment among the issue of the marriage equally, and in default of issue, as to 5,000*l.*, part of the fund, for C. absolutely. No transfer of the fund was made. The marriage was solemnized, and one child was born, and then the second husband died. A, the mother, the original tenant for life, then died, and the fund was still standing in the names of A. and B. C, the niece, married, and a suit was instituted by the trustees of the first settlement, and by C, and her husband, against B, the trustee of the second settlement, and the child of the second marriage, praying a transfer of 5,000*l.* to the trustees of the first settlement, and an injunction to restrain the transfer of the fund by B. to the trustees of the second settlement. The bill was dismissed in the court below; but on appeal,—Held, that, whether or not the first settlement was voluntary (which the Court did not decide) as to the trusts in favour of C, the niece, still it was a complete alienation of the fund by B, and the decree below was reversed, a transfer being directed as prayed.*

This case came on upon appeal from a decree of the late Vice Chancellor Sir James Wigram. Mr. Robert Kekewich, by his will, dated in 1822, bequeathed certain stocks, consisting of 10,500*l.* new 3*l.* 10*s.* per cents. and 500*l.* long annuities, to his wife Elizabeth Kekewich and his daughter, Susannah Kekewich, upon trust for his wife for life, and after her death in trust for his daughter absolutely, and he appointed them executrices. The testator died; they proved the will, and the funds were transferred into their names, and so they remained down to the institution of the suit and after the mother's death. In 1834, Miss Kekewich, being about to marry Sir Henry Maturin Farrington, assigned (with his assent) "all that the said capital sum of 10,500*l.*, new 3*l.* 10*s.* Bank annuities, and also all that the said annual sum of 500*l.*, long annuities, to which respectively the said Susannah Kekewich is entitled as aforesaid (subject to such life interest therein of the said Elizabeth Kekewich as aforesaid), and all the funds in which the same may from time to time be invested," &c., unto Mr. Charles, Mr. Samuel I., and Mr. George G. Kekewich, with a full power of attorney, and with a direction that all persons in whom the stock might be vested at the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Kekewich should forthwith on her decease transfer the same to the before-named trustees, to be held by them upon the trusts of the settlement. The trusts were declared to be for Miss Kekewich until the marriage, and afterwards for her for life, for her separate use; and after her decease, if Sir Henry should survive her, then the long annuities were to be held in trust for him for his life; and after the decease of the survivor, then both funds were to be held upon such trusts as she should appoint, for the benefit of Miss Bradney, her niece, and the children of the intended marriage, and of the issue of Miss Bradney, and of the issue of the children of the intended marriage, and in default of appointment, in trust for Miss Bradney and the children of the intended marriage equally as tenants in common. The settlement contained this proviso, "Provided always, and it is hereby expressly declared by and between the said parties to these presents, that in case there shall be no child or children of the said intended marriage, or, there being such, all of them shall happen to die before his, her, or their share and interest under the provisions hereinbefore contained shall have become vested as aforesaid, then immediately after the decease of the said Susannah Kekewich (notwithstanding all or any of the trusts, powers, provisoes, and declarations hereinbefore expressed and declared), the said capital sum of 10,500*l.* new 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent. annuities, and the said 500*l.* per annum long annuities (subject, nevertheless, as to the said 500*l.* per annum long annuities to the interest therein of the said

Sir Henry Maturin Farrington for his life as aforesaid), and the several dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof respectively shall be upon the trusts and for the ends, intents, and purposes herein-after expressed and declared, (that is to say,) as to, for, and concerning the said 500*l.* long annuities (subject to the interest for life therein of the said Sir Henry Maturin Farrington as aforesaid), and also as to the capital sum of 5,000*l.* stock, part of the said capital stock of 10,500*l.* new 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent. annuities, and the dividends, interest, and proceeds thereof, the same respectively, immediately upon the decease of the said Susannah Kekewich, shall be upon trust for the said Elizabeth Frances Bradney, for her own benefit, and become vested in her on her attaining the age of twenty-one years, but not to be payable or transferable until after the decease of the said Susannah Kekewich."

The remainder of the funds were settled, in the above-mentioned events, upon such trusts as Miss Kekewich should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for her next-of-kin.

The marriage was solemnized, and Sir H. Farrington soon afterwards died, and there was no child. Mrs. Kekewich had notice of the settlement, but no transfer was made of the funds into the names of the trustees of the settlement, and it did not appear that any application was ever made to Mrs. Kekewich to make such a transfer. In 1838, Lady Farrington married Mr. Manning, and in contemplation of that event, by deed dated in June in that year, she assigned the funds to Mr. George Manning and another person, as trustees, upon trust after her decease, for such of them, Miss Bradney, and the children of the then intended marriage, as she (Lady Farrington) should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for the children of the marriage equally; and if there should be no children, as to 5,000*l.*, part of the reduced annuities, in trust for Miss Bradney, if she should survive Lady Farrington. Of this second marriage there was issue one child; and the second husband died in 1844. Mrs. Kekewich, the original tenant for life, the mother of Lady Farrington, died in 1847. No transfer was ever made of the funds, and the same, after Mrs. Kekewich's death, remained in the names of that lady and of Lady Farrington.

Miss Bradney married Mr. Bailward, and those persons and the Messrs. Kekewich, the trustees of the settlement of 1834, filed a bill against Mr. George Manning and the other trustee of the settlement of 1838, and against Lady Farrington and her child by the second marriage, praying that Lady Farrington might be ordered to transfer the whole funds (or 5,000*l.*, part thereof, and the long annuities) into the names of the Messrs. Kekewich, the trustees of the settlement of 1834, upon the trusts thereof, and that such trusts might be executed under the direction of the Court, and that Lady Farrington might be restrained from transferring the funds into the names of Mr. George Manning and the other trustee of the settlement of 1838, or of any persons other than the plaintiffs.

The defendants by their answer insisted on the validity of the settlement of 1838, for that Lady Farrington had power to make the same, notwithstanding that of 1834.

The cause was heard before Sir James Wigram, who dismissed the plaintiffs' bill with costs, from which decision they appealed.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Bazalgette, for the appeal.—Either the trust for Miss Bradney is founded on a marriage contract, or it is a complete gift if it be voluntary; and in either view it is good. In support of the trust, as resting on marriage contract, the following cases are in point:—

Marchington v. Vernon, 1 Bos. & P. 101, n.

Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft, 18 Ves. 84.

And besides these authorities, the rule relating to a marriage contract, that being a contract for value, is very clearly laid down by Lord Langdale in the case of Colyear v. Lady Mulgrave (1), where he says, "When two persons, for valuable consideration between themselves, covenant to do some act for the benefit of a mere stranger, that stranger has not a right to enforce the covenant against the other two, although each one might as against the other." The party suing in the present case is a party to the contract, and therefore plainly within the rule thus laid down. But should the Court consider that the trust is a voluntary one, still, voluntary though it be, it is a complete gift, for everything was done which was capable of being done, having regard to the subject-matter of the gift. Nothing was left undone of which the subject was susceptible, and to hold that in such circumstances the gift was ineffectual, would be in effect to declare that no such interest is capable of alienation except for a valuable consideration. The gift was complete, and the transmission of interest as full as in—

Mr. Kenyon Parker, for the trustees.

Mr. Metcalfe, for the respondents.—The answer to the case here is, as it was in the court below, that the plaintiffs are volunteers, and that the gift being incomplete, the Court will in nowise assist volunteers to enforce it. Miss Bradney, a niece only of the intended wife, cannot be considered as coming within the consideration of marriage so as to support a settlement of the property of the intended wife—Sutton v. Chetwynd (2), Cotterell v. Homer (3), and Davenport v. Bishopp. The transaction, besides being voluntary, is imperfect. No declaration of trust is in existence, and the legal estate is outstanding; and all that the plaintiffs can do is, to come for the aid of this Court to enforce the agreement, which is assistance the Court will not give. The settlement is not, either in form or substance, a declaration of trust; it is merely an assignment; and several cases have decided that an imperfect gift will not be converted into a trust—Holloway v. Headington (4), Dillon v. Coppin (5), Antrobus v. Smith (6), and Edwards v. Jones (7). Even in the case relied on by the appellants of Colyear v. Lady Mulgrave, the decision was against the voluntary deed; and the cases of Ward v. Audland (8) and Jefferys v. Jefferys (9) are decisive against the appellants' case.

(1) 2 Keen, 98.

(3) 13 Sim. 506.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—There is the case of Ellis v. Nimmo (10), before Sir Edward Sugden, when Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Is the argument this,—that the word "trust" or "confidence" must be used to create a trust?]

No; but some act must be done to shew the creation of the trust, and this is pointed out by Sir James Wigram in Meek v. Kettlewell (11); and among the observations of the same learned Judge in deciding the case now before the Court are reasons totally unanswered by the arguments for the appellants. He remarked, that in a case in which there are no means of transferring the property in law, and there is an agreement to transfer, it is admitted that, in the absence of consideration, the Court will not convert the voluntary agreement into a trust, and that therefore, if the person who has the property is called upon to transfer it, this Court will not enforce the demand. He also observed that, supposing the subject in dispute to be property which cannot be transferred at law by the act of the beneficial owner, and instead of there being an agreement to transfer, the transaction takes the form of an absolute assignment, still, if there be a want of consideration, and the deed of itself is inoperative as an assignment, then it is well settled that, in the absence of consideration, this Court does not distinguish the assignment in form from the agreement to assign. On the other hand, if there be a consideration, it is immaterial whether it be an agreement or an assignment. It is said by the appellants that here the parties have done all they can, and that, therefore, this Court will consider that they have effectually deprived themselves of the property. But that is not so, and the case of Edwards v. Jones is a distinct answer to such an argument. There the obligee of a bond, five days before his death, indorsed what was in form an assignment, and handed it over to the party to whom he wished to transfer it, yet the bond debt was held not to pass, the transaction being without consideration and incomplete. Then it is to be observed that, in the proper sense of the expression, it cannot be said that the trustee of the property was a party to the settlement, for although Lady Farrington was a party to the settlement, she was so not as trustee of the property but as a person beneficially interested, and the whole scope of that settlement is, that she assigned her interest in the property when it should fall into possession to trustees to be held by them upon certain trusts. If the mother and the daughter had accepted the trusts, then it might possibly have been reasonably argued that the transaction was complete.

These cases must now be considered as in effect no longer binding authorities—Beatson v. Beatson (12), Cokman v. Sarel (13), and Sugden's 'Vendors and Purchasers', 11th ed. 934, besides the cases of Meek v. Kettlewell and Edwards v. Jones, before cited.

Mr. Rolt, in reply.—The case of Edwards v. Jones, and others which have been relied on by the respondents, are not inconsistent with the appellants' case. All which those cases establish in favour of the respondents is, that where the property professed to be dealt with consists of a merely legal interest, an alienation of it which does not give a complete legal title will not be enforced in equity at the instance of a mere volunteer. Here, however, leaving out of view the marriage contract, and therefore the valuable consideration, the property was equitable, and the assignment of it was a complete alienation.

Dec. 5.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.

—The present case has raised, necessarily or unnecessarily, a question which, on several occasions, under different aspects, and in various circumstances, has been brought before this Court, especially since the time of Lord Hardwicke,—the question, namely, whether an act or intended act of bounty, whether a gift, or a promise, or intended gift, was in truth a perfect act, a completed gift, resting neither in promise merely nor merely in unfulfilled intention; or was incomplete, was imperfect, and rested merely in promise or unfulfilled intention. Generally, this question, when arising here, is very material. For as, upon one hand, it is, on legal and equitable principles, we apprehend, clear that a person sui juris, acting freely, fairly, and with sufficient knowledge, ought to have power and has it in his power to make, in a binding and effectual manner, a voluntary gift of any part of his property, whether capable or incapable of manual delivery, whether in possession or reversion, and howsoever circumstanced; so, on the other, it is as clear generally, if not universally, that a gratuitously expressed intention, a promise merely voluntary, or, to use a familiar phrase, nudum pactum, does not (the matter resting there) bind legally or equitably. I have been speaking of transactions without any sealed writing. But though it is true that, in cases where such an intention, such a promise, is expressed in a deed, it may bind generally at law as a covenant, by reason of the light in which the particular kind of instrument called a deed is regarded at law; yet in equity, where at least the covenantor is living, or where specific performance of such a covenant is sought, it stands scarcely, or not at all, on a better footing than if it were contained in an instrument unsealed. The rules and the distinction or distinctions between them are, in theory, plain and simple enough, but are sometimes found to be of difficult application practically; nor, considering the position and circumstances in many instances of property, on the decision of the title to which belongs this jurisdiction, ought one to be surprised if he should find here occasionally a case so near the boundary line separating the two main classes as to render it no light or easy task to say to which side of it the case belongs.

Such instances have occurred not very unfrequently. To state, however, a simple case: suppose stock or money to be legally vested in A. as a trustee for B. for life, and, subject to B.'s life interest, for C. absolutely; surely it must be competent to C. in B.'s lifetime, with or without the consent of A, to make an effectual gift of C.'s interest to D. by way of mere bounty, leaving the legal interest and legal title unchanged and untouched. Surely, it would not be consistent with natural equity or with reason or expediency to hold the contrary, C. being sui juris and acting freely, fairly, and with sufficient advice and knowledge. If so, can C. do this better or more effectually than by executing an assignment to D? It may possibly be thought necessary to the complete validity of such a transaction that notice should be given to A. Upon that we do not express an opinion. Suppose the case only varied by the fact that A. and C. are the trustees jointly instead of A. being so alone. Does that make any substantial difference as to C.'s power, the mode of making the gift, or the effect of the act, C. not severing nor affecting the legal joint tenancy? C. would necessarily have notice. Possibly it may be thought material that A. should have notice likewise; but upon that we avoid saying anything beyond referring to Meux v. Bell (14), and to Smith v. Smith, mentioned in Meux v. Bell. It is probably, or certainly, in some instances, the course of this jurisdiction to decline acting at the suit of those whom it terms "volunteers," though within that description a person claiming directly and merely under a gratuitous promise, oral or not under seal, which is nudum pactum, may be thought perhaps hardly to come, for such a person has, in effect, had no promise at all. In effect, no contract has been made with him. But whatever rule there may be against "volunteers," it does not apply to the case of one who, in the language of this Court, is termed a cestui que trust claiming against his trustee. For that which is considered by this jurisdiction a trust may certainly be created gratuitously. So that the absence of consideration for its creation is, in general, absolutely immaterial.

To this doctrine Lord Eldon often referred. He did so especially in Ellison v. Ellison, Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft and Ex parte Pye; in which two latter cases his language is sufficient to correct any erroneous notion of his views which some part of his judgment in Ellison v. Ellison narrowly construed might possibly in some minds create. Ellison v. Ellison is among the valuable and instructive cases, various in kind, in manner, and in number, which we owe to the great learning, great carefulness, and great powers of that most distinguished man. With reference to the present litigation it is of the utmost importance. The necessity of sparing time as much as reasonably possible, and the recollection that probably every member of this bar is familiar with the report, alone prevent me from reading it now throughout. Let the report, however, be considered as read, and let it be particularly borne in mind that when Mr. Ellison executed the deed of the 18th of June 1796, he had an equitable interest, and only an equitable interest, in the property wholly personal, but partly moveable and partly immoveable, which was the subject of the deed; that the legal interest became afterwards, and probably at his own request, vested in him by means of the indenture of the 3rd of July 1797, which seems not to have taken notice of the deed of 1796, but to have been just such an instrument as would have been proper if the deed of 1796 had never existed; that the trustee of the property before, and independently of the deed of 1796, was the trustee of the deed of 1796 and the assignor of 1797; that whether this trustee, who had died before this suit, had notice of the deed of 1796 previously to his execution of the deed of 1797, or perhaps even in Mr. Ellison's lifetime, does not appear clearly, or does not appear at all, and that the deed of 1796 was, after Mr. Ellison's death, enforced against his residuary legatees, at the instance, I agree, of the plaintiffs, of whom one was Mr. Ellison's executrix. The decision, however, seems not to have turned in any degree on that circumstance, but would, it is our clear impression, have been the same had the parties to the suit been reversed, or had the eldest son been the plaintiff alone. Some years afterwards occurred Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft and Ex parte Pye. In the former of these, Lord Eldon,—after saying of Lord Thurlow, "I must take his opinion to have been, as I believe it was, that with a mere voluntary settlement this Court has nothing to do,"—used this language, "The distinction is settled that in the case of a contract merely voluntary (I do not speak of valuable or meritorious consideration) this Court will do nothing; but if it does not rest in voluntary agreement, but an actual trust is created, the Court does take jurisdiction." And in Ex parte Pye it is said by the same authority, "The other question involves not only the construction of the French law, and the point whether that has been sufficiently investigated, but farther, whether the power of attorney amounts here to a declaration of trust. It is clear that this Court will not assist a volunteer, yet if the act is completed, though voluntary, the Court will act upon it. It has been decided that, upon an agreement to transfer stock, this Court will not interpose; but if the party had declared himself to be the trustee of that stock, it becomes the property of the cestui que trust without more, and the Court will act upon it."

The case of Cadogan v. Sloane (commonly called Sloane v. Cadogan), the nature and effect of which the profession know from a valuable note in one of Sir Edward Sugden's works, and which we have examined in the Registrar's book, is a decision also of great weight. The plaintiff there was the widow and executrix of Mr. William Bromley Cadogan. The defendants were the surviving trustees of the original settlement of 1747, and the executors of Lord Cadogan, of whom the trustee was one. It does not, we believe, appear that in Cadogan v. Sloane any point was, if any could have been, made as to notice or the absence of notice, or as to the absence of the legal title. It is observable, however, that Sir Edward Sugden, in arguing the case, said, "here Mr. Cadogan did all he could, but that is not enough." Sir Edward Sugden was certainly as unlikely as any man could be to omit any view or suggestion possibly favourable to the side on which he was counsel, although, I think that I have heard him say, it was the first case he ever argued in court, and there were other counsel of great consideration on the same side. Perhaps Cadogan v. Sloane could not have been decided, as to the point of gift or trust, otherwise than it was, without contravening Ellison v. Ellison or Antrobus v. Smith, which was near the time of Cadogan v. Sloane; but we think before it. There there were very particular circumstances. The property seems to have been Scotch, and although, possibly, the legal title might have been rightfully and effectually changed by Mr. Crawford at his pleasure, he seems not to have so acted, but seems to have retained it. Sir William Grant, who appears to have dismissed the bill on the ground that Mr. Crawford was not, at his death, a trustee for Mr. and Mrs. Antrobus, upon the particular facts and in the particular circumstances of the case, did not, in our opinion, mean to do or say anything of a nature with which that eminent Judge's decision or language in Cadogan v. Sloane was at variance. In our view, Cadogan v. Sloane is entirely consistent with the decision in Antrobus v. Smith; but if it is not, we think Cadogan v. Sloane the preferable and more correct decision, subject only to the question, if any, of notice. In an earlier case, Colman v. Sarel (of which the turpis contractus or turpis causa was sufficient to dispose), the alleged donor, George Davy, had, as probably Mr. Crawford in Antrobus v. Smith had, the power and right of varying and transferring the legal title, but did not do so; nor did George Davy, we believe, make use of the term "confidence" or "trust" or the word "trustee,"—circumstances to which attention was due, but which perhaps were not of themselves decisive. We do not know, certainly, that if a man, entitled beneficially to the absolute interest in stock standing in his name, should deliberately and advisedly execute a deed declaring himself a trustee of the stock for certain purposes, to take effect immediately, and should communicate and deliver the deed to the cestuis que trust, or any one of them, this Court would decline to enforce the trusts against their author, because he executed the deed, though fairly and advisedly, yet voluntarily, that is to say, without consideration. Nor do we agree that an instrument may not be effectual as a declaration of trust, or tantamount to a declaration of trust, although it contains not the word "confidence," the word "trust," or the word "trustee"; and this we should have said even if Lord Eldon had not, in Ex parte Pye, expressed himself, and acted as he did, with respect to the French annuity there in question. In the recent case of Edwards v. Jones, however, the subject of the alleged gift, a bond debt, was from its nature incapable of being legally assigned, incapable of being transferred at law. Notice, certainly, of the assignment does not appear to have been given to the daughter, though whether that circumstance was material or immaterial the decision seems not to have proceeded upon it, and was against the alleged gift. But Fortescue v. Barnett, decided by Sir John Leach, Wheatley v. Purrr, by Lord Langdale, and Blakely v. Brady (15), by Lord Plunket, have, without question, followed Cadogan v. Sloane, and, if it could require support, supported it.

Having, with my learned Brother's concurrence, made these remarks, on his behalf as well as my own, I proceed to the particular circumstances of the case before the Court. [His Lordship, in this detail, observed that Mrs. Elizabeth Kekewick and her daughter held the funds as trustees for their own benefit, and had, therefore, between them as well the whole beneficial as the whole legal interest: that Mrs. Kekewick, contemporaneously with the settlement of 1834, or, at least, in Sir H. Farrington's lifetime, had notice of it: that upon her death the legal title to the Bank annuities became vested in her daughter, and so remained to the present time; and that the dealings of the daughter with the funds by the deed of 1838 could have effect, if at all, only as to the equitable title; and further, that the mother could not have been rightfully or effectually required to make or join in a transfer of the funds to the trustees of the settlement of 1834, or to affect in any way her legal or equitable title in favour or in consequence of that settlement.] Why, then, should the gift (if that is a proper term) be considered inchoate, unknown, or incomplete, or as resting merely in promise? What more could have been done which was within the power or competency of Sir Henry or Lady Farrington to do or enforce? Was it to depend on the pleasure of the mother whether the daughter should be able to give away her own property or not? Can a trustee, by saying, "I refuse to accept a trusteeship for the new claimant to a participation in the beneficial interest whom you, my cestui que trust, have introduced or have endeavoured to introduce,—I will object to the claim and oppose it,—I will not deal with the legal title nor shall you,"—can a trustee, we repeat, by thus saying and thus acting, prevent the cestui que trust from making an effectual gift of his interest in the trust property or any part of it? Surely not. It may be said, and perhaps truly, that not only did Mrs. Elizabeth Kekewich never make or join in a transfer, or declare herself a trustee for the purposes of the settlement of 1834, subject or not subject to her life interest already mentioned; or (so subject or not so subject) accept the trusteeship for those purposes, or consent to be a trustee either for the trustees of that settlement in that character or for Mrs. Bailward; but that no request having any such object was ever made, and that it is unknown and inconjecturable what Mrs. Elizabeth Kekewich would have done had any such request or any such application been made to her. This was, I think, immaterial; how the case would have stood if she had not had notice of the settlement in Sir Henry Farrington's lifetime, or if she had not had any beneficial interest in the funds, but had merely been a trustee of them for Lady Farrington, or if before the marriage Lady Farrington had survived her mother, it is altogether unnecessary for us to pronounce any opinion, and we decline doing so.

It has been said that there is not to be found any express declaration, or express direction, or express contract, that the trustees of the fund, namely, Lady Farrington and her mother, should have or hold the funds as trustees for them, for the purposes of the settlement of 1834 or for the trustees of it, in that character, subject or not subject to Mrs. Elizabeth Kekewich's life interest. Whether this observation is correct in point of verbal accuracy or not, we think it of no weight, being, as we are, of opinion that it is, upon all the language of the settlement of 1834 taken together, for every purpose, of equal efficacy and value with the formal and plain declaration of the most explicit kind, on the part of Sir Henry Farrington and Lady Farrington that she and her mother should, subject to the life interest already mentioned of the latter, stand possessed of the funds in trust for the purpose of that settlement, or for the trustees of it in that character.—[His Lordship said they did not attribute essential importance to the clause directing the trustees in whom the funds should be vested at the death of the mother to transfer them to the trustees of the deed of 1834, though it was not to be disregarded, and was to be considered as especially unfavourable to a portion of the defendants' argument.]—We consider the plaintiffs entitled to a decree, but this is on the assumption that we are not precluded by authority from acting on our opinion of what is right. Are we then so precluded? The plaintiffs, of course, contend that we are not; the defendants, that we are.

The cases of Ellison v. Ellison, Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft and Ex parte Pye appear to us, not merely to contain no doctrine opposed to the plaintiffs', but to be in their favour. Not only do we not question anything said in either of those cases by Lord Eldon, but we are persuaded that had the present cause come before him, he would have decided it against the defendants. Of Antrobus v. Smith we need say no more than has already been said. As to Wheatley v. Parr, the report of which has 1835 for 1825, and seemingly an incorrect marginal note, the author of the trust could have transferred the legal title but appears not to have done so. Lord Langdale, nevertheless, established the trust there. That case and those of Cadogan v. Sloane, Fortescue v. Barnett, Blake- ley v. Brady are, in our opinion, direct and clear authorities for the plaintiffs; but other authorities cited during the argument, and especially Edwards v. Jones and Meek v. Kettlewell, are said to be strongly opposed to their title to relief; whether any or all of these authorities, and particularly whether Colman v. Sarel, Colyear v. Lady Mulgrave, Ward v. Audland, Holloway v. Headington, Dillon v. Coppin, Jeffreys v. Jeffreys, Godsal v. Webb (16), James v. Bydder, Beatson v. Beatson, Bayley v. Boulcott (17), Tufnell v. Constable (18), Gaskell v. Gaskell (19), Farquharson v. Cave (20), Edwards v. Jones and Meek v. Kettlewell, or any one or more of them, ought in our opinion to be considered as contravening or contravened by Ellison v. Ellison, Cadogan v. Sloane, Fortescue v. Barnett, Wheatley v. Purrr or Blakely v. Brady, or as opposed to the plaintiffs' title to relief we think it unnecessary to say; for assuming that contravention, assuming that opposition, we think, nevertheless, that Ellison v. Ellison, Cadogan v. Sloane, Fortescue v. Barnett, Wheatley v. Purrr and Blakely v. Brady support, and are authorities for the plaintiffs' claim, and that we are justified in following the five cases so far at least as is necessary for the purpose of giving effect to it, circumstanced as it is,—and we do so accordingly. In this we are certainly differing from the very able, learned, and careful Judge before whom the suit originally came. He, however, in the particular station which he judiciously filled with so much advantage to the country, may have considered himself placed in a position with respect to former decisions in which we do not consider ourselves to be.

Hitherto, it will have been observed that I have treated the plaintiffs as being what are commonly called in equity volunteers, as persons claiming under a trust created without consideration, and by the mere bounty of Lady Farrington—but is the true view of the case so? The plaintiffs relying little, or not at all, on the relationship of Mrs. Bailward to Lady Farrington, and to her father, insist that the participation of Sir Henry Farrington in the settlement of 1834 precludes any effectual contention that Mrs. Bailward is a mere volunteer. The plaintiffs say that Sir Henry Farrington stipulated and contracted as much for the provision under which Mr. and Mrs. Bailward claim as for any other part of the provisions of the settlement of 1834, although she is not proved to have been related to Sir Henry Farrington, and though probably his only acquaintance with her, if any, and his only interest in her, if any, were through his intended wife; and that even if with the consent of Sir Henry Farrington, or a personal representative of that gentleman, any part of the trusts or purposes of the deed might have been or could be varied or disappointed, there can, without that consent, be no such variation, no such disappointment (21). We think this contention on the plaintiffs' part not by any means unworthy of attention. How do we know that Sir Henry Farrington did not take a strong interest in the welfare of Mrs. Bailward? How do we know that he did not believe in the existence of a moral obligation on the part of Miss Kekewich, in the circumstances of the case, to make a provision for her niece? How do we know that he would have concurred in any settlement not making a provision for Mrs. Bailward? How do we know that if he had refused to concur in a settlement the marriage would have taken place? How could it be known that he would not survive his wife? How is it clear that he was indifferent to her state of freedom as to property after his death if she should survive him, or to her marrying a second time, or the consequence of that step? Were it, in our opinion, necessary to decide this point, we should probably first deem it prudent to consult various authorities from Goring v. Nash, or earlier, down to Davenport v. Bishop, but we do not consider it necessary. We dispose of the cause on the other view of it, that into which we have more fully entered; we

March 11. } ANDERSON v. NOBLE.

Injunction—Proceedings at Law.

The plaintiff had obtained the common injunction to stay execution in an action on the same day that the action was tried, but before the verdict was given against him :—Held, upon motion by the defendant before answer, that the plaintiff must pay the amount for which judgment had been signed into court within a specified time, or the injunction must be dissolved.

This was a motion, on behalf of the defendant, that the plaintiff might be at liberty within three weeks to pay into the Bank of England to the credit of this cause the sum of 3,086*l.* 10*s.*, being the amount for which judgment had been signed in an action against the plaintiff, and that in default of such payment within the time aforesaid, the injunction issued in this cause might be dissolved. The bill stated that the plaintiff, James Anderson, prior to the year 1841, and for some time afterwards, carried on business as a merchant at Sydney, and in the course of his business had employed the defendant, Robert Noble, who was a merchant at Halifax, as his agent; that the said Robert Noble had claimed a large sum of money to be due to him in respect of such commission, which the plaintiff declined to pay, on the ground that a larger sum had been charged for commission than was fairly due to the defendant; that the defendant had thereupon brought an action against the plaintiff for 2,240*l.*, the sum alleged to be due to him as such agent; that in consequence of the refusal of the defendant to produce his books, papers, &c. the plaintiff was unable to prove, what was the truth, that there was a much smaller sum due to the defendant than was alleged. The bill therefore prayed that an account might be taken, under the direction of the Court, of all the dealings and transactions between the plaintiff and the defendant; and that the defendant might be restrained from further prosecuting the said action at law against the plaintiff.

From the affidavit of J. E. Bee, the clerk to the defendant's solicitors, it appeared that the action against the plaintiff was commenced on the 6th of October 1849; that the trial of the said action had been delayed from time to time by the plaintiff, upon various applications for commissions to examine witnesses at San Francisco, most of which had been refused by the Judges before whom the applications were made, on the ground that they were intended only for the purpose of delay; that the cause at last came on for trial on the 19th of January 1852, the day on which this bill was filed, when a verdict was given for the defendant, Robert Noble (the plaintiff in the action), for 2,881*l.*; that the costs of the said action had been taxed at the sum of 205*l.* 10*s.* making, with the sum of 2,881*l.*, a total of 3,086*l.* 10*s.* debt and costs, for which judgment had been signed and execution issued previously to the granting of the injunction in this cause. The affidavit further stated the deponent's belief that the plaintiff's object in instituting this suit and obtaining the injunction was solely to delay the defendant in the recovery of his debt and costs in the action, and that the answer of the defendant, including a statement of all the accounts required by the bill, could not be put in for three or four months, having regard to the course of post between this country and Halifax, where the defendant resided, and the deponent believed that the said debt and costs would be endangered by the continuance of the injunction.

Mr. Cairns, in support of the motion, contended that the defendant was entitled to have the money paid into court or to have the injunction dissolved. The plaintiff had done all he could to delay the trial of the action, and then, on the very day when a verdict was obtained by the defendant (the plaintiff at law), he filed this bill in order to delay payment until the defendant should put in his answer, and being abroad he could not do so for a considerable time. The following cases were cited—

Acton v. Market, 2 Bro. C.C. 14.

Wesket v. Carnevali, Ibid. 182, note.

Coglan v. Requeneau, Ibid.

Potts v. Butler, Ibid.

Mr. Roxburgh, contra, submitted that as the injunction had been obtained before the verdict at law, it could only be dissolved in the usual way, after the answer had been put in. The cases cited had reference only to where the injunction was obtained after verdict, and did not apply to this case. There had, moreover, been ample time since the bill was filed for the defendant to put in his answer, and to have come to the Court upon the answer to dissolve the injunction, and the defendant might have sent over his invoices and books. There had not even been an affidavit made by the defendant in Halifax to deny the charges in the bill. If that had been done there might have been some ground for the motion, but the only affidavit was made by the solicitor's clerk, who could know nothing of the merits of the case.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I really have no doubt about the case whatever. In the ordinary course, if a person brings an action at law against another, the defendant has a right to file a bill for an account in this court, and certainly this Court has jurisdiction in matters of account where the action is brought to recover that which is the result of an account between the parties, and it is much more convenient to adopt the machinery of a court of equity in taking the account. The party says—“I ask the Court to give me an injunction to restrain the proceedings in the action; that is to say, to restrain execution in the action (for that is all the common injunction restrains), until an account has been taken.” Moreover, he can apply to stay trial until the defendant has put in his answer, in order that when the trial does take place, the execution will still be restrained. The defendant at law will have the benefit of the answer put in; that is, the discovery which he will get by the putting in of that answer. That is the common course, and then the defendant in equity, wishing to dissolve that common injunction, must put in his answer; and when the answer is a full answer, he must obtain a common order nisi, in the first instance, to dissolve the common injunction, and after a certain fixed time, unless cause be shewn, he will get that order absolute.

Long ago it was felt, that where the plaintiff in an action at law resided abroad, the defendant at law availed himself of that in order to delay the recovery of what he felt to be a just debt, coming to the Court with a bill after verdict (for I will take that course first), after he has taken all the advantage of the defence which he could make at the trial; and then observe, you have no right to move to dissolve this injunction unless you have put in your answer; and as you are abroad, he may say, “I know you cannot put in your answer for some considerable time.” The Courts early saw the mischief arising from that, and in those cases which have been referred to, all of which appear to me to be cases in which prima facie, at least, it was after verdict that the bill was filed, the Courts said just this in substance—“When you are filing your bill against a plaintiff at law who is resident abroad, and you are asking to substitute service of the subpoena by serving it on the attorney in the action at law, you must have an affidavit of merits; you shall not have a right to substitute service; you are to go through the form of serving him, if you can.” Moreover, the Court felt that that was not enough, but that where the defendant at law (the plaintiff in equity) has got the common injunction, the defendant being abroad can apply to this Court to have the money brought in or let the injunction be dissolved; and the mischief intended to be cured by that practice, introduced above a century ago, was an obvious mischief, which, no doubt, became very frequent, and which would still exist as a gross abuse of the justice of the country—a gross abuse of the law of this Court—were the Court not to exercise such a jurisdiction. And that that is the practice still there can be no doubt, although the cases on the subject are only of ancient date. But if there are no modern cases in which the Court has exercised its jurisdiction, are there any modern cases in which the Court has refused? And what is the use of a reporter multiplying cases upon that which is the well-known A B C practice of the Court? In those cases decided by Lord Thurlow and the other Judges, I have no doubt that the practice is such, and that it will still be enforced without the slightest hesitation. If such be not the established practice, it is high time that such a practice were introduced, for the want of it would enable the grossest abuse of justice to be perpetrated under the forms and appearance of justice.

Now, then, let us look at the facts in the particular case in question. The bill was filed not after verdict, at least there is nothing to shew conclusively that it was after verdict; but the bill was filed on the same day that the trial took place. And now let us see under what circumstances. The action was brought as far back as the 6th of October. The summons was then delivered in the action, and the declaration was delivered on the 3rd of November; so that, from the time of the 3rd of November 1849, down to the time when the action was tried, on the 19th of January 1852, during all that time, the plaintiff in equity (the defendant at law) well knew what defence he could make; he perfectly well knew what the case was that he was to meet when he came to the action, and he did undertake the defence of the action. Pleas were put in, issues joined in the month of February 1850; and then what took place from the time when the issue was joined in the month of February 1850, down to the time of the trial in January 1852? First of all, the defendant at law obtained a commission to examine witnesses at San Francisco, and that, of course, he was entitled to do. That was obtained on the 13th of April 1850, and then we find that a copy of the interrogatories was delivered a month afterwards, on the 13th of May; and nearly two months after that again, that is, nearly three months after the order for the commission was obtained, further interrogatories were delivered on the 9th of July 1850.

In the mean time, the plaintiff at law, on whom the onus of proving every item in the account lay, obtained the commission to examine witnesses at Halifax; that is, on the 31st of February 1850. The interrogatories were handed over, I think, on the same day, but, at all events, very shortly afterwards, and on that day, an application is made to the defendant to know whether he means to cross-examine the witnesses. On the 4th of June, he writes to say that he declines generally to cross-examine the witnesses. That commission was executed and delivered in October 1850. Now, what was done with the commission to San Francisco, in California, does not appear; or whether the defendant who obtained it abandoned it, I do not know; but on the 10th of January 1851, that is to say, nine months after obtaining the first commission to San Francisco, he applied for and obtained a second commission to San Francisco, as I understand, to examine another witness there, and the interrogatories were handed over on the 30th of January; and from the 30th of January down to the month of November there is what I may call a total blank as to what was being done with respect to that commission, or whether it was ever attempted to be prosecuted at all. At length, on the 21st of November 1851, that is, a period of rather more than two years after the declaration was delivered in the action, notice of trial was given. A few days after that notice of trial was given, on the 25th of November, the defendant at law took out a summons—for what? Why, at the end of two years, he took out a summons for leave to inspect Noble's documents; that is, books of account, invoices, and so on, at Halifax, and praying that all proceedings might be stayed in the mean time. The Judges, no doubt, felt and saw that all this was for the purpose of delay, and that if he wanted it he should have done it at least two years before, and they refused the application, and, as I think, most justly refused it. But not satisfied with that, on the 28th of November, the defendant at law took out another summons for leave to examine Mr. Noble upon interrogatories, and that was heard on the 6th of December, and the Judge

there, no doubt, felt that it was for delay, and that if what was asked for had been wanted, it ought to have been applied for before, as there had been ample opportunity, and he refused that application with costs, also. But again, not satisfied with that, the defendant at law took out another summons—to do what? To put off the trial until the return of his commission to San Francisco, the first having been issued on the 13th of April 1850 and the second on the 10th of January 1851. Instead of endeavouring to support that summons when it was tendered, on the 1st of December, it was abandoned; so that the defendant at law did either not want to have his commission (for, at all events, he might have got it returned), or he did not wish now to put off the trial on the ground that his commission was not returned from San Francisco. Upon the 9th of December the cause was called on, and it would then have been heard, but from the absence of counsel it was postponed. Then the defendant at law takes an advantage again of that postponement; and he takes out a new summons for a commission to examine Mr. Noble on interrogatories at Halifax. That came on to be heard on the 3rd of December 1851, and it was dismissed, with costs. Upon the 9th of January 1852 notice of trial was a second time given. Then, on that same day, the defendant at law (certainly leaving no stone unturned to prevent the thing from being brought to a conclusion) applied to the full court of law, upon a notice of motion, to examine Mr. Noble on interrogatories. The Court, on the 12th, when it was heard, refused the application again, as I understand, and expressed its opinion, in which I entirely concur, that all these applications were simply for the purpose of delay. On the 19th the cause came on to be tried, and a verdict was obtained, the plaintiff having proved his case; having proved it by the evidence of witnesses whom the defendant had refused to cross-examine; and a verdict was given for the plaintiff. On that same 19th he applies for leave, on an affidavit made according to the requisitions and the practice of this Court—an application made to this Court, and granted of course on such an affidavit as contained the requisite statement of facts. So rapid were the defendant's motions there, that on that same day on which the trial took place he filed his bill, he got his affidavit filed, and an office copy of the affidavit, (at least, I presume he did so, otherwise it would have been totally irregular), he got an order of this Court, and he got service on the attorney of the plaintiff at law on a subpoena to appear and answer. Then, it is said, if he had got it done on the 20th, that practice which has been referred to would have prevailed, but because he got it done on the very day the verdict was given, it was not after verdict, and therefore the practice is wholly inapplicable. There is no doubt that if a party be sued at law, if he comes and asks this Court on bill filed, and gets an injunction to stay proceedings, that will not be dissolved until the coming in of the answer, if properly a matter of account; but if a party can shew sufficient equity, then, upon an application to dissolve, the Court will do justice. But is a party to say—"I will delay, I will wait; I will put off trial for two years and a half by every possible contrivance, and then I will take every advantage that I can at law, and then, on the very day on which the trial has to come on, I will have my bill ready, and I will file that bill and get an order to substitute service, and in accordance with that order substitute service; and I will then say, the practice does not apply, although twenty-four hours would have made all the difference"? Now if that practice, I say, did not exist at all it is high time to establish it; but finding it existing, and finding that it is just as applicable to the case before me as to any one of those cases which have been cited, and that it is just as necessary, and feeling that it would be an absolute stain on the justice of the country if the application were not granted, I should have no hesitation in granting it.

But there is more than that. The plaintiff in equity being required by the practice of the Court to file an affidavit as to the merits of his case—the bill properly stating, and necessarily stating, for the purpose of sustaining it at all, that the accounts, if properly taken, would shew a very different result from that which the verdict at law would shew, as to that which the plaintiff was claiming at law; and stating that on the taking of the account, either nothing would be due, or a very small sum, or at all events much less than the amount claimed by the plaintiff;—the bill, I say, properly stating that, and the plaintiff himself having verified the merits of his case on his bill by affidavit, carefully abstains from saying one word, even on belief, that the whole of the money claimed by the plaintiff, and now established by the verdict, is not due. Not attempting to state that one farthing of that is more than is due; and not only that, but all that he says about any inaccuracy, any impropriety, in the accounts delivered is, that some time either in or previous to 1848, when he had the accounts, and when he was abroad, he says, "I then became aware that there were inaccuracies in the accounts—that a commission on something or other had been charged improperly"; but neither on the bill nor on the affidavit does he attempt to state what the particulars are which lead to the belief that there is that overcharge, or to give me the slightest reason for supposing that there is one single farthing less than that found by the verdict due upon the account. Well, if ever there was a case in which an attempt was made, first in delaying the proceedings at law and then filing this bill and getting the substituted service, to use the process of the Court in order to delay a just demand, it appears to me to be this case.

I have not the smallest hesitation in applying that wholesome practice to the case now before me; and not merely because it would be an abuse to do otherwise, but because it is the order which ought to be made. Let the plaintiff in equity be at liberty within three weeks from this day, to pay into court to the credit of this cause the sum of 3,086*l.* 10*s.*, and in default thereof, let the injunction awarded in this cause for stay of the defendant's proceedings at law be dissolved.

March 12. } FORSYTH v. ELLICE.

Witness, Commission to examine.

The Court having directed a commission to issue for the examination of witnesses upon the certificate of the Master, and that commission having miscarried, by reason of the defendant being deprived of an opportunity of cross-examining the plaintiff's witnesses, a new commission was directed by the Court to issue without any further certificate of the Master.

This was a motion, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that they might be at liberty to sue out a renewed or new commission, for the cross-examination of the witness or witnesses examined on the part of the said plaintiffs, under the commission already sued out by them, in pursuance of an order made in these causes bearing date the 27th of May 1851, and that the said renewed or new commission might be directed to the same Commissioners as were named in the said former commission; and that the defendant Edward Ellice might be at liberty to exhibit interrogatories for the cross-examination of the said witness or witnesses, and to examine any witnesses whom he might desire to examine; or otherwise that the depositions taken under the said original commission might be forthwith published, and the said defendant, Edward Ellice, be estopped from taking any objection to the said depositions on the ground of the said Commissioners having refused or omitted to receive interrogatories on the part of the said defendant for the cross-examination of the said witness or witnesses.

It appeared from an affidavit in support of the motion, by the solicitor for the plaintiffs, that by the decree made on the hearing of these causes dated the 11th of July 1845, it was referred to the Master to inquire and state to the Court whether any debts or debt, or sum of money, for or to which the firm of Sir Alexander M'Kensie & Co. was liable, had at any and what time since the 21st of March 1821 been paid or become vested in the defendant Edward Ellice. That in pursuance of such decree a state of facts and claim was carried into the office of the Master in respect of a debt due from the firm of Sir Alexander M'Kenzie & Co. to Messrs. M'Gillivray & Co., and claimed by the said defendant to be vested in him; and that a counter state of facts, on the part of the plaintiffs in the said cause, with respect to the said debt, was also carried into the office. That by a certificate of the Master, dated the 29th of March 1851, he certified that it appeared to him to be necessary that a commission should issue directed to Commissioners in Canada, to take the depositions of witnesses on the part of the plaintiffs. That by an order made on the 27th of May 1851, upon the petition of the plaintiffs, it was ordered that the petitioners should be at liberty to sue out a commission for the examination of witnesses in Canada, and that a commission was issued accordingly, directed to Commissioners, on the part of the plaintiffs and the defendant, which was forwarded to Montreal, in Canada, in the month of September last. That such commission had been returned, with the depositions under the seal of the Commissioners. That a warrant was taken out to shew cause why publication should not pass, and that the solicitor for the defendant Edward Ellice objected to such publication, on the ground of some irregularity having occurred in the execution of the commission, whereby he had been deprived of the opportunity of cross-examining the plaintiffs' witnesses. That in consequence of such irregularity the plaintiffs' solicitor applied to the defendant's solicitor to consent to an order for the plaintiffs to be at liberty to sue out a renewed or new commission to take the cross-examination which, under the circumstances, had not been taken under the original commission, but the defendant's solicitor declined to consent to any further commission being issued.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Dickinson, in support of the motion, contended that this order ought to be made by the Court and not by the Master, and that it was necessary, in consequence of the irregularity in the first commission, that a renewed or new commission should issue; and cited

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Brett opposed the motion, on the ground that it was for the Master to direct a new commission to issue, if he thought it desirable, and not the Court, and that it had never been the practice of the Court to issue a second commission without the Master's certificate.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The question here is not, as in some of the cases cited, whether a commission should issue, but whether, a commission having issued on the authority of the Master's certificate, a cross-examination can be issued upon motion to the Court without a reference to the Master. The Master only asserts that there ought to be a commission; but it is the Court that orders the commission to issue, and the Court having ordered the commission, and a miscarriage having taken place, the question arises whether the Court is now to deal with it.

On this motion there has been a transposition of the two alternatives; in fact, the cart is placed before the horse. The application should have been to publish the depositions, or if the Court, by reason of a miscarriage having taken place, should think that the depositions should not be published, then to direct in the alternative that a new commission should issue. In the case of Handley v. Billinge there was an actual certificate by the Clerks in Court, as to the publication of the evidence of witnesses examined under a commission; it was in these words:—

"We humbly certify that in the case of the examination of witnesses after a decree, such witnesses having been examined either by commission or before the Examiner, the publication of the depositions is passed by order of the Court, unless the publication be passed by the respective Clerks in Court signing a consent to pass publication in the Six Clerks rule book; but in the examination of the witness by the Master personally, a circumstance rarely occurring, the publication is by warrant granted by the Master."

If that were the simple case here, without any miscarriage of the commission, and without any dispute about its having been duly returned, then this Court, not the Master, would be the tribunal to apply to; and I think that upon the proper principle it is not the Master's commission, he only certifies that it is necessary to have a commission, and the Court says "Let the witnesses be examined," so that in fact this Court is the proper tribunal to say when and how the commission is to go. That is plain on a simple case where there is no question about miscarriage. I think this would have been a simple application to pass publication, but the parties went before the Master on a warrant, to ask him to pass publication. The question raised was, whether it ought to pass or not; but nothing was determined by the Master; and then the parties come here, the plaintiffs' solicitor finding out that he has been wrong in going to the Master, and that he ought to have come here in the first instance. I think that the alternative should have been put in a different way, but I do not think that that fault vitiates the notice of motion. The plaintiffs do not wish for a new commission, but it is acknowledged by the plaintiffs that there has been a miscarriage, and they ask the Court to let the defendant have a new commission to cross-examine their witnesses; but if that order is not made, and if the defendant does not choose to have a new commission, then that publication may pass under the commission, which has been to some extent executed. It is said, as to the first alternative, "How can you come and ask for a commission when there is no certificate of the Master?" No doubt this Court will not issue out a commission except on the certificate of the Master, but when the Court has directed a commission to issue on the certificate of the Master, and when the defendant says publication ought not to pass because of miscarriage, in consequence of his not having been able to cross-examine the witnesses, then it is not for the Master to determine whether the cross-examination requires a commission, but it is for this Court to determine whether, by reason of the miscarriage, there ought to be a renewal of the commission to set right what may have occurred upon that miscarriage. I think the defendant is at liberty to choose whether he will have a new commission, or whether publication shall pass. Declare, the Court being of opinion that the defendant should elect which to take; and the defendant electing to take a new commission to the same Commissioners, direct the plaintiffs to issue a new commission, the plaintiffs not to examine new witnesses, but to be at liberty to cross-examine witnesses examined by the defendant. Costs to be costs in the cause.

HYDER V. COLEMAN.

Costs—Unopposed Petition—Irrelevant Matter.

An unopposed petition contained statements which were immaterial to the prayer. The Court inserted in the order a direction to the taxing Master, in taxing the costs, to have regard to such statements.

A petition was presented in this cause praying for an order that the Master might sell a certain property by private contract.

The petition was unopposed.

Mr. Steere, for the petition.

PARKER, V.C. said that, on reading over the petition, he perceived that it contained several statements which were quite immaterial to the prayer of the petition. He could not pass this over; and he should, therefore, insert in the order a direction to the taxing Master, in taxing the costs, to have reference to the statements contained in the petition, and to allow costs for such of them only as the petition required.

1851. } PACKET COMPANY, Ex parte
Dec. 1, 8. } CROPPER.

Company—Committee for Winding up—Costs of obtaining an Act of Parliament.

A committee was appointed under the provisions of the deed of settlement for winding up the affairs of a joint-stock company. The existing law being inadequate for the purpose, the committee incurred large expenses in procuring the insertion into a bill then before parliament of certain clauses applicable to the affairs of the company:—Held, affirming the decision below, that these expenses were not a charge against the company, not being authorized by the deed of settlement or by the individual shareholders.

On the 14th of September 1843, the St. George Steam Packet Company, under the powers contained in the 72nd clause of the partnership deed, was dissolved; and Abraham Wood, E. Pike and J. Pain, being three of the directors, and Edward Cropper, G. B. Crewdson and J. Potter, three of the shareholders, were appointed a committee for effectuating the dissolution and winding up the affairs of the company; and this committee appointed Mr. Rigge and his partners to act as their solicitors. At the date of the dissolution, the company were indebted to various persons in the sum of 162,000*l.*, and had assets estimated at 91,000*l.*, leaving an estimated deficiency of about 71,000*l.* The company consisted of three hundred and fifty shareholders. The committee prepared and circulated among the shareholders a statement of accounts, shewing that it would require a contribution of 120*l.* per share to discharge the liabilities of the company, and required the immediate payment of that amount. The whole amount authorized to be raised by the deed of settlement having been fully paid up by the shareholders, the committee had no power by action or otherwise to enforce payment of the contributions required by them, and the greater part remained unpaid. The committee then induced several creditors, upon being indemnified against costs, to issue writs of scire facias, on judgments obtained against the company, against the shareholders who had not paid. But these proceedings, not being productive, were ultimately abandoned. In 1844, the government introduced a bill into parliament for winding up joint-stock companies unable to meet their pecuniary engagements (7 & 8 Vict. c. 111.); but such bill in the form in which it was introduced only applied to companies then carrying on business, and not to such as had been dissolved, and the remedies proposed were altogether inapplicable to a company in the position of the St. George Steam Packet Company, as the bill contained no provisions for enforcing payment from the shareholders in cases where the assets should prove insufficient for satisfying the debts and losses of the company. Mr. Rigge, by the direction of the committee, went up to London at various times during the session, for the purpose of procuring such alterations in the bill as would make it applicable to this company, and enable them to wind up its affairs. After various interviews with the Board of Trade, who had charge of the bill, and through the influence of different members of parliament, whom Mr. Rigge and his agent, Mr. Field, had interested in the matter, various clauses were introduced into the bill, extending its provisions to companies which had been dissolved, providing for enforcing the rateable payment by shareholders towards the losses of the company where the assets should prove insufficient for the discharge of their liabilities, and for rendering shareholders resident in Ireland and Scotland subject to the provisions of the bill. Mr. Rigge, on his return from London, reported to the members of the committee the various steps he had taken for carrying out the purposes aforesaid; and such steps were fully approved of by the committee; and he was then instructed by them to use his best exertions to procure the making of the orders in Chancery requisite for carrying out the provisions of the act. In the year 1845, Mr. Rigge several times visited London, and had interviews with Lord Langdale and the Board of Trade with respect to such orders. In the same year, the government introduced a bill for extending the provisions of the former act to Ireland; and Mr. Rigge, after considerable difficulty, obtained the insertion of a clause enabling the company to be wound up in England. During the sessions of 1846 and 1847, Mr. Rigge several times visited London to attend to the progress of the bill, and reported to the committee the steps he had taken therein, which were adopted and approved.

The 72nd clause of the deed of settlement under which the company was dissolved was as follows:—

“That an absolute and entire dissolution of the company and determination of this partnership may lawfully take place on the terms hereinafter expressed, and on no other terms; that is to say, by and with the consent and approbation of two-thirds at least in number and in value of the votes of the shareholders present in person, and voting at each of two successive meetings of the proprietors, and each meeting to be for that purpose exclusively, respectively convened by the directors, by one calendar month's notice at least, (to be signed by the clerk for the time being), by advertisement in a Liverpool and Dublin newspaper; and that proper measures for effectuating such dissolution shall be taken by a committee, to be composed of three of the directors for the time being of the company, and by an equal number of persons to be elected by the majority of votes of the shareholders present and voting at the latter of such meetings; and that after such dissolution the affairs and concerns of the company shall, with all convenient speed, be wound up, and the debts and liabilities of and claims on the company shall be satisfied, discharged, or otherwise sufficiently provided for; and all the vessels, boats, engines and other property and effects, securities or assets, guaranties, and other funds, and interest and benefit of existing engagements, shall be converted; and for that purpose all outstanding debts owing to, and the benefit of engagements belonging to the company, may be sold for money, and the balance, if any, of the assets and property of the company shall be divided among the persons who shall be the respective shareholders at the period of dissolution, and their respective executors and administrators, rateably and in proportion to the amount of their respective shares at that time. Any of the shareholders, not being a director, may become purchasers of any of the assets of the company which shall be sold; and the majority of voters, according to the rules of voting hereinbefore contained, present and voting at any such special meeting to be convened for the purpose, may declare the accounts of the company finally closed and the assets of the company fully administered, or with such exceptions as they may think fit to declare: and the directors, trustees, and all other parties to be relieved and discharged, with or without such exceptions, from all suits, claims, and demands under and by virtue or in consequence of these presents, and they shall be released and discharged according to such resolution, and in the forms and under the modifications thereof.”

An order was obtained under the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Act 1848, for winding up the affairs of the company. The bill of costs of Mr. Rigge, for journeys and professional advice in the matters before mentioned, amounted to upwards of 2,000*l.*, and for that amount the present applicants claimed to be creditors of the company. The Master rejected the claim, and upon appeal, K. Bruce, V.C. affirmed the Master's decision; and the present motion was by way of appeal from the decision of the Vice Chancellor.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Selwyn, for the appeal.
Mr. Bacon and Mr. J. V. Prior, contra.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (TRURO).—This case appears to me to be unaccompanied with any serious difficulties. Certain individuals became partners under a deed, which regulated their liabilities inter se, their extrinsic liabilities remaining to be regulated by the general law. As between themselves, it was competent to them to come to such arrangements as they might think fit; but it was not in the power of any portion of the body to vary the liabilities of the individuals. In this case it appears that the company were in a condition that rendered it desirable to wind up their affairs; and I am told that those who interfered in the endeavour to wind up the concern, did so, not by resorting to the provisions of the deed, but by inducing creditors to bring actions or issue writs of scire facias against individuals, with a view of charging those individuals with the debts of individual creditors. Whether that was a proper course of proceeding is not a question before the Court. It was found in the result that these proceedings were not calculated to produce the desired result, and they then agreed to dissolve the company according to the provisions of the deed.

When the partners engaged with each other under that deed, they might or they might not have known what were their legal obligations under that deed; but it is clear that they meant to be bound by the existing law, and not blindly to enter into a contract that their liabilities should be regulated by some future and unknown law. Nor does it appear that at the meeting for the dissolution of the company there was any suggestion of an intention to apply for a new law to regulate the rights and remedies in a manner different from that under the existing contract; but the committee was appointed with reference only to a view of proceeding consistently with the provisions of the deed. These provisions might or might not be competent for the purpose; but each of the proprietors had a right to a voice in consenting whether the funds of the company should be applied to the obtaining of a new law, which was to increase their liabilities and give new remedies. Those who concurred in appointing the committee had no ground for supposing that the committee would procure a new law for winding up the company. They contemplated that the present law was sufficient; but if inadequate, they never contemplated that a new law was to be obtained at their expense; or that, at their expense an application should be made to improve the general law, where the object of the new law would be to increase the liabilities and give facilities against certain members of the company. That would certainly not improve their condition as individuals. Individuals who authorize a committee to wind up their affairs, might well express their surprise if they should be attempted to be charged with the obtaining of such a new law. The committee was clearly appointed with reference to the state of the law, the circumstances, and the liabilities as they existed at the date of their appointment. Now, though the general body of the subscribers must have supposed that the existing law was to be applied, it appears that some had a latent intention of endeavouring to obtain a new law to improve the condition of some who were primarily liable to the creditors; and the bill in question opens with the consideration of getting some clauses introduced into a bill brought into parliament by the government which should embrace the circumstances of this particular company, and, of course, other companies under the like circumstances. But the committee started with the intention of obtaining a new law; and, as far as I have gone through the items, the whole bill appears to be directed to that object.

It is said that the solicitors have a right to be paid;—that the Court has nothing to do with. If the solicitors gave the committee due caution as to what they were about, and that it was not within the scope of the authority given to the committee, they are entitled to be paid; but if the committee trusted to them to keep them within the limits of their authority, and if, by oversight or mistake, the solicitors led them into error by overstepping their authority, and put them to great expense, that is a matter between them and the committee; but it has no connexion with the general liabilities of the company. The solicitors start with seeing if a new law could be obtained: the bill proceeds with that view; they have divers communications with the various departments of government and various counsel, to see what clauses are necessary to be inserted in the bill with reference to this company. Dealing, therefore, with that part of the bill, my opinion is, that the decision of the Court below and of the Master was correct, and that it was not within the authority of the committee to set about procuring a general or a particular act of parliament.

It was said that they were authorized to take "the proper means for winding up the company." That means, of course, within the deed of partnership, and if those means are found impracticable, then they should have applied to those at whose expense they meant to act for further powers; and the liability would be confined to those persons who adopted their suggestion. The committee were bound to resort to such means as the deed authorized, and no other; and they had no implied authority to incur expense not within the terms of the deed. It was said that there is authority under the 76th clause of the deed to apply for an act of parliament; but that evidently has no reference to the winding up of the company, but is directed to a different object, namely, the carrying out the objects of the company and procuring certain privileges, such as a charter; and when you find an express clause, the 72nd, directed to the winding up of the company, which is altogether silent as to the authority to procure an act of parliament, and afterwards find in the 76th clause the language I have referred to, the distinction between the two clauses is perfectly clear. Considering, therefore, this committee only authorized at the expense of the company to prosecute such remedies as were incident to the partnership founded upon the deed, it was said that there were other applications to procure certain orders. All these appear to me to be orders and rules which it was desired to obtain for the purpose of incorporating them with that act of parliament; and there were no applications independent of that act of parliament. Again, the discretion of applying for an act of parliament was by the deed committed to the directors; but this committee was formed partly of directors and partly of other persons, and to this body no such discretion was delegated. The act, then, is out of the question; and with respect to that portion of the bill for obtaining orders, that does not appear to have entered into the minds of the parties until they had ceased contemplating the winding up of the company under the existing law; and it turned out to be an abortive attempt. Whether or not they rendered a public service in improving the act of parliament which afterwards passed, the Court has nothing to do with. It can furnish no ground for these particular charges against the company. They had no authority to incur any part of the bill with the payment of which they now seek to charge the company; and, therefore, the order of the Vice Chancellor must be affirmed, and the motion dismissed, with costs.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. }
March 4, 18. } LLOYD v. LLOYD.

Marriage, Restriction upon—Charitable Bequest—Repair of a Tomb.

A testator directed his executors to sell the whole of his real and personal estate, and invest the proceeds in some government annuity for the benefit of his wife and M. L., to be equally divided between them, and at the death of either of them her share was to pass to the survivor, and in case either his widow or M. L. should marry or live in a state of adultery, then her share to pass to the other, but if they both should marry, then their shares to go to his nephew. The testator also directed his wife and M. L. out of their annuity to keep in good repair the tomb in which he was buried:—Held, that the restriction upon marriage was good as related to the widow, but was not good with respect to M. L., who was a single woman.

Held, also, that the direction to the testator's widow and M. L. to repair the tomb, which was confined to the lives of the annuitants, was not void on the ground of perpetuity.

George Lloyd, by his will, dated the 13th of October 1842, in the first place appointed Mr. Robert Browning, jun. and Mary Martha Lockley executor and executrix of his will. He then requested that at his decease his body might be placed in a good sound oak inner coffin, one inch and a half thick, and the outer one of good sound oak, one inch and a half thick, cemented together and varnished, and no cloth was to be made use of on the outside of the coffin, and at the expiration of fourteen days to be interred in the vault in St. Mary's Churchyard at Chatham. And he desired that every unnecessary expense attending his funeral might be avoided, and that no person or persons whomsoever might be deposited in the said vault, save Mary Martha Lockley, if she continued a single woman, and living a chaste life. He then gave and bequeathed to Mary Martha Lockley his household furniture, glass, china, silver plate, jewellery, linen, &c. for her own use and benefit, and directed his executor or executrix to pay his funeral expenses, and collect all monies, securities for money, and all other property of whatsoever description of which he might die possessed; and his said executor or executrix was to sell or cause to be sold, to the best advantage, the whole of his personal and real estate, and invest the proceeds of such sale in some government annuity, for the benefit of his wife, Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley; and when the amount of the said government annuity should be ascertained, then the said sum of money so raised by the way of annuity on the joint lives of his wife Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley, was to be equally divided, share and share alike, between Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley; and at the death of either of the above-named Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley, her share, at her death, was to pass to the survivor of the two above-named Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley, on the day of her decease; and in case either Lucy Lloyd or Mary Martha Lockley should marry or live in a state of adultery, then her share should pass to the other, the same as if death had taken place; and should Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley both marry, then their shares and interest should pass to his nephew, Samuel Hayes, of Woolwich, in case Lucy Lloyd or Mary Martha Lockley should fail in fulfilling the conditions of his will. And further the testator desired that his wife Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley should, out of the annuity they received, keep in good sound repair the tomb and vault at Chatham Churchyard that belonged to him, and cause to be painted the said tomb and vault every four years, or if required, more frequently; and in default or failure, they should lose or forfeit the claim to the annuity, and any person thereafter that should receive the annuity should be bound to perform the same conditions. The testator then directed his executrix or executor to ascertain the amount of money received by his wife Lucy Lloyd from the Chatham Dockyard Society (which might be by the secretary's yearly report), and when that amount should be ascertained by his executrix or executor, the said Mary Martha Lockley would be entitled to the half of the sum so received by his wife Lucy Lloyd from the said society; and should his wife Lucy Lloyd refuse to pay the half of the sum so received by her from the society, then his executrix and executor were to stop so much of the share of the government annuity that his wife Lucy Lloyd should receive, as would make good her half of the dockyard pension money to Mary Martha Lockley, so that there might be an equal division of money between Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley.

The testator afterwards made a codicil, dated the 12th of October 1844, which was to the following effect:—That having entered into an agreement with Mr. J. W. Pyle to let him his house at Barnes, on a lease for fourteen or twenty-one years, at a yearly rental of 48*l.* per annum, to be paid quarterly, he now made this offer, that at the expiration of the first fourteen years of the said lease of twenty-one years, should he, the said Mr. Pyle, wish to continue the lease, he might do so upon paying to his executrix or executor (in case he should then have departed this life) the sum of 48*l.* yearly during the lifetime of his wife Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley. And further, the said Mr. Pyle was to pay, after the death of his wife Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley, within six months, the sum of 200*l.*, clear of all costs, charges, and expenses, and to invest the said 200*l.* in the new 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent. annuities of the Bank of England, in the joint names of the minister and churchwardens of St. Mary's Church, Chatham, in the county of Kent, as trustees for the time being. If the above stipulations were fulfilled in every point by the said Mr. Pyle, as respected the payment of the 48*l.* and the investment of the 200*l.* in the Bank of England, then he gave and bequeathed the said house at Barnes to the said Mr. Pyle for ever.

The testator afterwards made a second codicil to his will, dated the 14th of October 1844, by which he directed that his house at Barnes, then in the occupation of Mr. Pyle, should not be sold, but let at a yearly rental, or on lease, to the best advantage, for the benefit of his wife Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley, and the proceeds of the rent applied as set forth in his will, subject to all the conditions contained in his will, the same as if the house had been sold, share and share alike; and after the death of his wife Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley, or in case Mr. Pyle, of Barnes, should refuse to accept the offer made to him by the previous codicil, or in default of Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley fulfilling the conditions contained in his will, he gave and bequeathed upon trust, the said house at Barnes to the minister and churchwardens of St. Mary's Church, Chatham, for the said minister and churchwardens to apply the produce of the rent of the said house as follows:— First, to take for themselves 5*l.* every year for their expenses, of the rent or proceeds out of the said house at Barnes, and further to keep in good sound repair the vault and tomb, and cause the said tomb to be painted every third year, that belonged to him, in Chatham Churchyard; then the residue and remainder of the said rent to be applied for the benefit of his nephew, Samuel Hayes, of Woolwich; and after the death of the above Samuel Hayes, then the residue and remainder of the said rent to be applied for the benefit of the Church Missionary Society attached to St. Mary's Church, Chatham. And he further desired that if the said Mr. Pyle should accept the offer of the house at Barnes, then the interest of the 200*l.*, invested by him in the Bank of England, in the new 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent., in the joint names of the minister and churchwardens of St. Mary's Church, Chatham, should be applied as follows:— First, the said minister and churchwardens to take for themselves each 1*l.* 1*s.* every year; then the residue and remainder of the interest of the 200*l.* to be applied in keeping in good sound repair the vault and tomb, and to cause the said tomb to be painted every third year, that belonged to him in Chatham Churchyard; and if any surplus remained, after the expenditure of the cash on the tomb and vault, then it should be given to the Church Missionary Society attached to St. Mary's Church, Chatham.

The testator died in the year 1848, leaving his wife Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley surviving him; Samuel Hayes, the nephew of the testator, was also living at his death.

This bill was filed for the administration of the estate of the testator, and upon a reference to the Master it appeared that Mr. Pyle had declined the offer made him by the testator.

When the cause came before the Court, in February 1850, the Vice Chancellor decided that the bequests in favour of the minister and churchwardens and the Missionary Society were void. The questions now argued were, whether the restrictions upon the marriage of the widow of the testator and of Mary Martha Lockley were void, and whether the direction to repair the testator's tomb was void or not.

Mr. Torriano, for the widow and Mary Martha Lockley, submitted that the testator having given an annuity to his widow and Mary Martha Lockley, on condition that if they married the annuity should go over to other parties, the restriction was void, and the life estate was unconditional. In Sheffield v. Lord Orrery (1) it was held that restraint on the marriage of a testator's widow was not invalid, and had this testator confined the condition to the widow it would stand; so also in Rishton v. Cobb (2). But here the testator had associated with his widow in the condition Mary Martha Lockley, a single woman. In Morley v. Rennoldson (3) the testator annexed to the bequest to his daughter a condition that it should go over in the event of her marrying; but there, though the daughter was afflicted with nervous debility, the restraining clause was held to be void. In Grace v. Webb (4) the testator gave an annuity of 40*l.* to a single woman, which he directed to be reduced to 20*l.* in case she married. Lord Cottenham, in 2 Phillips, 701, reversed the decision of Sir L. Shadwell, upon the ground that the gift was a contract to pay 40*l.* until marriage, and 20*l.* afterwards, but he did not disturb the principle on which the case had been decided by the Vice Chancellor of England. The condition, therefore, was void as to Mary Martha Lockley, and as she was joined by the testator with the widow, it was void as to both.

Mr. Haldane appeared for Mr. Pyle in the same interest.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Collins, for the heir-at-law, said it was clear that, as regarded the widow, the restriction against marriage was good: the rule had been relaxed to this extent; but as to single women, there was much difference of opinion expressed by Judges, and the distinction was exceedingly minute. However in this case it was submitted that the condition as to the marriage of Mary Martha Lockley was good. The following cases were cited—

Chapman v. Brown, 6 Ves. 404.

Cherry v. Mott, 1 Myl. & Cr. 123;

Mr. Begbie, for Samuel Hayes, the nephew of the testator, contended that the restriction upon the marriage was perfectly good, as it was a limitation, and not a condition, and a limitation until marriage had always been held to be good. Vice Chancellor Wigram expressed his opinion that Morley v. Rennoldson would not govern other cases, as it depended upon its own circumstances. Subject to any interest which the Court might consider the two ladies had, the nephew took an absolute interest in all the copyhold property. The following cases were also cited—

Mr. Torriano, in reply.

March 18. — KINDERSLEY, V.C. — The question in this case arises upon the construction of the will of George Lloyd. The will is not very intelligible. The testator appears to have been a person who was not entirely destitute of education, but was not able to express his intentions in very clear or intelligible language; still it is not difficult to come to a conclusion as to his general intentions. He apparently had no children, but he left a widow and a person named Mary Martha Lockley surviving him, who seemed a friend, or a person for whom he desired to make a provision, though no relation. He had also a nephew, Samuel Hayes; and the principal objects of his bounty seem to have been his widow and Mary Martha Lockley, and in some degree he seems to have desired to do something for his nephew. In the first part of the will there is a clear intention that the executors should convert all the real and personal estate into money, and invest that money in a government annuity for the lives of his widow and Mary Martha Lockley, and the life of the survivor. So far there is no difficulty whatever; he gives an annuity for their joint lives and the life of the survivor; then he goes on as to the restriction upon marriage.

Now, with respect to that which, as a condition subsequent, attaches to the previous gift, I think, according to the authorities, it is not void as regards the wife. The law recognizes in the husband that species of interest in the widowhood of his wife, which makes it lawful for him to restrain a second marriage, that is to say, that the provision which he has made shall cease upon a second marriage. I have no doubt, also, that with respect to either his wife or a stranger, a testator may give an annuity, to continue so long as she remains single and unmarried; but as to a person not a wife, if he first gives her a life or other estate, and then appends a condition to defeat that estate if she marries, that would not be good. If I am right in this view of the law, the effect of that clause is, that if the wife should marry, her share would go over to Mary Martha Lockley; but if Mary Martha Lockley should marry she would lose nothing.

But then comes another condition or provision, "And should Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley both marry, then their shares and interest shall pass to my nephew, in case Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley fail in fulfilling the conditions of this my will." Now, that is a sentence part of which is intelligible, but as a whole it is not very easy to say what the testator meant. So far as he meant to give the property over in the event of their marrying again, it is clearly void with respect to Mary Martha Lockley, as I said before. But the testator imposes another condition as to his tomb; and the difficulty is to know whether he meant to say, if Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley both marry or fail in fulfilling the condition, or if he meant to say, in the conjunctive, if they both marry and fail, &c. My impression is, that he meant, at all events, that if they both married it was to go over; and I think that void.

But he adds another condition as to the tomb. Now, I am satisfied that a condition for keeping a tomb in repair is not a charitable use, and is not illegal. It may be illegal to invest property in perpetuity in trust for that purpose, so as to create a perpetuity; but a direction that the wife and Mary Martha Lockley are, during their lives, to enjoy the annuity, and are to keep the tomb in repair, is quite lawful; it is a valid condition imposed upon the enjoyment. I consider, therefore, that Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley are obliged, out of the annuity, to keep the tomb in repair.

Then, there is a direction about which there is no question, that his executors shall ascertain the amount of money which the wife is entitled to from a certain society, which the Master must inquire about. But nothing turns upon that.

So far, then, the testator directed the sale of all his real estate, for the purpose of purchasing an annuity for the two lives; and by a codicil he refers to this. Amongst the testator's estates was a copyhold at Barnes, which is let to Mr. Pyle. Mr. Pyle is lessee for fourteen years, at 48*l.*, and he says, "if you choose to accept this offer, you may do so upon the terms of paying 48*l.* during the life of my wife and Mary Martha Lockley," and then 200*l.* more, which is to be invested in the funds, but he does not direct any trust, and it appears Mr. Pyle has declined the offer. Then comes the second codicil, and by that, after referring to the fact that by his will he had directed a sale, he says it shall not be sold, but let, and so on. This language is very inartificial, and if you take it as it stands, it clearly does not express the meaning which ought to be extracted from the whole of the codicil. What the testator must have intended was, if Mr. Pyle does not accept the offer, then let the house continue to be let, and the rent to be paid to Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley during their lives, and the life of the survivor; and he afterwards devises it to the minister and churchwardens, if Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley fail to fulfil the conditions of the will, and I see no reason why the limitation over, in the event of their not fulfilling that condition, is not good: that is, assuming that the devise over is valid. But the devise to the minister and churchwardens is declared to be upon this trust; first, to take 5*l.* which would not be of itself illegal if the duty they were to perform was a duty which was valid; but the next trust is, to keep in sound repair the vault and tomb, and this being a devise of the fee, or rather of the inheritance of the copyhold, to the minister and churchwardens, upon trust to cause a tomb to be painted every year, that is, in fact, a perpetuity; and I suppose it is for that reason that the Court at the hearing declared this devise to be void, and dismissed the trustees from the suit; my opinion is, that whether right or wrong I am not here to alter it. But I must say I think it quite right, and the effect of it appears to be that everything which is contained in or grafted on the trust to the minister and churchwardens is void, and the trust is void. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the effect of the subsequent trusts; that is to say, to consider what is to be done with the rent after keeping the tomb in repair. It is to be applied to the benefit of the Missionary Society, which is, of course, void under the Mortmain Acts. Then, he says, "the interest of the 200*l.* invested in the joint names of the minister and churchwardens is to be applied as follows," &c. It is not necessary to comment on these ulterior limitations; they are clearly void, and have even been declared to be so by the Court.

The effect then of the whole is, that this property, after paying the costs of the suit, will have to be invested in the purchase of a government annuity for the life of Lucy Lloyd and Mary Martha Lockley, with a direction to pay the interest to these two persons in equal shares, during their joint lives, they undertaking to perform the conditions contained in the will with regard to the repair of the tomb and the painting of it, with liberty for any party to apply upon the death of either, or upon any other event.

Nov. 25. } HAVERD v. DAVIS.

Will—Construction—Condition, Precedent or Subsequent.

An estate was settled to such uses as W. D., a feme covert, should by deed or will appoint. W. D. devised the estate to R. D., her husband, with power to sell and dispose of the same, and to raise any sum or sums of money thereon by mortgage or otherwise as he should think proper, but with this proviso, "Provided, and these presents are upon this express condition, that such part of all and every sum and sums of money as aforesaid raised by the said R. D., either by sale or mortgage, as shall be expended at my (his) decease shall be charged upon the houses belonging to the said R. D., situate at, &c., to be disposed of immediately after the decease of the said R. D.; that is to say, that that sum shall be paid to my four nieces, share and share alike." And in case the estate should not be mortgaged to its full value, the testatrix devised the reversion to her said four nieces; and in case the estate should not be sold or mortgaged by R. D., she devised the same to her four nieces, and their heirs, as tenants in common. R. D. mortgaged the estate, and died without having made any charge of the mortgage money or any part thereof upon his houses:—Held, that the condition was not a condition precedent, and that the mortgages made by R. D. were valid.

Tenants in common, plaintiffs in a suit for redemption, are not entitled to a decree for partition in the same suit against the will of the mortgagee.

This was an appeal from a decree of foreclosure made by the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce. The facts of the case are fully set out in the judgment.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. T. Terrell appeared for the appellants, the owners of the equity of redemption; and complicated, but I will state such as are relevant and material to the judgment I am about to pronounce. By indentures of the 12th and 13th of May 1817, George Price Watkins, under whom the respondents claim, took a transfer of a mortgage for 1,200*l.* on an estate called Lower Tylecrown. Some years prior to this, Lewis Williams, being the owner of the equity of redemption of Lower Tylecrown, and also owner in fee of Upper Tylecrown, devised these estates to his daughters Abigail and Winifred, as tenants in common in fee, and died in the year 1802. Abigail Williams intermarried with Walter Lewis, and Winifred Williams intermarried with Rees Davis. In or about the year 1824, Abigail Lewis died intestate, leaving her husband, Walter Lewis, and three children, Edward Williams Lewis her son and heir-at-law—Mary, afterwards the wife of Thomas Haverd—and Margaret, afterwards the wife of John Lewis. Edward W. Lewis, the only son and heir of Abigail Lewis, died, leaving his sisters Mary Haverd and Margaret Lewis him surviving, in whom the moiety which belonged to Abigail Lewis became vested as his co-heiresses-at-law. In September 1833 Walter Lewis, Thomas Haverd and John Lewis made an equitable mortgage of the moiety which belonged to Abigail Lewis to G. P. Watkins, for securing 600*l.* one-half of which appears to have been paid. By indentures of the 16th and 17th of November 1838, John Lewis and Margaret his wife made a mortgage to G. P. Watkins of one undivided fourth part or share of Upper and Lower Tylecrown for 1,150*l.*

Mr. Bacon and Mr. W. M. James, for the representatives of the mortgagee, in support of the decree.

By indenture of the 21st of May 1813, Rees Davis covenanted with Samuel Church that he, Rees Davis, and Winifred his wife, would levy a fine of her moiety of Upper and Lower Tylecrown to such uses as Winifred Davis should by deed or will appoint, and a fine was levied accordingly. Winifred Davis devised to Rees Davis, her husband, her share of Upper and Lower Tylecrown, with power to sell and dispose of the same, or to raise any sum or sums of money thereon by mortgage or otherwise as he should think proper. And she then added a proviso, in these terms—"Provided always, and these presents are upon this express condition, that such part of all and every sum and sums of money so as aforesaid raised by the said R. Davis, either by sale or mortgage, as shall be unexpended at my decease shall be charged upon the houses belonging to the said R. Davis, situate at &c., to be disposed of as hereinafter expressed, immediately after the decease of the said R. Davis, that is to say, that that sum shall be paid to my four nieces, viz., Charlotte Coltheart, Mary Lewis, Margaret Lewis, and Helen Williams, share and share alike." And in case the estate should be mortgaged for less than its real then value, the testatrix devised the reversion of the same to her said four nieces, share and share alike, and in case the estate should not be sold or mortgaged by the said R. Davis, then she devised the same to her said nieces, their heirs and assigns, as free from incumbrance as they should be at her decease, share and share alike as tenants in common.

Rees Davis made certain mortgages to George P. Watkins, and in 1839 died without having made any such charge on the two houses as required by the proviso in the will of Winifred Davis. On his death, the moiety in which he had a life interest became vested in possession (subject to the mortgages) in the defendants Charlotte Williams, Mary Haverd, Margaret Lewis, and Ellen Holderness, as tenants in common in fee, and in their husbands Henry Williams, Thomas Haverd, John Lewis, and John Holderness in their right.

George Price Watkins devised the premises vested in him as mortgagee under the various mortgages to the respondents, and the several mortgage debts still remain due to the estate of George Price Watkins, except the part of the 600*l.* which has been paid off. In this state of things the appellants, in February 1844, filed a bill for redemption and partition, and in March in the same year the respondents filed a bill of foreclosure. These causes came on to be heard before the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, when his Honour pronounced a decree of foreclosure, the particulars of which it is not necessary to state any further than this, that it was thereby declared that the mortgages created by Rees Davis were valid, and it also treated the equitable mortgage for 600*l.* as a valid charge; and it did not direct that a commission should issue for making a partition as prayed by the redemption bill. Against that decree the parties interested in the equity of redemption presented a petition of appeal, whereby they objected to the decree: first, on the ground that the mortgages created by Rees Davis are not valid; secondly, on the ground that the equitable mortgage for 600*l.* is not a valid charge; and, thirdly, on the ground that the decree ought to have contained a direction for a partition. The other objections which were taken by the appellants on the hearing of the appeal, and which do not appear on the face of the petition of appeal, I cannot entertain without infringing a rule of practice (stated in 2 Daniell's Ch. Pr. by Headlam, 1354) which is necessary to protect respondents from being taken by surprise.

Now, with respect to the objection to the validity of the mortgages made by Rees Davis, the foundation of that objection is, that the power in the will of Winifred Davis under which he created them, was dependent on the condition of Rees Davis making such a charge as is required by the proviso in the will; and inasmuch as he did not perform that condition, the mortgages created by the execution of the power were void. I am of opinion that this objection to the validity of these mortgages cannot be maintained. I do not think the condition embodied in the proviso is a condition precedent. Conceding that the words "unexpended at my decease" were written by mistake for "unexpended at his decease," and supposing, also, that the import of the proviso is sufficiently clear, and that the meaning was that Rees Davis should create a charge, either by deed or will, on his two houses, for such a proportion of the money to be raised by him as might happen to be unexpended at the time of his decease, the form of the proviso is most certainly not that of a condition precedent upon which an estate is to arise, but of a condition subsequent, in that general sense of the term in which it is sometimes used in contradistinction to a condition precedent, to denote a clause which causes the cesser of an estate given in a preceding sentence, whether such condition subsequent is a condition properly so called, which causes the reverter of the property, or a conditional limitation, which gives the property over to a third person. Indeed, the word "provided" and the words "on condition," when they constitute the introductory words of a distinct sentence, whereby a condition is annexed to an interest given in the preceding sentence, are the technical words which properly introduce a condition subsequent, as opposed to a condition precedent. But, independently of the form of the proviso, the condition cannot be a condition precedent, because it would be absurd that Rees Davis, before raising the money, should have been obliged to execute a charge by deed on his own estate to secure to the nieces so much as should be unexpended by him, and thereby put himself to considerable expense, and preclude himself from the free alienation of his estate, and from the power of raising money on it, when he could at any moment render such a charge wholly nugatory by spending the whole of the money. And as to a charge by will, that, of course, cannot be deemed to have been intended, as it might be revoked the next day. The proviso is of the nature of a condition subsequent, in the general sense of the term which I have mentioned. It is an irregular way of accomplishing the purposes of a conditional limitation, properly so called. A conditional limitation takes effect in defeazance of the interest given in a preceding sentence, and this proviso is intended virtually to take effect in partial defeazance of the absolute interest in the entirety of the money to be raised; for it would seem to amount to the same as if the testatrix had said, "But in case Rees Davis shall not expend all the money which shall so be raised by him, so much as shall be unexpended at the time of his decease shall go to my nieces, and Rees Davis shall execute a charge on his two houses to secure that amount to them." But whether this is the precise character and import of the proviso or not, which it is unnecessary for me to decide, there can be no doubt that it was intended virtually to be a limitation over in some way or other of so much of the money as should be unexpended.

Now, it is a rule that where a money fund is given to a person absolutely, a condition cannot be annexed to the gift that so much as he shall not dispose of shall go over to another person. Apart from any supposed incongruity—a notion which savours of metaphysical refinement rather than of anything substantial—one reason which may be assigned in support of the expediency of this rule is, that in many cases it might be very difficult, and even impossible, to ascertain whether any part of the fund remained undisposed of or not, since, if the person to whom the absolute interest is given left any personality, it might be wholly uncertain whether it were a part of the precise fund which was the subject of the condition or not. Another reason may be, that it would be contrary to the well-being of the party absolutely entitled to lead him profusely to spend all that was given him, which in many cases might be all that he had in the world; for although, indeed, he might provide against leaving himself destitute by buying an annuity, yet, even if he did this, it might be at the expense of those for whom he might be under a moral obligation to make some provision.

In Ross v. Ross (1) Sir Thomas Plumer observed—"One consequence of permitting such limitations over would be, that if the party entitled to the absolute interest had not spent the money, and were to die indebted to any amount, his creditors would be excluded from it." The validity of this reason may be doubtful, as it may, perhaps, be said that a man might properly be deemed to have spent the amount of debt which he has contracted, and which he has laid himself under an obligation to pay. In Bourn v. Gibbs (2) a testator gave his personal estate to his wife for her own absolute disposal, provided, nevertheless, that if his wife should make no disposition thereof in her lifetime, or by her will, then he directed that such part as should remain undisposed of should go to, and he accordingly bequeathed the same to, his nephews. It was held that the sum of stock, which was part of the testator's property given to his wife, remaining in his name at her death, passed by her will, although it contained no allusion to her husband's will; Sir John Leach being of opinion that the widow took an absolute interest in the whole of the testator's residuary estate. So in Ross v. Ross, a testator gave to his son a sum of money with a limitation over in case he should not receive or dispose of it by will or otherwise in his lifetime. He died intestate, without having received the money, although it was carried to his separate account in a suit. Sir T. Plumer said, "This differs from a power and a remainder over in default of its exercise. * * * If you give absolute property to a person, you cannot subject it for his life to a proviso, that, if he does not spend it, his interest shall cease." So in Cuthbert v. Purrier (3), an absolute interest was given to A. at twenty-one, with a bequest over in the event of his dying under that age, "or afterwards without lawful heirs, being intestate." Sir T. Plumer said, "As the testator had two objects, which are inconsistent,—to invest his son with the absolute property, and then to provide for the event of his not exercising his rights over it,—I think the Court is bound to transfer it to him." So in Green v. Harvey (4) Wigram, V.C. said, "The general rule of law is, that an absolute interest is not to be taken away by a gift over, unless that gift over may itself take effect. Now, it has been repeatedly decided, that where a legacy is given absolutely, and a gift over is superadded, in the event of the legatee dying without having disposed of his legacy, the gift over is void and the legacy is absolute." So in Byng v. Lord Strafford (5) Lord Langdale said, "If an absolute interest be given upon an express condition which may be lawful in itself, but is incompatible with the free enjoyment of the property, the Court does not modify the absolute interest for the purpose of giving effect to the condition, but declares the condition void for the purpose of supporting the absolute interest." The case of Doe d. Stevenson v.

Glover (6), in which I was counsel, is not opposed to these cases; as that was not a case of money limited over, but one in which there was a devise over of real estate. There a testator devised his real estate to his son, his heirs and assigns for ever; but in case he should die without leaving any issue then living, or being no such issue, and he should not have disposed and parted with his interest in the real estate, then the testator devised the same to his illegitimate daughter, her heirs and assigns. The Judges were unanimous in the opinion that the devise over was a good executory devise; and that as the son had not parted with the estate in his lifetime, although he had disposed of it by will, it went over to the daughter.

As to the case of Doe d. Willis v. Martin (7), which was cited at the bar by the counsel for the appellants, a most substantial distinction exists between that case and the present. That was a case of a power enabling settlors to revoke the uses of a settlement, and the trustees to sell the estate and convey to a purchaser, so as the purchase-money should be paid to the trustees and not to the settlors, to be laid out and invested by the trustees in the purchase of other property to be settled to the same uses. It was held that the power of revocation was conditional, and as neither of the conditions were performed, viz. the payment of the money to the trustees, and the re-investment of it in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses, the revocation was a nullity. In this case, as Lord Kenyon intimated, the exercise of the power and the performance of the condition were beyond all doubt to be considered as parts of one transaction. They were essentially and inseparably connected. The performance of the condition, instead of being a derogation from the ownership of the parties to be affected by the exercise of the power not permitted by the law, was an act which those parties had a most unquestionable right to expect to be done.

But, independently of the rule to which I have adverted, the mortgages created by Rees Davis cannot be affected by the proviso. Supposing, for the reasons I have assigned, it was not a condition precedent, then, as the testatrix has specified no time for the creation of the charge, it would be sufficient for Rees Davis to create it at any time before he died. But, it cannot be contended that he was bound to create it at all if he had spent all the money. And yet the appellants, upon whom it was incumbent to shew that the condition was not performed, have not proved that Rees Davis left any part of the money unexpended, and, consequently, have not proved that the condition was broken. For these reasons, I am clearly of opinion that their objection to the validity of the mortgage created by Rees Davis altogether fails.

With respect to the second ground of appeal, it appears to me that the decree must be right in treating the equitable mortgage as a valid charge; for the appellants, by their answer, have admitted that the 600*l.* was lent, and that John Lewis and Thomas Haverd gave George Price Watkins a written undertaking that they would execute a mortgage of their respective interests, and that if necessary all proper parties should concur in levying a fine of the premises. The answer seems to me to admit facts which constitute a valid equitable mortgage of the life estates of the husbands of the two daughters of Abigail, and of the four nieces of Winifred; and I see no evidence to impeach or reduce that mortgage, except so far as the payment of one-half of the 600*l.*

With respect to the third ground of appeal, viz. the omission of a direction as to a partition: a partition appears to me not to be properly incident to a foreclosure or redemption suit, in such a way that the owners of the redemption can be allowed to insist on it against the will of the mortgagee who has no interest in the question. In the present case, with the consent of the mortgagee, the parties interested in the equity of redemption may have a partition; but I cannot regard the omission of a direction for a partition as constituting a ground for an appeal.

The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

TAYLOR v. FROBISHER.

Will—Construction—Remoteness—Word “vested.”

*A testator directed trustees to pay the interest of a sum of 1,000*l.* to A. for life, and, after her death, to divide the principal between the child and children of A, and if there should be only one child, then the whole to such child, to be a vested interest or vested interests on their respectively attaining the age of thirty years, and directed that, if any child should die under thirty years, without lawful issue, the share of him or her so dying should go to the survivors or survivor, and become vested at the same time as their original shares. B, one of the children of A, died in the lifetime of A. under thirty years of age:—Held, that the gift to B. as one of the children of A. was a valid bequest, and that the gift over on the death of B. without issue was void for remoteness, and therefore that the representatives of B. were entitled to a share of the fund.*

Mrs. Blanchard, having a power of appointment over a sum of 1,000*l.* made her will, dated the 23rd of March 1833, and thereby directed her trustees J. Gray, W. Husband and J. Barber, to invest the same as therein mentioned, and to pay the income to her daughter, Ann Gray, for life. The will then proceeded as follows.—“And from and after her decease to pay, apply, and dispose of the said principal sum of 1,000*l.* and all interest due thereon unto, between, or amongst all and every the child and children of my said daughter, in equal shares, or, if there shall be but one such child, then the whole to such only child, to be a vested interest or vested interests on their respectively attaining the age of thirty, and, if any child or children of my said daughter shall die under the age of thirty years, without lawful issue, the share or shares, of him, her or them so dying, as well original as accruing by survivorship, shall go to the survivors or survivor in equal shares, if more than one, and become vested at such ages or times as his, her, or their original share or shares; and upon this further trust, that they my said trustees do and shall, after the decease of my said daughter, and, until the share or respective shares of such child or children as aforesaid shall become vested and payable, by and out of the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of the said sum of 1,000*l.*, pay and apply to and for the maintenance and education of the same child or children respectively such yearly sum or sums of money as to them my said trustees shall seem meet, not exceeding the interest of the expectant share of such child or children respectively in the said principal sum of 1,000*l.* And I hereby direct and declare that, in case all the children of my said daughter shall die under the age of thirty years and without lawful issue, the said J. Gray, W. Husband and James Barber, their executors, administrators and assigns, shall stand possessed of the same principal sum of 1,000*l.* upon trust to pay or transfer the same unto my said son, Thomas Frobisher, his executors, administrators and assigns."

The testatrix died in 1835, leaving two children, Ann Taylor and Thomas Frobisher, who were named in the will.

Ann Taylor died in 1841. Ann Taylor had two children, T. J. Taylor and B. F. Taylor. B. F. Taylor died in the year 1839, in his twenty-eighth year.

PARKER, V.C.—The question in this case depends on the meaning which, upon consideration of this will, is to be attached to the word "vested," as used by the testatrix. It is scarcely necessary to say that, in construing this will, the Court lays out of sight the circumstance that, if one construction be adopted, the disposition in favour of the children of Ann Taylor would be void for remoteness, while, if the other be taken, it would be in a great measure supported. The Court, in such cases, in the first instance ascertains what are the provisions of the instrument, whether they are opposed to the ordinary rules of construction, and to what extent they are in accordance with the rules of law. In this will the testatrix uses the word "vested" not in its ordinary sense, but in the sense of not being subject to be divested, so as to be defeasible. It is only in this way that her intention could have been carried into effect in the form which was in her contemplation. The word "vested," though it has a technical or strictly legal meaning, especially when applied to various interests in real estate, is in effect used in different senses. In Barnes v. Allen (1), Lord Thurlow says—"Contingent or executory interests may be as completely vested as if they were in possession;" obviously there using the word "vested" in the sense of "transmissible." In Berkeley v. Swinburne the Lords Commissioners, where the testator directed the shares to be vested interests in the sons at twenty-one, and in daughters at twenty-one or marriage, construed the word to mean indefeasible, and held that the shares vested before the ages of twenty-one or marriage on the death of the tenant for life, subject to be divested on their deaths under that age, and, in the case of daughters, without having been married. In Glanvill v. Glanvill Sir W. Grant construed the word "vested" in its ordinary sense, observing, however, that there was no evidence from any part of the will that the testator did not affix to the word its precise legal meaning.

In the present case, the testatrix, after the death of Ann Taylor, directs the trustees "to pay, apply, and dispose of the said principal sum of 1,000*l.*, and all interest due thereon, unto, between, and amongst all and every the child and children in equal shares, or, if there shall be but one such child the whole to such only child, to be a vested interest or vested interests on their respectively attaining the age of thirty years, and, if any child or children of Ann Taylor should die under the age of thirty years, without lawful issue, the share or shares of the child so dying to go to the survivors or survivor." In this disposition, as well as in what follows it, the testatrix contemplates that each child, before attaining the age of thirty years, was in some sense, at least, to be entitled to a share of the fund, which she designates as "the share of such child respectively." If any child die under thirty years without issue, then the share of such child is to go to the others; if any child die under the age of thirty years leaving issue, the share of such child is not to go to the others, but the original gift remains unaffected. The conclusion appears to be irresistible that the testatrix intended the child so dying with issue to retain his share as an interest transmissible to his representatives. It is impossible to suppose it meant an intention that, while the share of a child dying and leaving no issue was to go to the others, a share of a child dying leaving issue was to go to the others, but to go to those who were to take in default of appointment. So, when the testatrix, in the ultimate disposition of the fund, gives it to Thomas Frobisher, in the event of all the children of Ann Taylor dying under the age of thirty years and without issue, she must have meant that to be the only event in which, under the previous dispositions, the fund was to be undisposed of; but, in the event of an only child dying and leaving issue, the fund was not to go over to Thomas Frobisher, because such deceased child took an absolute interest in the fund. The object of the testatrix was to make a complete disposition of the fund, and, in such a case, the Court always endeavours to construe the will so as to prevent a failure of the interest of any party named therein. I consider that here the meaning was, that all the children of Ann Taylor were to take vested interests in the fund, subject to be divested by their deaths under thirty without issue, and that, when they attained thirty, they were to take respectively indefeasible interests in their shares. This construction, which makes all the will consistent, is in accordance with what was said by Sir John Leach, in his judgment in the case of Bland v. Williams. He there says—"Whether, in a gift of this nature, the time of vesting is postponed, or only the time of payment, depends altogether upon the whole context of the will. If the gift over is simply upon the death under twenty-four, then the gift could not vest before that age. In this case, the gift over is not simply upon the death under twenty-four, but upon the death under twenty-four without leaving issue. If upon a death under twenty-four at whatever age issue was left, then the gift over is not to take place. It is, in effect, therefore, a vested interest with an executory devise over in case of death under twenty-four without leaving issue. All the cases upon the subject except the one before Lord Gifford, Bull v. Pritchard, are reconcilable with this distinction." If the case before Lord Gifford be referred to, it will be found to form no exception to the rule as stated by Sir John Leach. In that case, the gift was not to any children except such as should attain the age of twenty-three years. Such a gift in favour of children is of the same nature as that in Glanvill v. Glanvill before referred to; and, in the latter case, Sir William Grant's decision would probably have been different if the gift over had been in the event of the death of children under age without leaving issue. The case of Russel v.

Buchanan has been referred to. There is nothing in the will in that case to shew that the word "vested" is to be taken in any other than its ordinary sense; the clause being similar to that adverted to in Glanvill v. Glanvill and Bland v. Williams, for the destruction of the contingent remainders in that case by an event subsequent to the testator's death could not affect the construction of the will. In the present case, the direction as to maintenance does not throw much light upon the intention of the testatrix either way, neither does the discretionary power to the trustees. The testatrix appears to have considered the fund as entirely disposed of by the previous dispositions.

For the reasons I have stated, my opinion on the case is, that the bequest or appointment in the will of Mrs. Blanchard of 1,000*l.* after the decease of Ann Taylor, unto and amongst all and every her child and children is a valid bequest, and that the gift over of the shares of any child or children who shall die under the age of thirty without issue, is void for remoteness. The consequence is that T. J. Taylor and the representatives of B. F. Taylor are the persons who are entitled under the clause in question. The costs must come out of the fund.

PARKER, V.C. } Ex parte THE BISHOP OF Feb. 20. } HEREFORD.

Copyhold Enfranchisement Act—Costs of Petition for Investment.

A Bishop, lord of a manor, enfranchised certain copyhold lands held of the manor under the Copyhold Enfranchisement Act, and the consideration money was paid into court. A petition was presented by the Bishop for the investment of the money:—Held, that the Copyhold Commissioners had a right to appear at the hearing of the petition, and that their costs of the petition and those of the Bishop were payable out of the consideration money.

The Bishop of Hereford, as lord of a manor, with the consent of the Copyhold Commissioners, enfranchised certain copyhold hereditaments held of the manor, and the money received in respect thereof was paid into court under the Copyhold Enfranchisement Act.

A petition was presented by the Bishop for the payment of the costs of, and incident to, the petition out of the fund in court, and for the investment of the remainder, as directed by the act, and for the payment of the dividends. The Copyhold Commissioners were served with the petition and appeared. The petition came on to be heard, and an order was made according to the prayer of the petition.

The Registrar having declined to draw up the order, on the ground that Sir J. L. Knight Bruce had decided that the Commissioners ought not to have been served with the petition, and that the costs were not payable out of the fund, the matter was now again brought before the Court.

By the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35. s. 56, it was enacted that a lord of a manor, whatever might be his estate or interest therein, with the consent of the Commissioners under the act, might enfranchise lands holden of the manor for any sum, &c.

The 58th and 69th sections of the act relate to the expenses of the enfranchisement.

By the 73rd section, it is enacted "that all monies paid for enfranchisement from the lord's right, where such lord shall be only entitled for a limited estate, shall, if the same exceed 200*l.*, be paid into the Bank of England in the name and with the privity of the Accountant General of the Court of Exchequer, to be placed to his account there, ex parte the Copyhold Commissioners, pursuant &c., and shall, when paid in, therein remain until the same shall, by order of that Court, made upon the petition of the party who would have been entitled to the rents and profits of the manor had no such enfranchisement been made, be applied in the discharge of incumbrances affecting the manor, or in the purchase of lands to be settled to the like uses; and, in the mean time, the same money may, by order of the said Court, upon application thereto, be invested by the said Accountant General in his name in the purchase of 3*l.* per cent. consolidated bank annuities, or 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, the dividends in the mean time to be paid to the person who would have been entitled to the rents and profits of the manor if no enfranchisement had been made."

Mr. Willcock, for the petition.

Mr. Prendergast, for the Copyhold Commissioners.

PARKER, V.C. said that he had communicated with Lord Justice Knight Bruce, and that he should decide that service of the petition on the Commissioners was necessary, and that they had a right to appear on the hearing. As to costs, the question was one of more difficulty, and, but for a decision of the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, (Ex parte the Archbishop of Canterbury (1)), who granted the costs of the petitioner out of the fund, he should have doubted his jurisdiction to make any order as to the costs of the petitioner or the Commissioners. He should, however, follow that precedent; and, as the Commissioners had a right to appear at the hearing of the petition, he thought that the proper order on the present occasion would be, that the petitioner should pay the costs of the Commissioners, and add them to his own, and take such costs out of the fund.

PARKER, V.C. }
March 10. } STRUTT v. BRAITHWAITE.

Power of Appointment—Exclusive Powers—Attaining Twenty-one—Estate in Fee—Surviving a Parent.

By a settlement made on the marriage of A. and B. real estate was conveyed to trustees and their heirs upon trust for A for life, with remainder for B. for life, and, after the death of the survivor, in trust to apply the rents in the maintenance of all and every the children of A. and B, until such children should attain twenty-one, and, when such children should attain twenty-one, to convey the premises to such children in such manner as A. and B. jointly, or the survivor should appoint, and, in default of appointment, to convey the premises to such children equally as tenants in common; and, if there should be but one such child who should attain twenty-one, to convey the premises to such child, his or her heirs and assigns:—Held, that the power of appointment was not an exclusive one, and, that in default of appointment, all the children took the property as tenants in common in fee, without reference to their attaining twenty-one or surviving their parents.

By indentures of settlement, dated the 12th and 13th of April 1784, made on the marriage of John Strutt and Sarah Susanah his wife, certain real estates, the property of Mrs. Strutt, were conveyed to H. Mayo, J. Oxland, and N. Taylor, and their heirs, upon trust that they, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of the survivor, should be seised thereof upon trust for Mr. Strutt for life, with remainder to Mrs. Strutt for life. The settlement then proceeded as follows:—"And from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them, the said J. Strutt and S. S. Strutt, upon trust to pay and apply the rents, issues, and profits of the same premises towards the maintenance and education of all and every the child or children of the said J. Strutt on the body of the said S. S. Strutt lawfully to be begotten, until such child or children shall attain his, her, or their age or ages of twenty-one years; and, when and as such child or children respectively (if more than one) shall attain the said age of twenty-one years, then upon trust to release and convey the same premises unto such child or children, in such manner, shares, and proportions, for such uses and estates, as they, the said J. Strutt and S. S. Strutt, shall jointly in their lives' time, or which the survivor of them alone by any deed, &c. shall appoint; and, for want of, and in default of any such deed, will, disposition, direction, or appointment, then upon trust to release and convey all the same premises, with the appurtenances, unto and amongst such children equally, share and share alike, to hold as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and if there shall be but one such child who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, then upon trust to release and convey all the same premises, with the appurtenances, unto such only child, and his or her heirs for ever. Provided that, in case it shall happen that there shall be no such lawful issue of the said then intended marriage, or, being any, all such issue shall happen to die, without having any lawful issue, in the lifetime of both the said J. Strutt and S. S. Strutt, or after her decease, and in the lifetime of the said John Strutt, then and in either of such cases the said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, shall stand seised of and convey the same premises to such uses as the said S. S. Strutt shall by any deed or will, &c. appoint, to take effect from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them, the said J. Strutt and S. Susannah his intended wife, or their issue under the age of twenty-one years, and without issue as aforesaid; and, in default of, and subject to, any such last-mentioned direction or appointment, upon trust to convey the premises to the right heirs of the said S. S. Strutt."

In 1830 Mrs. Strutt died.

There were eight children of the marriage. Three of these children died before 1835, one of whom was an infant.

At the date of the settlement next stated five of the children were living: Mrs. Braithwaite, Joseph Henry, Sarah, Maria, and Matilda.

By an indenture, dated the 12th of January 1835, John Strutt, in exercise of the power given by the settlement of the 13th of April 1784, appointed that the hereditaments and premises comprised in the said settlement should, subject to his life estate, go, remain, and be to the use of the said Joseph Henry, Sarah, Maria, and Matilda Strutt equally as tenants in common, and their respective heirs and assigns, and directed that the trustees of the settlement should, immediately after his death, convey and assure the said hereditaments and premises accordingly.

Joseph Henry died in 1848 having attained twenty-one, and Mr. Strutt died in 1850.

The suit was instituted for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the Court as to the effect of the above-mentioned deeds with reference to the shares of the children.

PARKER, V.C.—This is a very obscure settlement, and no one in construing it can feel sure what was the construction which the parties contemplated at the time. Mr. Strutt appoints to some only of the objects of the power, and this raises the question whether the power did or did not authorize an exclusive appointment. This turns entirely, as it appears to me, on the grammatical force to be attributed to the word "such" in the clause giving the power to appoint "unto such child or children, in such manner, shares and proportions, and for such uses and estates, as they, the said John Strutt and Sarah Susannah, should jointly in their lives' time, or the survivor of them should appoint." If "such" meant such as they should choose to appoint, there can be no doubt that the power authorized an exclusive appointment. If "such" is to be taken in the sense of "the said," the power did not authorize an exclusive appointment.

In the first place I find a trust to pay and apply the rents, issues, and profits towards the maintenance and education of all and every the child (this is the only place in which the word "the" is used) or children of the said John Strutt on the body of the said Sarah Susannah lawfully begotten, until such child or children (this must mean all—not excluding any) "shall attain his, her, or their age or ages of twenty-one years; and when and as such child or children respectively, if more than one, should attain the said age of twenty-one years, then upon trust to release and convey the same premises unto such child or children" (which must mean the said child or children following the previous description). The next place where I find it introduced seems to me to remove all doubt whatever: "And in default of any such deed, will, disposition, direction, or appointment, then upon trust to release and convey all the same premises, with the appurtenances, unto and amongst such children equally share and share alike" (the word "such" must there have the same grammatical force as it had where the parents were empowered to appoint); "and if there shall be but one such child who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, then upon trust to release and convey all the same premises, with the appurtenances, unto such only child and his or her heirs for ever." I think that the power did not warrant an exclusive appointment; and, therefore, the appointment by Mr. Strutt was bad, and there must be a declaration to that effect.

The next question is, who are the parties to take in default of appointment? Three constructions were contended for. It was first said, that those children only were to take who survived the surviving parent. I think that there is no ground for this construction. This was a marriage settlement, and the Court always endeavours to construe marriage settlements so as not to make the interest of the children depend on their surviving their parents. In the case referred to by Mr. Hall (Gordon v. Hope), there was a trust to pay to and amongst all and every the children and issue of the marriage, to be paid to sons at twenty-one, and to daughters at twenty-one or marriage, on the death of the parents: and it was held, that the fund vested in the children as they came of age, though they died in the lifetime of the parents. There can be no doubt, then, that in this case the children attaining twenty-one took vested interests, though they died in the lifetime of their parents.

The next question is, whether the children who died under twenty-one took any interest; and as to this, I must say that I do not see my way, on legal principles of construction, to exclude any child who died under twenty-one from taking a share in the property. It is on these words of gift, in default of appointment, that the argument arose: "Upon trust to release and convey all the same premises, with the appurtenances, unto and amongst such children equally, share and share alike, to hold as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants; and if there shall be but one such child who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years," &c. This, it was contended, was a gift to all of them at twenty-one, for that by the word "such" was meant such as should attain twenty-one. It is not, however, safe, on an instrument so framed as this, to depart a single step from the literal meaning of the words. If to attain twenty-one was to be the condition of vesting, what became of the share of a daughter marrying under twenty-one, and dying before that age? There was not to be a gift over in case of one dying leaving lawful issue during the parents' existence. A daughter, therefore, dying under twenty-one leaving a child, would prevent that gift over taking effect, though she took no share,—which would be incongruous. I think that none of the children were to be excluded.

The next question is, what estates did they take in default of appointment? I think that there is no doubt they took estates in fee. The conveyance to the trustees was in fee. "Upon trust," (after saying they were to convey to such children as the parents should appoint) "to convey in default of appointment to the children as tenants in common; and, if only one, then all to such one, his heirs and assigns." In a marriage settlement which is for the benefit of the children a direction to convey must mean to convey to children in fee.

March 13. } WYKE v. ROGERS.

Principal and Surety—Collateral Security—Reservation of Rights against Surety—Parol Evidence.

J. W. joined in a bond as surety, and the creditor subsequently took a promissory note from the principal debtor, payable at two months, for the balance due upon the bond. The principal debtor becoming insolvent, and the note being unpaid, the creditor sued J. W. on the bond, who thereupon filed his bill for an injunction. It was proved that at the time of taking the note there was a general understanding between the principal debtor and the creditor that the remedies upon the bond should not be thereby affected :—Held, that this general understanding amounted to a stipulation between the parties preventing the legal consequences that would have otherwise flowed from the transaction, and that the surety was not released.

An agreement that a dealing between the creditor and principal debtor shall not operate as a discharge of the surety may be proved by parol evidence.

This was an appeal from an order made by Knight Bruce, V.C., on further directions.

In 1843, the plaintiff joined one Evans in a joint and several bond to the defendant Rogers in the penal sum of 800*l.*, conditioned for the payment of 400*l.* and interest, which sum was paid by the defendant to Evans, with the consent of the plaintiff. In January 1844 the plaintiff paid to the defendant 120*l.* on account of the principal secured by the bond. In January 1845 the defendant applied to Evans for the payment of the balance due upon the bond, and Evans thereupon gave to the defendant a promissory note as follows :—

“ Abergavenny, Jan. 20, 1845.—280*l.* Two months after date, I promise to pay Mrs. Alice Rogers, or her order, the sum of 280*l.*, value received. S. Evans.”

An action was afterwards brought by the defendant against Evans upon the note, and judgment recovered, but no execution was issued, Evans being insolvent. The defendant then commenced an action against the plaintiff and Evans, for the balance of 280*l.* due upon the bond and arrears of interest. The plaintiff filed his bill against A. Rogers and Evans, alleging that at the time of giving the note there was an agreement between the defendant and Evans, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, that the bond should not be put in force until the note should arrive at maturity, and charging that under the circumstances the plaintiff's liability upon the bond as surety was discharged, and it prayed that the action might be restrained. The answer of the defendant stated that at the time of the giving of the promissory note it was distinctly understood and agreed that it was not to be considered as payment of the balance due upon the bond, and denied any undertaking by the defendant for postponing the remedies upon the bond.

At the hearing, the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce directed an inquiry whether, at the time the promissory note was given, there was any and what agreement entered into between Rogers and Evans with respect to the bond in the pleadings mentioned, and under what circumstances the promissory note was given, with liberty to state special circumstances. The Master found that the promissory note was not given in discharge of the bond, and that there was a general understanding between Rogers and Evans that the remedy on the bond was not to be taken away ; but he found that there was no written, nor, beyond the general understanding before mentioned, any distinct parol agreement, respecting the bond, between Rogers and Evans.

The cause coming on for further directions, the plaintiff not appearing, the Vice Chancellor, after hearing the report and the evidence, dissolved the injunction, and ordered that the defendant should be at liberty to proceed with the action, and that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the suit, and all further proceedings should be stayed.

The plaintiff then appealed.

[The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Is the plaintiff rightly before the Court upon appeal, when, by his own neglect, the judgment of the Court below has not been exercised upon the question? The proper course was to apply to the Vice Chancellor to have the case reheard.]

Upon the consent of the defendant's counsel, the Court allowed the appeal to proceed.

Mr. Cooper, Mr. Bilton, and Mr. J. Brown, for the appellant.—During the two months the promissory note had to run, no proceedings could have been taken upon the bond against the principal debtor ; and, consequently, the surety was discharged. The reservation of the remedies against the surety ought to appear on the instrument giving time ; and parol evidence of the understanding of the parties to the deed that the remedies against the sureties should be reserved, cannot be admitted.

Lewis v. Jones, 4 B. & C. 506; s. c.
3 Law J. Rep. K.B. 270.

Mr. Wigram, Mr. Bovill, and Mr. Pearson, contra.—The promissory note was not a discharge either at law or in equity, for it did not suspend the remedies upon the bond; it was merely a collateral security—Pring v. Clarkson (1). It is upon the plaintiff to prove that the remedies on the bond were suspended, and the Master's report negatives that fact.

Mr. Cooper replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the plaintiff had joined with Evans in a bond for 400*l.* to the defendant as surety. 120*l.*, part of that sum, had been paid, and the remaining 280*l.* was still unpaid. In that state of things a promissory note for the 280*l.* was given by Evans to the creditor, payable at two months. The effect of that at law was in no manner to impeach the bond, which remained as effective at law as it was before. A question, however, might arise upon the circumstances, whether that promissory note did necessarily, in the absence of agreement, operate as a discharge of the surety; that is, whether it was simply a collateral security, or whether from its being payable at two months it must not be understood as giving two months' time to the principal debtor so as to prevent the remedy upon the bond during that period. All the cases prove that if at the time the security is taken, which might operate as a discharge of the surety, the remedies against the surety are reserved, there is no discharge of the surety. An action was brought upon the bond, and judgment recovered; and then the surety resorts to this Court to stay proceedings. The party coming for equitable relief against a legal obligation must shew a case that would operate to release the surety in equity from his obligation. Is anything shewn here which necessarily operates to give time to the principal debtor so as to release the surety? But I do not mean to give an opinion upon that point; because it is perfectly clear in law that if a security is taken, which, by postponing the time of payment, would operate to release the surety, the creditor may prove by parol evidence that an agreement was come to between the parties that the transaction should not have that operation. I assume that you could not give parol evidence to impeach the promissory note; but here the evidence is properly introduced to prevent that collateral operation which it is insisted the note had, namely, to prevent any proceedings being taken upon the bond in the mean time, and so to release the surety. Beyond doubt the evidence was admissible, and if the plaintiff thought it was not, instead of allowing the matter to go to the Master, the plaintiff should have insisted that no such evidence was admissible. However, the evidence before the Master was directly against the claim of the plaintiff. The defendant also, in her answer, swears that there was an understanding that the giving of the note was not to have the effect contended for by the plaintiff. Now, with respect to the parol evidence, a case was cited to shew that this understanding ought to have appeared on the face of the promissory note. The case cited proves no such thing. In that case (Lewis v. Jones) there was a regular instrument, by which the compromise was effected; and the Court held that you could not introduce parol evidence to vary the effect of that instrument. Nothing can be clearer than that. Then it was insisted that the promissory note was given in discharge of the bond. It would require a strong case to prove that, because it would be converting a specialty debt into a simple contract debt, without any consideration. The Master has found that there was no distinct parol agreement, but a general understanding between Rogers and Evans that the remedies on the bond should not be affected. There was no contract in terms, but a general understanding, which in point of law amounts to a stipulation that the taking of the promissory note should not be a bar. I am of opinion that there was no such dealing in this case with the principal debtor as would discharge the surety; and the appeal, therefore, must be dismissed, with costs.

March 16. } HEATH v. CHAPMAN.

Witness—Foreign Commission—Expenses.

A testator gave the residue of his property to be held in deposit for the purpose of inquiring whether there were any relations of his blood living, and if so the said residue was to be divided equally among them. Upon a reference to the Master to make inquiries in conformity with the above residuary bequest, the Master reported that a commission ought to be sent to Venice to examine witnesses as to who were the next-of-kin. The Court, upon the application of the executors, made an order for a foreign commission, and also directed what sum should be allowed out of the testator's property for the expenses of the commission.

This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of Domenico Dragonetti, a professor of music, who was a native of Venice, but had died domiciled in England, and by his will, after making various specific bequests and legacies, gave the residue of his property in the following terms:—"And as respects the residue of all the money and securities for money belonging to me at my bankers, in whatever bank or place the same may be, I desire that after all obligations, gifts, and engagements shall have been satisfied, the above-mentioned residue be held in deposit for the purpose of inquiring whether there be any relation of my blood living, and if such be found it is my will that all the said residue be given to my next-of-kin; and if there should be living several of my relations in equal degree of consanguinity, I desire that the said residue above alluded to be divided in equal shares for them and among them." In case no persons could be found to answer the above description, the testator gave the residue of his property for the benefit of various churches in Italy. Upon a decree made in the cause in December 1850, it was referred to the Master to inquire and state who, according to the laws of this country, would have been entitled at the testator's decease to his personal estate, and who were his next-of-kin or their legal personal representatives.

The Master, by his report, dated the 28th of January 1852, stated that one Giro-lamo Zener, resident at Venice, had made a claim, alleging himself to be the representative of the next-of-kin living at the time of the decease of the testator, and had carried in a state of facts in support of his claim, and by which, very material facts relating to the family of the testator appeared.

The report of the Master, after setting forth the effect of the evidence before him, and the names of the witnesses, all of whom resided at Venice, stated that it appearing that no further evidence could be obtained, shewing who were the next-of-kin of the testator unless the evidence above referred to should be obtained, and it appearing that the decree could not be further prosecuted without such further evidence, the Master certified that it was necessary that a commission should issue to take evidence in Venice and its neighbourhood in reference to the inquiries.

A motion was now made that in pursuance of the certificate of the Master, a commission might issue to take evidence in Venice and its neighbourhood in reference to the inquiries directed by the decree, and that all the costs, charges, and expenses incident thereto might be borne by the estate of the said D. Dragonetti, and that if necessary it might be referred to the Master to ascertain what would be a proper sum to be allowed for the commission, and that such sum might be raised out of the money forming part of the estate of the testator.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Elderton appeared for the plaintiffs, and submitted that this commission ought to be granted, since it was impossible otherwise for the trustees to carry out the trusts of the will. It was also urged that the expenses of the commission should be paid out of the testator's estate, and money for the purpose should be advanced, since the claimant was a person in humble life, and was quite unable to provide the expense himself.

Mr. James appeared for the Attorney General, and submitted that it was unnecessary to go to the expense of a commission, as it would be quite sufficient to obtain evidence by communicating with persons in Italy. There had already been a considerable outlay in searching for the testator's relations, and this would materially diminish the property which, in case of there being no next-of-kin found, would go to a charity.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This was an application for a commission to examine witnesses at Venice in a cause for the administration of the estate of a person who was by birth an Italian and a native of Venice, Domenico Dragonetti. He was a musical professor in this country, and had amassed a certain amount of personal property, which he has given first to his next-of-kin, and in his will there is this clause—(His Honour here read the residuary clause in the testator's will).—So the testator intimates very distinctly that he is uncertain whether he has even any, or how many, of his blood living; at all events entirely uncertain whether, if there be any, they will be capable of being ascertained, and quite uncertain as to what relatives they may be; and he clearly directs that the residue of his property shall be held in deposit for the purpose of inquiring whether there be such relatives of his blood. Now, it appears that the decree having made a reference to the Master to inquire what relations he had, the inquiry was in this form: He was to inquire and state to the Court, who, according to the laws in force in the country in which he should find the testator Domenico Dragonetti to have been domiciled, for regulating the succession of estates and effects of persons dying intestate, would have been entitled to his personal estate,—who was or were next-of-kin to the said testator at the time of his death, according to the laws in force in this country for the distribution of intestates' assets, and he was to inquire whether such person or persons were dead, and who were their representatives. So that the purpose of the inquiry was to ascertain what the testator himself had pointed out that it was necessary to ascertain, and he was unable to give any information by his will upon the subject.

It seems that the Master, in the course of last year, certified that a commission was necessary for the purpose of prosecuting this inquiry, and Lord Cranworth made an order for a commission; and upon appeal to the Lord Chancellor he reversed that decision and discharged the order, considering that it was not regular to grant the order in the then state of circumstances. It did not very distinctly appear what the Lord Chancellor's grounds were, but I think I can see quite ground enough for his having thought that in that state of things there could not be a commission. At that time there was nothing before the Master but a decree containing the reference for inquiry. Now, under a decree directing an inquiry as to certain matters of fact, the Master cannot merely upon that receive evidence upon anything. He must have before him some state of facts, or charge, or claim, brought in by somebody, in support of which, or in opposition to which, he may receive evidence. There must be something before the Master containing an allegation of something, for the Master to receive evidence at all; and that not only as to evidence under a commission directed to persons in a foreign country, but even evidence with reference to persons in this country he cannot receive, until there is some allegation before him upon which he can proceed. There seems to have been no such allegation, no such state of facts, charge, or claim before the Master; but it seems to have been considered that he was directed to inquire whether there was to be a commission, not for the purpose of taking evidence, but for the purpose of inquiry. Now, that alone, I think, would be a ground why it would not be regular in that state of things to grant a commission as the matter then stood in July last. Another ground seems to have been, that there was no particularity as to there being any witnesses who might be able to give any evidence under the commission. I believe another ground existed, though it did not appear very distinctly; that the commission was of a roving kind, that is to say, it was not addressed to any particular locality, but, I believe, addressed to Italy generally, which the Lord Chancellor very properly considered was too roving. There was quite sufficient ground in that state of things for the Lord Chancellor to have thought there ought not to be a commission.

The state of things now, when this application is made, is very different from what it was at that time. It appears, that since the proceedings in July last, a Venetian, a person at least residing in or near

Venice, of the name of Girolamo Zener, has brought before the Master a state of facts and charge, claiming that he is the next-of-kin, or, at least, one of the next-of-kin or blood relations of the testator, and in support of that state of facts produced before the Master various documents sent over from Venice to this country, which, although they do not establish perhaps in the shape of distinct evidence whether this Girolamo Zener is positively the next-of-kin, or one of the next-of-kin, nor establish who are the next-of-kin distinctly and conclusively, certainly do go to shew that there are a number of persons whose names are distinctly set forth, resident in or near Venice, who are capable of giving at least some evidence and information upon the subject of the testator's family, and evidence which may go either to substantiate or defeat the claim of Girolamo Zener who is claiming to be next-of-kin; and not only so, but will also probably tend, whatever may be the result of that particular claim, to do what the testator desired to have done, to have the inquiry made as to who are his blood relations, whether there be any such, and who they are. There is, therefore, now, in the existing state of things, no positive irregularity in granting the commission. The Master certifies, very much indeed in detail, the grounds upon which he considers a commission should go; and it appears clear that the commission would be quite right if it were applied for by Girolamo Zener, the claimant, for the purpose of his claim. The plaintiffs are the representatives of the testator, and they have no interest either in defeating or supporting the claim of Girolamo Zener, or anybody else; but they have a positive duty imposed upon them to do all they can to ascertain whether there are any blood relations or any next-of-kin, and who they are. That duty is imposed upon them by the testator's will, and this Court would be very reluctant to adopt a course, the effect of which must be that this testator's property must remain in this court I do not know till when. I do not know what steps are to be taken except in some way as here proposed. For the purpose of this Court really and truly adjudicating upon the rights of the persons who are entitled to the property, it is necessary to find out who they are. I have said there would be no irregularity in now granting a commission, if it were upon the application of Girolamo Zener, the claimant himself; nor would there be any irregularity in granting the commission upon the application of the plaintiffs themselves. Supposing the plaintiffs to be in a situation in which they had either an interest or a duty to oppose the claim, they might have a commission for the purpose of examining witnesses to oppose this man's claim: but their position is such that their duty is only to oppose in the sense of taking care that the evidence is distinctly and fully brought out to shew whether the man is or is not next-of-kin, or who may be next-of-kin. There being no irregularity in granting a commission, what presses upon my mind is this:—that it appears to me that the granting of a commission, irrespective of its being a mode of determining whether this man, who now claims, is or is not the next-of-kin;—irrespective of that, it appears to me to be a mode and machinery by which the Court can best, in all probability, work out what the testator directed to have done, that is, to have inquiries instituted, not merely a roving inquiry getting somebody to pick up all the gossip he can get in Venice and its neighbourhood, but by information derived from persons subjected to the test of examination under the solemnity of an oath. It appears to me I ought to grant a commission, first, because it is not irregular to do so, and it may be very serviceable with a view to the specific claim now pending before the Master, and also as a very convenient and a very desirable mode of working out what the testator desired should be worked out, and what this Court would be very desirous to work out, and which it is the duty of this Court for this purpose to work out. For these reasons, I think it right to grant this commission.

It is true, as was urged by the counsel for the Attorney General, it may be that the result of this commission may be to defeat the claimant Girolamo Zener. It may defeat his claim, and if it were merely to result in that, the observation of counsel would be very just—"Why should the testator's estate be wasted by an individual claim which may turn out to be no claim at all. But being satisfied as I am that the tendency at least, if not the certain result, of the commission will be to get inquiries effectively prosecuted upon the subject of the testator's relations, for that reason it appears to me that it will not be a waste of the testator's estate, even though the particular claim should fail, whatever should be the result of the claim.

Then comes the question, what ought to be done with reference to that part of the application which asks that a certain sum out of the testator's estate, now in court, should be delivered out for the purpose of working this commission? What is asked is a reference to the Master to ascertain what would be a proper sum; but it has occurred to me that, without the expense of going back to the Master, I could be satisfied by reasonable evidence of some persons competent to judge of the matter, of what would be required upon an economical scale fairly to work the commission without extravagance. For that purpose I should like to know how it is intended to work the commission. Its effectiveness would depend very much upon the mode in which, and the persons by whom, it is worked.

Upon a subsequent application to the Court an affidavit was produced, shewing in what manner it was proposed to work the commission, and what sum would be required for the purpose.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. made an order in conformity with the affidavit, and directed the money to be raised and paid out of the testator's estate.

HAWKINS v.
GATHERCOLE.

Advowson — Charge — Contempt — Receiver.

A judgment having been entered up against a beneficed clergyman for a debt, the Court held that it was a charge upon the benefice, and that the creditor was entitled to have a receiver of the profits of the benefice appointed. Another creditor of the clergyman obtained judgment upon his debt, and issued a writ of sequestration directed to the receiver already appointed:—Held, upon motion to commit the second creditor for contempt, that upon his undertaking to deal with the tithes as the Court should direct, and pay the costs of the motion, no order should be made.

This case came before Lord Cranworth in November 1850, and is reported 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 59; s. c. 1 Sim. N.S. 63.

The defendant, being a clergyman, and the owner of the advowson of the vicarage and parish church of Chatteris Nuns, mortgaged his advowson to the plaintiff, Mr. Hawkins, for 25,000*l.*, and as a further security for the principal and interest, gave a warrant of attorney for the same amount, upon which judgment was entered up. Shortly afterwards the defendant presented himself to the living. The interest upon the debt having become greatly in arrear, the plaintiff issued a writ of sequestration for the arrears of interest, and filed his bill for a receiver. The Court decided that under the 13th section of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. the judgment was a valid charge upon the living; and that the plaintiff having a legal right as against the profits of the living was entitled to make it available in equity, by having a receiver appointed. In pursuance of this decision, Mr. Burder was appointed receiver of the tithes and profits of the living of Chatteris Nuns. In April last, another judgment was recovered in the Court of Queen's Bench against the defendant, by J. S. Carrick, for the sum of 3,000*l.* and costs, and a writ of testatum fieri facias was issued, directed to the Sheriff of Cambridgeshire, indorsed to levy 1,254*l.* The sheriff returned that the defendant, Mr. Gathercole, had no goods in the bailiwick, but was vicar of the parish and parish church of Chatteris Nuns, having no lay fees. A writ of sequestrari facias was then directed to issue out of the Court of Queen's Bench, at the suit of Carrick against Mr. Gathercole, directed to the Bishop of Ely, commanding him to enter the vicarage of Chatteris Nuns, and take and sequester the same until he should have levied the said sum of 3,000*l.* and costs. A writ was accordingly issued, directing Mr. Burder, who was appointed the receiver in the original suit, to levy and receive the rents, tithes, oblations, fruits, issues and profits of the vicarage of Chatteris Nuns, and all the ecclesiastical goods belonging to the vicarage, or to the said M. A. Gathercole as vicar thereof, and out of the said profits and emoluments (if need be) to cause the cure of the said church to be duly served, and all other duties, charges, repairs, &c. to be done, and to pay the surplus in such manner as the said Bishop should direct.

A supplemental bill was then filed for the purpose of making Mr. Carrick a party to the original suit, and a notice of motion was now given to commit Carrick for contempt, in causing the sequestration to be issued.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Sydney Smith, in support of the motion, referred to the previous report of this case.—The proceedings already taken by Mr. Hawkins were well known to Mr. Carrick, who nevertheless commenced proceedings in the common law court, and obtained a judgment against the defendant. A writ was issued, to which there was a return of nulla bona, and that there were no lay fees. The effect of the order of Lord Cranworth was to bring all the profits of the living into court, in order that they might be held for the benefit of all those creditors who were properly entitled. The effect of the sequestration issued by Mr. Carrick would be to give him a priority over the other creditors—Russell v. the East Anglian Railways Company (1).

Mr. Malins and Mr. Shebbeare, for Mr. Carrick.—The proceedings at law and the publication of the writ were adopted in order to give Mr. Carrick a locus standi, so as to have his rights adjudicated upon, and so that Mr. Hawkins should not have the whole money, 24,500*l.*, to himself. The writ had not been executed so as to interfere with the receiver. Mr. Carrick only wanted to stand on an equal footing with the other creditors, and he considered that the course he had pursued was the best method of doing so. He was also desirous that the propriety of Lord Cranworth's decision should be ascertained. Mr. Carrick could not be bound by an order made in a suit to which he was not a party. He was desirous of disputing the validity of the receiver's appointment by appeal from Lord Cranworth's decision.

Mr. S. Smith, in reply.

Judgment reserved.

July 2.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This case came before me in this way:—a motion was made by Mr. Hawkins, the plaintiff, to commit one of the defendants, named Carrick, for contempt of court in having interfered with the possession of the receiver appointed by this Court. It appears that the plaintiff Hawkins, being a creditor of the first defendant, who is a clergyman, filed a bill against him, and got a receiver appointed. It is unnecessary to enter into the particular circumstances under which Hawkins proceeded; it is sufficient to say that Lord Cranworth determined that Hawkins was entitled to have a receiver appointed of the profits of the living of which Mr. Gathercole was the incumbent. Mr. Burder was appointed the receiver, and is still such. Mr. Carrick, another creditor of Mr. Gathercole, having recovered judgment against him for his debt, and sued out execution upon such judgment, and the sheriff having returned nulla bona, the defendant being a clergyman, the usual sequestration was issued by the Court of Queen's Bench, which is addressed to the Bishop, as a substitute for the sheriff, sometimes called the ecclesiastical sheriff, directing him to sequester the living of Mr. Gathercole, which was in his diocese of Ely. The sequestration was addressed to the Bishop of Ely in the usual course, and he was thereby authorized to sequester the living. The same gentleman was appointed sequestrator who is also the receiver, and the Bishop issues his sequestration; and in pursuance of the ordinary course, the sequestration is published by affixing it on the doors of the church in the living of which the defendant is incumbent. The effect of that sequestration is, that the Bishop, by the terms of it, authorizes, as far as by law he may, the sequestration of all and every the rents, tithes, profits, and other ecclesiastical goods, &c.

belonging to the vicarage of Chatteris Nuns. The effect of this sequestration was, that the sequestrator is directed by an authority which he is bound to obey, and which he dare not disobey, to collect the profits, &c. and apply the same for the benefit of the creditors, after the other ends have been answered, and the directions contained in the order complied with. The question now is, whether the act done by Mr. Carrick in procuring the sequestration to issue amounts to an interference with the possession of the receiver.

Mr. Carrick has done nothing more than in the ordinary course of legal process he is entitled to do by virtue of the judgment; but it is equally clear that when this Court has appointed a receiver, it will not allow the possession of that receiver to be disturbed by any one, however good his right may be; but the party conceiving that he has a right paramount to that of the receiver must, before he can presume to take any step, apply to this Court for leave to assert his right against the receiver. This is not an arbitrary rule, not a rule of tyranny, but one that is absolutely necessary, because it would be impossible for the Court otherwise to administer justice; for this Court will always take care to have justice done, and give any one who has a paramount right to the receiver, the means of asserting that right. The question is not whether Mr. Carrick in the abstract had a right to issue the sequestration,—most unquestionably he had,—but whether he has done anything without the leave of this Court which has disturbed the possession of the receiver. It was argued that it was true all this has been done, the sequestration issued, &c., but no disturbance has yet taken place; “wait and see whether the sequestrator does interfere with the possession of the receiver—whether he does collect and receive the rents and profits of the living so as to prevent the receiver from getting them in.” If that argument was a good one, the same rule would authorize an ejectment to be brought against the receiver; for it might be said “until execution is actually taken out, there is no disturbance of the receiver.” Now, it was clear that the Court would not allow a first step to be taken without its authority. It appears to me that the act which has been done does amount to a disturbance of the possession of the receiver. See how the matter stands. Any tithe-payer or any person liable to pay any of the dues of the living is in this predicament,—there might be a demand made by both parties, the sequestrator and the receiver. It is quite clear that the moment the sequestrator appointed by the Bishop does anything in the performance of his duty, he disturbs the possession of the receiver, and that is a step which it appears to me the Court will not permit. Mr. Carrick ought, before he issued the sequestration (being entitled to obtain the judgment), to have come to this Court stating the facts, and asking leave to do it. I think the Court would have allowed him to do what he has done, but upon terms. For this reason, it was necessary to give Mr. Carrick the position as between him and his debtor which he holds between himself and the other creditors. If the application had been made stating the fact of nulla bona being returned by the sheriff, the Court would then have allowed him to issue the writ upon the terms of undertaking to use the writ entirely in submission to the direction of this Court, and that the sequestrator should not receive the profits, &c. without the leave of the Court. It was represented, on the part of Mr. Carrick, that it was necessary to do what he did; and it was justly said that Mr. Carrick, by the very act of appointing the same person sequestrator as was previously appointed receiver, has indicated that he had no desire to interfere with the possession of the receiver, and had no wish to take the rents and issues of the living, but only that the receiver, being the same person as the sequestrator, should receive them.

I have not the smallest doubt that Mr. Carrick will now give the same undertaking as, had he applied to the Court before he had caused sequestration to issue, the Court would have required him to give before he would have been permitted to do so; but as he has done this without the leave of the Court, and thereby justified Mr. Hawkins, the plaintiff, in making this application to protect the receiver, Mr. Carrick must pay the costs of this application; and upon doing that and submitting to deal with the writ of sequestration in such manner as the Court shall from time to time direct, and undertaking that the sequestrator shall not receive any portion of the rents of the living, I make no further order on this motion.

PARKER, V.C. }
July 3. } In re STABLES.

Infant—Allowance to Parents out of Infant's Income.

The Court will not give a direct benefit out of an infant's income to his father.

A scheme by which an infant (whose father was living) was to be articted to a solicitor, and to live with an uncle residing in the same place, was approved of by the Court; and the uncle was appointed to act in the nature of a guardian to the infant, and to have an allowance out of his income. An application that an allowance might be made to the father, who lived at a distance, and was in very narrow circumstances, was refused.

This was a petition presented by an infant.

This petition stated that the infant, then seventeen years of age, was absolutely entitled to property which produced about 220*l.* a-year, that it was proposed that he should be at once articted to a solicitor named in the petition, who was willing to take him, and that he should, during his minority, reside with an uncle who lived in the same place as the solicitor.

The petition then contained these statements:—The father of the infant was living. He was a clergyman of the Church of England, but had no preferment, and was not entitled to any property whatever, and his only means of subsistence were the emoluments derived from teaching a village school, which amounted to no more than 20*l.* a-year. The father's residence was at a distance from the town where it was proposed the infant should be articted.

The petition then stated that it was proposed that the infant's uncle should be appointed to act in the nature of a guardian to him, and that an allowance of 90*l.* a-year should be paid to him for the infant's benefit, and that the father was willing that the above arrangement should be carried out, and that he did not wish to interfere with the infant in any way. The petition then stated that, under the circumstances of the case, it was proposed that an allowance of 20*l.* a-year should be paid to the father out of the infant's income not required for his maintenance. The petition prayed that the above scheme might be carried out, and that the uncle might be appointed to act in the nature of a guardian to the infant, and that the above-mentioned allowance should be paid to him for the infant's benefit, and that 20*l.* a-year might be paid to the father.

Mr. B. L. Chapman, for the petition, asked that the above-mentioned allowance of 20*l.* a-year should be paid to the father out of the income of the infant on the authority of the cases of Heysham v. Heysham (1) and Allen v. Coster (2). In Heysham v. Heysham the father of a female infant was dead, and her mother was living. The Court had passed over the mother and appointed another person to be the guardian of the infant. An order was made that 130*l.* should be paid to the guardian for the maintenance of the infant, and that 120*l.*, part of the infant's income, should be paid directly to the mother. In Allen v. Coster the principle of making an allowance to a parent directly, where the guardianship of the infant was in other hands, was recognized by Lord Langdale; though, as it was there contended that there was a gift to the father of the income, the point was not expressly decided.

PARKER, V.C. said, that in the case of Heysham v. Heysham a benefit was given to the mother. A father was bound to maintain his children, and he thought that he could not make an order giving him a direct benefit out of the income of the infant's property. In Allen v. Coster there was a sort of compromise. He must decline to make any order as to that part of the prayer of the petition which asked for an allowance to the father.

Ex parte THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN AND CITIZENS OF LINCOLN.

Charity—Scheme—Protection of the Interests of a large Body of Persons in a Matter before the Court.

A railway company took, for the purposes of their act, a piece of land belonging to the corporation of L. but over which the freemen of L. had certain rights. By one of the railway acts of the company it was enacted that, out of the purchase-money, the costs of the corporation should be paid, and that such a sum should be appropriated for the corporation as the Court of Chancery should, on the application of the corporation, direct, and that the residue should be applied for the permanent benefit of the freemen as the Court of Chancery should, on the same application, direct, and that notice of such application should be fixed on the door of the town hall. On an application by petition by the corporation of L. for a scheme,—Held, that the freemen of L. ought to be represented at the hearing.

In 1847 the Great Northern Railway Company took possession, for the purposes of their act, of certain lands in Lincoln, belonging to the corporation of Lincoln, but over which the freemen of Lincoln had certain rights of pasturage.

By the 14 & 15 Vict. c. cxiv., one of the Great Northern Railway Acts, it was enacted that it should be lawful for the mayor, aldermen and citizens of the city of Lincoln to convey the above-mentioned land to the company, free from the rights of pasturage thereon, and that, out of the purchase-money, certain costs and expenses of the corporation relating to the sale should be paid, and that such sum should be appropriated to the said mayor, aldermen and citizens as the Court of Chancery, by any order to be made in the matter of the act, and ex parte the mayor, aldermen and citizens of Lincoln, upon the application of the said mayor, aldermen and citizens, should order and direct, and that the residue should be applied for the permanent benefit of the freemen of Lincoln as the Court should by any order to be made in the same matter, and ex parte the corporation, upon such application as aforesaid, order and direct. To this the proviso following was added—"Provided, nevertheless, that seven days' notice of every such application as aforesaid, so to be made by the said mayor, aldermen and citizens, shall be given by affixing the same on the outer door of the town hall of the said city."

A petition was presented by the corporation of Lincoln, praying for a reference to the Master as to the application of the purchase-money and a scheme for the benefit of the freemen.

A notice had been placed on the door of the town hall in Lincoln, as required by the act, but none of the freemen had been served, and no one appeared on the petition on their behalf.

Mr. Baggallay, for the petition.

PARKER, V.C. said, that he thought that any interest that was to be protected ought to be protected properly. It did not appear that the freemen had appointed any committee to contract with the company for the sale. He thought that he could not make an order of reference to the Master as the matter then stood. The number of freemen being large, he considered that this was a case in which the Court should treat any bond fide selection as representing the whole. Without hearing the freemen upon the question, he did not see what directions could be given to the Master, nor how the proportion of the fund to go to the corporation could be determined. He desired that so many of the freemen should be served as would give a certainty that the body was fairly represented, and directed that the petition should stand over.

The freemen of Lincoln afterwards had a meeting to take the above matters into consideration, at which they appointed a committee to look after their interests. By the direction of the committee, counsel appeared for the freemen, and a sum was appropriated for their benefit, and a scheme was approved of by the Master. On the coming on of a petition for the confirmation of the Master's report,

Mr. Hallett, for the freemen, asked for their costs, and referred to the 80th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

PARKER, V.C. said, that the case as to the freemen's costs did not come within the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, but must be decided on the act directing the application of the purchase-money. In that act there was a particular mention of the costs of the corporation, and in the absence of any notice as to the costs of the freemen, he thought that he could not give them.

After some further discussion,—

His HONOUR said, that, upon evidence being produced of a resolution passed at a public meeting of the freemen that the costs should be paid out of the income of the fund appropriated for their benefit, he would make an order accordingly.

KINDERSLEY, }
V.C. } LONGSTAFF v. RENNISON.
May 24, 31. }

Promissory Note—Debt or Legacy—Mortmain—Power to call in Common Law Judge.

A testatrix directed her executors to pay the debt which she owed to two persons named, and for the security of the payment of which she had given her promissory note. The promissory note was voluntary:—Held, that whether this was a good debt or whether it was a legacy was a question for a court of law, and that it was not a case in which the Court could call in the assistance of a common law Judge under the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83. s. 8.

The testatrix gave the residue of her estate to her trustees to be applied towards establishing a school:—Held, that this gift was void under the Statute of Mortmain.

This case came on upon exceptions to the Master's report, the object of the parties being to have certain questions arising upon the will of Margaret Clay decided by the Court. The testatrix, Margaret Clay, by her will, dated the 8th of March 1844, directed the debt of 350*l.* and interest which she owed to the Rev. John Carrick and the Rev. George Sample, and for the security of the payment of which she had given them her promissory note payable to them or their order on demand, and all other her just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid by her executors; and the testatrix, after giving her real and personal estate to her trustees, J. Rennison and M. Roplewell, upon certain trusts therein mentioned, continued in the following words:—"And as to all the rest, residue and remainder of my said trust estate, monies, chattels and premises, after payment of the before-mentioned legacies, debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the expenses of proving and carrying into execution the trusts of this my will, and all the expenses incident thereto respectively, I will, bequeath, and direct my said trustees and the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors, administrators and assigns of such survivor, to pay and apply the same towards establishing a school in connexion with the Baptist Chapel at North Shields for the time being, and to pay the same over to the treasurer for the time being of such school, now or hereafter to be built, whose receipt shall be a good and sufficient discharge for the same to my said trustees."

The suit was instituted for the administration of the will; and upon a reference to the Master, he found that the promissory note alluded to by the testatrix was dated the same day as her will; and that she had handed the note over to her trustee Rennison to be given to Messrs. Carrick and Sample. She had also told Mr. Rennison that she wished the proceeds of the note to be applied for the use of the Baptist Chapel at Tynemouth, but she desired that Messrs. Carrick and Sample might not be informed of her wishes until after her death. The promissory note was given to Mr. Carrick about four months after the date of the will; but Mr. Rennison did not communicate the wishes of the testatrix respecting its application until after her death. The Master, under these circumstances, found that the note was made voluntarily; that there was no debt owing by the testatrix to Messrs. Carrick and Sample, but that the amount thereof was intended as a legacy to them; that at the date of the testatrix's will there was no school in connexion with the Baptist Chapel at North Shields, nor was there any such school now existing, nor had any land been purchased as a site for building a school.

Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Hislop Clarke, for the plaintiff, who was the heir-at-law and one of the next-of-kin of the testatrix, said,—the first question was, whether the direction to pay the 350*l.* was in satisfaction of a debt, or whether, if there was no debt, it was good as a legacy to that amount; and the other question was, whether the gift for establishing a school was not void under the Statute of Mortmain, on the ground that it was impossible to establish a school without purchasing land upon which the school should be built. The testatrix distinctly treated this as a debt; but if it were a legacy it was given upon a secret trust, and that trust was void—

Blandford v. Thackerell, 2 Ves. jun. 238.

Mr. Lee, for the executor, submitted that a legacy for establishing a school was not void under the Statute of Mortmain. There was no reason why a school should not be established in a house rented for the occasion, or in the chapel itself, a plan which was commonly adopted by all classes of dissenters.

Mr. Smythe appeared for Messrs. Carrick and Sample, and contended that this was a debt, and ought to be paid before the legatees of the testatrix. It was a debt, though there was no valuable consideration appearing upon the transaction.

Mr. James appeared for the Attorney General.

Mr. K. Parker, in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—If the effect of the Master's report is, that this is found to be a legacy properly payable to these gentlemen, or the survivor of them, there can be no question about the matter; but, if it is to be treated as undecided, then the question arises whether it is a debt. Now, upon that point, in strict propriety, I ought to send the case to a court of common law, and I do not see how I can escape it, the question being whether, upon the death of the testatrix, the sum of 350*l.* was due from her to Messrs. Carrick and Sample. If there was no debt at her death it could not become one afterwards, nor could the will make it so; therefore, the question is, whether at the death of the testatrix any debt was owing by her, and it is, I think, doubtful how a court of law would deal with this question. It is not as if there were a number of decided cases from which I could draw a clear conclusion as to what a court of law would decide, but it seems to me an open question, and such a question as a Judge in equity cannot take upon himself to decide.

As to the other point, with respect to the residue, there is no doubt that as regards any part of it which consists of realty, or savours of the realty, so far the devise is void; and then comes the question as to the pure personalty, whether that is well given to the charitable purpose mentioned. The question is, whether it is void on the ground that in the execution of that trust there would be a necessity for the purchase of real estate for the site of the school. In The Attorney General v. Williams there was no gift of the corpus of the fund to establish a school, but a direction to pay out of the dividends a sum of money to the master, and to apply the surplus in a different way, so that in the due execution of that trust there could be no application of the dividends in the purchase of land. But in the case before me the corpus of the fund is given upon trust to pay and apply the same towards establishing a school. Now, it is true that a school might be established without buying land; but the question is, would it not be a due execution of this trust to apply this fund in buying land and building a school-house? It clearly would be. I do not say it is a necessary inference; but, there being no existing school, it would be a due performance of the trust to buy land and build a school. Taking it altogether, it appears to me a case in which, though it might be possible, if there were an existing school to apply this fund towards the establishment of the school, yet, there being no school, the direction to apply the money in this manner is void. I think this is a case within the purview of the Mortmain Statutes, and I ought to hold the gift of the residue, as applicable to pure personalty, to be void.

An application was then made by Mr. Smythe, in which all the parties concurred, that the Vice Chancellor would call in the assistance of a common law Judge to decide this case, in order that the expense of sending it to law might be avoided—the amount of property in dispute being very small. It was submitted that the Court had power to take this course under the 8th section of the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, the act appointing the Lords Justices, which enacted, that “it shall be lawful for the said Court of Appeal and the Master of the Rolls, and the Vice Chancellors, and for each of the said jurisdictions, to sit, with the assistance of any Judge of either of Her Majesty’s Courts of Common Law at Westminster, upon the request of the Lord Chancellor, if any such common law Judge shall find it convenient to attend upon such request.”

KINDERSLEY, V.C. said, — that there might be cases involving points with respect to which the assistance of a common law Judge would be very valuable, but he did not think that this clause applied to a case where the whole decision depended upon a point of law. Before the act referred to, the Lord Chancellor had power to ask any of the Judges to assist him, but that never was held to supersede the practice of sending cases to common law where there was a dry point of law to be decided. Assuming, however, that there was such a power, he did not think this was a case for the exercise of it. It was clear that, when the opinion of a Court of common law upon a case like this was required, it was of great importance to have the case argued before four Judges and by common law counsel. Under these circumstances, he should decline to call in the assistance of a Judge;

but, as it was probable the state of the assets would be such as to render the argument useless, and, as he felt clear that this was not a legacy, if it was a debt, but as it might be that the same parties would be entitled in either case, he would consider the point; for if he came to the opinion that it was a legacy, the question as to whether it was a debt would perhaps be immaterial.

Judgment reserved.

May 31.—KINDERSLEY, V.C. — In this case I was anxious to see whether I could save the parties the expense and delay of going to law. The testatrix, Mrs. Clay, on the same day that she made her will, executed a promissory note for 350*l.*, by which she promised to pay to two persons 350*l.*, together with interest, for value received, and that was without consideration, voluntary; and she did not on that day deliver the bill to the payees, but to her solicitor. Then Mr. Rennison proves that he was directed by the testatrix to get the note from the solicitor and hand it over to the payees, and she communicated to Mr. Rennison what her intention was about the property, and the object of the trust was to be communicated to the trustees. So Mr. Rennison did deliver over the promissory note to Carrick and Sample. Then, on the same day on which she executed the note she made her will, and referred to the note in this way—“I order and direct particularly the debt of 350*l.* and interest which I owe to the Rev. J. Carrick and the Rev. G. Sample, and for the security of the payment of which I have given them my promissory note, payable to them on demand, and all other my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid by my executors hereinafter mentioned.” So she treats this as being a debt, and she directs the debt and all other debts to be paid by her executors. Now, the Master has reported that in his opinion this is good as a legacy, at the same time submitting the matter to the opinion of the Court. It appeared questionable whether on the authorities, and whether on a trial at law the Court would decide it was a legal debt. I have formed no opinion of that; but, at all events, it was questionable: so my determination was to send the case to law to have the question tried, whether it was a debt; but considering that if it was not valid as a debt, it would be as a legacy, and as it is immaterial whether it be a legacy or debt, and as the only way in which it could make any difference would be upon the subject of legacy duty, and as the legatees are willing to take it as a legacy and to pay the duty, and as they are also willing to take it without having priority over any other legacies, I may, I think, under these circumstances, affirm the Master's report and decide that it is a legacy. It will then be subject to legacy duty and will not be prior to other legacies, and I ought to declare that the amount is due as a legacy on the trusts declared by the testatrix, that is, subject to the secret trusts. The effect of doing it in this way will be, to leave the parties unfettered, in case they wish to take the opinion of another Court. Under this declaration, so much as consists of real estate will go to the heir, but so much as consists of personal estate will go to the trustees.

WEBB v. WOOLLS.

Will—Precatory Words—Absolute Bequest—Trust and Confidence.

A testator, by his will, bequeathed all his property of whatsoever description to his wife, her executors, administrators and assigns, to and for her and their own use and benefit, upon the fullest trust and confidence reposed in her, that she would dispose of the same to and for the joint benefit of herself and his children :—Held, that the widow of the testator was entitled to have the entire residuary property transferred and paid to her for her own use and benefit.

This was a claim filed by the plaintiff, Jane Webb, who was the executrix appointed under the will of her husband, Richard Webb, against Edward Woolls, who was the executor appointed by the will jointly with the plaintiff, and against the children of the testator, for the purpose of having an account taken of the estate and effects of the testator which had been received by the defendant, E. Woolls.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

The claim now came on upon further directions, and a question was raised as to the construction of the will of R. Webb, dated the 4th of June 1836, which was in the following words :—" This is the last will and testament of me, Richard Webb, miller. All my property of whatsoever description, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or which I may be possessed of at the time of my death, I give and bequeath the same and every part thereof unto my dear wife Jane, her executors, administrators and assigns to and for her and their own use and benefit, upon the fullest trust and confidence reposed in her, that she will dispose of the same for the joint benefit of herself and my children. And I hereby appoint my said wife and my friend Edward Woolls executrix and executor of this my will and testament, hereby revoking all previous testamentary papers at any time heretofore made by me."

The question was, whether the widow of the testator was entitled absolutely to the property bequeathed by the above will, or whether a trust was created for the benefit of her children.

Mr. Shapter appeared for the plaintiff.

Mr. Beavan, for the defendant, Edward Woolls ; and

Mr. Murray, for the other defendants.

Wood v. Wood, 3 Hare, 65.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This is one of a class of cases which are extremely difficult to arrive at a conclusion upon. It is one of those cases in which a gift being made to the parent, by the words of the will, a question is raised as to whether a trust is created for the benefit of the children or family of that legatee. In the present case the words of the will are short, and certainly very distinct; and I have not been able to find any case, or rather, any decided case, which appears to me entirely to govern the present. The words of the will are these, "This is the last will and testament of me, Richard Webb. All my property of whatsoever description, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, or which I may be possessed of at the time of my death, I give and bequeath the same and every part thereof unto my dear wife Jane, her executors, administrators and assigns to and for her and their own use and benefit." Now, if it stopped there, of course there would be no question, because it is not only a gift to the wife, her executors, administrators and assigns, but it goes on to declare that the party or parties who are to benefit by that gift are the wife, her executors, administrators, and assigns. It is a gift to her of the legal interest, and an express gift to her of the whole beneficial interest. If she is alive when the property is realized it would go to her; if she had died before the property was realized, it would go to her executors and administrators for their own use and benefit, of course, as part of her estate; and if she had made an assignment of it, then to her assigns for the use and benefit of those assigns. And nothing can be more express and distinct than the testator's intention, that the whole beneficial interest should belong, in fact, to the wife, or to those claiming under her, either as her executors or administrators, or as her assigns. And, then, I may observe that if that be so, if in the words which follow there is anything that imports that there is to be a benefit for some parties other than the wife, her executors, administrators and assigns, such words would necessarily be in direct contradiction to the language which I have just read. Now the words which follow are these, "Upon the fullest trust and confidence reposed in her, that she will dispose of the same for the joint benefit of herself and my children; and I hereby appoint my said wife and my friend Edward Woolls, of Uxbridge, executrix and executor of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all previous testamentary papers heretofore made by me." That is the whole of the will. Now, the question is, whether that last clause,—“upon the fullest trust and confidence reposed in her, that she shall dispose of the same for the joint benefit of herself and my children,”—creates a trust for the benefit of the widow and her children, contradicting an express direction in a prior part of the will, that the gift is to the wife for her own use and benefit.

Now, one rule of construction, which is quite elementary, appears to me to be applicable to this case, which is this,—that if there be two clauses or sentences, or branches of a sentence, in a will capable of two different constructions, according to one of which constructions the two sentences or branches of a sentence would contradict each other, but according to the other construction, the two clauses or sentences, or branches of a sentence, would be in accordance with each other, carrying no contradiction with them, you should adopt that construction which would make the two clauses agree, instead of putting a construction upon them which would make them contradict each other. Now, here we have not only two sentences, but two parts of the same sentence. If I am to put upon the latter branch of the sentence a construction the effect of which would be to create a trust, that is, a trust which might be enforced in this court for the benefit of the children as well as the wife,—if, I say, I put that construction, I make these two branches of the same sentence directly contradict each other. Now, is there any construction which I can put on that last branch which will prevent that contradiction? I think there is. I think I may fairly put this construction on the latter clause,—that the latter clause was intended, not for the purpose of creating a trust for the benefit of the wife and children, which the children could enforce against the wife, but simply for the purpose of declaring that in giving all his property to his wife for her own use and benefit, making her the absolute mistress of the property, and of the mode of disposing of it, all he meant to do by the latter clause was to express that he reposes in his wife full confidence that she will dispose of it for the joint benefit of herself and her children, without intending to impose upon her the obligation to do so.

Now, in looking through all the cases (and I think I have examined them all), those that were cited, and those that were subsequently handed up,—and there is a note of several others in those,—I have not been able to find any case which is in all respects the same as this. The nearest case to it I think, or one of the nearest cases to it, is that of Crockett v. Crockett in 1 Hare, and again in another stage of the cause in 5 Hare, and then upon appeal, in 2 Ph. Now, in that case the language of the will was this, “My desire is, that all and every part of my property shall be at the disposal of my most true and lawful wife Caroline Crockett:” of course, if it stopped there, there would be no doubt, since giving the property to be at her disposal would be to give it to herself absolutely. Then it goes on to say, “for herself and her children, in the event of any unforeseen accident happening to myself, which God forbid, and I recommend the arrangement of all my affairs to my friend J. Gore.” Now, the wide difference between that case and the present is this, that there is not in Crockett v. Crockett as in this case, first of all a gift to the wife, her executors, administrators and assigns, to and for her and their own use and benefit; there is simply a direction that the property shall be at the disposal of the wife for herself and children. In that case the Vice Chancellor Wigram held that the wife and children took as joint tenants, and one of the children, who had attained twenty-one, having applied for his share on that footing, Vice Chancellor Wigram gave him an equal share with the wife and the other children. When it came by way of appeal before Lord Cottenham, Lord Cottenham reversed that decision. He reversed the declaration which Vice Chancellor Wigram had made,—that the wife and the children took as joint tenants, and reversed the direction to pay an equal share to the child who had come of age, but he declined to decide what the rights of the parties were. He said that no doubt the wife had a personal interest in the fund, and that as between herself and her children she was, as he said, either a trustee with a large discretion as to the application of the fund, or she had a power in favour of her children, subject to a life interest in herself. And having stated that one or other of those two was the right construction His Lordship there left it, and I cannot help thinking, left it there on account of the enormous difficulty in saying which of those two was the right construction. His Lordship gave reasons why he thought it not necessary to decide it, but the fund was in consequence left in court, and the dividends had been previously ordered to be paid to the wife by Vice Chancellor Wigram. Lord Cottenham continued that, and therefore there remained in court the fund, the wife receiving the dividends without any direction how to apply them: there was no declaration of any interest or trust for the benefit of the children; but it was left in this uncertain way, either it was a trust with a large discretion in the trustee, or if it was not that, then it was a life estate in the wife with a power of appointment to the children, such either as were then living, or such as might be living at her death. Very little instruction is to be gained from that case; but even if it had been fully decided, it does not appear to me to touch the present case for the reason I have mentioned, that in the present case the testator sets out by declaring and directing—and by declaring and directing in the very same sentence (for the whole will is but one sentence)—that the gift to his wife in the first instance is a gift to and for the use and benefit of herself and her executors, administrators and assigns. Now, there is no such clause in the will in Crockett v. Crockett: it is only a direction that the property should be at the disposal of the wife for herself and her children.

There is another case of Wood v. Wood which has a little bearing upon this, but not sufficient bearing to make it necessary to refer to the case more specifically. But another case decided by Vice Chancellor Wigram is somewhat like the present, or rather I should say somewhat like Crockett v. Crockett,—the case of Raikes v. Ward. The language in the will in that case was this: “I give to my dear wife Marianne all my personal estate, to the intent that she may dispose of the same for the benefit of herself and our children, in such manner as she may deem most advantageous." Now, the difference between that case and the present is this, that although there is a gift in the first instance to the wife, so far from there being any declaration that that gift is for the use and benefit of the wife, as there is in the present case, it is a gift to her expressly to the intent that she may dispose of the same "for the benefit of herself and our children in such manner as she may deem most advantageous." Now, in that case the Vice Chancellor Wigram gave his opinion that there was a trust, but that the Court would not deprive the widow of the honest exercise of the discretion which the testator had vested in her. It will be observed that in that will there are express directions that the wife is to have a discretion as to what she considers the best mode of disposing of the property for herself and children; and therefore, though there was no decree, because the matter was necessarily referred to the Master to take the accounts, the Vice Chancellor expressed his opinion—I think a very just and sound opinion—that there was a trust there, and that there was by the express terms of the will a discretion to be exercised by the wife, which, if honestly exercised, the Court could not interfere with.

These two cases of Crockett v. Crockett and Raikes v. Ward appear to me the two cases which most nearly approach the present. At the same time, neither the one nor the other appears to me to govern the case now before me; I think that I must declare that the wife is entitled to have the whole residuary personal estate transferred and paid to her for her own use and benefit, and decree accordingly. By that means it appears to me that I am making a declaration which expresses her right almost in the very terms of the will; at the same time I shall be directing that the property be handed over to her, to be dealt with by her as she thinks fit, as any other property which is to be for her own use and benefit.

And I may observe, that there are two cases which, though not governing the present, might possibly help to shew that I should be right in so deciding. I refer to the cases of Cooper v. Thornton and

Robinson v. Tickell. In Cooper v. Thornton, the testator, by his will, gave "to Thomas Cooper 100*l.* to be equally divided between himself and his family;" and after the death of Thomas Cooper, and of the executor who had paid the 100*l.* to Thomas Cooper, the children filed a bill against the surviving executor, who was the widow of the testator, and also, I think, the residuary legatee of the testator, calling on her to pay them the 100*l.* Lord Alvanley decided that the 100*l.* was rightly paid to Thomas Cooper, upon the footing that the testator meant it to be handed over to the parent, leaving the parent to apply it for the benefit of himself and his family. And upon appeal to Lord Thurlow, Lord Thurlow affirmed that decision. The case before Lord Alvanley and the case on appeal are reported in the same volume of Brown. That was a decision that in a case where a sum of money was given to A. to be equally divided between himself and his family, the money was rightly paid over to A. Now, Robinson v. Tickell was decided by Sir William Grant upon the authority of that case of Cooper v. Thornton. The gift there was this, it was a bequest of 2,000*l.* stock to Mrs. Hooke for her life (but that bequest has nothing to do with the question), and when she died with remainder to her daughter, "and my niece Mary Ann Robinson, for her and her children's use which she either now has or may have, for ever." So that there was, in fact, a gift of 2,000*l.* stock to Mary Ann Robinson for her and her children's use, that is, any children she has now, or may have hereafter. Upon the authority of Cooper v. Thornton, Sir William Grant decided that the 2,000*l.* stock should be handed over to Mrs. Robinson, leaving her to execute such trust as was created, for the benefit of her children. Now, in subsequent cases, it has been observed on these two cases of Cooper v. Thornton and Robinson v. Tickell, that there was no decision that would amount to a trust; but that, assuming there was a trust for the children or the family in the case of Cooper v. Thornton, assuming, I say, there was a trust, the money was rightly paid over to the parent, leaving the parent to deal with it, and leaving the parent amenable to such right, if any, as the children might have as between the parent and the children.

Now, I mention those two cases, not because they govern the present, but because I think that, even upon the authority of those two cases, if I were of opinion that there was a trust here created on this property for the benefit of the children of this testator, I might still in conformity with those two cases direct the property to be handed over to the parent. I recollect in referring to these cases that they have the authority or sanction of such names as Lord Alvanley, Lord Thurlow, and Sir William Grant. I must honestly confess that if it had not been for those authorities, if it had been a case where a trust was created, I cannot see the propriety of handing over trust property to the trustee, leaving the trustee, although the parent of the children, to deal with the property and make away with it, so that the children might never be able to recover it in case the parent died, having spent it. I should have thought, I confess, that the children would have been entitled to have the property secured at all events, if there was a trust at all. And in Woods v. Woods, before Lord Cottenham, which was precisely the same case, Lord Cottenham held that the children might file a bill to secure the property. Now, in Woods v. Woods, the case was a very peculiar one. The testator had authorized his executors, who were his wife and his brother, to sell all his estates and chattels, and he gave them authority not to sell if they thought it most advantageous and most desirable to keep them. The purpose of the sale was chiefly to pay his creditors, and then he says that he desires that every creditor should have his money if the property is sold. It is to be observed, he gave an absolute discretion to the trustees either to sell or not to sell; but if sold "all overflush," that is, the surplus, "to my wife towards her support and her family, if any there be, after paying my brother for his trouble, and all other debts whatsoever." There was, in fact, a direction that if a sale took place, after paying the creditors and all other liabilities, the overplus was to go to his wife towards her support and her family. Now, one would think that according to the cases of Cooper v. Thorn- ton and Robinson v. Tickell, which I have referred to, that might have been a very proper case to have said, "this overflush may be properly paid to the mother, leaving her to deal with it as the Court in those other cases left the parent to deal with it." And accordingly, upon a bill being filed by the children, a demurrer was put in to the bill, and no doubt upon the authority of those cases. Now, when it came before Lord Cottenham, Lord Cottenham overruled the demurrer. He said there was some interest in the children, and such an interest, at all events, as entitled them to file a bill to have the accounts taken.

Well, if I, in this case, were of opinion that a trust was created, I confess I do not very well see my way to part with the fund. But being of opinion that the testator, although he expressed a confidence which he reposed in his wife, inasmuch as he has stated that he gives the property to her for her own use and benefit, and in the very same sentence states as if he were stating his reason for so doing, because he reposed such trust and confidence in her, that she would do what was right,—for these reasons, and following those cases which I have cited as governing the present, I consider that there is no trust here created, but that, at all events, without declaring that there is no trust, I should declare that the wife is entitled to have the whole property. The surplus has been ascertained, I believe, and the declaration will, therefore, be that she is entitled to have the surplus of the personal estate paid and transferred to her for her own use and benefit and decree accordingly.

Executors, Liability of—Wilful Default —Interest on Balances—Costs.

In an administration suit by one executor against his co-executors, the pleadings raised a question of wilful default; but upon the hearing, a decree was made for the common accounts of what had been received, without any special direction or inquiry as to what might have been received but for the wilful default of the defendants. Upon the cause coming on for further directions, it was held that the plaintiff was then precluded from raising the question as to wilful default, but that if the question were still open, the plaintiff could not call upon his co-executors to account for what he jointly with them might have received.

The plaintiff claimed interest upon balances remaining in the hands of the defendants:—Held, that the Court was not precluded from entertaining this question by the decree, which might have afforded materials for forming an opinion; but the circumstances of this case were not such as to entitle the plaintiff to interest, there having been no improper retention of balances to any substantial amount.

This suit was instituted to administer the estate of a lady named Frances Morrall, who died in the year 1823. The testatrix made a will in execution of a power during the life of her husband, and appointed certain property, about which no question arose. Upon the death of her husband, the testatrix made a codicil to her will, by which she disposed of certain leasehold estates, and she then directed that the household goods, farm-houses, cattle, farming implements and other effects (except money and plate) being in and about the manor-house of Plas Yellen, should remain there for the use of her son William Morrall during his life; and after his decease, the same should be equally divided amongst all her children that should be then living. The testatrix gave the residue of her personal estate to be divided equally between all her children, and appointed her sons, C. Morrall and R. Morrall, and the plaintiff, Thomas Jones, who had married one of her daughters, executors of her will.

The testatrix died in December 1823, leaving eight children, and the will and codicil were proved by the three executors. In May 1829, the plaintiff Jones became a bankrupt, and obtained his certificate in the following September. In December 1834, the share of the plaintiff's wife in the residuary estate of the testatrix was assigned by him and his assignees to Edwards, who, on the 7th of April 1835, executed a deed declaring that he was a trustee for the plaintiff. In March 1835, W. Morrall died, upon which the furniture and other effects in and about the mansion-house of Plas Yellen became divisible amongst the seven children of the testatrix. On the 25th of April 1835, the plaintiff Jones and his wife filed a bill against the other children, including the two who were jointly with the plaintiff executors of Mrs. Morrall, for an account of her personal estate. That bill was not actively prosecuted, but lingered on till 1840. In the mean time, C. Morrall, one of the executors, died, and his daughter, Mrs. Gooch, was appointed his executrix. A bill of revivor and supplement was then filed, seeking an account of the personal estate of the testatrix which had come to the hands of C. Morrall and R. Morrall. In August 1840, answers were put in giving the accounts asked for, but no decree having been taken, the bill was dismissed for want of prosecution upon the motion of the defendants. The costs were subsequently taxed, and ordered to be paid by the plaintiff, but had not in fact been paid.

The present bill was filed by Jones and his wife in November 1843, alleging that many of the household goods and other effects left in and about the mansion-house of Plas Yellen at the time of the death of the testatrix had been removed and misapplied by W. Morrall during his life, with the sanction of the two executors C. Morrall and R. Morrall; and that the said goods, &c. had not been converted into money nor divided amongst the children of the testatrix as directed by her codicil, but that they had been taken possession of by the defendant R. Morrall, and had become greatly deteriorated in value; and alleging that improper payments out of the estate of the testatrix had been made to W. Morrall, amounting to the sum of 760*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*; that the defendant R. Morrall had improperly retained in his hands part of the assets of the testatrix, and that the plaintiff's wife had not received what she was entitled to as her share of the estate; and the bill prayed an account of the personal estate of the testatrix, and that it might be declared that C. Morrall and R. Morrall had been guilty of breaches of trust in permitting W. Morrall to receive the rents and profits of the leasehold estate, and in neglecting to divide the furniture, &c. upon the death of W. Morrall; and that the defendant R. Morrall and the representatives of C. Morrall might be decreed to make good the loss occasioned by such breaches of trust, and might be charged with interest upon such sums of money as had remained from time to time in their hands, or had been received by them, or which but for their wilful default they might respectively have received.

The cause came on to be heard in July 1845, and a decree was made referring it to the Master to take an account of the personal estate of the testatrix received by the defendants, and what portion of the estate remained outstanding or undisposed of, with liberty to state special circumstances as to the matters aforesaid; but the decree did not contain any direction to inquire as to what assets might have come to the hands of the defendants but for their wilful default, nor did it direct any inquiry as to interest on balances in the defendants' hands.

By the Master's report, it appeared that the balance of the personal estate of the testatrix received by the executors amounted to 767*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*, of which the plaintiff's share was 95*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* That the surviving executor, R. Morrall, was liable to the extent of 88*l.* 14*s.*, and that the plaintiff's share of the leasehold estate of the testatrix as against the estate of C. Morrall, the deceased executor, amounted to 158*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, out of which sum 154*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* had been paid into court.

The suit now came on upon further directions.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Haddan appeared for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Malins, Mr. Piggott, Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. C. Hall, for the defendants.

Judgment reserved.

May 5. — KINDERSLEY, V.C., (after stating the facts of the case, as already set forth, said) — The questions raised upon the cause now coming on upon further directions are these. First, it is contended for the plaintiffs that one of the defendants, R. Morrall, who is the surviving executor of the testatrix, and the other defendants, who represent the estate of C. Morrall, the deceased executor, ought to be declared liable for the value of certain furniture and other effects remaining in the mansion-house at Plas Yellen on the death of the testatrix. Secondly, that those defendants are liable for interest on balances remaining in their hands from time to time, and ought to account for the rents and profits of certain leasehold property; and thirdly, that the costs of this suit ought to be paid by the defendants; first, because of a refusal on their part to account, and secondly, because they have disputed the plaintiff's claim.

Now, according to the terms of the will of Mrs. Morrall, the eldest son was entitled to the furniture, &c. during his life, and upon his death it was to be divided between her other children, of whom there were seven. After the death of the testatrix, all the executors, C. Morrall, R. Morrall, and the plaintiff himself, Thomas Jones, proved the will. At the time when the plaintiff became bankrupt he was entitled in right of his wife to one-eighth of the residuary personal estate of the testatrix, and to one-seventh of the furniture, &c. at Plas Yellen after the death of W. Morrall. On his bankruptcy, of course, the plaintiff's share passed to his assignees; but by the deed of 1834 the plaintiff's share was assigned to a trustee for him. Now, as to the first point, regarding the furniture, it appears that the question is raised by the pleadings in the suit; but the decree not only declared nothing respecting it, but gave no directions for any inquiry on the subject, on the result of which the Court could, upon further directions, proceed. What the decree directed was, an account of such personal estate as had been received by the executors, and a direction that an account should be taken of the furniture and other things, so far as such things had been received; but there is no direction for any inquiry as to what they might have received but for their wilful default. If it had been intended to raise that point, the Court ought to have been induced at the hearing to make some declaration or to direct some inquiry, on the result of which, upon further directions, it might act. The rule on this subject I conceive to be this: if the pleadings do not raise the point, it cannot be raised either at the original hearing or on further directions; but if the pleadings do, as in this case, raise the point, whether the defendants are liable for wilful default, it is the duty of the plaintiff, if he can make out a case, to get a declaration by the decree, or if he cannot make a case for an immediate decree, to get an inquiry of such a nature that the Court may, on further directions, make a declaration. If, however, the point was raised on the pleadings, and the Court, by its decree, passed it by, and neither made any declaration nor directed any inquiry, it must be taken, either that it was waived by the plaintiff or that the Court, being urged by the plaintiff, did not think fit to give any relief. Now, here the Court has directed no special inquiry, but in directing the common account of the general estate, has said, —take the account also as to the furniture, that is, of what has been received, not of what might, but for wilful default, have been received. The decree further directs an inquiry as to what is outstanding; so that if any part of the furniture, &c. had not been received, it would come under the words "outstanding estate." Now, the Master has found that there is no outstanding estate, and as no exception has been taken to that report, the question is concluded. But if it were now open, I think the plaintiff could not have the relief asked. It appears that the plaintiff Jones, as one of the executors, proved the will himself; and thereby took upon himself the execution of the trusts as much as his co-executors; and if a party thus under an obligation to perform a trust does not choose to perform it, but leaves it to his co-executors, he cannot be entitled to call upon them to account for what they and he together might have received. For all these reasons, I am of opinion that there is no ground for making the defendants liable for the value of the furniture and other effects which the plaintiff alleges ought to have been realized and divided.

The second point is this: the plaintiff contends that the defendants ought to be held liable for interest on the balances from time to time remaining in their hands. Now, it appears by the Master's report that, except as to two small sums of 95*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* and 158*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, out of which latter sum, 154*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* has been paid into court, every part of the plaintiff's share, as well of the general personal estate as of the leasehold rents, has been duly paid. The defendants insist that, applying the rule to which I have referred, the plaintiff cannot claim interest on balances because there was no declaration or inquiry as to balances at the hearing. It appears to me that, according to the proper application of that rule, the plaintiff has a right to raise the question. It is true there was no declaration to that effect at the hearing, but there was a direction to take the common account of what had been received, and that was the first step towards such a declaration. The Court could not at the hearing say whether there were any balances, but the direction to take an account of the personal estate ought to shew what personal estate has been received from time to time, and the receipts and payments should be shewn upon the schedule; and on that report the Court might hear it argued what balances there were in respect of which either an immediate declaration or further inquiry could be made. In this case, then, the question is, whether the circumstances are such as to shew that if there are balances there ought to be interest on those balances.

It appears that Jones the plaintiff became a bankrupt in May 1829, which is twenty-three years ago; and as, at that time, all interest passed out of him, he could not then ask for payment, and no payment could properly have been offered to him. In 1834 his share was assigned to a trustee for him, and he was then in a position to ask for accounts in respect of the personal estate of the testatrix, and directly afterwards he filed a bill, but that bill, after lingering for five years, was dismissed for want of prosecution, and then the present bill was filed in 1843. Now, in order to give a claim for interest there must be a clear case of improper retention of balances to a substantial if not to a considerable amount; but here the total balance retained from the personal estate does not amount to 96*l.*, and the total sum for which the surviving executor is found liable is only 88*l.* 14*s.* Under these circumstances, there is no ground, in my opinion, for decreeing payment of interest on the balances.

The last point is, whether the plaintiff ought to have his costs on the ground of a refusal by the defendant to account. The circumstances as to the refusal appear to be these: that immediately after the execution of the deed by which Edwards became a trustee for the plaintiff in 1835, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the two executors, C. Morrall and R. Morrall, asking on behalf of Edwards for an account. An answer was returned within a fortnight, that an account should be rendered, and directly afterwards the bill was filed. In the answers to that bill the accounts were set out, but the bill was dismissed for want of prosecution. When the present bill was filed another application for an account was made, and the answer was that the accounts had been put in upon oath. This certainly does not amount to a refusal to render the accounts. Then, it is said that the defendants have resisted the plaintiff's claim, by suggesting in their answer that the assignment to Jones by his assignees was without a sufficient concurrence by the creditors. I accede to the principle that if a defendant questions the title of the plaintiff and fails, and by that course puts the plaintiff to any costs, the defendant should pay so much of the costs as were caused by the objection; but here there has been no expense incurred, and the costs must therefore go according to the usual course in administration suits.

SPRYE v. REYNELL.

Fraud—Misrepresentation—Mistake—Setting aside Conveyance—Champerty—Jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal as to Costs.

S. was aware that R. was entitled to property, but might not at first be aware that the interest of R. was not precarious, and impressed R. with the notion that it was so; S. however became aware that the interest was not precarious, yet he did not inform R. of that fact, but on the contrary still represented that it was both precarious and could not be established without difficulty, delay, and expensive litigation. R. in such a state of circumstances sold one half of the estate to S, the latter giving him an indemnity against all costs of recovering the property, and representing that men of business conducted cases on the arrangement that no law expenses were paid unless the proceedings were successful; but if they were, that law costs were paid out of the money recovered, and the party conducting the proceedings and furnishing the information was allowed half what was recovered to satisfy him for risk of paying law expenses. Subsequently, R. agreed to sell the other half for a stated sum. R. filed a bill to set aside the conveyance and to have the contract for the sale of the second moiety declared void, but died before the hearing, and the suit was revived by his devisee and executrix. S. filed a cross bill for the specific performance of the sale of the second moiety. In the first suit the solicitor of S. was made a party, and was charged with a participation in the fraud. The Court below set aside the conveyance, and as the contract for the sale of the second moiety was based on the former conveyance it declared the same void, and ordered S. to pay the costs, but dismissed the original suit as against the solicitor, without costs. The Court also dismissed the bill for specific performance, with costs. From this decree S. appealed:—Held, that as R. did not know his rights when he executed the conveyance, nor when he signed the contract for the sale of the second moiety, and that as the former was based on fraud and misrepresentation, and as the latter depended on the former, both must fail, and the decree must be affirmed, with costs.

Where a party has induced another to act on the faith of several representations made by him, any one of which has been made fraudulently, he cannot set up the transaction by shewing that every other representation was truly and honestly made, or was the result of innocent error.

A representation that remuneration for professional services rendered, as above stated, was customary, being untrue, is a ground for setting aside a conveyance and contract founded on it.

Whether the agreement amounted to champerty, or savoured of champerty, still as the parties were not in pari delicto, and as the vendor had no legal advice but that of the solicitor of the purchaser, who adhered more to the purchaser than to the vendor, and failed in his duty to the latter, the Court considered that the vendor's suit ought not to fail, on the ground that he was a party to a contract against public policy or illegal.

Where the Master of the Rolls or a Vice Chancellor has given substantial relief against a defendant, with costs against him personally, it is competent to this Court, in affirming the decree as to relief, to vary it as to costs, if its dissent from the decree as to costs is strong, clear and undoubting.

The Court being of opinion that, although the solicitor had acted contrary to public policy, whether through misapprehension or otherwise, and although his duty professionally prohibited him from assisting where there was aliud simulatum aliud actum, and although he abetted in the composing and uttering of documents which recorded an affair as it was not, yet still as the Court had no firm impression that the decree below ought to have charged him with costs, it refused to vary the decree in this respect.

The facts of this most remarkable case, disclosed in voluminous pleadings and lengthy evidence, and above all to be extracted from a correspondence, a copy of which occupied more than 200 very closely written brief sheets of paper, can only be stated with comparative shortness in a narrative form; and (throwing out of view all but the prominent circumstances (1) on which the judgment of the Court is founded), these facts were as follows:—

Henry Reynell, of Leatherhead, by his will, dated the 19th of December 1813, devised his real estates consisting of lands and other hereditaments in the counties of Devon, Somerset, and Surrey, of the annual value of 1,200*l.* to Mr. Trower and Mr. Walker in fee simple, upon trust to pay off certain charges, and among them an annuity to Mrs. Williams Reynell, his illegitimate daughter, and then unmarried, until she should attain the age of twenty-one years, and subject thereto, upon trust, for that lady for life, with remainder to her issue in strict settlement, with remainder to Sir Thomas Reynell for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to Sir Richard Littleton Reynell (brother of Sir Thomas) for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to Samuel Reynell for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to Sir Richard Littleton Reynell, his heirs and assigns for ever.

The testator died in 1824 or 1825. At the date of the will and of the death of the testator the whole property was mortgaged in fee, the testator having only an equitable fee simple in it.

In the middle of the year 1843, Mr. and Mrs. Williams Reynell, who were married before the death of the testator, were living, she being aged forty-eight years and he much older; there had never been any issue of the marriage, and the lady was in a very infirm state of health. Sir Richard Littleton Reynell was then dead without issue male, and Mr. Samuel Reynell was also dead without issue. Sir Thomas Reynell was sixty-six years of age, and his wife Lady Elizabeth Louisa Reynell was fifty-eight, and there had been no issue of their marriage, which had been solemnized many years. It was not asserted by any one that Sir Richard Littleton Reynell left any female issue. Under this state of circumstances in the middle of the year 1843, the estates of Henry Reynell, the testator, stood, in fact, limited to trustees (new trustees having been appointed in 1828 in a suit then instituted), in trust for Mrs. Williams Reynell for life, with remainder to Sir Thomas Reynell for life, with remainder to the right heirs of Sir Richard Littleton Reynell. If this latter gentleman actually left no issue female, Sir Thomas Reynell was his heir-at-law, and had been so from the time of his death, and unquestionably Sir Richard Littleton Reynell died intestate.

In March 1843 Capt. Richard Samuel Mare Sprye was informed by a surgeon, named Llewellyn, that Sir Thomas Reynell was entitled to interests in the property under the will of Henry Reynell. On the 15th of April following commenced a correspondence between Capt. Sprye and Sir Thomas Reynell. In these letters Sprye inquired of Sir Thomas as to his pedigree, stating as his reason his intention to publish genealogies, and wishing that of the Reynell family.

On the 21st of April one Mitchell, described by Sprye as his clerk, read the will of Henry Reynell at Doctors Commons, and communicated verbally its contents.

By letter, dated the 22nd of April, Sprye stated to Sir Thomas that he had made a discovery, which, though it could not benefit Sir Thomas himself, might benefit his heir. The earliest letter of importance was one from Sprye to Sir Thomas, dated the 29th of April 1843, and was as follows:—"My dear sir,—I hope you received my last note, making inquiry as to who at present stood in the position of your heir-at-law. I sent a sketch of your pedigree for a few of the modern descents, to assist you in discovering it, should you not otherwise know. I think I did not inform you that I have taken to study for the bar, in the genealogical branch, for practice at the bar of the House of Lords, in peerage cases; and that I am, in furtherance of this plan for future life, compiling some genealogical works for print, to bring myself into notice in that way by the time I am called to the bar. The Reynell family I take particular interest in, collecting a complete history of it for print; and it has been in making researches for it, through my record researches in the several depositories of public records, that I discovered what I conceived to be the means of benefiting your heir-at-law. Since I wrote to you I have employed my clerks in still further investigating the matter, and to see if it was not possible to do the benefit to you, instead of to the other party. It is, as all these things are, doubtful, and can only be tested by legal proceedings, the result of which may give nothing, and may gain something considerable. Now, almost all men are frightened at the idea of law proceedings to recover property, and, consequently, a system has grown up among men of business, of conducting such cases on the arrangement that no law expenses are paid unless success attends the proceedings; in which case they are first paid out of the money recovered, and the party conducting the proceedings and furnishing the information is allowed for his compensation half what is recovered, which is also to satisfy him for the risk of paying the law expenses, without perhaps succeeding. I have mentioned briefly to a legal man the case and mode in which I consider I have discovered a way to benefit your heir-at-law. He has not yet given me a decided opinion, but from what he observed I considered my belief strengthened. He said if he found what I stated to him to be borne out by documents, he would undertake the case legally, on the usual arrangement, as above. There is but a faint chance that the discovery can be made to benefit you, and as, whether for you or for your heir-at-law's benefit, it will be necessary to institute legal proceedings, will you say if you will be content that it shall be done under my direction and controul, on the foregoing plan; that, if you are benefited nothing, you pay nothing, and the lawyers lose their expense and labour; and that if you are benefited, you will allow half of what may be gained to you to them, for their risk and remuneration. I shall be glad to hear from you at your leisure on this point, and also to have what help you can give in discovering to us your heir-at-law, as that party must be included, even if efforts be first made for you. I write this hastily to save to-night's post. I beg our united compliments to Lady Elizabeth Reynell and family, and remain, my dear sir, yours, &c., Richard Sprye, 6, Chesham Place."

Between the end of April and the middle of July there passed between these parties a vast number of letters, one of which, dated the 12th of May, was addressed by Mr. John Yonge, the solicitor to Sprye (but the draft of which was proved to have been written by Sprye for Yonge to copy), and stated that considerable property might be recovered for Sir Thomas after the death of the present possessors, if Sir Thomas were then alive, but if not, for his heir, and saying that much inquiry would be necessary, and that but for Sprye's discovery the present possessors might have kept the property, and Sir Thomas's claim might have been barred by lapse of time, and alleging that his claim must depend upon surviving the present possessor. That possessor was Mrs. Williams Reynell.

The next letter of importance was dated June 1, and was written by Sir Thomas to Sprye, and dated from Avisford, and contained these words:—"My dear sir,—I am very much obliged to you for the trouble you have taken in explaining to me further particulars of the business in hand, and, after reading over carefully your letter of yesterday, I feel satisfied that the first proposed arrangement, whereby I meant to engage to give up the half of the property recovered, subject to no law expenses, either on success or failure in the suit, is the best for me to pursue, and I therefore agree to it, hoping that the result may hereafter prove to our mutual advantage." The correspondence had, in some of the letters of Sprye, referred to some degree of relationship existing between the family of his wife and that of Sir Thomas.

On the 24th of July 1843 a deed, dated the 15th of that month, was executed, being made between Sir Thomas Reynell of the first part, Sprye and Henrietta Digby his wife of the second part, and Charles Wilson of the third part, which contained the following recitals:—"Whereas the said Sir Thomas Reynell is seised to him and his heirs in fee simple in remainder or reversion under a will, or alleged will, of Henry Reynell, late of Leatherhead, in the county of Surrey, Esq., since deceased, of and in the hereditaments hereafter mentioned, and one moiety or equal half part whereof is intended to be hereby released, or the said Sir Thomas Reynell is seised of an immediate estate to him and his heirs in fee simple of the same hereditaments as the heir-at-law of the said Henry Reynell. And whereas the said Sir Thomas Reynell has not any issue. And whereas the said Richard Samuel Mare Sprye being connected by marriage with the family of the said Sir Thomas Reynell, and the said Sir Thomas Reynell having lately discovered or ascertained his rights and interests in the estates late of the said Henry Reynell, deceased, through the intervention of the said Richard Samuel Mare Sprye, and from information derived from him, the said Sir Thomas Reynell has determined upon testifying his regard and friendship for the said Richard Samuel Mare Sprye and Henrietta Digby his wife, by conveying and assuring one moiety or half part of the said estates late of the said Henry Reynell, deceased, to the uses and in manner hereinafter declared of and concerning the same."

It was then witnessed that "in pursuance of and for effectuating the said determination, and in consideration of the premises, and for making a provision for the said Richard Samuel Mare Sprye and Henrietta Digby his wife," and for certain nominal considerations, Sir Thomas conveyed to Wilson in fee simple one moiety of and in all manors, lands, estates and hereditaments in the counties of Surrey, Devon and Somerset, or all or any of the said counties or elsewhere in Great Britain of, in, and to which he was or could or might be entitled in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy by devise, descent, succession or inheritance howsoever, of, from, by, through, or under the said Henry Reynell, deceased, to such uses as Sprye and his wife should appoint, and in default to the use of Sprye and his assigns for life, with remainder to the use of his wife and her assigns for life, with ultimate remainder to the use of Sprye, his heirs and assigns for ever. Then followed a covenant for further assurance.

Simultaneously with this conveyance Sir Thomas executed to Sprye a power of attorney "irrevocable," to commence, carry on, and prosecute any actions, suits, or other proceedings at law or in equity, he, Sprye, might deem requisite for trying the validity of any will, or alleged will, of Henry Reynell, or obtaining legal and peaceable possession of the real estate to which Sir Thomas was entitled by devise, descent, or otherwise, by, from, through, or under Henry Reynell. Also at the same time, and dated the same day, Sprye executed to Sir Thomas a deed of indemnity against any costs, charges, or expenses occasioned by any action, &c. brought by Sprye in consequence of the power of attorney.

The deed of conveyance had formerly been intended to be in the form of a settlement, but that form was ultimately abandoned. In preparing all the instruments between Sir Thomas Reynell and Sprye, Mr. John Yonge acted as the solicitor for Sprye.

Among the evidence was a draft marked Exhibit R, which was of a proposed deed between Sir Thomas and Sprye, in which, in consideration of services rendered by Sprye in the discovery of Sir Thomas's rights, Sir Thomas was made to convey the moiety, and Sprye covenanted to take all steps necessary for the recovery of it, and to save harmless and indemnify Sir Thomas from all the costs; but this draft was afterwards altered, and ultimately the conveyance was executed as before stated. Added to all this a codicil was prepared for Sir Thomas to sign by way of confirming all the arrangements, but it was never executed.

In pursuance of this power of appointment Sprye and his wife, by deed, dated the 13th of January 1844, appointed the same moiety to William George Watson and James Watson, and their heirs, by way of mortgage for securing 400*l.* and interest; and by another deed, dated the 23rd of April following, they further charged the property with 300*l.* and interest to the same persons.

On the 15th of June 1843 Mr. Stinton, of the Chancery bar, had given an opinion on a case submitted to him by Sprye, in which he stated, speaking of the title to the estates in default of children of Mrs. Williams Rey-nell, "Sir Thomas Reynell would have an estate for life, with remainder to his sons in tail: the ultimate remainder in fee was given to the late Sir Richard Littleton Reynell, and that estate would by the settlement be vested in any person to whom he may have devised it; but if he did not so devise it, Sir Thomas Reynell would have the ultimate vested remainder in fee, as the heir-at-law of his late brother, which I presume he is."

Upon the evidence it was not plainly shewn when this opinion was communicated to Sir Thomas Reynell, but Sir James Wigram, when the case was originally before him, considered that the opinion was not communicated to Sir Thomas before the 15th of July 1843, and both the Lords Justices came to the conclusion, that Sir Thomas, if it was communicated at all, did not understand his rights when he executed the deed of 1843, and signed a draft of an intended deed (hereinafter mentioned) of 1844. Mitchell, Sprye's clerk, was not examined as a witness in the court below, and was stated to be dead at the date of the appeal.

The second part of the narrative relates to a contract for the sale of the remaining moiety of the property. After the correspondence had gone on for many months, during which Sir Thomas was informed of the proceedings which Sprye had commenced and was prosecuting against the trustees of the will of Henry Reynell, and against Mr. and Mrs. Williams Reynell, Mr. Yonge addressed a letter to Sprye, dated the 17th of April 1844, but which was copied from a draft made by Sprye, which contained the following remarkable passages, and which was forwarded by Sprye to Sir Thomas Reynell on the 18th of the same month, as a letter addressed by Mr. Yonge to him.

"20, Tokenhouse Yard, April 17, 1844.

"My dear sir,—Having endeavoured during the leisure hours of the Easter holidays to give my best consideration to the present position of the Williams Reynell case, I am anxious to put you in possession of the views I have formed, not only as your professional adviser, but as entertaining the highest friendship for yourself and family. You will therefore bear with me while I candidly confess my sentiments, even if they should happen to differ in some respects from what I know to be your ideas. You must bear in mind that when we commenced operations, although you soon accumulated a good deal of valuable information, we were left in the dark on several points in which we have been in some measure rectified by the answers put in. For instance, we had reason to expect Mr. Reynell left sufficient personal estate to pay off existing mortgages, which, however, appears is not the case, and the mortgages still exist. We were unprepared to find that Mrs. Williams Reynell had ventured to appoint a life interest in the estates in favour of her husband after her decease, and that, in fact, very soon after the testator's death she executed a settlement of the property, giving that interpretation to the trusts of the will which we have resolved to dispute, and vesting the estate upon such in a Mr. Beverley, instead of Monro and Thomas Williams." * * * "The decree when made will direct inquiries in the Master's office as to the testator's estate, and the mortgages and settlement, and perhaps ultimately a new settlement may be ordered, and when after all by the demise of Mrs. Williams Reynell, and if by having previously set aside her husband's life interest, the estates become indisputably yours and Sir Thomas Reynell's, in all probability a fresh resort to Chancery will be requisite to partition the property, as, being so scattered, it may be difficult otherwise to apportion. The value of your interest, to yourself individually, of course, in great measure depends upon your chance of surviving Mrs. Williams Reynell. She is forty-eight, and you, I think I recollect, are three years younger. Female lives, every insurance office will say, are more durable, and if Mrs. Williams Reynell lives on for a few years longer she may possibly live to old age. I think an office would say her present chance of duration of life is at least eighteen years. To this period, then, it is possible your benefit may be postponed, and, though hitherto childless, her having issue I know would by many be considered as a contingency not to be overlooked. Under all these circumstances of the case, the long litigation we may anticipate, and the certain heavy expense incurred, which will involve my often resorting to you for supplies, it well becomes you to consider how far it may be advantageous to you, or otherwise, to proceed. Had it so happened that the whole estate in reversion had been yours, there could not have existed the same ground for hesitation. You might then have found little difficulty in obtaining pecuniary assistance to enable you to buy up or make terms for Mrs. Williams Reynell's life interest, put an end to the suit, and acquire the fee simple. At all events, you would have had more facility in obtaining means to carry on the suit vigorously, and then compel our opponents to an amicable arrangement, or speedily obtain all the Court would enforce. These considerations, I confess, have impressed me with the value of a suggestion hinted to me by more than one with whom I have had occasion to advise,—that if you could feel at liberty to do so, it would be well for you to treat with Sir Thomas Reynell, for the purchase of his remaining moiety in the property. Of course, one would take every means of ascertaining what, under the circumstances of the case, with all contingencies, would be a fair price for you to offer, and for him to accept, and, agreeing upon this, I cannot but think it would be the most eligible arrangement possible for yourself and family, while Sir Thomas would realize at once a present benefit, instead of having the mere title to a prospective advantage, which, at his age, might be realized only in his declining years. Should the suggestion meet your view, and the proposal be not unacceptable to Sir Thomas I should advise that a statement of Sir Thomas's interest be prepared in such a manner as shall be mutually approved by him and yourself, and then that each obtain the valuation from an actuary of his own selection. It will then be for you to adopt measures for providing sufficient funds to complete the purchase, and acquire the entire reversionary interest. Having now candidly expressed to you my mind, I leave the matter to your thoughtful consideration, and should recommend you to talk it over also with Mrs. Sprye and her trustee. Your determination I shall wait for ere I press forward for getting the bill amended; if you decide that it is ineligible to communicate with Sir Thomas on the matter, let me know, and then we will resolve how to proceed. I remain, my dear sir, very truly yours, John Yonge."

The correspondence proceeded, Sprye still adhering to his representation that the issue of the litigation was doubtful; yet, in a letter of the 26th of April, he offered to buy the remaining moiety at its full value; and although he spoke of the investment of his money in such a purchase as a "lottery investment," and although Sir Thomas, in his answers, expresses reluctance to sell to Sprye property which he (Sir Thomas) did not possess, and to involve him in risk, Sprye, on the 11th of May, addressed a letter to him, offering to buy, and urging him to sell at a value to be determined by an actuary, the other half, "with all its doubts and risks, the Chancery suits pending, of your share of the reversion. If receiving the money while matters are in uncertainty is objectionable in the doubtful state of our suit in Chancery, the sale may be made conditional on your right, whenever the reversion shall fall in." * * * "The money may be invested, but I had rather purchase at once." This letter contained a valuation of the reversion at 5,000*l.*, which, from the evidence, was not that of an actuary; and Mr. Yonge in his answer on oath denied it to be his. Sir Thomas, in reply to this, addressed a letter, dated the 11th of May, to Sprye, which, after speaking of the Chancery suit, went on thus:—"but I assure you, that I dislike it and our future prospects, more on your account than my own, having already undergone heavy expenses in prosecuting your able researches, and having now such a prospect of large law expenses, particularly if they succeed in visiting you with their costs. I wish that I was a rich man, and could afford to assist you in your difficulty; but you are aware of the case, and I have little but my military income to look to, as the purchase of this place, and the expense to which I have been put to by it, has swallowed up all the little spare money I possessed. I am most anxious that you should not injure your finances by this business. I am ready to withdraw when you find that there is no hope of success remaining, and that a favourable moment has arrived for doing so. I have from the first put myself in your hands, and have implicitly conformed to what you advised and recommended, and will continue to do so." And in still further reply to communications from Sprye he wrote the following letter to him:—

"Avisford, 14th May 1844.

"My dear Captain Sprye,—I have much gratification in acquainting you that your despatch received this morning, with Mr. Yonge's estimate of the half of the reversion, has completed the work of reconciling me to the sale, as recommended by you and him, and removing the scruples I had entertained to that measure. I have so good an opinion of Mr. Yonge, and of his reasoning upon the subject, that I will not press any other valuation than his, but will consent to accept from you the sum of 5,000*l.*, and in the simple, and direct, and ordinary plan, according to your wish, in preference to investing the money in the funds to accumulate until the settlement of the suit, which I will endeavour to believe will prove most favourable to you and yours, rewarding you amply for your trouble, and reimbursing you for your outlay. * * * Believe me, my dear Capt. Sprye, always faithfully yours,

"Thomas Reynell."

Two days later Sprye, in a letter to Sir Thomas, said, "I feel equally glad you are satisfied with Mr. Yonge's valuation, who is a good and honest creature;" and, subsequently, the correspondence contained allusions by Sprye of an intention to compromise the litigation, and expressions by Sir Thomas of his gratification at the idea of compromise, as he never viewed the matter in the same sanguine light that Sprye did. On the 25th of May, the draft of the conveyance of the second moiety was prepared and was approved by both parties, but it was never executed.

Mrs. Williams Reynell died in February 1846, and on the 18th of the following month, Mr. Yonge forwarded to Sir Thomas the drafts of the deeds of conveyance of the second moiety, altered so as to meet the fact of the death of that lady; and in his letter Mr. Yonge recommended Sir Thomas Reynell to employ his own solicitor. The matter was then placed by Sir Thomas in the hands of Messrs. Walker, Grant & Co., his solicitors, under whose advice the original bill was filed, on the 2nd of April 1846, by Sir Thomas Reynell against Sprye and wife, Yonge and Wilson, praying a declaration that the deed of 1843 was procured by fraud practised on the plaintiff by Sprye and Yonge his solicitor; and that the same was void for fraud and champerty, except as regarded the mortgages of January and April 1844; and that it might be declared that the contract contained in the letter of the 14th of May 1844 was fraudulently obtained by Sprye and Yonge, and that such contract was void, and that the approval of the draft deeds of the 25th of May 1844 was obtained by the fraud of Sprye and Yonge, and that those two persons might be decreed to pay off the mortgages and procure the reconveyances from the mortgagees; and that the deed of 1843, the letter of the 14th of May, and the approval of the 25th of May 1844, and the drafts might be cancelled; and that Sprye and wife and Yonge might be restrained from interfering with the property, and also that Sprye and Yonge might pay the costs of the suit.

On the 28th of August 1846, Sprye and wife filed a cross-bill against Sir Thomas Reynell and Wilson, praying specific performance of the contract contained in the letter of the 14th of May 1844.

Sir Thomas Reynell died pending the suits, and the same respectively were revived by and against the universal devisee and legatee and executrix Lady Elizabeth Louisa Reynell.

The causes were heard before Sir James Wigram during five days in April 1849, and ten days in the following month, and judgment was given on the 6th of November in that year, when he made this decree:—Declare the deed of 1843 void, except as to the two mortgage deeds of, &c.; and that the contract in the letter of the 14th of May 1844 is also void. Declare that the defendant Sprye is bound to pay to, &c. (the mortgagees), their executors, &c. principal, interest, and costs due on the mortgages, and to procure at his own expense a re-conveyance to Lady Elizabeth Louisa Reynell, or as she shall direct; take an account, &c. due on mortgages; direct Sprye, on or before, &c. to pay, &c. (the mortgagees) the amount found due. Declare the plaintiff is to be at liberty to use the names of Sprye, wife, and Wilson in procuring the re-conveyance; and that she is entitled to recover against Sprye principal money, interest, and costs she may properly pay to the mortgagees for procuring the re-conveyance. And, upon satisfaction of the mortgagees, deliver up the deed of 1843 to be cancelled. Let letter of the 14th of May 1844 be forthwith delivered up to be cancelled. Injunction against Sprye as prayed, except for procuring the re-conveyance. Dismiss the bill Reynell v. Sprye, as against the defendant Yonge, without costs; dismiss the bill Sprye v. Reynell, with costs; such costs, and also the plaintiff's costs in Reynell v. Sprye (including the costs of Sir Thomas Reynell deceased), to be paid by the defendant Sprye.

From this decree Capt. Sprye appealed, and during the argument it was stated from the Bench that as in the judgment of the Court it might be necessary to mention the name of Mr. Yonge, the counsel for that gentleman had their Lordships' judicial authority to address the Court on his behalf. This offer was refused on the ground that Sir James Wigram had acquitted Mr. Yonge of all immoral conduct. The Court also permitted an affidavit to be read, proving the death of Mitchell, Sprye's clerk, between the hearing of the original cause and the appeal. Their Lordships also sanctioned an offer made by the counsel for Lady Elizabeth, to allow the answer of Mr. Yonge to be read in evidence, as an affidavit or deposition in favour of Capt. Sprye. The offer was declined, and Lord Cranworth remarked that no inference detrimental to Capt. Sprye could be drawn from the refusal, because the argument of his counsel was, that if Mr. Yonge were examined before a jury he would prove, not only what was contained in his answer, but much more which would be beneficial to Capt. Sprye.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Shapter supported the decree of the Court below.

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood), Mr. Bethell and Mr. Terrell appeared for the appellant.

Mr. C. P. Cooper was counsel for Mr. Yonge.

The argument of the counsel for the appellant was in substance as follows:—The case has been conducted on a theory most extraordinary, namely, that Capt. Sprye having found with ease and without trouble, that Sir Thomas was the owner of a clear and indisputable estate absolutely, subject only to the life interest of an infirm lady, had set to work to form a scheme of fraud and misrepresentation, by which to induce Sir Thomas to part with his property. It was said that the title of Sir Thomas was clear, plain, and indisputable, the only present obstacle to immediate enjoyment being the life of a lady of forty-six years of age. It was said that Capt. Sprye knew the title was clear; that he knew Sir Richard had died, and left no heir other than Sir Thomas. So far from that being so, in truth, the case at the outset was involved in doubt and difficulty, and so continued up to a very late period before the conveyance of the first moiety of the property; yet wonder had been expressed at the ingenuity and wickedness which could have raised a doubt—could have surrounded Sir Thomas with mystification of fraud and falsehood. All this was the theory of the bill, and well did counsel follow such instructions. It had been said that the title was plain, no doubt, no difficulty about it; and so Capt. Sprye knew, and all he had to do as an honest man was to tell Sir Thomas, that he could at once, after the death of the lady, walk unmolested into the estate. The estate was represented to be "at home" with most respectable trustees, and that the life estate was vested in a most respectable lady. What, however, was the truth? The trustees of the will of Henry Reynell renounced, and new trustees were appointed, and they were appointed in a suit instituted in the name of Sir Thomas, without his consent and without his knowledge. As to the estate, the trustees had none, for the legal estate was in mortgage. All this theory was adopted by Sir James Wigram, who believed from first to last that all the representations of Capt. Sprye were false—were mere inventions. So far from that theory being correct, it is clear that but for Capt. Sprye's great exertions the property would have remained under the power of the Williams Reynells, or their devisees, or others claiming under them. The impression on Sir James Wigram's mind, that the trustees were most respectable persons, could never be removed; nor was their respectability questioned; but the learned Judge always seemed to refer to the fact that persons of such respectability would not engage in such a fraud. No one said they did. It is plain that Sir Thomas Reynell had as much knowledge of the subject after the discovery of the will, and before the transaction of the purchase of the first half, as Capt. Sprye himself had; that before and after, and up to the execution of the second contract, he was in possession of every fact that Capt. Sprye knew of the title. The true history of the knowledge of Capt. Sprye of the title to the property was disclosed in his answer to the plaintiff's bill, and was this,—one Llewellyn, a surgeon, told the Captain that the Reynells were entitled to property, and asked him whether Sir Thomas had succeeded to any. On this the Captain, who was intimately conversant with the Reynell pedigree, turned his attention to that, and, after tracing its steps, came to the second Baronet, and believed that the property vested in him "and his heirs in tail for ever" was the property alluded to by his informant. Llewellyn, however, told him that was the wrong clue, and added, that old Henry Reynell, of Leatherhead, had often told him (Llewellyn) that Sir Thomas was his heir, and would have his property. Capt. Sprye, thereupon, said that was not possible, for Henry Reynell left a daughter; but Llewellyn added she was not legitimate: upon which Capt. Sprye declared that must be a mistake, for in Burke's Landed Gentry it was said that Henry Reynell left a daughter, who inherited his estate. Llewellyn, however, still persisted, and this led Capt. Sprye to make further inquiries, and convinced him that, whatever the will of Henry Reynell might be, it must be sought for, and the facts ascertained. But up to this time he knew nothing of the will—did not know that there was one; and yet the case had been commented on as if the will had been seen, examined, understood, and kept back from the knowledge of Sir Thomas Reynell. The first thing done by Capt. Sprye as to the will was to send his clerk,

Mitchell, to read it, and subsequently he obtained a copy. Finding reason to believe what Llewellyn had said about the Williams Reynells, they in fact having been married secretly, he suspected that the will might not be a fair and clear transaction, and, doubting the legitimacy of the daughter from the positive assurances of Llewellyn, Capt. Sprye did entertain very grave doubts of the conduct of those parties. That his doubts were reasonable is tolerably plain both from the frame of the will and the conduct pursued towards it at Doctors Commons. The will was that of an attorney, and was altogether holograph. It was constructed of paper differing in hue and character, and the fourth and fifth sheets did not tally with the remainder at all, nor was the writing similar in different parts of the will,—these two sheets, in particular, being in the hand apparently of a lady. The sheets, however, purported to follow on, and the will to have been composed and written at one and the same time. It was plain that such was not the fact. Capt. Sprye found all this to be so, and, therefore, he suspected, and was right in suspecting, the Williams Reynells. When Capt. Sprye found that the very material paper not affixed by the testator to his will, and which gave a power to the daughter to appoint a life interest to her husband, had been fastened to the will by the husband after the testator's death, he had a fair ground of suspicion, and when he found this out, he communicated it to Sir Thomas Reynell. When he discovered, as he did from the affidavit of the husband himself, that that will had been examined by him and his attorney during the testator's lifetime, he had more than ground for suspicion—his doubts and suspicions were confirmed. When the probate was seen, that most important paper was copied, as if it had been wholly incorporated by the testator himself in his will. The observation made by one of your Lordships that the knowledge of real property law possessed by solicitors is generally sound, is a very true representation if confined to country solicitors; but the easy access of London solicitors to conveyancers induces them to rely more on others than themselves, and, therefore, they are generally in the habit of referring every question for the opinion of counsel. This would fairly account for Mr. Yonge having laid the case on the will before Mr. Stinton instead of coming to a conclusion himself. If, then, it was not improper for the solicitor to seek that advice, still more was it to be expected that Capt. Sprye himself would not be able to form a clear and definite conclusion on the legal rights of the parties. Yet great stress has been laid on the fact of Mr. Yonge taking legal advice. In each place where Capt. Sprye used the word "contingency," it is put down to fraud, because it is said Sir Thomas Reynell was known to have a vested estate; whenever it is said that the benefit to Sir Thomas was contingent on surviving Mrs. Williams Reynell, it is alleged to be wilfully false, the fact being that Capt. Sprye, like any other man not a lawyer, considered the benefit to be contingent, for Sir Thomas, at his age of sixty-six, was not likely to outlive a lady of forty-eight. Is it to be said that because a man of sixty-six has a vested estate, the enjoyment of which must be postponed until after the death of a person forty-eight years old, it is a falsehood if represented as a contingent benefit? It is said that Sir Thomas Reynell's title was clear; but so far from it, there were three contingencies: first, whether he would survive Mrs. Williams Reynell; secondly, whether he could obtain possession, if entitled, without litigation; and, thirdly, what was the nature of the property, and whether it was worth anything, considering the incumbrances upon it. It must be admitted, as more than once said by one of your Lordships, that the representation of business being conducted by a gift of half the property being the consideration for the lawyer's services, was "unlucky," and could not be defended; still that did not displace the truth of the later parts of the case. In the court below it had been said, and Sir James Wigram concurred in the view, that the onus lay on Capt. Sprye to shew that the opinion of Mr. Stinton had been communicated to Sir Thomas Reynell. Having remarked on the propriety of the taking of Mr. Stinton's opinion, it remains to be observed that the evidence is contradictory as to the time of its being communicated to Sir Thomas Reynell. In the first place it is obviously most improbable that Sir Thomas Reynell did not see the opinion given by Mr. Stinton, and which in plain terms disclosed his rights; and, secondly, the opinion being in such plain terms, and in a narrative form, it was most improbable that he did not understand it. No one had ever ventured to allege that Sir Thomas Reynell could not understand what any ordinary man could comprehend; nor had those who had put the words of his sworn answer into his mouth ventured to permit him to swear more than that he did not recollect seeing the opinion, and that if he did see it, he did not understand it. That is a very tender mode of swearing. Accepting the acquittal of Mr. Yonge as proved, then the real case is that he made an erroneous conclusion of law as to Sir Thomas Reynell's title, and Capt. Sprye as innocently made the representation, and that representation has been unfairly described as a fraud and a falsehood. The truth about the rights of Sir Thomas being unknown, if it were so, to himself was no person's fault but his own. All he said was, that if he did see the opinion of counsel he did not understand it. A gentleman of ordinary faculties could have understood it, and a gentleman of fortune could have obtained advice. If he would shut his eyes—if he would abstain from inquiry, the fault was at his own door. The Court will not, and ought not, to help him. Complaint is made of the presentation of this petition of appeal, but, independently of Capt. Sprye, the case is thus:—A gentleman complained of having had a bill filed against him containing charges of the grossest fraud and practices of the most obvious dishonesty, and the plaintiff, well knowing that the solicitor would be the most important witness to disprove those things if they were untrue, or to explain those transactions and their true nature, deliberately and for the purpose, it was fair to infer, of suppressing that evidence, made that solicitor (Mr. Yonge) a defendant to the suit. For such a reason alone justice has not been done, and the appeal is proper to be heard. The Vice Chancellor made strong observations on this fact, in the course of his judgment in the court below, and gave that gentleman the acquittal to which allusion has before been made in these emphatic words:—"If I am to hold Mr. Yonge liable for the costs of this suit, it certainly will not be upon the ground of moral delinquency, but upon the ground that he has so mixed himself up with Sprye's acts that he must, for judicial purposes, be considered as identified with Sprye in those acts. But I think I should be going too far in so treating the case." And, again, his Honour says, "A solicitor is not necessarily answerable for writing a letter to his own client for the purpose of being shewn to others; and, if that be so, the circumstance that Yonge was expressing Sprye's opinions would not make the act fraudulent, provided those opinions were Yonge's also. I think the case is not brought within the anomalous rule relied on by the plaintiff for making Yonge a defendant in the suit." As to the first contract, it is an error to say it was a bargain obnoxious to the law relating to champerty; and as to the second agreement, it was not an undervalue. On the second, the evidence of four different persons well versed in the affairs of reversions proves that the 5,000*l.* was above the value. Champerty was defined to be a bargain to divide the land between the parties, if it were recovered at law, and by which one was to carry on the other's suit at his own expense. That was not so here. Here there was a deed of gift of half of whatever Sir Thomas was entitled to, if anything, and Capt. Sprye was to proceed to recover that half for himself and the other half for Sir Thomas. There was no covenant, no agreement, no contract by Capt. Sprye to prosecute the suit, and, therefore, the bargain did not amount to champerty—Wood v. Downes (1), Strachan v. Brander (2), Co. Litt., and Fitz. N.B. tit. 'Champerty.' But supposing champerty to infect the case, in the first place the frame of the suit is erroneous, and in the second place the Court will give no relief to the champertor. If Capt. Sprye is incriminated by his proceedings, so is Sir Thomas Reynell; they are in pari delicto. Look at the case made by the bill. The main ground on which relief is sought is, that a fraud has been practised by Capt.

Sprye, in concert with Mr. Yonge, his solicitor, on Sir Thomas Reynell, and yet the evidence totally disproves this case. If Sir Thomas was deceived at all, it was not by Mr. Yonge in concert with Capt. Sprye, but by Capt. Sprye apart from Mr. Yonge; and it is contrary to every principle which governs the proceedings of the Court that a plaintiff shall make a case of joint fraud by his bill, and sustain his case by proof of a fraud by one; he can no more do this than he can make that sort of case by his bill, and bring another and totally different case before the Court by his evidence. Here the bill is filed, charging the fraud on both defendants, and if it be proved at all, which is denied, it is proved against only one, and on the authority of the case of Wilde v. Gibson (3), decided by the House of Lords, this Court is not at liberty to give the relief sought. With regard to the charge of champerty, no benefit can accrue to Sir Thomas Reynell or his devisee, if it be proved; for by the statute 32 Hen. 8. c. 9. s. 2. it is enacted, that both champertor and accomplice shall be deemed equally guilty, and the subject-matter be forfeited to the Crown. This decree ought, on every ground to be reversed; or, at any rate, the matter ought to be sent to a jury, when both Mr. Yonge and the present plaintiff could be put into the witness-box, and examined on behalf of Captain Sprye.

The reply of Sir Fitzroy Kelly contained the following expressions:—Is the allegation in the bill that the agreement for the conveyance of the first moiety of the estate was obtained by fraud and misrepresentation—rank fraud and gross and wilful misrepresentation—disproved by the defendant? I say it is not. Is it proved by the plaintiff? I say it is. Upon the evidence it is clear that the representation that Capt. Sprye had discovered Sir Thomas's heir-at-law to be entitled to some property, through his record searches in the several depositories of public records, was a clear, plain, palpable, and deliberate falsehood, and known by Capt. Sprye to be so. I prove it to be false from Capt. Sprye's own account, for he says that he was told Sir Thomas was entitled to something by Llewellyn, and he knew it to be a fact from the will at Doctors Commons. It was untrue that the property, whatever it was, could not be recovered excepting by protracted, by expensive, and precarious litigation. It was untrue that the practice of solicitors—of respectable solicitors, and other professional men, is to conduct litigation for half the property recovered. To say so, is a libel on the profession, is a libel on the solicitors. It was utterly untrue, for no such practice did or does exist; and although Capt. Sprye has never been interrogated as to how or where he learnt that such a practice existed, he knew that a representation made by him, holding the rank of an officer and a gentleman, to Sir Thomas Reynell, an officer and a gentleman, was enough to make his assertion implicitly believed. In that sense, if in no other, it was a false and fraudulent misrepresentation. It was untrue, as stated by Capt. Sprye to Sir Thomas, that a suit was necessary to set aside the will of Henry Reynell to enable the Baronet to take the ultimate benefit. In all these points, and in more, plain falsehood was told; and the fraud and misrepresentation contained in the letter of the 29th of April 1843, were never abandoned, and that letter formed the basis of the transaction between the parties.

March 15. — LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—In these causes the original plaintiff, Lieut.-Gen. Sir Thomas Reynell, sought, and after his death, Lady Elizabeth Reynell, as his devisee and executrix, obtained, from a learned Judge of this Court, not now on the bench, relief against two instruments as effected in equity by unfair or improper dealing alleged to have taken place on the part of Capt. Sprye, who, with Mrs. Sprye, his wife, claimed the benefit of those instruments, their alleged rights under which they, by their suit sought, but in the opinion of the Vice Chancellor who dismissed their bill, were not entitled, to enforce. The earlier instrument is a deed, by which Sir Thomas Reynell purported to convey, for the absolute benefit of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye, the interest of Sir Thomas Reynell in an undivided half of the freehold estates that had belonged to his distant kinsman Henry Reynell, at the death of that gentleman, who died in the year 1824, owning freehold estates in Somerset and Devon of considerable value, and leaving an only child, a daughter. She was not legally related to him. This lady, with her husband, a clergyman, named Williams, but called after Henry Reynell's death, Williams Reynell, was in the enjoyment of those estates from that event to her own decease, which happened early in the year 1846. The deed was executed by Sir Thomas Reynell in July 1843. The other instrument is an agreement for the sale by him of the interest in the other half of the estates to Capt. Sprye for 5,000*l.*, a sum of which no part has ever been paid. Under this document, signed by Sir Thomas Reynell in May 1844, there seems to have been some colour, at least, for suggesting that Mrs. Sprye had acquired or might claim an interest, as well as her husband. The case brought before us upon a petition of appeal or re-hearing, presented by Capt. and Mrs. Sprye, in each of the causes, occupied here, as it had done before Sir James Wigram, a length of time fully commensurate to its bulky materials and to the demands of justice—whether too long a time, or, if too long a time, whether the excess ought to be ascribed to the Court, or the Bar, or both, I need not now consider. The present is one of those instances of cross litigation, in which a dismissal of each of the contending parties is incapable of terminating the dispute between them, for that course taken here would leave Capt. Sprye at liberty to sue Lady Elizabeth Reynell (whether without or with a reasonable chance of success), for the purpose of recovering against the assets of Sir Thomas Reynell pecuniary damages (substantial or nominal) upon the agreement of 1844, and the covenant contained in the conveyance of 1843. It is therefore necessary, not only with respect to the costs, but also otherwise, to determine whether relief ought to be given upon the bill filed by Sir Thomas Reynell, against which the suit of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye, it must be observed, cannot be viewed in the light merely of a defence, or merely of being auxiliary to the defence—and this, not because the bills of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye pray relief, but because they pray such relief as they do. Whatever may become of the suit of Sir Thomas Reynell, I apprehend that if we shall dismiss or affirm the dismissal of the bills filed by Capt. and Mrs. Sprye, that will amount to an adjudication that the two instruments in question (of which, if either confers any title at law, it is only a title to sue for pecuniary damages, inasmuch as H. Reynell's interest in his real property was equitable only), confer in equity, either no title at all, or nothing beyond a title to proceed against Sir T. Reynell's assets for the recovery of pecuniary damages; while it is obvious that the success of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye, in their suit, must be destructive of Sir T. Reynell's suit, which on the other hand, cannot succeed without causing the total failure of the other. But there would be nothing absurd or anomalous in a dismissal of each of the bills; and as in most instances, so especially in this, the attack on each side requires a more forcible and clear case than the defence. I have but another word in the nature of preliminary observations to say, which is this—upon the assumption of the decree being right, as far as it goes, it might well, I think, have restrained Capt. Sprye in terms from suing Lady E. Reynell at law upon the two instruments respectively, an addition which I suppose that the Vice Chancellor, if asked to make, would have made; for though an injunction of that kind is not, I believe, prayed on the record, the omission was, I apprehend, at the hearing of the causes, immaterial, whatever the rule may be as to interlocutory applications. The decree would, perhaps, have also contained provisions concerning some other documents in evidence in the cause, if this had been asked at the bar—[His Lordship then read at length the deed of the 15th of July 1843 and a letter of the 14th of May 1844].

As to the origin of these documents, it seems that in or before April of the year 1843, Capt. Sprye, perhaps in the course of some genealogical inquiries, perhaps otherwise, did, without any request from Sir T. Reynell, or employment on his part, discover or hear of the fact that H. Reynell had left a will, conferring reversionary interests in real property on Sir T. Reynell and his elder brother, Sir R. Reynell, which was proved, and deposited at Doctors Commons. It must also be taken that Capt. Sprye, in a manner open to some remark, did, between the end of March 1843 and the end of June 1843, communicate the fact of the existence of the will to Sir T. Reynell, and inform him that he was, or might possibly be, either under it if valid, or by heirship, interested importantly in the landed property of H. Reynell, property of considerable value. It may, moreover, be fairly considered as true, that Sir T. Reynell, though he had been acquainted slightly at least with that gentleman, and aware of a relationship between them, had, previously to receiving this information from Capt. Sprye, neither cared nor thought whether H. Reynell had left a will or property. Now, that possibly but for Capt. Sprye, the life of Sir T. Reynell might have ended without any attention on his part having been given to any such matter; that possibly but for Capt. Sprye, it might at this moment have been unknown to Lady E. Reynell that H. Reynell left either will or property; and that but for Capt. Sprye, possibly Mr. W. Reynell might now have been receiving and enjoying the rents of the estate—a possession which not very improbably might have continued until his death—there is, I think, no gainsaying. And inasmuch as the estates in question may be taken to be worth not less than 25,000*l.* clear, after discharging the burthens upon them, as at the time when the communication was made by Capt. Sprye to Sir T. Reynell, the true and real title to the estates was, for all purposes material in the present case, thus: that Mrs. W. Reynell was tenant for life, subject to impeachment of waste, with remainder or reversion (immediately in substance) to Sir T. Reynell in fee—as some timber had been cut irregularly—as some colour had been given for an unfounded claim on the part of Mr. W. Reynell, to an interest for his own life—and as there was at least probable ground for questioning the propriety of the conduct of Mr. and Mrs. W. Reynell, and of the trustees or supposed trustees under the will, or one or some of them, in having omitted to inform Sir T. Reynell of the will, and in having dealt somewhat singularly with the paper under which that unfounded claim arose, it cannot, I think, be denied, that Capt. Sprye, by merely telling Sir T. Reynell of the existence and the nature of the will and of the place of its deposit, might have done a valuable act of service to him—a service which Capt. Sprye might have rendered in several ways; as, for instance, he might have said to Sir T. Reynell, “I am glad to be able to inform you of a circumstance which you are possibly not aware of—your kinsman H. Reynell, of Leatherhead, left a will, under which some important interests in landed property appear to be given reversionarily to you, and to Sir R. Reynell—had you not better look after the matter? The will is at Doctors Commons.” Now, if Capt. Sprye, on becoming aware of the will and the place of its deposit, a notorious and sufficiently accessible place, had taken this course, without any bargain or other motive than the wish to do as he would be done by, or to perform an act of mere good nature or courtesy to a respectable acquaintance—I say nothing of their common profession, or of Sir T. Reynell's age, services, and station—Capt. Sprye would have acted as, I hope, three out of four men in this country similarly circumstanced would have acted. Or it might have been thus:—I have more than once, as probably many others have, received letters proposing to furnish some unexplained information alleged to be of an advantageous kind, in exchange for a preliminary coin, I think a sovereign, upon the safe transmission of which, but not before, the mystery was to be unfolded. If Capt. Sprye, taking such a course, had, before giving any information, required and received a promise from Sir T. Reynell that he would, upon learning something beneficial to him from the Captain, give the Captain half, or a quarter, or an eighth, of the value of what the information should enable or lead Sir T. Reynell to acquire, it may be that a jury would, in an action of assumpsit, upon the promise, have given the Captain pecuniary damages, and that the verdict would not have been disturbed; but I do not think it likely that a court of equity would have assisted such a transaction, beyond not refusing to recognize, as an effectual judgment for damages, or damages and costs, a judgment at law obtained fairly in such an action. Again, Capt. Sprye might have withheld the information from Sir T. Reynell until the latter had promised him a fair or sufficient compensation or reward in general terms for the communication. This, certainly, would have been a contract merely of legal cognizance, but if a judgment at law for damages, or damages and costs, had been obtained by Capt. Sprye upon it fairly, a court of equity would have recognized that as an effectual judgment for its proper legal purpose.

How far he acted in a manner similar or analogous to any of these modes, the pleadings and proofs before the Court shew. There may certainly be a difference of opinion among civil, if not among military, moralists, upon the question whether none of the possible lines of conduct that I have been mentioning would have been in any degree open to animadversion; but as to one of them, there could not have been the least difference or doubt; and as to the others, if not of the highest elevation, they would, at least, not have been of a perplexed, puzzling and cabalistical kind—there would have been something in a sense straightforward belonging to them—they would, in a word, not have been of that generally unlucky description—acuminis nimis. I have used the expression “valuable act of service:” the worth and extent, however, of that act, of that service, should of course be neither over-rated nor under-rated. The title and claims of Mrs. W. Reynell and her husband were merely and solely under the will. It was of the utmost importance to their interests that the will should be held valid and effectual; nor has it been shewn or suggested that either of them, at any time, denied or questioned, or thought of denying or questioning, its existence or validity. They desired, indeed, perhaps fairly, perhaps unfairly, but certainly without any foundation, to give testamentary validity, as concerning the freehold property, to an invalid paper—a paper at least invalid as to the testator’s freehold property—and he does not seem to have had any copyhold property—a paper, the sole effect of which, if valid as to freehold estate, would, through the execution by Mrs. W. Reynell of the power it purported to give, have been to confer a life interest on the husband. This wish, however, must have increased rather than diminished their inclination to support the will; which, in fact, is safe in Doctors Commons, and has continually been so for the last twenty-five years and more, including as part of it the paper professing to give the power just referred to.

H. Reynell’s title-deeds, I believe, were, at his death, and have ever since been, held by none of the persons whom I have mentioned, but by a mortgagee under a mortgage, created, I think, by H. Reynell, which seems to be still unsatisfied, and by reason of that incumbrance the legal estate in fee in the property in question, as I collect, was at the time of the making of the will, and has ever since been outstanding. The will speaks of “monies secured on my estates in the counties of Devon and Somerset, in mortgage to Mr. John Beague,” and of “the said mortgage money due to the said John Beague.” The testator describes himself in it as H. Reynell, of Leatherhead, and it seems highly probable that many persons at Leatherhead, and some, if not all, of the occupying tenants of the property were aware or had heard long before the year 1843, that Mrs. W. Reynell was not legitimate, and was entitled under the will of her reputed father, H. Reynell, of Leatherhead, to the real estate of which she and her husband were in the enjoyment. Upon the whole, if Capt. Sprye, at any period of the year 1843, thought it likely that, without and independently of any aid, interference, and communication on his part, Sir T. Reynell and his heir or devisee, if any, would remain for ever or for so long a period as a twelvemonth, after the death of the survivor of Mrs. W. Reynell and her husband, ignorant of the existence, nature, or contents of H. Reynell’s will, that opinion so entertained by Capt. Sprye was, in my judgment, founded on wrong calculations of chance and of probabilities, and in error.

But let us suppose that Capt. Sprye, acting gratuitously, had merely taken the first line that I have mentioned and then left Sir T. Reynell to himself. In what manner would Sir T. Reynell, if assumed to have had ordinary prudence or common discretion, have acted? He would have resorted to a competent solicitor, a man of consideration and experience; and accordingly, if not then knowing one of that description, would have procured some judicious friend to recommend him one. To this solicitor he would have stated the matter. The solicitor would have inspected the original will and have bespoken and obtained a copy of it, and have learnt from Sir T. Reynell the state of his family, including the probability that Sir R. Reynell, who certainly survived H. Reynell, had died intestate, leaving Sir Thomas heir of Sir Richard. The solicitor then would have made inquiries at Leatherhead and elsewhere, and would very easily and soon have ascertained the place of residence of Mr. and Mrs. W. Reynell, and the fact that she had never had, and was not likely ever to have, a child, and would also have guessed at least that an attempt would be made to give a life interest in the property to her husband, but would of course have felt perfectly satisfied that the attempt could not succeed, for the mere inspection of the will would have shewn that though its validity as to freehold property was probable in the highest degree, except as to the paper under which alone a life interest could be claimed by him, that paper was clearly of no value as to freehold estates. The solicitor would also have felt convinced that Mrs. W. Reynell was neither heiress nor co-heiress of H. Reynell, and that she and her husband in all probability considered it most desirable for each, most material and important for the interests of each, that the will, whether without or with the unattested paper, should be supported as a good will of all the testator's property. The solicitor, having thus informed himself, which he would have done at a small expense, would then have applied by letter or personally in a civil and business-like manner to one of them, and so have learnt the name, abode, and calling of Mr. Monro, one of the trustees, and his connexion or former connexion with the property. But it must be recollected also that Mr. Monro is a deponent, or was intended to be a depo-

nent, in the affidavit deposited with the will at Doctors Commons. By means of communications with that gentleman, Mr. T. Williams and Mr. and Mrs. W. Reynell, or one or more of them, the solicitor would have acquired a sufficient knowledge of the property, the timber cut, and the possession of the title-deeds by H. Reynell's mortgagee. This, too, would not have taken much trouble or time, and the solicitor would then have told Sir T. Reynell there was no doubt or perplexity or difficulty about the case, and that the freehold estates of H. Reynell, encumbered, however, of course as he had encumbered them, must be considered as certainly and safely the absolute property of Sir T. Reynell, subject only to these qualifications: first, the life interest of Mrs. W. Reynell, and the possible but necessarily hopeless claim on her husband's part of a life interest to himself; secondly, the very improbable possibility that Mrs. W. Reynell might bear a child; thirdly, the circumstance that the husband or wife, or both, having cut timber irregularly, might do so again; fourthly, the improbable possibility that Sir R. Reynell had left issue or a will disinheriting Sir T. Reynell; fifthly, the possibility that Sir T. Reynell might have issue, who would after his death be entitled.

Now, if the view and estimate of the facts and probabilities that I have stated are substantially, as I believe them to be, correct, two questions seem to suggest themselves: first, did Capt. Sprye render any important or considerable service to Sir T. Reynell beyond the mere fact of informing him that there was a will of H. Reynell's, under which Sir T. Reynell took valuable interests, whatever may have been the worth or merit of a service of that simple kind? A question which must, I think, be answered in the negative. Secondly, what are we to think of the course of conduct pursued towards Sir T. Reynell by Capt. Sprye and his solicitor, Mr. Yonge, during the interval between the time when Capt. Sprye learnt the existence of the will and the time of Sir T. Reynell's execution of the impeached deed of conveyance in July 1843? In considering this second question, we should probably proceed at once to that instrument itself which I have already read—a deed which, if its nature, foundation, and intention are to be collected merely from its language and contents, is simply voluntary, purely gratuitous. It does not mention or indicate that Sir T. Reynell had employed Capt. Sprye, or owed him money, or was or had at any time been liable to be sued by him at law or in equity: nor does it bind, or profess to bind him by covenant or otherwise to take any proceedings on the account or for the benefit of Sir T. Reynell, or to render Sir T. Reynell any services whatever. I may also observe that the connexion by marriage which it mentions—a connexion not proved or not otherwise proved—must have been slight or distant, if there was any at all; for though the connexion is stated on the part of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye to have been constituted by consanguinity between that lady and Sir T. Reynell, there is no suggestion or any probability that either of them was descended from any great grandfather or grandmother of the other. Indeed, in a letter, to Mr. W. Reynell, of the 15th of April 1843, Capt. Sprye speaks of his own son's descent "from the old Devonshire branch of the family of Reynell, by matches of two or three centuries back, but nothing connected with the branch from which Mrs. Williams Reynell descends and represents." It seems, moreover, that previous to the year 1835 there had been no acquaintance whatever between Sir Thomas and Lady Elizabeth Reynell or either of them, on the one hand, and Capt. and Mrs. Sprye or either of them on the other, and that if there was any intimacy it began in or after April 1843: still, if the deed was not founded on an improper consideration, was not turpi ex causâ, was intended by Sir T. Reynell to be in substance what it appears on the face of it to be, and was fairly obtained from him, it would be impossible to give relief against it. But how do those two or three circumstances stand? They stand as I now proceed to mention, first saying, however, though perhaps superfluously with reference to the expressions "improper consideration" and "turpi ex causâ," that notwithstanding the solemnity and force which the law ascribes to deeds and all the strictness with which in general it prohibits the introduction of extrinsic evidence to prove that an instrument goes beyond, or does not fully contain, or incorrectly exhibits, the terms of the contract, which it was written and signed for the purpose of expressing or recording, the rule is settled, and not merely in courts of equity, that a deed ex facie just and righteous, may be vitiated and avoided by alleging and adducing extrinsic evidence to prove that it was founded on a consideration, or had a view or purpose contravening law or public policy; nor would I mention the well-known case of Collins v. Blantern (4), but for the sake of referring, as I pass, to the very useful note appended to it in Mr. John Wm. Smith's collection, vol. 1, p. 154.

Besides the conveyance of July 1843, there are in evidence two deeds, each of the same date with that. All were executed in July 1843; two of those are produced, the other is proved by an admitted copy, and one of the two produced is the conveyance just mentioned, which the decree declares void. The deed proved by the admitted copy is a power of attorney from Sir T. Reynell to Capt. Sprye. The remaining deed produced is a deed of covenant to indemnify, from Capt. Sprye to Sir T. Reynell. Not however so, was the first intention of Mr. Yonge and Capt. Sprye, by whom or by Mr. Yonge as Capt. Sprye's solicitor, which is the same thing: it seems to have been meant originally, if I draw a correct inference from the papers which I have seen, that there should be only two instruments, embracing, however, the objects of the three actual deeds, but in a form differing, and a mode varying from them.—[His Lordship then proceeded to refer to and remark on the instructions laid before counsel, the observations of counsel on the drafts, and the final frame of them as executed in 1843; and then read in extenso the power of attorney and the deed of indemnity.]

Now, these three instruments, viewed together, do form certainly, even in their actual state of polish, no commonplace assemblage; but if we break the group into individuals, or into an unit and a pair, the result will not be less odd. Who saw ever before such a document as the impeached conveyance? And would it remove the surprise of any learned or unlearned person, having read that deed without any knowledge of the extrinsic facts, and immediately afterwards being informed of the existence of the two other instruments, to read them and find them what they are? In saying this, I do not exclusively allude to the word "irrevocably," contained in the power of attorney. Again, I apprehend that the power of attorney and deed of indemnity read in ignorance of the impeached deed and of the extrinsic facts, would create a strong suspicion of illegal or improper dealing. The appointment of an attorney irrevocable by an instrument having apparently no other purpose, and the taking of an indemnity from that attorney against the costs of the suits which, as the attorney, he shall institute, the indemnity being by a simultaneous instrument, having no other object, may well be thought out of the ordinary course of fair transactions. It is mere repetition, to observe, however, that the three documents together do not contain or express, do not profess to create, any agreement or obligation on the part of Capt. Sprye to institute or prosecute any suit, take any proceedings, make or pursue any investigation, or perform any operation whatever. Do then the three instruments, taken together, express the true intention and the whole agreement of the parties to them, or at least of Sir T. Reynell and Capt. Sprye, so that it could be fair or right, independently of any question of misdemeanour or public policy, to act on the impeached deed of conveyance simply according to its purport, or as affected only by the purport of the two other instruments?—[Here his Lordship referred at great length to, and read throughout, the draft of the intended conveyance of the second moiety of the estates, and which is before referred to as Exhibit R, and also made reference to many letters in the correspondence as illustrative of the agreement between Sir T. Reynell and Capt. Sprye.]

The understanding, the agreement, that I have been just mentioning, appears to me to have been in substance and effect this: that, inasmuch as H. Reynell was believed by Sir T. Reynell and Capt. Sprye to have died the owner of freehold estates considerable in extent and value, as Sir T. Reynell was neither in the possession or enjoyment of that property or any part of it, nor correctly aware of its particular situation or rental, but as they believed that in the character of heir, if he was the heir, of H. Reynell, or in the character of heir, if he was the heir, of Sir R. Reynell, or in character of devisee under the will, if there was a will, of H. Reynell, valid as to his freehold estates, or in more than one or each of these modes, Sir T. Reynell had some right or rights, immediate or not immediate, of more or less value or importance, to or in these estates, and as this right or supposed right, these rights or supposed rights, Capt. Sprye represented to Sir T. Reynell, and which he accordingly considered to be, of uncertain extent, likely to be resisted or questioned, nor susceptible immediately or easily of proof, the ascertainment, assertion, and establishment of this right, or these rights, if any, whether on the footing of intestacy on the part of H. Reynell, or otherwise, were to be, and were, undertaken by Capt. Sprye, so far at least as reasonable diligence and reasonable endeavours on his part would extend and could be effectual; that the expenditure for the purpose should be his; that Sir T. Reynell should be at no expense nor incur any liability, and that upon those terms Capt. Sprye should have half the benefit of what should be so ascertained, asserted, and established, that is to say, should, subject to the life estate if there should prove to be any, in Mrs. W. Reynell, to the life interest, if there should prove to be any, of her husband, to the interest, if any, of her possible issue, to the interests, if any, of Sir T. Reynell's possible issue, to the interests, if any, of Sir R. Reynell's issue, if any, and of his devisee, if any, and to the questions, whether material or immaterial, of Sir R. Reynell having been H. Reynell's heir, and Sir T. Reynell being Sir R. Reynell's heir, have half the freehold property of H. Reynell whatever it might be. Such an understanding, such an agreement, which were in my opinion expressed substantially with sufficient accuracy upon the Exhibit R, in its original state, nor ever abandoned by Capt. Sprye or Sir T. Reynell, however affected by the agreement of May 1844, may or may not have amounted strictly in point of law to champerty or maintenance so as to constitute a punishable offence, but must in my judgment be considered clearly against the policy of the law, clearly mischievous, clearly such as a court of equity ought to discourage and relieve against. I need not repeat a reference to the authorities quoted during the argument, nor need I mention Wallis v. the Duke of Portland (5), Kenney v. Browne (6), Burke v. Greene (7), and Stevens v. Bagwell (8), if they were not particularly cited. It was suggested, by one at least of the learned counsel, that cases between solicitors and clients, and cases where the illegality of a contract, or its contravention of public policy, has been effectually alleged by a defendant against a plaintiff, furnish little or no support to a bill such as that of Sir T. Reynell; and it may be true that principles or rules are applicable to transactions between solicitors and their clients, which are not applicable to those between persons standing not in any such or any similar relation to each other; but it was not, nor could reasonably have been said, that a transaction may not be bad for champerty or maintenance, or to use a phrase more than once found in the books, as "savouring of champerty," though between persons not affected by any such or any analogous connexion. Again, we know that there are instances in which a case, available and effectual in this court for defeating a plaintiff, is unavailable and ineffectual for the purpose of obtaining a decree against a defendant. Upon many a contract, whether bad or good at law, this jurisdiction has refused to act whether for or against the instrument or transaction, and in the present instance of course the dismissal of the bills of Sir Thomas and Lady E. Reynell would not necessarily be inconsistent with the dismissal of the bills of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye. It is obviously true, that Sir T. Reynell participated in the transaction which I have just described and characterized, and if he and Capt. Sprye had been, to use the old legal phrase, in pari delicto, and public policy ought not to be considered as interested in favour of allowing one to sue the other for relief against the contract, there might possibly be ground for contending that Sir T. Reynell's suit ought to fail. But where the parties to a contract against public policy, or illegal, are not in pari delicto (and they are not always so), and where public policy is considered as advanced by allowing either, or at least the more excusable of the two, to sue for relief against the transaction, relief is given to him, as we know from various authorities, of which Osborne v. Williams (9) is one. Here it cannot reasonably be said that Capt. Sprye, in the matter of the impeached deed of July 1843, was not more blameable than Sir T. Reynell, who either had not a legal adviser as to the matter or had none but Mr. Yonge, and if Mr. Yonge was so, then he adhered much more to Capt. Sprye than Sir T. Reynell, and failed in duty to the latter, who I am, upon the evidence, convinced did not suppose that in entering into the agreement on the basis of which the impeached deed was executed by him, or in executing it, he was doing an act contrary to public policy, or illegal, or open to the censure of a Court of justice. I believe he did not mean to do anything wrong.

But what are we to say or think of Mr. Yonge, and Capt. Sprye who had had Mr. Yonge for his adviser? Did either of them suppose the agreement unobjectionable? If so, why was the conveyance framed as it was? Why did it not express and embody what was the true bargain, the true arrangement? Why, as I said before, were there three instruments? Whatever the case was between Sir T. Reynell and society at large, he was, as between himself and Capt. Sprye, entitled to believe the incorrect and unwarrantable statements contained in the letter of the 29th of April 1843, in these words—"A system has grown up among men of business, of conducting such cases on the arrangement that no law expenses are paid unless success attends the proceedings; in which case they are first paid out of the money recovered, and the party conducting the proceedings and furnishing the information is allowed for his compensation half what is recovered, which is also to satisfy him for the risk of paying the law expenses, without perhaps succeeding." And again, when speaking of "a legal man" unnamed, the writer uses this expression—"He said, if he found what I stated to him to be borne out by documents, he would undertake the case legally on the usual arrangement as above." I call these statements incorrect and unwarrantable, on the supposition, which I think reasonable, that Capt. Sprye in using the words "men of business" and "legal man," meant Sir T. Reynell to understand him as referring to decent people, to persons of possible respectability, and not to barristers or counsel whom no Inn will own, and solicitors estranged from every roll. What too can be said for Mr. Yonge's letter of the 12th of May 1843, in which, without any expression of surprise, dissent, or disapproval, he, an admitted and enrolled attorney, writes of the "informant" or supposed informant of Capt. Sprye, considering himself "entitled to half the property when recovered, after payment of all expenses, which, however, he was to defray if unsuccessful," and afterwards uses (not as it seems ironically, or at least not with apparent irony) the word "generously," the same letter recommending "some legal document stipulating to the above effect"? Some legal document! Whatever may have been the object or influence under which Mr. Yonge consented or submitted to write that letter, is Capt. Sprye at liberty to allege, for any effectual purpose in this litigation, that Sir T. Reynell was not entitled to believe it the spontaneous letter of a professional man, able and willing to advise according to his position and station? A letter less objectionable might have been made worse by the fact that its language was dictated or suggested to the writer by the person to whom it was written; but this letter seems beyond any such heightening.

Perhaps it might with some plausibility be suggested, as an argument against the illegality of the deeds of 1843, or their contravention of public policy, that Sir T. Reynell's rights were so certain, plain, and clear as to exclude any notion of rational controversy. It must, however, be recollected that the validity of H. Reynell's will, as a will of freehold estates, had been represented to Sir T. Reynell, and must be taken to have been considered by him as questionable—that the same may be said of the possible result of the claim to a reversionary life interest for Mr. W. Reynell—that difficulties had been suggested as to the heirship and intestacy of Sir R. Reynell, which cannot be thought to have had no influence on Sir T. Reynell's mind—and that his notions of the construction and effect of the will were vague and obscure. To his apprehension, therefore, and in his understanding when he executed the deeds of 1843, and when he signed the draft of 1844, his rights were not certain, plain or clear. Believing them to be otherwise, he acted on that idea, and, ignorant of the law, entered into a bargain with views and for purposes prohibited by law. It was his intention to break, not knowing, the law. No man can say that Sir T. Reynell would have executed any one of the deeds knowing at the time the nature and extent of his rights, and that they were plain and clear, nor capable of being rationally opposed.

The possible argument to which I have just been referring, exhibits also this dilemma: if from the certainty, clearness and plainness of Sir T. Reynell's rights there was no breach of law or public policy in the transaction of 1843, and the facts and circumstances of that transaction have been correctly viewed by me, what answer is there to the case alleged of mere fraud? I repeat distinctly, that in my judgment Sir T. Reynell did not know or did not understand accurately or sufficiently the material facts, the extent of his rights, their nature, and the rules of law applicable to the will, when he executed the deeds in question, or when he signed in 1844 the draft of the proposed conveyance under the agreement of May, a draft recognizing and purporting to confirm the conveyance of July, each of which acts he did either without any legal assistance, or with worse than none.

Anything, to my apprehension, more thoroughly bad in equity upon the whole than the deed impeached I never knew; nor after close attention to the subject, can I hesitate as to relieving against it in Sir T. Reynell's suit. If, indeed, after its execution, he had, with sufficient knowledge of the true state of the facts and of his rights, either confirmed the deed or allowed Capt. Sprye to bestow labour and incur expense on the basis of it, and in reliance on it, a different course might very possibly have been correct; but no such case is proved, or in my opinion proveable. There was no substantial difference, it is plain, in my judgment, between the state of his mind and information when he executed the deeds of 1843 and when he signed the draft of the conveyance. I have, before proceeding to the consideration of the agreement of May 1844, but one thing more to say, that is, to express pointedly my regret that the letter of the 12th of May 1843 should have been written; that it should have been transmitted to Sir T. Reynell, and that the episode of the suggested codicil, by which among others these papers are diversified, should have been possible; though whether the first idea of the codicil formed itself in a mind familiar with the case of Powell v. Knowler in the second volume of Atkyns' Reports, p. 226, I know not, nor attempt to guess.

With respect to the agreement of May 1844, it is so closely connected, so intimately associated, with the impeached deed, that the deed failing, I do not see how the agreement can with propriety be supported. Can it be alleged that without the deed, without the transaction upon the basis of which Sir T. Reynell was induced and intended to execute the deed, can it be safely said that free, and knowing himself to be free, from that transaction and the deed, he would have made the agreement? Would not to hold the latter binding on him be in a sense to give a degree of force and effect to the deed? Retaining the agreement, would not Capt. Sprye be retaining a benefit substantially under the deed? I am of opinion that Sir T. Reynell having entered into the agreement under the erroneous notion that he was bound by the deed, from which, in my judgment, his devisee is entitled to be delivered, and relieved, that lady is entitled to be delivered and relieved from the agreement also. And this I say independently of the very questionable means (they were probably more, indeed, than questionable) to which, subsequently to October 1843, Mr. Yonge and Capt. Sprye, or one of them had recourse, for the purpose, I will not say of driving, I will not say of coaxing, I will say of conducting Sir T. Reynell into the agreement, in which matter as to legal or professional advice he stood as he did in the matter of the deeds. It is impossible, however, without deep concern, to see what the case is with respect to the letter of Mr. Yonge of the 17th of April 1844, transmitted by Capt. Sprye to Sir T. Reynell, and with respect also to the document transmitted to him in Capt. Sprye's remarkable letter of the 11th of May 1844, written at Tonbridge Wells—a document as to which Capt. Sprye, in a later letter to Sir T. Reynell of the 16th of that month, says—"I feel equally glad you are satisfied with Mr. Yonge's valuation, who is a good and honest creature." By calling, however, the letter of the 11th of May "remarkable," I do not mean to attribute that distinction to it exclusively among the letters—far from that—though it does mention "an actuary," and speaks of "doubts and risks and Chancery suit pending," and "the doubtful state of our suit in Chancery." Sparing myself the task of saying more on this topic, I proceed to state that the conveyance of July and the agreement of May must, in my opinion, fall together and be dealt with not differently.—[His Lordship then read the instructions then laid by Mr. Yonge before counsel for the preparation of the conveyance of the second moiety, the draft of that deed itself, the alterations in it, and the fact of Mrs. Sprye's name being introduced into the transactions, and Sir T. Reynell's surprise thereat, and other particulars disclosed in the evidence.]—Much has been said with more or less weight on the subject of Mr. Stinton's opinion, and the disabling Mr. Yonge as a witness by making him a defendant. The opinion of Mr. Stinton may or may not have been seen by Sir T. Reynell before he executed the deeds, but this I believe, that whether without or with any bad motive, the opinion, if communicated, had not been explained to him properly or sufficiently, if at all, before he executed them, or before he signed the draft of 1844; and that, as I have said, when he executed them, and when he signed the draft of 1844, he did not sufficiently understand his true position and circumstances with respect to the property in dispute. How otherwise are we to account for his letter of the 11th of May 1844? Is it to be attributed to forgetfulness, cunning, or to what? Perhaps this document is the most observable of the many, I had almost said unaccountable papers which this case contains.

Stress was also during the argument professed to be laid on a case decided by the House of Lords in the year 1848, reported by Messrs. Clark & Finnelly (10), which, however can be better and more thoroughly understood by reading the printed appeal papers belonging to it, but especially the examination of it, in a treatise of the law of property as administered by the House of Lords (11), published in 1849, a well-known and valuable work, where the learned author has elaborately considered the case, on which if his comments are well founded, it is perhaps as remarkable as any in the history of civil judicature of the House of Lords. But whether his view of the facts, the equity and the law of it, or on the contrary those taken by the peers, who advised the House of Lords upon it, are correct, it is binding here as an authority, and, if it can, ought to be applied in this instance. I do not find myself able however so to apply it, or to agree with the learned counsel for Captain and Mrs. Sprye, in their assimilation of it to the present. I do not consider the former as furnishing a rule or precedent for the latter. It has been contended, that fraud or impropriety of conduct has not been alleged by Sir T. Reynell's bill, except as against Capt. Sprye and Mr. Yonge jointly, and that as Mr. Yonge has been dismissed, though without costs, and there has not been a petition of re-hearing or appeal by him or Lady Elizabeth Reynell, the consequence must be the dismissal of Sir T. Reynell's bill. To this, however, I cannot accede. Upon the circumstance that the actual petition of rehearing or appeal is general and unlimited, and that Mr. Yonge, a respondent to it, has appeared upon it, I lay no stress. I give no opinion whether rebus sic stantibus the Court has jurisdiction to vary the Vice Chancellor's decree in a manner favourable to Mr. Yonge, or unfavourable to him. But I apprehend it was clearly within the judicial power of the Vice Chancellor, dismissing Mr. Yonge, to make with consistency the decree which I find made against Captain and Mrs. Sprye. The argument has in effect gone the length of contending that if relief in equity is sought against a man alleged to have obtained an instrument by fraud, or otherwise improperly from the plaintiff for the benefit of the defendant, and the facts alleged as constituting or shewing the fraud or impropriety, are proved against him, and do constitute or shew the fraud or impropriety, the suit must fail, because the bill has incorrectly and untruly alleged the third person to have been a participator and actor in the facts, with such intentions and in such a manner as to have been guilty of the fraud or misconduct equally, and in co-operation with him. That incorrect and untrue mode of stating the case may affect the costs, but to say that it can do more is to contradict alike theory and practice, precedent and principle. Where, indeed, it can reasonably be suggested that the defendant may have been to his prejudice crippled or misled in his defence by the plaintiff's inaccurate mode of stating his case, the Court has the means of providing a remedy for any possible injustice, not only, as I have said, in point of costs, but by giving the defendant an opportunity of adducing evidence, or further evidence, before itself, or a Master, or a jury. Here, in my judgment, neither Captain nor Mrs. Sprye has been crippled or misled in their defence.

And let me observe, that whatever ought to be thought of Mr. Yonge's conduct, as fraudulent or free from fraud, it is clear that in a course of acting contrary to public policy, and to rules by which a professional man especially ought to hold himself bound, Mr. Yonge has, through misapprehension or insufficient information, or otherwise, without or with censurable intentions, directly participated, and as he was personally mingled with the case in 1843 and 1844, so he appears in it in a questionable light often enough to relieve from blame and to prevent much wondering at the act of making him a defendant. Nor am I sure that if Mr. Yonge had been made by the Vice Chancellor liable for the plaintiff's costs in Sir T. Reynell's suit, I should have been prepared to dissent from that. Here there was a masked transaction. A solicitor ought to know that his duty professionally prohibits him (if as a man he is not by instinct drawn back) from assisting or lending his name or credit where there is aliud simulatum, aliud actum. Here there was aliud simulatum, aliud actum. Mr. Yonge was an abettor in composing and uttering documents which, not recording an affair of business as it truly was, did record it as truly it was not. And why? Because the true transaction was unlawful—because, truly told, it announced its own failure, vanity, and nothingness (to use no harsher term), and this is done by a minister, an officer of the superior courts of justice. If Capt. Sprye (whether student or not) was unaware of how the English laws regard the traffic of merchandising in quarrels, of huckstering in litigious discord, or was ignorant of the value of truth merely as a commodity in business, Mr. Yonge should have informed him better; nor in any event should Mr. Yonge have allowed Sir T. Reynell to remain at once without a solicitor and without a due understanding of the manner, the grave manner, in which he, a gentleman and a soldier full of years and honour, was committing himself. Still I cannot say that I have a firm impression that the decree ought to have charged Mr. Yonge with the costs, and he will be neither charged nor relieved on this occasion. It has not indeed been suggested for him, that he ought to have his costs.

It has been said likewise, that Sir T. Reynell's bill, so far as it is directed against Capt. Sprye on the ground of fraud distinct from champerty, or supposed champerty, and distinct from any question of public policy, is, if not groundless, at least exaggerated and inflated in a manner to be disapproved and discouraged.

For this argument, whatever its weight or extent, there was probably more foundation in a former than in the present state of the bill, and perhaps even in its actual state there is some room. The mode of acting, however, which Capt. Sprye seems to have thought justifiable, was such, on his part, that he cannot, I think, well complain that it was viewed unfavourably even without regard to any question of mere law or public policy. And if it was merely an error even without regard to any question of mere law or public policy, still, if so far as Sir T. Reynell's suit is concerned, the decree had exempted Capt. Sprye from a portion at least of the costs, it may be that I should have agreed. Sir T. Reynell was not a young, an embarrassed, or an isolated man; he was not out of society; was well connected; was the brother-in-law of an archbishop; was often or occasionally in London; was in good circumstances; of high military rank; and had the means of obtaining with facility the best advice. If he was deceived, he was so under circumstances that do not, it is true, induce me to say, qui vult decipi decipiatur, but may remind one perhaps of the saying. And if it was merely in error, he recalls that passage in the Digest (Lib. xxii. tit. 6, ix.), where Paulus tells us—"Sed facti ignorantia ita demum cuique non nocet, si non ei summa negligentia obijciatur. Quid enim, si omnes in civitate sciant quod ille solus ignorat? Et recte Labeo definit: scientiam neque, curiosissimi, neque negligentissimi hominis accipiendam, verum ejus, qui eam rem diligenter inquirendo notam habere possit. Sed juris ignorantiam non prodesse, Labeo ita accipiendum existimat; si jurisconsulti copiam haberet vel sua prudentia instructus sit, ut, cui facile sit scire, ei detrimento sit juris ignorantia. Quod raro accipiendum est."

Sir T. Reynell, too, though not as I have said in equal fault with Capt. Sprye, was a party to a bargain against public policy. Yet if these considerations are insufficient, as of course they are, to justify disingenuousness, how very far are they from affording an excuse for turning to advantage the unsuspecting trust of confiding simplicity. Whatever may formerly have been the course, or supposed course of this jurisdiction, it is now, I apprehend, considered, that where the Master of the Rolls or the Vice Chancellor has by decree given substantial relief against a defendant, with costs against him personally, it is competent to this jurisdiction, upon a rehearing, by way of appeal, affirming the decree as to the relief, to vary it as to the costs; but I conceive that to render this course correct, there ought to be a judicial dissent as to the costs, strong, clear, and undoubting. That the decree here, so far as it goes, is certainly right in the relief which it gives, I have no doubt; and as to the costs of Sir T. Reynell's suit, if I doubt, I cannot say that I do more; or that the inclination of my opinion is not with the decree in this respect.

It is of necessity included in what I have said, that in my opinion the bills of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye must stand dismissed; but I will add that this I should have thought right, even had it appeared to me correct to dismiss the other bills; for upon all the principles which have guided the Court of Chancery during a long series of years and now regulate it, the indisputable facts of the case shew an absence of all title on the part of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye to ask what their bill asks from a court of equity. This is plain and clear, nor perhaps would it be wrong to say, too plain and clear for argument. To suppose a court of equity capable of interfering for the purpose of giving specific effect to either of two such instruments as the conveyance of July 1843 and the agreement of 1844, obtained as they were, is surely to suppose it capable of forgetting or abandoning every rule of rational jurisprudence. The claim, indeed, of Capt. Sprye, as a plaintiff, ought to be carefully all along distinguished as I have just been distinguishing it, from his resistance as a defendant. The claim of Capt. Sprye as a plaintiff, brings to mind the commencement of one of Lord Hardwicke's judgments (12), in which he says, "Next to the surprise and concern one has to see persons enter into such a combination as this, is the surprise to see it contended in a court of justice. It is most extraordinary to think a court of justice can wink so hard as to suffer it to be supported." That case is particularly mentioned by Lord Eldon in another, where the most striking perhaps of Sir Samuel Romilly's replies was made—Huguenin v. Baseley (13); the judgment delivered in which contains more than one remark not without bearing here. There, too, the person alleging that she had been unfairly dealt with, or unduly influenced, was plaintiff. It is impossible, I think, to doubt that the Vice Chancellor disposed justly and correctly of the costs of the suit of Capt. and Mrs. Sprye, and I consider the costs of the appeal ought to be borne in the same way.

There are two or three matters, not probably of much importance, which the decree has not, but which very possibly the Vice Chancellor, if asked, would have provided for: first, I think, that Lady E. Reynell should undertake to abide by such order or orders as the Court shall now or hereafter make concerning the deed of indemnity; and that the deed of indemnity and any draft or drafts in existence which Sir T. Reynell has signed of the three instruments, or any one or more of them, or of the conveyance under the agreement of 1844, should be deposited in the Master's office, subject to further order. Next I consider that, if Lady E. Reynell shall desire it, there should be an injunction restraining Capt. Sprye from bringing or prosecuting any action, or proceeding at law against Lady E. Reynell as the executrix or devisee of Sir T. Reynell, upon or in respect of the two instruments which the decree declares void, or either of them, or any draft or drafts signed by him of the deed which the decree declares void, and of the conveyance under the agreement of 1844, or either of them. I have reason to believe that in affirming the decree, with costs, and with the additions to it that I have mentioned, and in the undertaking to be required, and which has now been given, Lord Cranworth agrees with me. Whether he does so in the mode I have arrived at this conclusion, the Bar will, I doubt not, have the satisfaction of hearing from himself.

(12) Bridgman v. Green, 2 Ves. sen. 627.

grounds: first, that the instruments impeached are void on the ground of fraud; and, secondly, that they are so as founded on champerty. Sir James Wigram decided in favour of the plaintiff on the first ground; and, after a full consideration of the facts, I am of opinion that they do disclose a case of fraud, entitling the plaintiff, on that ground, to what he seeks by his bill; so that the decree is in all essential points correct. My learned Brother has gone so fully into the case, that agreeing with him, as I do, in the result at which he has arrived, it might perhaps have been enough for me simply to express my concurrence, and so leave the matter where it now stands. But considering the nature of the dispute, we thought it more fair to the parties to reduce to writing each of us his view of the case, so that it might not only appear that we concurred in the same result, but also that the reasoning which each of us had, separately, deemed sufficient to warrant the conclusion at which we had arrived, might be explained.

I have said that the facts established in proof disclose a case of fraud fully warranting the decree. It may be impossible to give a definition of what constitutes fraud in the contemplation of a court of equity, so as to meet all the various combinations of circumstances to which the word may apply; but there can be no difficulty in saying that whenever any one has, by wilful misrepresentation, induced another to part with his rights on the belief that such representations were true, this is, in the plainest and most obvious sense, a fraud which this Court will not tolerate. Now, I am of opinion that beyond all doubt Sir T. Reynell was induced to execute the conveyance of the 15th of July 1843, which it is the principal object of this suit to set aside, by repeated misrepresentations made to him by Capt. Sprye, and so that this Court cannot permit that conveyance to stand. The conveyance was executed in pursuance or in consequence of an agreement contained in a letter of Sir T. Reynell, dated the 1st of June 1843. By this letter Sir T. Reynell agrees to give up half the property to which he might be eventually found entitled, in consideration of his being indemnified against all costs whatever incurred in the attempt to recover it, whether that attempt should or should not prove successful.—[His Lordship then read the material parts of the letter of the 29th of April 1843.]—Looking, then, to this letter as the basis of the subsequent treaty, the question is, whether it contains any untrue statements calculated to mislead Sir T. Reynell, for if it does, and if they were known to Capt. Sprye to be inconsistent with truth, and were in any degree calculated to influence the mind of Sir T. Reynell, they will render invalid all the subsequent negotiations based on them. Now, after fully considering this part of the case, I feel bound to conclude that in this letter Capt. Sprye was misleading Sir T. Reynell on more than one point; he was misleading him on the subject of what he represents to be the usual course among men of business in conducting litigation, that is, that the parties for whose benefit it is conducted, should be indemnified from costs, and then should give up half the property recovered as a compensation or reward to the party carrying on the proceedings. Capt. Sprye distinctly states that this is the usual practice, and so states it as evidently to imply that it is both a lawful and an honourable practice. But though this is contrary to the fact, yet it may be said perhaps Capt. Sprye might have supposed he was only stating the truth. Let us see how that is. Capt. Sprye not only states the practice to be usual and impliedly honourable, but he says that he had mentioned it to a legal man, who had said he would, if Capt. Sprye's representations on the subject of Sir T. Reynell's rights were borne out by the documents, undertake the case legally "on the usual arrangement as above." I quote the very words. This amounts impliedly to a representation, first, that the person designated "a legal man" had represented the arrangement as usual; and, secondly, that he had undertaken to act on it. Who, then, was that legal man? Mr. Yonge was then Capt. Sprye's solicitor; and Capt. Sprye, in his first answer, says, that if Mr. Yonge was not the person referred to as the legal man, he does not know who it was. It is true that in the second answer, he says he thinks the person intended as the legal man was his clerk Mr. Mitchell; but that cannot be, for, in the first place, the legal man, according to the letter, had said that he would on certain contingencies undertake the case legally, that is, professionally; and this shews that the legal man must have been an attorney or solicitor, whereas Mr. Mitchell was a mere clerk or assistant to Capt. Sprye, aiding him in his genealogical inquiries—who could not, if he would, have conducted the case, professionally;—and, secondly, the legal man is represented as having said that if he found what Capt. Sprye had stated to him was borne out by documents, he would undertake the case. This is altogether inapplicable to Mitchell. There were no documents except the will, and that had been communicated by Mitchell himself to Capt. Sprye, and, of course, therefore, was not a matter to be communicated by Capt. Sprye to Mitchell. Clearly, therefore, this allusion in the letter to a legal man, must have been altogether unfounded, or else it must have meant to represent that Mr. Yonge had agreed to undertake professionally the conduct of the law proceedings necessary for enabling Sir T. Reynell, or his heir, as the case might be, to obtain the property on the terms that he represented as the usual terms, namely, that Sir T. Reynell was to incur no costs, and that Mr. Yonge should, if the suit should be successful, receive one half of the property recovered by way of payment for his services; but that if nothing should be recovered, then he should himself bear all the costs. With such a representation, Sir T. Reynell, supposing him to place reliance on its accuracy, might well think that the most prudent plan for him to pursue would be to follow the course thus considered both by Capt. Sprye and Yonge to be the most fair and usual in similar cases, that is, to enter into the agreement contained in his letter of the 1st of June.

Let us now consider, whether on the evidence we can believe that Yonge had, in fact, made the statement to Capt. Sprye which the letter says he made: that is, did represent the proposed terms as being the usual mode of conducting litigation, and did offer himself to undertake the business on those terms. I cannot reconcile the hypothesis of any such proposal having been made by Yonge, with his letter to Capt. Sprye of the 12th of May. I will for the present treat that as the genuine letter of Yonge, and in it I find this passage:—"It appears you have already communicated to Sir T. Reynell that your informant considered himself entitled to half the property when recovered, after payment of all expenses, which, however, he was to defray if unsuccessful, and that he had afterwards generously offered that what he would thus have retained should be made over for the benefit of your wife and daughters. I am glad to find from Sir T. Reynell's note that this arrangement will be quite agreeable to him, but as life is uncertain, and to provide against any future misunderstanding, I agree with your friend in his suggestion, that before moving in this matter Sir T. Reynell should sign some legal document stipulating to the above effect. You on your part, at the same time binding yourself to indemnify him against any expenses whatever." Now, this is a representation materially different from that made in the letter of the 29th of April. The plain meaning of that letter was, that Mr. Yonge had undertaken, if satisfied with the documents, to run the risk of the litigation, looking to the eventual receipt of one half as his remuneration; whereas, according to Mr. Yonge's own letter of the 12th of May, he was to run no risk, he was to be employed professionally by the person described as the informant, who was to get half of what should be recovered, and then had agreed, after reimbursing himself his costs, to give it up to Capt. Sprye's wife and daughters. As far as Sir T. Reynell was concerned, it was of no consequence whether the half of the property recovered should go to Yonge or to any other person; but the discrepancy between the two statements is important, as shewing that the letter of the 29th of April, on which the whole negotiation depended, contained representations not consistent with truth; representations calculated to make Sir T. Reynell believe that the proposed arrangement was one in the ordinary course of business, approved by Mr. Yonge, and on which he had himself offered to act. This could not have been an accidental misrepresentation—Capt. Sprye could not have supposed that Yonge had made the offer to conduct the litigation on the stated terms, if he had not done so; and he could not possibly have meant to describe Mr. Llewellyn as the legal man—and yet the plain inference from Yonge's letter is, that Llewellyn and not Yonge was the party who was to get the half of the property, though he had agreed to give it up, after payment of the costs, to Capt. Sprye or his family.

But the deception on this head does not rest here. I have already alluded to Yonge's letter to Sprye of the 12th of May, and have supposed it to be the genuine letter of Yonge. In truth, however, it was no such thing. It was most important to Capt. Sprye that Sir T. Reynell should consider the proposed arrangement as being the ordinary established mode of conducting litigation under similar circumstances. Capt. Sprye told him that it was so—if the information so conveyed to Sir T. Reynell had rested wholly on the assurances of Capt. Sprye, it was possible that Sir T. Reynell might inquire further on the subject—at all events the mind of Sir T. Reynell would be much more likely to acquiesce in the notion that the proposal was in conformity to ordinary usage if he was informed by some professional person that such was the case, than if the whole rested on the representation of Capt. Sprye alone; it was, therefore, most important to Capt. Sprye that he should be able to put into the hand of Sir T. Reynell some document which should lead him to suppose that Yonge viewed this proposed arrangement in the same light, in which it had been represented by Capt. Sprye himself in the letter of the 29th of April, that is, as an arrangement such as honourable men were accustomed to act on, and the letter written by Yonge to Capt. Sprye on the 12th of May was exactly calculated to have that effect; for he there, in the passage to which I have already referred, alludes to the proposed arrangement as to dividing the property without making any comment on it as being unusual or illegal, and only expresses admiration at the generous way in which the informant had agreed to forego his share, after payment of the expenses, in favour of Capt. Sprye's wife and children. So, again, he approves of the suggestion said to have been made by Capt. Sprye's friend, that the parties should bind themselves by some legal document, in order to guard against the contingencies of life and death. This letter was forwarded on the 15th of May by Capt. Sprye to Sir T. Reynell, and its effect on his mind (assuming him to have treated it, and no doubt he did treat it, as a genuine letter of Yonge) must have been to make him think that the transaction was, in the opinion of Yonge, one of ordinary occurrence, or differing only from the usual course of such transactions, in the generosity which as between the informant and Capt. Sprye, had led the former to forego his share of the property in favour of Capt. Sprye or his family. This would, I say, necessarily be the effect of such a letter on the mind of Sir T. Reynell, supposing him to treat it as the genuine letter of Yonge. It could have no such effect, or at all events much less effect, if Sir T. Reynell had known that it was in truth not the letter of Yonge, but a letter prepared under the directions of Capt. Sprye himself, for the purpose of being shewn to Sir T. Reynell as being the letter of Mr. Yonge; and such, I conceive, it certainly was. Capt. Sprye incloses it to Sir T. Reynell in his letter of the 15th of May, merely describing it as "a note from my legal friend." Let us see, then, how and under what circumstances it was written. Capt. Sprye, in his first answer, says, that having obtained a copy of the will of H. Reynell, he, on the 9th of May, had a conference with Mr. Yonge thereon, and on the proposed arrangement for remuneration; whereupon Yonge said he would consider the matter and write his opinion to Capt. Sprye, in order that he might submit it to Sir T. Reynell, and the letter of the 12th of May was accordingly written. If this had been a full and fair representation of the whole which had passed between Capt. Sprye and Mr. Yonge, I do not think that Sir T. Reynell would have anything to complain of so far as relates to this part of the case; but it appears from Capt. Sprye's second answer, when he had been further pressed on the subject, that what he had stated in his first answer by no means fairly represents the truth of the case. The fair inference from the first answer is, that the letter of the 12th of May was the genuine unprompted production of Yonge, whereas from the subsequent answer it is apparent that what Mr. Yonge then wrote had been, in truth, suggested by Capt. Sprye himself. He denies, indeed, in answer to the charge in the amended bill, that he dictated or settled the draft of the letter of the 12th of May, but he admits that he communicated to Yonge an outline or sketch of the letter that he should write. It is enough to say that a letter so written is a very different thing from a letter containing the spontaneous suggestions of the writer's own mind; the latter might well create impressions which the former would fail to produce; and when Capt. Sprye forwarded Mr. Yonge's letter under circumstances which necessarily implied that it had originated with Yonge himself, he was misleading Sir T. Reynell in an important particular. It had the same effect as if he had said, "do not trust to me, you see in what light Yonge views the matter, act upon that." We have thus a negotiation opened between Capt. Sprye and Sir T. Reynell, founded on what I consider to have been misrepresentation, necessarily leading Sir T. Reynell to believe that the basis on which Capt. Sprye proposed to conduct the litigation for the benefit of Sir T. Reynell, was fair and usual, and that in the ordinary intercourse between Capt. Sprye and his solicitor, the latter had so treated and was ready to act on it. Putting, then, this construction on what had passed between the parties, I am of opinion that the original negotiation was founded on what must be treated in this court as a fraudulent misrepresentation; and that for however long a time the negotiation afterwards continued, and into whatever ramifications it afterwards extended, the original vice continued to taint it, and that Capt. Sprye can never claim the benefit of any deed or instrument founded on it.

In these remarks I have proceeded on the assumption, that the impeached deed was, in fact, founded on the previous letters to which I have adverted. It is, I think, impossible to come to any other conclusion. I am aware that the terms of the conveyance, as it was eventually executed, differ in several material particulars from those originally contemplated, but the circumstances of the case satisfy me that Sir T. Reynell, though probably not unaware, to some extent, of the change made in the form of the deeds, yet executed them in the full belief that he was substantially carrying into effect the proposal originally made to him. I do not pursue this part of the case, which my learned Brother has so fully investigated. This, then, being my opinion; being, as I am, satisfied that Sir T. Reynell was induced to execute the impeached deed on the representation that the proposal to divide the produce of the litigation was one emanating from Yonge, and on which he had been ready and had offered to act, it would perhaps be enough for me to leave the case here; for where a party has induced another to act on the faith of several representations made to him, any one of which he has made fraudulently, he cannot set up the transaction by shewing that every other representation was truly and honestly made. But I felt it my duty to follow this inquiry further, lest I may have taken too strong an impression from the single point to which I have yet adverted.—[His Lordship then read copious extracts from Sprye's answers, giving his version of the transaction and many of the letters in the correspondence, and which his Lordship stated that he disbelieved.]—I assume, that at the same time when the negotiation was opened and for several weeks afterwards, Capt. Sprye fully believed that Sir T. Reynell would take no interest himself, unless he survived the tenant for life; it was, therefore, no fraud in him to represent to Sir T. Reynell that the nature and extent of his interest were such as he supposed them to be. But having made such a representation, and knowing that Sir T. Reynell was negotiating on the footing of his interest being such as it had been represented to him, Capt. Sprye was, on the most obvious principles of justice and fair dealing, bound, as soon as he discovered his mistake, as soon as he found that the interest of Sir T. Reynell was much more valuable than he had described it, to explain the mistake to Sir T. Reynell, so as to enable him, if he should think fit, to put an end to the pending treaty. That this was not done is, I think, apparent from all the circumstances of the case. Mr. Stinton's opinion, which was obtained on the 15th of June, stated, as of course it must state, that Sir T. Reynell had a vested remainder in fee expectant on the life estate of Mrs. Williams Reynell, and subject to certain contingent estates known by all parties to be interests which might practically be disregarded as being of no value whatever. I may say, that I have disregarded the circumstances of the supposed life estate of the husband of Mrs. Williams Reynell, that would only remove the title one step further, but the truth is, as it turned out, there was no such title. I have treated it as if that never came in question. Capt. Sprye says, in his first answer, that this opinion was communicated to him on the 16th of June, and that he was then for the first time informed what the interest of Sir T. Reynell in the estate was. In his second answer, he says, a copy of the opinion was sent to him, unaccompanied by any note or other memorandum, and he denies that he then fully understood the nature of Sir T. Reynell's rights. This denial, it will be observed, is made in very guarded terms; he only says that he did not then fully understand what Sir T. Reynell's rights were, but in his former answer he had said that he was then first informed of what the interest of Sir T. Reynell was.

Now, taking the two answers together, the fair and reasonable inference appears to me to be, that Captain Sprye at this time, by means of the opinion of Mr. Stinton, had at least ascertained that the interest of Sir T. Reynell was far more valuable than it had been originally supposed to be, and so that he had led Sir T. Reynell into a treaty on an erroneous view as to his rights. Under these circumstances, it was the bounden duty of Capt. Sprye immediately to put Sir T. Reynell on his guard, to explain to him that he had up to that time unintentionally misled him as to his rights, that consequently he was free to disregard all that had been done up to that time as having been founded in error. Did he do this? Nothing of the sort. On the contrary, I find that on the 16th of June, after he had got the copy of Mr. Stinton's opinion, he wrote a long letter dated on that day at 10 o'clock p.m. to Sir T. Reynell, in which he does not even state that the opinion had been obtained; he says, indeed, that he has had on his desk for some time the case which had been submitted to counsel, hoping that he, Sir T. Reynell, would look in and see it. But this could hardly have been the case with the opinion, for what had been sent to him was, as he states, merely a copy of the opinion. At all events, though he writes a long letter, many passages in which satisfy me that he had then seen the opinion, and, to a great extent, understood its import, yet he does not give any hint to Sir T. Reynell as to how much more beneficial an interest he possessed according to the opinion than had been originally represented by Capt. Sprye in the letter of the 29th of April. I cannot but consider the omission, immediately and at once to call Sir T. Reynell's attention to the effect of the opinion, as affording very cogent evidence that he never intended to set him right as to the real nature of his interests. If he did not at once put him on his guard when he wrote to him at great length as soon as he got the opinion, what reason is there for supposing he would do so afterwards? I can discover none. There is no evidence of his having done so. The probability, as he did not do so at first is, that he would not do so afterwards, and I think that in the subsequent correspondence I discover satisfactory, I might say irresistible, proof that no such communication ever was made to him.—[His Lordship then referred to the proceedings in Chancery and Sprye's letters relating to them, and then read such other parts as related to the alleged difficulties in the case, and the effect on Sir T. Reynell's mind as shewn in the letter of the 11th of May 1844.]

Let us here pause and consider what is the necessary inference from these letters. The problem to be solved is this:—Did Capt. Sprye before he obtained the conveyance of the 15th of July 1848, explain to Sir T. Reynell that in his former letter he had made to him an erroneous representation as to his rights; had represented that to be contingent and precarious which he had since discovered to be vested and certain—had led him to suppose that the benefits possibly to accrue to him, could only be recovered through the means of expensive legal proceedings of doubtful result; whereas, in fact, he would, on the death, without issue, of Mrs. Williams Reynell, succeed entirely and without any law proceedings at all to the whole of the property? This I say is the question to be solved—and surely there can be no doubt as to the answer. The letter of the 11th of May, which I have just read, is absolutely irreconcilable with the notion that Sir T. Reynell was aware of the real nature of his rights. There is no meaning in the passage about his being ready to withdraw when Capt. Sprye should find there was no further hope of success, if we are to believe that he knew the property would regularly, without any litigation or controversy, devolve on him when Mrs. W. Reynell should die. The letter is well consistent with the hypothesis that Capt. Sprye allowed Sir T. Reynell to proceed all along on the notion that his rights were such as he, Capt. Sprye, had originally represented them—it is irreconcilable with the supposition that he had at any time explained to him the real nature of these rights. It only remains to add, that on receiving this last letter, Capt. Sprye still keeps up the same delusion which he had previously created. Instead of saying, as he was bound to do, "What do you mean by hope of success? There is no doubt or difficulty on the subject—it is quite certain that when Mrs. Williams Reynell dies, we shall succeed to the estate, that is to say, you to one half and I to the other." Instead of saying this, or to this effect, he keeps up the delusion, treats the offer made by Sir T. Reynell to drop the proceedings, as a friendly proposal, but to which he could not listen, not because it was (as in truth it was) absurd and founded on ignorance of the real nature of his interests, but because he, Capt. Sprye, "was not of a turn or temper of mind accustomed to yield to difficulties!" On these grounds then I come to the conclusion, that some time before the execution of the conveyance, probably on the 16th of June, Capt. Sprye ascertained that Sir T. Reynell had an absolute indefeasible interest in the property in question, to recover which, no legal proceedings whatever would be necessary, and that he nevertheless kept Sir T. Reynell in ignorance of what he had so found out, and allowed him to proceed on the erroneous notion of his rights, as they had been originally represented by the letter of the 29th of April, and those which immediately followed. I have thus arrived at the conviction, that in three distinct respects, Capt. Sprye misled Sir T. Reynell in the treaty which ultimately led to the execution of the deed of conveyance of the 15th of July 1843: first, by representing to him that the proposal to share the property was one usual among men of character, and one on which Mr. Yonge had proposed to act; secondly, by leading him to believe that the benefits to be obtained for him or his heir, could only be so obtained, if at all, through the medium of a doubtful and costly litigation; and, thirdly, by not explaining to him, after Mr. Stinton's opinion had been obtained, that his interest was not contingent as he had originally described it, but an absolute indefeasible interest subject only to the chance of Mrs. Williams Reynell leaving issue.

Every one of these considerations would be material ingredients towards enabling Sir T. Reynell to form his judgment as to whether he should or should not accede to the proposal of Capt. Sprye. If he had not received what was equivalent to an assurance that Mr. Yonge considered the proposed division of the property as the usual course of conducting business on such occasions, and if he had not been led to suppose that his interest was contingent, depending on the chance of his surviving Mrs. Williams Reynell, and then only to be recovered by expensive and doubtful litigation, it may well be that he would not have acted as he did;—perhaps he might, perhaps he might not. But this is a matter on which I do not feel called upon or indeed at liberty to speculate. Once make out that there has been anything like deception, intentional deception, and no contract resting in any degree on that foundation can stand. It is impossible so to analyze the operations of the human mind as to be able to say how far any particular representation may have led to the formation of any particular resolution or the adoption of any particular line of conduct. No one can really do this with certainty, even as to himself, still less as to another. Where certain statements have been made, all in their nature capable, more or less, of leading the party to whom they are addressed, to adopt a particular line of conduct, it is impossible to say of any one such representation so made, that even if it had not been made, the same resolution would have been taken or the same conduct followed. Where, therefore, in a negotiation between two parties, one of them induces the other to contract on the faith of the representations made to him, any one of which has been untrue and known to the party so to be, the whole contract is in this court considered as having been obtained fraudulently. Who can say that the untrue statement may not have been precisely that which turned the scale in the mind of the party to whom it was addressed? The case is not at all varied by the circumstance that the untrue representation, or any of the untrue representations, may, in the first instance, have been the result of innocent error. If after the error has been discovered, the party who has innocently made the incorrect representation, suffers the other party to continue in error and act on the belief that no mistake has been made, this, from the time of the discovery, becomes, in the contemplation of this Court, a fraudulent misrepresentation even though it was not so originally.

These are all principles of such obvious justice as to require neither argument nor authority to illustrate or enforce them, and they need but to be stated, in order to command immediate assent. The only question can be in each particular case, how far the facts bring it within the principle? I have already pointed out several particulars in which I think these principles apply to the present case; and, therefore, without inquiring whether there are or are not other instances of misrepresentation fatal to the case of Capt. Sprye, I feel bound to say, that I concur with Sir James Wigram in his conclusion, that the conveyance of the 15th of July was obtained by fraud, and so must be set aside.

It would not be right that I should leave unnoticed an argument much pressed at the bar, and which carries with it a semblance of justice, but to which I have not felt it possible to yield my assent. It was said that during the whole of the negotiations Capt. Sprye not only left Sir Thomas Reynell at perfect liberty to consult his friends and professional advisers, but even on several occasions recommended him to do so. To a great extent this certainly was the case: and if the relief sought in this suit had rested on mere mistake, if Capt.

Sprye had not by misrepresentations of facts, which I cannot treat as unintentional, led Sir T. Reynell to believe that his rights were different from what in truth they were, it may be that the argument to which I am now adverting would have prevailed. In such a case, perhaps, this Court might have considered that it was the folly of Sir T. Reynell to have acted without advice, and might have refused to assist any person who was so singularly little alive to his own rights. Qui vult decipi, it is said, decipiatur. But no such question can arise in a case like the present, where one contracting party has intentionally misled the other, by describing his rights as being different from what he knew them really to be. In such a case it is no answer to the charge of imputed fraud to say, that the party alleged to be guilty of it recommended the other to take advice, or even put into his hands the means of discovering the truth. However negligent the party may have been to whom the incorrect statement has been made, yet that is a matter affording no ground of defence to the other. For no man can complain that another has too implicitly relied on the truth of what he has himself stated. This principle was fully recognized in the case of Dobell v. Stevens (14), referred to by my learned Brother in the course of the argument.

The reasoning by which I have satisfied myself of the plaintiff's right to set aside the conveyance, also disposes of that part of the bill of Sir T. Reynell, in which he seeks to have the contract for the purchase of the other moiety delivered up and cancelled, and also of the cross suit. For, independently of all other objections to that contract, it is clear Capt. Sprye having, by what I must consider as fraud, put Sir T. Reynell in the position of being the owner of a moiety instead of the entirety, could never deal for the purchase of that moiety. Such dealing is, in truth, but a continuation of the original fraud; and on that short ground I am clearly of opinion that the contract of the 14th of May 1844 must be considered as having been obtained by fraud, and must be delivered up to be cancelled, and that the cross bill filed for the purpose of enforcing a specific performance of that contract was properly dismissed, with costs. My learned Brother has pointed out some trifling additions which ought to be made in the decree, but this does not go to the substance of the case; and we both, therefore, concur in the opinion that the costs of this rehearing must be borne by Capt. Sprye.

The decree was then added to by ordering an injunction against Sprye from bringing any action or proceedings at law against Lady Elizabeth as executrix or devisee of Sir Thomas, upon or in respect of the two instruments declared by the decree to be void, and the counsel for Lady Elizabeth gave for her an undertaking that she would abide by any order the Court might make concerning the deed of indemnity.

SPRYE v. REYNELL.

Costs—Stay of Proceedings—Waiver—Supplemental Bill in the nature of a Bill of Review.

*A party was ordered to pay the general costs of certain suits. Pending an appeal, he moved for leave to file a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, and obtained leave to do so on depositing 50*l.* with the Registrar, and he was ordered to pay the costs of the motion. He paid the 50*l., but not the costs of the motion, and filed a supplemental bill; but the Court held that the payment of the costs of the motion was a condition annexed to the order giving leave to file the supplemental bill, and that therefore all proceedings in the supplemental suit must be stayed until payment of them.

Where a party is ordered to pay the general costs of a suit, and also the costs of a particular motion, and then files a bill against the party entitled to all those costs, if the latter moves to stay all proceedings in the new suit until the costs of the particular motion are paid, that is a waiver of any right he may have to stay proceedings until the general costs of the suit are paid, and the Court will only stay the proceedings until payment of the costs of the particular motion.

By a decree, dated the 6th of November 1849, in the causes of Reynell v. Sprye and Sprye v. Reynell (1), the defendant in the first and the plaintiff in the second suit, Richard Samuel Mare Sprye, was ordered to pay the costs of Lady Elizabeth Reynell, one of the parties to those suits. This decree was appealed from, and before the hearing of it, Mr. Sprye moved, on the 20th of November 1851, against that lady and her solicitors, Messrs. Walker & Grant, for the production of documents, and for leave to file a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review; whereupon it was ordered that the motion for production be refused with costs, but leave was given to file the bill upon Mr. Sprye depositing 50*l.* with the Registrar, to answer costs, in case the Court should think fit to award costs in respect of the proceedings had since the decree, and Mr. Sprye was ordered to pay the costs of the application, and the hearing of the appeal was stayed. The decree was ultimately affirmed, the appeal being dismissed with costs. On the 15th of January 1852, Mr. Sprye having deposited the 50*l.*, filed his supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, against Lady Elizabeth Reynell, Mr. Lawrence Walker, Mr. Arthur Walker, (two of the firm of solicitors of Walker, Grant & Co.) and Mr. Charles Wilson, and appearances were entered on the 19th of the same month. The costs ordered to be paid by the decree of the 6th of November 1849 not having been paid, an attachment was issued against Mr. Sprye, and a similar proceeding was taken against him for non-payment of the costs given by the order of the 20th of November 1851. An application was made on the 1st of March 1852 to the Master, in the supplemental suit, on behalf of Lady Elizabeth and Mr. Lawrence Walker, and Mr. Arthur Walker, that the time for their answering might be enlarged for six weeks after Mr. Sprye should have paid the costs directed by the order of the 20th of November 1851. On the following day, a motion was made on behalf of the same parties before

(1) These causes are reported on minor points, 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 117, 286, and ante, p. 13. The case upon appeal will be found, ante, p. 633.

Vice Chancellor Parker, that all proceedings against them for want of answer might be stayed until four weeks after the plaintiff, Mr. Sprye, should have paid to them the costs directed to be paid by him by the order of the 20th of November 1851, giving him leave to file the new bill, and for non-payment of which he was then in contempt, or in case the Court should not think fit so to order, then that the said defendants might have four weeks further time to answer. The Vice Chancellor made an order, giving the four weeks' further time, without prejudice to an application to stay the proceedings in the suit. On the 8th of March, a motion was made before Vice Chancellor Parker in the same suit, and on behalf of the said parties, that all proceedings in that cause against the defendants, Lady Elizabeth Reynell, and Lawrence Walker, and Arthur Walker, for want of their answers, might be stayed until three weeks after Mr. Sprye should have paid to the three defendants the costs directed to be paid by him by the order in the suits of Reynell v. Sprye and Sprye v. Reynell, dated the 20th of November 1851, and should have cleared his contempt; and that all proceedings in this cause against Lady Elizabeth Reynell for want of an answer might be stayed until three weeks after the said plaintiff should have paid not only the said costs, but also other costs in the said suits of Reynell v. Sprye and Sprye v. Reynell, for non-payment of which to the said Lady Elizabeth Reynell he was then in contempt, and should have cleared his contempt. The Vice Chancellor held that as the Court had given Mr. Sprye, by the order of the 20th of November 1851, liberty to file the new bill, on a condition which he had fulfilled, namely, the payment of the 50*l.* to the Registrar, the motion must be refused with costs. His Honour stated his opinion to be, that the payment of the costs was not made a condition precedent, to be performed before the filing of the bill. From this order Lady Elizabeth Reynell, Mr. Lawrence Walker, and Mr. Arthur Walker appealed.

Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Malins, and Mr. Shapter, for the appeal.—The only rational construction, having regard to the uniform practice of the Court, of the order of the 20th of November 1851, by which leave was given to Mr. Sprye to file his supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, is, that he was required to pay the costs before he should file that bill. That was a condition precedent, imposed by the Court as the term of such indulgence being granted. He has not performed that condition; and the case of Partridge v. Usborne (2) is explicit to shew that, unless under very special circumstances, which do not occur here, a party will not be allowed to prosecute a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review unless he performs at the proper time all that the decree commands him to do. In that case the time for the payment of money had not arrived, but here it has; and there Lord Lyndhurst said that if the money were not paid when the period should arrive, or if it turned out upon inquiry that a period had arrived, and an application were made founded on the default, that would lead him to a different conclusion from that which he had arrived at. The rule is laid down very clearly in the third and fourth of Lord Bacon's Orders (3). In Wilson v. Bates (4), before Lord Cottenham, the practice that proceedings will be stayed until costs are paid is fully recognized, and more especially in Price v. Dakon, cited in page 204 of the same reports, where it is stated "Upon a motion by the defendant that all proceedings for want of answer might be stayed until the plaintiff had paid certain costs, the Court gave the defendant three weeks time to answer, after the costs should have been paid." In a much more recent case, decided by one of your Lordships when Vice Chancellor, and sitting for Sir James Wigram, Bradbury v. Shawe (5), and in which Wilson v. Bates was cited, an order was made staying all proceedings until the plaintiff should have cleared his contempt by the payment of the costs.

(3) Beames's Orders, 3:—"No bill of review shall be admitted, or any other new bill, to change matter decreed, except the decree be first obeyed and performed; as, if it be for land, that the possession be yielded; if it be for money, that the money be paid; if it be for evidences, that the evidences be brought in; and so in other cases which stand upon the strength of the decree alone. But if any act be decreed to be done, which extinguisheth the party's right at the common law—as making of assurance or release, acknowledging satisfaction, cancelling of bonds or evidences, and the like,—those parts of the decree are to be spared until the bill of review be determined; but such sparing is to be warranted by public order made in court."

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—From the report, it is plain that I made the order with great reluctance, under pressure, as it were, of Wilson v. Bates. The order was made, also, very near August.]

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Terrell, for Captain Sprye, argued that there was no sufficient reason stated why proceedings should be stayed. Besides the doubt entertained by one of their Lordships, as stated in Bradbury v. Shawe, of the soundness of Wilson v. Bates, the late Sir Lancelot Shadwell in Bickford v. Skewes (6) refused a motion that a trial should be postponed until a defendant should have cleared his contempt of the non-payment of costs. There Wilson v. Bates and Price v. Dalton were both cited, and his Honour said that, although the cases cited afforded some countenance for the application, he could not think they warranted it; and he should therefore refuse the motion with costs. The case of King v. Bryant (7) was also cited.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — This motion divides itself into two parts, namely, the general costs of the two suits of Reynell v. Sprye and Sprye v. Reynell, in which a decree has been made, and the costs of the motion in the month of November last. As to the costs of the motion in the month of November last, my original impression was against Lady Elizabeth Reynell and Messrs. Walker, Grant & Co. or at least against the latter; but the progress of the argument has changed that impression. The motion was made in a cause in which Lady Elizabeth Reynell was a party, and it relates to the subject-matter of that cause. It desired the production of certain documents for the purpose of an application for a rehearing, pending an appeal in that cause. It, moreover, asked leave to file after the decree a supplemental bill, and it made parties to that motion four gentlemen, describing them by the names of Messrs. Walker, Grant & Co. The Court on that occasion adjudicated without any consent, I believe, as to that part of it, that Captain Sprye, who made the motion, should pay the costs of it, that is, the costs of Lady Elizabeth Reynell and of these gentlemen, and that direction formed part of an order which gave leave to him to file the present bill. The consequence is, that these costs not being paid, the condition annexed to that order has not been fulfilled. The order which gave leave to file a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, although it also asks in the alternative, or otherwise, to set aside the decree upon the ground of alleged fraud, not being complied with, my learned Brother and myself are of opinion that, as the subjects are so intimately connected together by the means which I have mentioned, there is a right on the part of Lady Elizabeth Reynell, and on the part of two of the solicitors whom I have mentioned, who have been made parties to the present bill to stay the proceedings under the present bill until those particular costs have been paid; namely, the costs given to Lady Elizabeth Reynell and to Messrs. Walker, Grant & Co. by the order of the 20th of November 1851. Nothing has taken place to waive the right to the payment of those costs, for they have been claimed on every occasion. As I understand, they were claimed before the Master, and they were claimed by the application made to the Vice Chancellor Sir James Parker for the order; I mean that the costs were claimed by the motion under which Sir James Parker made the order now appealed from, and the right to which is reserved by that order. With respect, however, to the general costs of the suits Reynell v. Sprye and Sprye v. Reynell, in which the decree was made, it is arguable whether a case of waiver has been established or not, and therefore as to that fact the Court would hear a reply.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH. — What my learned Brother has said represents precisely the view I take of this matter.

Mr. Lloyd replied upon the question of waiver, and contended that although the original application did not in express terms add the costs of the suit, still it must be considered, that so far as they were concerned, the appellants relied on the well-known practice of the Court, so as to exclude the notion of a waiver of any part of their rights.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—My learned Brother and myself are both of opinion that with respect to these costs, that is, the general costs of the suit, excluding the costs of the order of the 20th of November last, there has been that which amounts to a waiver on the part of Mr. Lloyd's clients; and for this reason, which may be reduced to a very simple form: suppose the application for time had been an application having no reservation at all: suppose it to have been not four weeks after any particular act to be done, but simply four weeks' further time to answer, that would have been a waiver of any right to stay the proceedings: that is not disputed. Now, what is applied for is four weeks after the particular act is done; that is not an absolute waiver, it is no waiver on that particular act being done; but that particular act being done, the application is the same as if it had been an application for time, there being no restriction. That is the view we take of it, and therefore the motion will be refused so far; that is, we think that the motion ought to be granted with reference to the costs of the motion of the 20th of November last, and refused as to the more extended application. The appeal will be partly granted and partly refused. The proper course will be that the order should be made without any costs in the court below, and no costs now. All proceedings against Lady Elizabeth Reynell and the Messrs. Walker will be stayed until three weeks after the plaintiff shall have paid the costs given by the order of the 20th of November last; and let the order of the Vice Chancellor be varied accordingly.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—On the ground of waiver we decline to stop the proceedings in this suit in the nature of a supplemental suit, until the costs in the other suits mentioned in the order of the 20th of November are paid. No costs on either side.

MILES v. DURNFORD.

DURNFORD v. WOOD.

Mortgage—Executor—Parties.

An executor borrowed money upon a representation that it was wanted for the purposes of his testator's estate. The money was lent upon the personal security of the executor, who afterwards mortgaged part of the testator's property as a security for the money antecedently advanced:—Held, by the Vice Chancellor, that the onus of proof lay on the person who advanced the money, to shew that it was applied for executorship purposes: but

Held, on appeal, that there was no evidence to shew that the advances were not made for executorship purposes; and the bill was dismissed.

The plaintiff was the representative not only of the executor, who had borrowed the money, but also of the original testator, and in the latter character he sought to impeach the mortgage:—Held, by the Vice Chancellor, that the plaintiff, although he was executor of the original testator, in which character he might sue, could not repudiate the character of representative to the executor, who could not sue: but • Held, contra, on appeal.

The bill stated, that John Punter, the elder, was possessed, amongst other property, of three leasehold houses in Earl Street, Lisson Grove. That by his will, dated in January 1846, he gave all his property, including these three houses, to his son John Punter on trust to pay his debts and also a mortgage on the three houses in Lisson Grove, if it should be still subsisting at his death; and subject to the payment of debts, &c., the property was to be equally divided between John Punter, his son, and his brothers and sisters.

The testator appointed his son sole executor of his will, but declared that if he should die in the lifetime of the plaintiff John Miles, then, after the decease of his said son, the testator appointed the plaintiff his sole executor. Upon the death of the testator, in May 1846, his will was proved by John Punter, the son, who died in September 1849 intestate, and thereupon probate of the testator's will was granted to the plaintiff, who also took out letters of administration to the son. The bill stated that the residuary personal estate of the testator possessed and received by his son John Punter was far more than sufficient to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, including the mortgage debt on the three houses in Earl Street, Lisson Grove.

The plaintiff then alleged that the said three houses of the testator in Lisson Grove were advertised for sale at the instance of the defendant Elizabeth Durnford, who claimed to be entitled thereto as the mortgagee thereof, under a mortgage with a power of sale, executed to her by the said John Punter, the son, and purporting to bear date the 14th of April 1849. That in such mortgage it was recited, that upon the application and request of the said John Punter, the son, the said defendant Elizabeth Durnford had, at divers times between the month of October 1846 and February 1848, advanced and lent to the said John Punter, the son, several sums of money, amounting together to the sum of 600*l.*, and that the sum of 350*l.*, part of the said sum of 600*l.*, was so advanced and lent to the said John Punter, the son, for the purpose of enabling him as such executor as aforesaid to pay off and discharge a certain mortgage debt of 250*l.* and interest, to Henry Smart, charged upon the said three houses in Lisson Grove, and also to pay certain charges which the said John Punter, the son, had incurred as such executor, in and about the said testator's estate, and that the said Elizabeth Durnford had taken other security for the remainder of the said sum of 600*l.*, and that there was then due from the said J. Punter, the son, as such executor, to the said Elizabeth Durnford, in respect of the said sum of 350*l.* and the interest thereon, the sum of 370*l.* And that the said J. Punter, the son, not being able to pay the said sum of 370*l.*, had proposed and agreed to execute to the defendant a mortgage of the said three houses, for securing repayment of the said sum of 370*l.* with interest thereon in manner thereafter mentioned.

The bill then set forth the mortgage made in pursuance of this recital, which contained, amongst other usual clauses, a power of sale given to the defendant upon her giving three calendar months' notice of her intention to the said J. Punter, the son, or the executor for the time being of the testator. The bill alleged that the defendant did not give to the said J. Punter, the son, and had not given to the plaintiff the notice required by the mortgage deed; that the debts due and owing by the testator J. Punter at his decease were very few and trifling, but that at the time of the execution of the said mortgage there was a large sum of money due and owing from J. Punter, the son, to the estate of his father, and that J. Punter, the son, borrowed the whole of the sum of 600*l.* mentioned in the mortgage from the defendant to answer his own occasions, and not for the purpose of discharging any debts of the testator, or of paying any charges incurred in and about the estate of the testator, and that at the time the said J. Punter, the son, executed the said mortgage to the defendant, she well knew, or had good reason to suspect, that he had borrowed the whole of the said sum of 600*l.* for his own occasions, and not for the purpose of paying any debts of the testator, or any charges incurred by J. Punter, the son, in and about the estate of the testator.

The bill charged that the said sum of 600*l.* was lent by the defendant to J. Punter, the son, in six different sums, and at different times, upon his personal security, and that at the respective times of such loans being made, the said defendant did not know, and had not any reason to believe or suspect that the said J. Punter, the son, was the executor of his father, and that the said several sums of money were lent and advanced by the defendant upon the belief that they were lent for his own purposes, and she treated such several sums as his private debts. That under these circumstances the defendant was bound to inquire and ascertain whether any part of the said sum of 600*l.* had been required or expended by the said J. Punter, the son, for or in paying any charge incurred by him as the executor of his father.

The bill further alleged that shortly after the several advances were made by the defendant to John Punter, and on the 30th of October 1848, the said J. Punter deposited some of the deeds relating to the testator's estate with the defendant by way of security for the sums so advanced, and that this equitable mortgage was made for the whole sum of 600*l.*, and the defendant had filed a bill in this court against the said J. Punter for the purpose of compelling payment of the money, or a sale of the property. The bill prayed an injunction to restrain the sale of the three houses, and that it might be declared that the before-mentioned mortgage executed by J. Punter, the son, was not a valid mortgage, and that such mortgage did not in any manner affect the estate of the testator, or any part thereof, or the said three houses in Lisson Grove, and that the defendant might be ordered to deliver up the mortgage to be cancelled.

There was a cross-bill filed by Mrs. Durnford, praying that a subsequent mortgage to a Mr. Wood might be declared fraudulent and void, or, at all events, postponed to her mortgage, and that the mortgage to Mrs. Durnford might be redeemed.

During the progress of this suit a motion for an injunction was made, which was submitted to.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Nalder appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that there was nothing to shew that the money had been advanced for executorship purposes. It was advanced in small sums to the executor J. Punter, without any security being taken. After the last advance, an equitable mortgage by deposit of deeds was created; but it was not until the defendant attempted to enforce payment of the money that the mortgage now set up by the defendant was made. There were, at any rate, circumstances of suspicion sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to an inquiry whether any of the advances were made to J. Punter in his character of executor.

M'Leod v. Drummond, 14 Ves. 353.

Keane v. Roberts, 4 Madd. 332, were cited.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Giffard, for the defendant submitted that it was to be presumed the executor obtained the money for the purpose of his testator's estate, as alleged upon the mortgage, unless the contrary could be shewn. The plaintiff was bound by the recitals in the mortgage deed.

The defendant had no means of knowing that the executor was not dealing honestly, and there was no allegation that she was in the position of a party colluding with the executor when she took the mortgage. It was requisite that the executor should go forth to the world as a person accredited by the testator. If an inference could be drawn from all the circumstances, that the money was lent for the executor's personal use, then, no doubt, it would be impossible to enforce the mortgage; but there was no rule whatever that the money was to be considered as advanced for personal use, merely because it was lent before any security was given. It was held, upon all the authorities, that a person lending money to an executor was not bound to see to the application of it—Watkins v. Cheek (1), Eland v. Eland (2) and Griffith v. Vanheythuysen (3). There was another objection in this case, that the plaintiff had no power to sue. He was, no doubt, the representative of the original testator, J. Punter the father, but he was also the representative of John Punter the younger, the person who had executed this deed, and in the latter character the plaintiff could not sue to set aside the mortgage.

Mr. Stuart, in reply, said, the plaintiff could not be precluded from protecting the estate of the original testator from his merely happening to fill the character also of representative of the person who had committed the fault. The plaintiff was suing exclusively in his character of executor to the original testator, and not as administrator to the son, and this course he was bound to take for the protection of the estate.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The testator died in May 1846, and his son, John Punter the younger, was appointed executor and proved the will. At different periods between the 14th of October 1846 and February 1848, John Punter borrowed from Mrs. Durnford sums of money, generally 100*l.* at a time, representing that he wanted them for executorship purposes, and she lent him those sums up to 600*l.*, the last advance being in February 1848. It appears that the testator owed to a person named Smart the sum of 250*l.*, and he wanting payment, a sum of 50*l.* was paid in 1847, and the rest of the money was paid on the 2nd of February 1848, which was after the 200*l.* was borrowed from Mrs. Durnford by Punter. It does not appear that at the time these advances were made to Punter there was any agreement to give security for them. The effect of the advances when made was this, that they were advanced on private security of Punter himself, and not giving any lien on the testator's property; and any remedy which Mrs. Durnford might have sought to enforce was only against Punter individually and not as executor. They were made to him alone, though they might have been for executorship purposes, and if all had been paid for the benefit of the testator's estate, still the loan to him was personal, there being no agreement as to any mortgage or security on the testator's assets, at the time the advances were made. On the 30th of October 1848, which was after the last advance was made, Punter deposited the deeds of the leasehold property of the testator with Mrs. Durnford, by way of securing the money advanced to him, and that equitable mortgage seemed to have been as a security for the whole. I see no reason for supposing that the mortgage was for less than the whole amount of the advances. That equitable mortgage having been given in 1848, in February 1849 Mrs. Durnford attempted to enforce payment of the security, and a common equitable mortgagee's bill was filed. The transaction is there treated as the private transaction of Punter. There was nothing said about its being to Punter, in the character of executor to his father. On the other hand, I do not see that there was any necessity for that, as between Mrs. Durnford and Punter, as for the purpose of a mortgage or sale it was not necessary to make such a case on that bill. The bill treated it as a private transaction; but in consequence of that bill, shortly afterwards in April 1849, Punter executed an actual mortgage deed to Mrs. Durnford for securing, not the whole 600*l.* but only 370*l.*, and the recitals were in this shape:—It was stated that on the application and request of J. Punter, the defendant, Mrs. Durnford, at divers periods, from October 1846 to February 1848, advanced and lent to the said J. Punter several sums of money amounting together to 600*l.*, and that the sum of 350*l.* part of the 600*l.* was so advanced and lent to Punter to enable him as such executor to pay off and discharge a mortgage debt of 250*l.* and interest to Smart, charged upon the three houses, and also to pay certain charges which Punter had incurred as such executor, and in and about the testator's estate, and that the said defendant had taken other security for the remainder of the 600*l.* Then it proceeds to state as to the 350*l.*, that there was something due for interest, making altogether 370*l.*; and the mortgage was made for that sum.

Now it is clear that the equitable mortgage of October 1848 having been made for the 600*l.* was itself apparently a security given, partly for what was alleged to have been advanced to Punter as executor, and partly for what was not alleged to have been advanced to him as executor. Then the mortgage deed recites, in the statement of the parties to that deed, that the 350*l.* had been advanced to him in his character of executor. Now, the principle on which the Court acts is this:—An executor taking on himself to deal with the assets in his hands as executor, it is considered important to preserve in the executor, the unfettered controul over them, and the Court gives him prima facie an unfettered right of dealing with the assets, for raising money wanted for the estate, and the onus is not thrown on the party advancing the money on security of the assets, to shew that it is wanted for the testamentary purposes. It is true, that in the case of a private banker of the executor to whom he owes a private debt, if the banker takes as security for his private debt, property which he knows to be the assets of the testator, there he is a party to what is a devastavit or improper application of the testator's estate. And so in this case. If it were not for the statement of Mrs. Durnford and Punter, made after the money was advanced, there would be nothing to shew that the 600*l.* was advanced for any other than private purposes.

While the Court is careful to look to the way in which an executor deals with the assets, that does not apply to cases in which he only gives security for the antecedent advances, long after they have been made. The advances were made, not even upon an undertaking to give security upon the assets, though wanted for executorship purposes, and the subsequently giving a security, was not for raising money for the purposes of the estate, but giving a security for antecedent advances, and without any legal necessity to give that security. I think, therefore, that where a party having advanced money for the purpose apparently of the estate, but on the personal security of the executor without taking a security, and if that party takes for these antecedent advances a subsequent security on the assets of the testator, that cannot be considered to come within the rule, but the party is then bound to see that the money was applied for the purpose of the executorship. The principle on which the cases have been decided involve this as a necessary consequence.

If there were no other difficulty in this case, I should refer it to the Master to ascertain what sums of money were applied for the purpose of the administration of the testator's estate; but I confess I think I am precluded from making such a decree as attempts to invalidate the mortgage, owing to this, that the party asking to invalidate it, is himself the representative of the person who is a party to it. It is true the bill is filed by Miles, in his character of executor to John Punter the testator, wishing to throw off another character which he assumes, which is that of the representative of J. Punter the younger. It appears that after having proved the will of John Punter, the father, he takes out letters of administration in 1849, and takes upon himself to represent the position of John Punter, the son, and I cannot hear the plaintiff say, "Although I assume the two characters, in one of which I cannot impugn the transaction, yet I wish to shut out my character in which I cannot impeach the transaction, but retain the character in which I can." It is clear if J. Punter the younger were living, and Miles had joined with him in impeaching the transaction, that would have been bad, and if Punter alone had filed the bill, it is clear he could not have been heard to say this. It appears to me that the present plaintiff, although not personally mixed up with these transactions, as he has taken upon himself to sustain the character of the representative of the person who could not impeach them, cannot be allowed to separate the two characters, and sue only in one of them. For these reasons, I cannot make a decree as to the original bill which seeks to impeach the mortgage.

As to the other bill of Mrs. Durnford, which charges Mr. Wood, the subsequent mortgagee, with fraud, it is admitted that there is no ground for maintaining the allegation of fraud; therefore, I must also dismiss so much of that bill as charges the fraud. That bill seeks to impeach the security, and that it may be declared to be fraudulent and void. As to so much as does that, it must be dismissed, with costs; and as to the rest, I must make the common decree for redemption and foreclosure.

The case subsequently came before the Lords Justices, on appeal by the plaintiff, when

Mr. Nalder contended that the bill was properly filed in point of form, and cited, in addition to the cases referred to on the original hearing, Lambert v. Hutchinson (4).

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Giffard were heard for the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The case is this:—One of two executors, by being acting executor, committed, it is alleged, a breach of trust with respect to the general personal estate, and having done so, he died, and the surviving executor of the testator, innocent of participation in the breach of trust, makes himself an administrator of the executor who committed the breach of trust. I am of opinion it is competent for him to file a bill to make good the breach of trust, submitting all in a proper mode to this Court.

(4) 1 Beav. 277; s.c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 196.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH concurred.

Mr. Nalder was then heard on the second point, and contended that although the money was advanced by Mrs. Durnford to Mr. Punter, jun. before he gave her the security, it did not become necessary for the plaintiff on that account to shew that the act done by Punter, jun. as executor was a proper act, and, further, that in the absence of proof to the contrary, the loan must be taken as having been properly obtained for the purposes of the executorship. He cited the following additional cases:—

Scott v. Tyler, 2 Dickens, 725.

Hill v. Simpson, 7 Ves. 152.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Giffard were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—On the evidence, the security is not impeached,—not touched. Assuming, then, that all the evidence that can be, has been adduced, the question is, whether this creates such a case of suspicion as that further inquiry should be directed or allowed. I am of opinion that that proposition cannot be warranted. The only evidence is, then, that the advances were originally made without security, and that the security was afterwards added. That is a circumstance deserving of attention, but it does not go a long way; it is not inconsistent with the probability that the advances were made for the purpose for which he might properly borrow as executor. But that being the case, all is clear; and, in my opinion, the presumption is in favour of that view of the case, and that the plaintiff wholly fails.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—We both concur with the Vice Chancellor that the bill ought to be dismissed, but we arrive at that conclusion on different grounds.

PARKER, V.C. } In the matter of TINKLER'S
July 10. } TRUSTS.

Annuity—Charge on the Corpus—Compulsory Sale.

A testator devised real estate to B, charged with an annuity to A. for her life, with powers of distress and entry. The rents fell short of the annuity, and an arrear became due to A. A sum of money (less than the arrear) was paid into court by a railway company in respect of a part of the estate which had been taken by them:—Held, that A. was entitled to this sum in respect of her arrears.

R. Tinkler, by his will dated in January 1840, devised all his real estates to the uses therein mentioned, charged with an annuity of 100*l.* a-year to his wife for her life, with powers of distress and entry, and died soon after the date of his will.

The rents of the devised estates fell short of the annuity, and an arrear of upwards of 300*l.* became due to Mrs. Tinkler.

The Great Northern Railway Company took some land, part of the devised estates, and paid into court the sum of 262*l.* in respect of the purchase-money.

This was the petition of Mrs. Tinkler, praying for the payment to her of the 262*l.*

Mr. C. J. Simpson, for the petition, contended that, although the sum in question formed in fact a part of the corpus of the estates, Mrs. Tinkler was entitled to it in respect of the arrears due to her, and cited Greatheed v. Elliot (1).

Mr. Hislop Clarke, for the devisees, contended, that she was entitled only to the income of the fund in question.

PARKER, V.C. said, that the Court would not sell the estate for the purpose of paying off the arrears, but, as by means of the powers of distress and entry, the devisees could not touch a shilling of the rents until the arrears were discharged, the annuity was, in a sense, charged on the corpus. As there had been here a compulsory sale, he thought that the money thus produced was available for the arrears, and the order would, therefore, be for payment of the fund to Mrs. Tinkler.

Will—Construction—Legal Estate—Mortgage—Securities for Money.

A testator, a mortgagee in fee of real estate, gave and bequeathed to A. all his monies, securities for money, and all his goods, chattels, personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, to hold to A, his executors, administrators and assigns, he paying thereout all his debts:—Held, that the legal estate in the mortgaged property passed to A.

Mr. Sudbury, a mortgagee in fee of real estate, made his will, dated the 27th of April 1848, which was as follows:—"I give and bequeath unto my wife, Frances Sudbury, all my monies, securities for money, and all my goods, chattels, personal estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, to hold to Frances Sudbury, her executors, administrators and assigns absolutely; she or they paying thereout all my just debts and testamentary expenses." The testator appointed his wife sole executrix.

The testator died in June 1848, leaving an infant heir; and his will was proved by his widow.

This was a petition under the Trustee Act 1850, praying for an order vesting the mortgaged estate in the executrix.

The question discussed on this petition was, whether the legal estate in the mortgaged property had passed, under the will, to the testator's widow, or whether it had descended on the heir.

Mr. F. W. Clarke, for the petition, contended that the legal estate had not passed by the will, and cited Galliers v. Moss (1).

PARKER, V.C.—I have looked into the cases on this subject, and I have no doubt that the words "securities for money" in this will pass the legal estate. The words "securities for money" are sufficient to pass the legal estate, unless there be something in the will to induce the Court to come to a different conclusion. It is said that, in this case, the words "securities for money" are found among words relating exclusively to personal estate. This is, however, where you would naturally expect to find them, the mortgage money with which it is associated being personal estate. The object of the will is to give the executrix complete dominion over the mortgage money, and to enable her to receive it; and the Court is not to put a construction on the will which would defeat that object. Then, it is said that the words of limitation apply only to personal estate. This argument appears to me to proceed on a confusion between the authorities applicable to this case and those relating to a gift, in which there are words such as "estate," which may or may not relate to real estate, and where the collocation of the words and the words of limitation are important. Here you have the words "securities for money," very aptly expressing the legal estate, and their effect is not taken away because you have the words "executors and administrators" following as words of limitation.

If we look at the authorities we find that in Silberschildt v. Schiott (2), Sir William Grant says, "There is no doubt a gift of the money would have carried his interest in the land upon which it was secured." Again, in Renvoize v. Cooper (3), Sir John Leach says, "I am of opinion that the mortgaged fee will pass to the wife by the subsequent gift of mortgages and other securities for money, though coupled with personal property. In substance, money secured by a mortgage in fee is personal property, and a gift of a mortgage security for money is a gift of all the testator's interest in the money and security, and will therefore pass the fee." On the other side, there is the case of Galliers v. Moss, which Mr. Clarke referred to. That case must, however, I think, be considered as overruled by subsequent decisions. In Ex parte Barber, (4), the Vice Chancellor of England held that the words "securities for money" would pass the legal estate; and, in a case of Mather v. Thomas (5) the point came before him again, and he intimated his opinion that they would pass the legal estate, notwithstanding the case of Galliers v. Moss, but sent a case for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, which held (6) that the words in question did pass the legal estate. It is true that, in that case, the word "heirs" occurred as the word of limitation; but, on examining the will, it appears that there was a gift of "messuages or dwelling-houses buildings, chattels real, ready money, securities for money, and debts to become due and owing," to trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns. The word "heirs" there, reddendo singula singulis, is properly referable to the real estate, and not to the words "securities for money." At all events, it appears to me to be putting too narrow a construction on the words to hold that the occurrence of the word "heirs" makes a material difference. There is a recent case which appears to me to be precisely in point. In Doe d. Guest v. Bennett (7) the words were, "I leave my wife to receive all monies upon mortgages." The Court of Exchequer, after going through the authorities, came to the conclusion that the wife took the legal estate. I think that I should be throwing the law on this subject backwards, and departing from what seems a very convenient rule of construction—a rule which obviously effects the testator's intention—if I held that the legal estate did not pass; and therefore I think that I can make no order on this petition.

A testator, a mortgagee in fee of real estate, gave and bequeathed to A. and B. all and singular his household furniture, goods, plate, linen, and utensils whatsoever, and all and every other his goods and chattels, stock-in-trade, monies, debts, and securities for money, and all and every other his personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, upon trust to get in his debts and to sell his personal estate, and hold the money arising therefrom upon the trusts therein mentioned:—Held, that, under these words, the legal estate in the mortgaged property passed to the trustees.

John Walker, a mortgagee in fee of a freehold estate, made his will, dated the 3rd of April, 1832, which was, in part, as follows:—"I give and bequeath unto William Walker, of, &c., John Ollershaw, of, &c., and James Jowett, of, &c., all and singular my household furniture, goods, plate, linen and utensils whatsoever, and all and every other my goods and chattels, stock-in-trade, monies, debts, and securities for money, and all and every other my personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind or quality soever the same may be or consist of, whereof I or any person or persons in trust for me or for my use is, or are, or shall, or may hereafter be possessed of, interested in, or entitled unto, upon trust, to collect in my said debts as soon as convenient, and sell and dispose of my said household furniture, stock-in-trade, and other my personal estate and effects, either by public auction or private contract, as they in their discretion may think proper, for the best price and most money that can or may be had or gotten for the same; and the money to arise therefrom, after payment of my debts, funeral, testamentary and other incidental expenses, I do hereby direct shall be laid out and invested in the public funds or upon mortgage of good freehold security, with power to alter and vary the same upon such and the like security as they or he shall think proper, and the interest to arise therefrom to pay in manner hereinafter mentioned."

The testator appointed his trustees his executors. The will did not contain any devise of mortgaged or trust estates.

The testator died in January 1833, and his will was proved by all his executors.

The heir-at-law of the testator afterwards died intestate, leaving an infant heir-at-law, to whom the legal estate in the mortgaged property would have gone if it had been left undisposed of by the will of the testator.

Jan. 23, 31. } CATO v. IRVING.

Ship—Registry—Mortgage—Freight.

A ship belonged to A. and B. in different shares, and they were registered as the owners of it at the port of Liverpool. In April 1849 the ship sailed from Liverpool for Sydney. In October A. executed a power of attorney authorizing B. to sell his shares. In November A. mortgaged his shares in the ship and freight to C, and the deed of mortgage was registered at Liverpool. In March 1850 B. being at Sydney (acting under the power of attorney as to A.'s shares) sold the ship to D. On this occasion the old certificate of registry was given up, and the ship was registered de novo in D.'s name at Sydney. The ship, with a cargo, was put into the London Docks in February 1851, and both C. and D. took possession of it, by each of them putting a man on board. Upon the question as to the rights of C. and D. in the ship and freight,—Held, that C. was entitled to A.'s shares in the ship and freight.*

The ship Ajax, of the port of Liverpool, belonged to Mr. Ward and Mr. Adams; Mr. Ward being entitled to forty-eight sixty-fourth parts, and Mr. Adams to the other sixteen sixty-fourth parts. They were registered as the owners, and the certificate of registry was given to them.

In April 1849 the Ajax, with Adams as master, sailed from Liverpool for Sydney; Adams taking with him the certificate of registry.

A power of attorney, dated in October 1849, authorizing Adams to sell Ward's shares in the ship, was executed by Ward, and sent out to Sydney to Adams.

The ship arrived at Sydney in March 1850, and was soon after sold by Adams, acting for himself and under the power of attorney, to Mr. Murnin. On this occasion the certificate was given to the collector and comptroller of Customs at Sydney, the ship was registered de novo in the name of Murnin, as owner, and a new certificate was granted to him.

After this sale the ship took a cargo of wool and tallow, and proceeded on her home voyage to England.

By a bill of sale, dated the 2nd of November 1849, after the date of the power of attorney, Ward assigned his forty-eight sixty-fourth parts in the ship, with the like proportions of all future freight and earnings to Mr. Cato and two other persons, by way of mortgage. A memorandum of this bill of sale was entered in the registry-book kept at the port of Liverpool, and a note of the entry was indorsed on the bill of sale.

The ship arrived at Gravesend on the 21st of February 1851, and was put into the London Docks on the 28th. On that day the mortgagees put a man on board to take possession of it on their behalf, and the agents of Mr. Murnin also put a man on board to take possession on his behalf.

This was a special case filed under Sir George Turner's Act, and the question submitted to the Court on these facts was, what sum, if any, ought to be paid to the plaintiffs, the mortgagees, on account of their demand, as such mortgagees, against the ship and the freight.

Mr. Crompton and Mr. Selwyn, for the plaintiffs, referred to the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89. ss. 11, 34, 37. and 38, and Dixon v. Ewart (1).

PARKER, V.C. said, that he thought that under the Ship Registration Act the plaintiffs had made out their title to Ward's shares of the ship as mortgagees, and that the reply might be confined to the question of the freight.

Mr. Crompton, in reply, cited Kemp v. Clark (2).

PARKER, V.C.—In this case Mr. Ward and Mr. Adams were owners of the ship Ajax, Ward being entitled to forty-eight sixty-fourth parts and Adams to the other sixteen sixty-fourth parts. The ship belonged to Liverpool, and proceeded thence on a voyage to Sydney, with Adams, one of the part-owners, as master. After this Ward made a bill of sale of his shares by way of mortgage to the plaintiffs. Afterwards, the ship being at Sydney, Adams, who had a power of attorney from Ward for the sale of his shares, sold the entirety of the ship to Murnin, who purchased in ignorance of the previous mortgage. One question which was raised in the case was as to the interest of the several parties in the ship. I stated my opinion when the case was argued, that the mortgage was good against Murnin to this extent, and, consequently, that he had purchased, and held the ship subject to the rights of the plaintiffs as mortgagees of Ward's shares. Adams's own shares are free from any incumbrance.

The remaining question is as to the rights of the plaintiffs and Murnin in the freight of the ship. As to the freight the statements are in substance as follows:—The ship sailed from Sydney with a cargo of wool and tallow on the 22nd of September 1850, and arrived at Gravesend on the 21st of February 1851. The plaintiffs, on the 28th of February 1851, before any part of the cargo had been discharged, took possession of the ship and freight in the London Docks by placing a man on board. The defendants, who are agents of Murnin, have since taken possession in a similar manner, and they claim to be entitled to the whole of the freight on his behalf. The plaintiffs have caused notices to be served at the different wharves of their claim to the forty-eight shares. The defendants have received the freight under an arrangement to submit the title of the parties to such freight to the judgment of this Court upon this claim. It is not stated that Murnin had been at the expense of the outfit of the ship and the voyage to England. I suppose, however, that must be so. The rights of the plaintiffs as mortgagees cannot be put higher than the rights of part-owners, and therefore, if Murnin did incur the expenses in earning the freight, the plaintiffs cannot claim without making an allowance to him for his expenses so incurred. I am of opinion that, subject to any deduction to which Murnin may be entitled on that account, the plaintiffs have made out their right as mortgagees to forty-eight shares of the freight in this case.

The cases which were cited establish that mortgagees of a ship who take possession before the conclusion of a voyage are entitled to the freight then accruing. It was contended that the present case did not come within this rule, because the plaintiffs did not take possession until the conclusion of the voyage. I consider that a mortgagee who takes possession before the cargo is delivered comes within the rule. The right to the freight does not accrue until the goods are delivered. Parties so taking possession must be as much within the reason of the rule where the ship is in dock as where she is only on the way to the docks. For these reasons, if the mortgagees had been mortgagees of the whole of the freight, I consider that, under these circumstances, they would have been entitled to the whole. Being mortgagees of a certain number of shares only, they could not take possession to the exclusion of Murnin or his agents. I think that this circumstance does not vary the rights of the parties, though it may alter the principle on which their rights depend. Until the mortgagee takes possession, or does some equivalent act, the owner is entitled to the freight, and is not accountable to the mortgagee for what he receives. When the mortgage is of the entirety, the mortgagee may take exclusive possession; when it is of shares only, he cannot take possession so as to entitle him to prevent the owner taking possession of part. In such cases the mortgagee, without formally taking possession, if he gives notice, and requires payment to himself of his shares, that entitles him to receive his share of the freight then accruing and not actually due. To hold otherwise would render it impossible for the mortgagee to make a title to his share at all. If the ship had been real estate in the possession of Murnin, and had been let by him to another person at a certain rent for the whole, the plaintiffs by giving notice to Murnin requiring payment of a portion of the rents, would have been entitled to a share of the rents as against Murnin. The declaration must be, that the plaintiffs are entitled to forty-eight sixty-fourth parts of the ship and forty-eight sixty-fourth parts of the net freight (after allowing to Murnin his expenses) to an amount not exceeding the sum due to them for principal, interest, and costs.

Railway Act—Disqualified Persons—Investment—Reference to the Master.

Land belonging to a vicarage was taken by a railway company, and the purchase-money paid into court to the account of the vicar. On a petition by the vicar, stating an agreement to purchase land particularly mentioned in the agreement, and that the title had been approved of by a barrister, and that the title deeds had been examined and found correct; and praying for a conveyance and payment of the money out of court, without a reference to the Master—the Court made the order.

The Norfolk Railway Company took, for the purposes of one of their acts, a piece of land, part of the glebe belonging to the vicarage of East Dereham in Norfolk, and, in respect of this purchase, the sum of 606*l.* 3*s.* per cent. consols was carried over to the account of the vicar of East Dereham.

This was a petition of the vicar.

The petition stated an agreement whereby he, the vicar, had agreed to purchase of W. C. Wollaston some land particularly mentioned in the agreement, in consideration of the stock standing to the above-mentioned account. The petition then contained the following statement:—"That the abstract of the title of the said W. C. Wollaston to the said hereditaments has been submitted by your petitioner to F. J. Turner, Esq., barrister-at-law, who has approved of the title thereby shewn, and the several deeds, evidences and documents therein abstracted and referred to have severally been examined and found correct." The petition prayed for a sale of the stock and the application of the money in the proposed purchase, and a conveyance to the vicar of the land, to be held by him in the same manner as the lands taken by the company had been held.

The petition was supported by proper affidavits.

Mr. W. M. James, for the petition, asked for the order in the form proposed, in order to dispense with a reference to the Master.

Mr. B. L. Chapman, for the company.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. made the order.

Costs—Railway Act—Purchase of Lands for a Rectory with the Consent of the Ordinary of a Diocese.

By a railway act a company was empowered to take lands belonging to a vicarage, and it was declared that the purchase-money should be paid into court, and, that, on a petition by the vicar and patron, and with the consent of the Ordinary of the diocese, it might be laid out in the purchase of other lands. A purchase was made accordingly:—Held, that the Bishop was entitled to be paid by the company, not only the costs of his attendance in the Master's office, but also of his appearances on the petitions to the Court for a reference and confirmation of the Master's report.

By the Bristol and Exeter Railway Act (6 Will. 4. c. xxxvi. s. 9.) it was declared that the company might take for the purposes of their act the vicarage-house of Creech St. Michael and the grounds belonging to it; but that they should not be allowed to take a part only, and that the compensation payable for such house and grounds should, "on petition to the Court of Exchequer by the vicar and patron for the time being of the vicarage, and with the consent of the Ordinary for the time being of the diocese," be laid out in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses.

The vicarage-house and grounds were taken by the company, and the purchase-money was paid into court. A petition was afterwards presented for the investment of this money in the purchase of certain specified lands, and the usual reference was made to the Master, who, by his report, approved of the purchase and title. A petition was now presented for a confirmation of the Master's report and a conveyance.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells was the Ordinary of the diocese. The Bishop had appeared in all the proceedings relating to the investment.

The only question, on the hearing of this petition, was as to the Bishop's costs.

Mr. H. Prendergast, for the petition.

Mr. Fooks, for the Bishop of Bath and Wells, asked for the costs of his appearances in the above matters.

Mr. Osborne, for the company.—The duties of the Bishop under this act were confined to an attendance in the Master's office to see that the purchase was proper and the title good. He had no right to appear at the hearing of either of the petitions, and was not entitled to the costs of such appearances. The order, then, ought to be that the costs should be so confined.

PARKER, V.C. said, that he thought that the Bishop had a right to be present at all the proceedings, and was entitled to the costs asked for by counsel.

Will—Construction—Tenant for Life—Residue.

*A testator, by his will, bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate to his executors, upon trust to pay his wife the income and profits thereof, so long as she should continue his widow. A part of the personal estate of the testator, at his death, consisted of a debt of 12,000*l.* payable by annual instalments of 1,500*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. from the death on the debt or such part as for the time being should remain unpaid:—Held, that the tenant for life was entitled to 4*l.* per cent. on the debt or such part as should remain unpaid, and that the other 1*l.* per cent. ought to be invested for the benefit of the tenant for life and those entitled in remainder.*

This was a special case under Sir George Turner's Act.

Solomon Meyer, by his will, dated the 19th of February 1849, after certain legacies, made the following residuary devise and bequest:—"I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my real and personal estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, unto my said wife, and to any person or persons who may be executor or executors, trustee or trustees of this my will, and their heirs, executors and administrators, for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue my widow, upon trust to pay to or permit her, my said wife, to receive the income and profits thereof for her use and benefit, so long as she shall continue my widow, and from and after her decease," &c.

The testator appointed his wife to be his sole executrix, and died in August 1850, and his widow proved his will.

ticles of partnership, dated the 4th of January 1850, were made between Solomon Meyer of the one part, and Meyer Meyer of the other part, to the effect that if either of the partners should die during the partnership, the share of the partner so dying should be transferred to the surviving partner, and that the surviving partner should give a judgment to the personal representatives of the deceased partner for the payment of a sum of money, to be ascertained as therein mentioned, and interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent. from the death of the deceased partner; the principal sum to be paid by annual instalments of 1,500*l.* each, the first instalment to be paid at the expiration of one year after the death of the deceased partner.

It was agreed between Mrs. Meyer, as executrix, and Meyer Meyer, as surviving partner, that Meyer Meyer should pay 12,000*l.* to the estate of the testator by the instalments mentioned in the articles.

On the 22nd of January 1851, Meyer Meyer gave a warrant of attorney, authorizing the attornies therein mentioned to suffer judgment to be entered against him for 24,000*l.*, with a defeazance annexed on payment of 12,000*l.*, and interest at 5*l.* per cent., by the instalments mentioned in the articles, with a power, however, of enforcing immediate payment in default of payment of principal or interest; and judgment was entered up accordingly.

The opinion of the Court was required whether Mrs. Meyer was entitled to the whole of the interest payable by Meyer Meyer, and, if not, what part should be considered interest and what part capital.

Mr. Waley, for Mrs. Meyer, contended that she was entitled to all the interest.

Mr. Goldsmid, for the persons entitled in remainder.

Mr. Waley replied.

PARKER, V.C.—The question in this case, how a residue is to be dealt with as between a tenant for life and those entitled in remainder, where the will contains no direction to convert the property, is familiar to the Court. The principle is contained in the judgment in Howe v. Lord Dartmouth (1), and the only difficulty is in applying it to particular instances. The personal estate of a testator for this purpose may be considered as divided into three different classes. First, property which is found at the testator's death invested in such securities as the Court can adopt, as money in the funds or on real securities. The tenant for life is entitled to the whole income of this. Secondly, property which can be converted into money without sacrificing anything by a forced sale. As to this, the rule is clear,—it must be converted,—and the produce must be invested in securities which the Court allows, and the tenant for life is entitled to the income of such investment. Thirdly, property which, according to a reasonable administration, is not capable of an immediate conversion into money, and which cannot be sold immediately without involving a sacrifice of both principal and interest. In this case the rule is to take the value of the testator's interest, and to give the tenant for life the income of that present value.

In this particular case part of the personal estate consists of money invested on personal security, and payable by instalments. It is contended that the tenant for life is entitled to the whole interest. The contract might have been that the money was to remain out for longer periods, and that a larger rate of interest, as 10*l.* per cent., should be paid. The result of Mr. Waley's argument would be, that the tenant for life would be entitled to the whole of the income so produced during that period. The case cannot be stated more beneficially for the tenant for life than by assuming that the debt is well secured, and will certainly be repaid without any loss of capital. Supposing this to be so, I do not think that the tenant for life can be allowed to have the whole interest of 5*l.* per cent. payable upon that debt. This would clearly be giving her more than a life interest in the present value of the property. In Gibson v. Bott (2) and Caldecott v. Caldecott (3) it was held, that the tenant for life should have 4*l.* per cent. upon the present value. I think that the proper conclusion to come to is, that the tenant for life should have 4*l.* per cent. upon the principal sum secured, from the death of the testator, and that the additional 1l. per cent. should be invested from time to time, and she should have the income of that investment. The principal sum, as it comes in, must also be invested, and the tenant for life is entitled to the income produced by that investment. I do not think it necessary, in this case to have any present value put on this debt.

July 23. } GOODMAN v. DRURY.

Will—Construction—Vesting Legacies charged on Land.

A testator devised real estate to A. in fee, charged with an annuity to B. for life, and directed that after the death of B, the estate should be charged with the payment of 100l. a-piece to X, Y, and Z, and that the same should be paid to them respectively within six calendar months after the death of B, or such of them as should be then living. X. died in the lifetime of B:—Held, that the legacy to X. had not vested, and was not payable to his representatives.

Henry Bates, by his will, dated the 2nd of February 1827, devised his real estates therein mentioned to John Goodman, for his life, "charged and chargeable as hereinafter mentioned," and, after his death, to William Goodman, his heirs and assigns. He then charged the devised estates with an annuity of 50l. to his wife, and, after her death, with an annuity of 15l. for his niece Mary Freeman, for her life. The will then proceeded as follows:—"And, from and after the decease of my said niece, I do hereby further direct that the said hereditaments and premises shall stand and be further charged, and I do hereby onerate and charge the same with the payment of the sum of 100l. a-piece to Richard, Mary, and Louisa Freeman, the children of my said niece Mary Freeman; and which said several sums of 100l. I do hereby give and bequeath to each and every of them accordingly, and do direct the same to be paid and payable to them respectively, within six calendar months next after the decease of my said niece Mary Freeman, or to such of them as shall be then living."

The testator died in 1835, and his widow in 1836.

Mary Freeman, the daughter, married Mr. Drury, and died in the lifetime of Mary Freeman, her mother, the annuitant, who died in 1851.

This was a special case under Sir George Turner's Act. The question was, whether the legacy of 100l. had absolutely vested in Mrs. Drury, so as to entitle her husband, who had taken out administration to her, to receive it.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Pryor, for the devisee of the estate, cited Howes v. Herring (1).

Mr. Malins and Mr. Shapter, for Mr. Drury, cited

Farmer v. Francis, 2 Sim. & S. 505; s.c. 4 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 154; and

In re Bartholomew's Trust, 1 Hall & Tw. 565; s.c. 1 Mac. & G. 354; 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 237.

PARKER, V.C.—Where there is a gift of personal estate to a legatee, the postponement of the payment to a future period does not prevent the legacy from vesting. This, however, is not the case where there is a gift of money charged on real estate. Whatever may be the terms of a gift of money charged on land, if the payment is postponed, the legacy will not vest until the time of payment. There is an exception to this rule (which does not apply here) where the postponement of the payment might appear to have reference to the situation or convenience of the estate. Here the direction is, that the estate "shall be charged with the payment of 100l. to each of three children of Mary Freeman, and which sum I do hereby give and bequeath to them accordingly." Had the will stopped there, they would have had vested interests. It goes on, however, to say, "I direct the same to be paid to them within six months after the death of Mary Freeman or to such of them as shall be then living." This contingency attached to the time of payment, and made, I think, the legacy contingent on the legatee surviving Mary Freeman.

Jan. 18. } In re DALTON'S SETTLEMENT.

Settlement — Construction — Estate for Life to Parents, upon Condition of maintaining their Children — Petition under the Trustees Relief Act.

By a post-nuptial settlement, 4,000l. was vested in trustees, upon trust to invest, and to pay the income to the husband and wife for their joint lives, and then to the survivor for life; and, after the death of either, to stand possessed of one moiety of the trust fund for the survivor absolutely, and of the other moiety for the children of the marriage, as the parents should jointly appoint; and, in default of such appointment, for the children in equal shares, with powers of advancement; and it was thereby declared that the income of the trust monies was made payable to the parents and the survivor of them, upon the condition only, that they and the survivor of them should, during the minority of the children, provide them with suitable diet, clothing, maintenance, and support, in proportion to the circumstances and condition in life of the parents, and the expectancies of such child or children; but that, in case of an advance to any of the children, the parents or the survivor should be released from the condition. In 1844 the husband petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy, and, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, a conditional order was made for his protection upon payment of a yearly sum. In 1845 the husband and wife assigned by way of mortgage all their interest in the income and capital of the trust fund. The fund was then transferred into court, under the Trustees Relief Act. On petition by the six infant children, stating that their parents were in embarrassed circumstances, and had for some time past omitted to provide them with suitable diet, &c., (following the words of the deed) and that no advance had been made to them or any of them; and it appearing that the parents were in a respectable station in life, and in no business, the Court ordered the whole income to be applied for the maintenance of the petitioners.

Quære—the effect of a conditional order for protection under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, as to vesting the assets of the insolvent in the official assignee.

In 1839, W. A. Dalton, the father of the petitioners, sold certain real estate for 6,500l.; and Harriet Dalton, his wife and the mother of the petitioners, joined in the conveyance and released her dower, on the express agreement that 4,000l., part of the purchase-money, should be settled upon the trusts after mentioned. By a settlement of the 29th of July 1839, and made between W. A. Dalton of the first part, Harriet Dalton of the second part, and two trustees of the third part, it was declared that the 4,000l. should be held by the trustees upon trust to invest the same in their names in the public funds, or upon real securities, with power to vary the same; and, upon further trust, to pay the income to W. A. Dalton and his wife during their joint lives; and after the decease of either of them, to the survivor for his or her life, without power of anticipation; and subject thereto, it was declared that, upon the death of either of them, the trustees should be possessed of one moiety of the trust monies, for the survivor of them absolutely, and of the other moiety for such of the children of W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife as they should jointly appoint; and in default of appointment, for all the children equally, with power of advancement, with the consent of the husband and wife, or the survivor. And it was thereby agreed and declared “to be the true intent and meaning of this indenture that the dividends, &c. of the said trust monies are hereby reserved and secured to the said W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife, and the survivor of them, upon condition only that they and the survivor of them shall from time to time, and at all times during the minorities or minority of all and every their child or children, find and provide such child or children with suitable diet, clothing, and general maintenance and support, in proportion to the circumstances and condition of life of them the said W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife, and to the expectancy or expectancies of such child or children, respectively, notwithstanding the portion or portions of such child or children should not have become vested or payable”; and it was provided “that from and after any advance or advances should have been so made as aforesaid in the lifetime of the said W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife, or the survivor of them, to such child or children, amounting to one-third part of their presumptive shares respectively, then and in such case the said W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife, and each of them, shall be wholly released and discharged from the said condition or obligation to provide such child or children with diet, clothing, or maintenance, as aforesaid."

The 4,000*l.* was invested by the trustees in the purchase of 4,232*l.* 16*s.* consols. In August 1844 Mrs. Dalton was taken in execution for 67*l.*, in an action upon a promissory note, she not having pleaded her coverture. On petition to the Court of Bankruptcy she obtained protection, upon condition of satisfying the claim by the yearly payment of 40*l.* out of the income of the trust fund. In November 1844, W. A. Dalton petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy for protection; and in 1845 an order was made by the Commissioner for his protection, and it was thereby directed that W. A. Dalton should pay to the official assignee the sum of 30*l.* in each year, until his debts were discharged; and that if default were made therein for one month, the order was to be void. In 1849, the trust fund was, under the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. (the Trustees Relief Act), transferred into court in the matter of the trusts of the settlement, and the same, together with the amount of dividends since accrued, was standing in the Accountant General's name, at the time of presenting the present petition. In December 1845, W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife assigned to Obbard, by way of mortgage, for securing the sum of 500*l.*, all the income of the trust funds to which they were entitled during their lives, and also one moiety of the capital to which W. A. Dalton would be entitled, in the event of his surviving his wife, and all his contingent interest in the other moiety.

The present petition was presented by the six infant children of Mr. and Mrs. Dalton, which, after setting out the above facts, stated, that W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife had, for some time past, omitted to provide the petitioners with suitable diet, &c., in proportion to the circumstances and condition in life of the said W. A. Dalton and Harriet his wife, and the expectations of the petitioners; that no advancement had been made to any of the petitioners, and that the dividends of the trust fund would not be more than sufficient for that purpose; and the petition prayed that the dividends might be applied accordingly, and be paid for that purpose to such person as the Court might in that behalf appoint.

The petition came on to be heard before the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, whereupon an order was made, that, after providing thereout for the costs of the trustees and the petitioners, the residue of the dividends in court and the accruing dividends should be paid to G. E. Evans, a solicitor of the court, during the minority of the infant petitioners, or until further order, he undertaking to see the same applied in their maintenance and support; and that the costs of Obbard, of and incident to this application, should be added to his mortgage security. Obbard presented a petition of appeal against that order, so far as it affected his mortgage security; and prayed that one moiety of the income of the trust fund to accrue during the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Dalton and the life of the survivor might be paid to him as such mortgagee.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Daniel having opened the case for the appellant,—

Mr. L. Wigram and Mr. C. Hall, for the infant petitioners, objected that the mortgagee had no title; as, previously to his mortgage, both Mr. and Mrs. Dalton had taken the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Acts.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Daniel contended that the property did not vest absolutely in the official assignee, except in cases where a final order was made; that here a mere order for protection was made upon the proposal of the insolvent, which was adopted by the Commissioner, under the 4th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, which was a proposal to pay a yearly sum out of the specific property. They contended further, that there was no instance in which the Court, under the Trustee Act, had dealt adversely against a party upon petition; and they referred to the difficulties expressed by Lord Cottenham, in In re Bloye's Trust (1). Upon the merits they contended that the order was wrong in giving the whole income to the children, and that at the utmost they were only entitled to a moiety.

Mr. J. V. Prior, for the official assignee, claimed the 30*l.* a year, under the order of the Commissioner.

Mr. L. Wigram and Mr. C. Hall, in support of the order.—The Court will not willingly entertain an objection to the jurisdiction which was not raised in the court below — Upton Warren Case (2). But the objection is really only to the discretion of the Court, and therefore clearly inadmissible upon appeal. The appellant has no locus standi; for the property vested in the official assignee upon his appointment; and the only provision in the act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. for revesting the property in the insolvent is under the 10th section, namely, where the petition is dismissed. The condition in the deed of settlement clearly creates a trust in favour of the children.

Mr. Barber, for the trustees of the settlement.

Mr. Malins replied.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (TRURO).—Upon the best consideration I can give this case I am of opinion that there is no just objection to the order. The first point raised was, whether the question involved in the petition is a fit question to be decided upon petition, or whether some other course ought to have been adopted. As far as the question of law is concerned, the Court is in quite as good a position to decide it as if the matter were brought before it by bill. But it is said there is a conflict of evidence with respect to the present state of the family; but that fact does not appear to me to be essential to the decision; and, according to the view I take of the case, I am quite disposed to decide it upon affidavits. The affidavits amount to this: that, at the time of the advance of the 500*l.*, the parents were in a distressed condition, having neither house nor furniture, and that the 500*l.* was raised with a view to improve the condition of the parents and the family generally. What the case might have been if the money had been raised for the express purpose of benefiting the children it is immaterial to consider.

With respect to the other question, how far the interest of Mr. Dalton became vested in the assignee of the Court of Bankruptcy, I express no opinion. The construction of the act may be attended with some difficulties; but I think the case may be decided upon the merits, independently of that construction.

The supposed hardship of the case, at the present moment, cannot affect the construction of a written instrument. You must always have regard to the circumstances of the parties at the time the instrument is executed, with a view to construing that instrument. In the present case there is no material before the Court as to the status of the parties but this: that Mr. Dalton was possessed of a considerable estate in Yorkshire, subject to dower; and that Mrs. Dalton released her dower upon the terms contained in this instrument; the plain object of which was, to secure a provision for the children. The settlement is prepared with a reasonable anticipation that the parents would be in a situation to provide for their children; and then it contemplates a reverse of circumstances, that they would not be able to do that; and with reference to that view, let us see what is the meaning of the terms used in the deed. It is admitted that the terms of the deed amount to a condition or trust, regulating the application of the interest of the money invested: the deed provides that the interest shall be applied in a particular way, upon this express condition. What does this mean? That if the condition is not performed, the right of the parents ceases. Whether the condition be in favour of children or any stranger, it seems to me it would make no difference. If this creates a trust, what was the obligation of the trustees in the event of the parents making default? Would it not have been the duty of the trustees, or of the Court, to put the children in the condition that they would have been in if the parents had performed the condition, and to apply the whole fund for that purpose, if no less than the whole fund would do? The children are entitled to maintenance and support out of the fund, in proportion to the circumstances and condition in life of the parents, and the expectancies of the children. What is meant by those words? It appears Mr. Dalton did not follow any particular occupation. The expectations of the children are not limited to their parents; but extend to the circumstances of their relations and friends. If the parents happen to be in poverty at a particular time, it does not follow that the children are to receive their education at a charity school. Without doubt the words meant that they should receive such an education as would fit them for the position in life in which Mr. Dalton then moved. I cannot read these words in the restricted sense which the arguments for the appellant suppose. It appears to me that 120*l.* a year is not too much for this purpose, considering there are four boys and two girls. But it is said "What, then, are the parents to do?" With that I have nothing to do; my duty is, to give to the children what the parents by deed have provided for them. The object of the deed was to secure the children in the first instance; and the parents are only entitled to what remains after they are provided for. But it is said the mortgagee advanced his money under legal advice; he did it, I am ready to believe, from benevolent motives; but still he did it with ample means of information as to the rights of the children. I think, therefore, that the order of the Court below is quite consistent with the power the Court has over this settlement. The right of the mortgagee is the right of Dalton himself; and neither one nor the other has a right to anything, except what may remain after providing for the children; and, in this case, I think the application of the whole income is not more than sufficient. The petition of appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

CORN EXCHANGE COM-

Tithes—37 Hen. 8. c. 12.—Composition.

A rector of a parish in the city of London received for some years, without objection, a fixed sum by way of tithes of particular premises, and then filed his bill for an account :—Held, that the receipt of such fixed sum, though less than the annual value, did not necessarily imply a composition; and that much stronger evidence would be required to establish such a payment as a composition than in the ordinary case of a money payment in lieu of tithes in kind.

Quære—whether the rule requiring six months' notice for determining an ordinary composition for tithes in kind is applicable to the case of a composition for a money payment in lieu of tithes.

Form of reference to the Master to take an account of tithes due under the 37 Hen. 8. c. 12, where the rent or annual value of the buildings and premises is increased by means of implements or fittings not titheable let or used therewith.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from a decree of the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, dated the 2nd day of July 1851, dismissing the bill, without costs.

The plaintiff, who was the rector of the parish of St. Olave, Hart Street, in the city of London, in July 1848, filed his bill against the London Corn Exchange Company, incorporated by the 7 Geo. 4. c. 1*v.* intituled "An Act for erecting and providing a new Corn Exchange at or near Mark Lane in the city of London," and W. W. Wren, the clerk and solicitor of the company, praying that it might be declared that the plaintiff and his successors, rectors of the parish, were entitled to receive from the London Corn Exchange Company, in respect of the Corn Exchange and premises erected and built by them in pursuance of their act, tithes, after the rate of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound upon the annual value of the said Corn Exchange and premises; and that it might be referred to the Master to inquire and state the true annual value of the same, and to take an account of what was due to the plaintiff for arrears of the tithes thereof from Michaelmas 1847, and for payment to the plaintiff; the plaintiff waiving all right to penalties in respect thereof.

The London Corn Exchange Company was built upon a site previously occupied by dwelling-houses; and the premises of the company consisted of two large areas, used as seed and corn markets, and of a coffee-room or tavern, and cellars, which last were let respectively at rents of 300*l.* and 200*l.* The principal revenue of the company was derived from the letting of stalls or tables, placed in and around the areas, to factors and others connected with the trade. The gross revenue of the company was upwards of 3,000*l.*, and the outgoings about 600*l.*

It appeared that Dr. Owen, the immediate predecessor of the plaintiff, as rector of the parish, had agreed to accept, and from the time of the erection of the Corn Exchange up to his death, in 1837, had received, from the company a sum of 90*l.* a year in lieu of and as a composition for the tithe; and that this amount was fixed upon as the yearly value of 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound upon the estimated rental of the houses previously standing upon the site of the Corn Exchange. After the death of Dr. Owen, the same sum of 90*l.* was received by the plaintiff, his successor, without any objection being made, down to Michaelmas 1847. Subsequently, a long correspondence took place between the plaintiff and the defendants as to their respective rights and liabilities; and ultimately the present bill was filed in July 1848. The defendants by their answer insisted, among other things, that the plaintiff had adopted the composition made with Dr. Owen, and that he was bound to have given six months' formal notice to determine it; and upon this objection the Vice Chancellor dismissed the bill at the hearing, but without prejudice to the filing of a new bill.

The other question raised by the pleadings was, the manner in which the premises of the company were to be assessed for tithe. On this latter point the following sections of the 37 Hen. 8. c. 12. were referred to.

"2. That the citizens and inhabitants of the said city of London and liberties of the same for the time being, shall yearly, without fraud or covin, for ever pay their tithes to the parsons, vicars, and curates of the said city and their successors for the time being, after the rate hereafter following: that is, to wit, of every 10*s.* rent by the year of all and every house and houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, stables, and every of them within the said city and liberties of the same, sixteen pence half-penny; and of every 20*s.* rent by the year of all and every such house and houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, and stables, and every of them within the said city and liberties 2*s.* 9*d.*; and so above the rent of 20*s.* by the year, ascending from 10*s.* to 20*s.* according to the rate aforesaid."

"4. Item, that every owner or owners, inheritor or inheritors, of any dwelling-house or houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, or stables, or any of them, within the said city and liberties, inhabiting or occupying the same himself or themselves, shall pay after such rate or tithes as is abovesaid, after the quantity of such yearly rent as the same was last letten for, without fraud or covin."

"8. Item, if any dwelling-house, within eight years last past, was or hereafter shall be converted into a warehouse, storehouse, or such like, or if a warehouse, storehouse, or such like, within the said eight years, was, or hereafter shall be, converted into a dwelling-house; that then the occupiers thereof shall pay tithes for the same after the rate above declared of mansion-house rents."

"9. Item, that where any person shall demise any dyehouse or brewhouse, with implements convenient and necessary for dyeing or brewing, reserving a rent upon the same, as well in respect of such implements as in respect of such dyehouse or brewhouse, that then the tenant shall pay his tithes after such rate as is abovesaid, the third penny abated."

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Hugh Hill, and Mr. Speed, for the plaintiff.

Sir W. P. Wood, Mr. Willes, and Mr. Humphry appeared for the defendants, and, at the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor, also for the holders of stalls, who were not made parties to the bill.—They insisted that the annual payments of 90*l.* were made and received as a composition; and that such composition had been adopted by the plaintiff, and had never been legally determined. As to the mode of rating, they contended that the holders of stalls could not be considered as tenants, but that the letting was more in the nature of a licence or easement; as in the case of a box at the opera, &c.; and if so, then the company were both occupiers and owners, and the tithe would be payable upon "such yearly rent as the same was last letten for,"—that is to say, the rent of the houses pulled down; and lastly, that if the tithes were to be assessed, having regard to the profits of the stalls, there must be an abatement, as in the case of the dyehouse and brewhouse mentioned in the statute. The following cases were cited—

Mr. Bethell replied.

March 10.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The course which has been taken at the bar in regard to this case has relieved the Court of considerable difficulty; and the only question necessary for me to decide is, whether the plaintiff can maintain his suit; that question depending upon the fact of whether there was such a composition as bound him, and as required a regular notice to put an end to it. There is a distinction between this case and the ordinary case of a composition for tithes. Where a money payment is made upon the annual value, it requires strong evidence to maintain that it is a composition, and you cannot infer that it is so from the receipt of an annual sum below the annual value. The party may not be able to ascertain what the annual value is; and it is not like the case of a money payment in lieu of tithes in kind. A case of this kind must stand upon its peculiar circumstances. I will assume that the composition, if such it is, began with Dr. Owen, though that is a question of considerable difficulty.

The next point is, whether that composition was adopted by Mr. Letts. He undoubtedly accepted the same payment as was made to Dr. Owen, but there was no direct dealing between Mr. Letts and the owners of the property in respect to the acceptance of less than the actual value; and he, finding payments made with reference to the value of the original houses, might very naturally be led to accept the sum received by the former incumbent from ignorance of the real value or from not wishing to disturb the existing arrangements; but this would not amount to a composition. Assuming it to be a composition on the part of Dr. Owen, Mr. Letts might have received it without notice that it was a composition, or less in amount than 2s. 9d. on the actual value. I think it very doubtful upon the whole case, whether there was an adoption of the previous composition which was binding on Mr. Letts. I will assume, however, that it was so; and then the question arises, whether that composition was put an end to.

I am not aware of any authority which decides that, in a case like the present, you must give the same notice as would be requisite in the case of a payment in lieu of a common render of tithes. But clearly the effect of the correspondence is, that there is an assertion by Mr. Letts that he is receiving less than the value, and an acquiescence on the part of the Corn Exchange Company in the alteration and revision of the annual payments then payable to him. They do not say to him, "Whatever may be the case for the future, as to the past he is bound to accept this sum, because he had adopted in a formal manner the composition paid to his predecessor." But the correspondence shews clearly that the plaintiff would be taken by surprise if I were to allow this objection. The parties have come here with reference to the operation of the act of parliament, and not upon the question whether Mr. Letts had precluded himself, by adoption of the composition, from that to which he would otherwise have been by law entitled. It being, then, a question of fact, I am of opinion that the plaintiff can maintain his bill; and there will be nothing left but to direct the common account. With regard to the period from which the account shall commence, I am not disposed to carry it back further than the time of filing the bill.

The form of the decree was arranged as follows:—Reversing the order of the Vice Chancellor, and inserting the defendants', the company's, submission to be bound by the decree in respect of their tenants' liability, declare that the plaintiff is entitled to tithes after the rate of 2s. 9d. in the pound on the annual value of the London Corn Exchange and premises, to be ascertained in manner hereinafter directed, from the time of filing the bill; refer it to the Master to inquire into and ascertain the annual value of the London Corn Exchange and premises in each year from that date, having regard to the annual rents received by the company in respect of such parts as are let at annual rents, and deducting therefrom such parts of such rents as are payable in respect of matters or things included in the lettings as are not by law chargeable with tithes. Liberty to state special circumstances.

Trustee Act 1850—Railway Company—Costs.

A petition, under the Trustee Act 1850, stated that A. had mortgaged lands to B. in fee; that B. had died, having by his will devised the lands to infants, and appointed C. his executor; that a contract had been entered into by C. with a railway company for the sale of a part of the lands at a certain price, and that, for the purpose of carrying out the contract, it was necessary to get in the legal estate. The petition prayed that the legal estate might be vested in C, and that the railway company might pay the costs of the petition. The railway company appeared at the hearing, but objected to pay the costs:—Held, that the Court had no jurisdiction to make any order either in favour of, or against, the company.

This was a petition under the Trustee Act, 1850. The petition stated that Mr.

Biddulph had mortgaged lands to Mr. Rees in fee, with a power of sale, that Mr. Rees had died, having by his will appointed an executor, and devised the mortgaged estate to infants. The petition then stated a contract between the company and the executor for the purchase of a part of this land, and that, with a view to this contract, it had been desired that the legal estate in the property should be vested in the executor. The petition then prayed that the estate might be conveyed by the children to the executor, and that the railway company might pay the costs of the petition.

The company were served with the petition.

The petition was not headed in the matter of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act or the particular railway act.

Mr. Metcalfe, for the petition, contended that, as the petition in this case had been rendered necessary by the contract with the company, it was one of the items of costs which the company were bound to pay. There was, perhaps, a defect in not having the petition headed in the matter of the railway act and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, but the Court would probably give leave to have the petition amended in this respect. He referred to the 82nd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

Mr. Bovill, for the company, objected to the question of costs being considered on this petition.

PARKER, V.C. said that, on the petition before him, he had not jurisdiction to make any order on the company. The vendors must make out their bill of costs, and send it to the company, and the taxing Master would have to judge of any items which might be disputed. He had no objection, if both parties wished to submit the question to him as to these costs, to act as arbitrator in the matter. In the absence of such submission, he should make no order as to the costs.

Mr. Bovill, for the company, declined to give such submission, and asked for the costs of the appearance of the company on the petition.

PARKER, V.C. said that he had not jurisdiction on the petition to make any order for, or against, the railway company, and declined to give costs.

Company — Contributory — Irregular Transfer—Deed of Settlement.

By the deed of settlement of a joint-stock company, the directors were specifically authorized to purchase shares of members under certain circumstances; but the deed contained no express prohibition restricting the directors from buying up shares generally. The company, becoming embarrassed, summoned an extraordinary general meeting, at which a resolution was passed, authorizing the directors to purchase and take a transfer of the shares of any member who would lend the company a sum of money equal to the purchase-money of his shares. The notice calling the meeting did not state, as required by the deed, the specific object for which the meeting was called. At a subsequent general meeting, at which the resolution was read, the directors were authorized to give further time to the members who had not yet complied with the terms of the resolution. W. L. then sold his shares to a trustee for the company upon the terms stated in the resolution, and died before the transfer was effected; and the directors, at the instance of his executor, completed the requisite formalities of the transfer:—Held, that the resolution of the extraordinary meeting was invalid for want of due notice; and that the subsequent ratification of the same was inoperative, as in excess of the powers of a general meeting; and that the executor of W. L. was properly retained on the list of contributories without qualification.

Observations on the difficulty of applying the doctrine of acquiescence to joint-stock companies.

Where partnerships, as in the case of joint-stock companies, consist of a great number of individuals, the Court will hold them in their transactions strictly to the terms of the partnership contract.

This was an appeal from an order of Knight Bruce, V.C., reported 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 295, refusing to remove the name of Mr. J. Lawes as the executor of Mr. W. Lawes, deceased, from the list of contributories of the above-named company.

The 22nd and 23rd clauses of the deed of settlement, and the resolutions passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the company, are set out in the report of Morgan's case (1).

The 35th clause provided that "the respective persons in whose names the shares in the capital of the company shall from time to time be held and stand in the share register of the company shall, for all the purposes of these presents, and by and between all the present and future shareholders of and in the said capital, be declared the true and absolute owners and proprietors of such shares respectively," &c.

The 40th clause, providing for the keeping of a share register book, is set out in the report of the original hearing.

The 42nd clause provided "that in case any husband of a female proprietor, or any executor who shall not obtain the approbation of the directors to be admitted a proprietor of the company, &c. shall not be able within six calendar months from the time of his becoming such executor to sell or dispose of the share or shares belonging to or claimed by him in such character or right as aforesaid, to some other person or persons to be approved of by the directors, it shall be lawful for the directors in all such cases, and they are hereby required, on the application of the person holding or entitled to, or claiming such share or shares as aforesaid, to purchase the same from him or her at the current or market price thereof, or for such other price as the directors shall deem fair or reasonable; and the share or shares so purchased shall, under the order of the directors, be transferred to one of the trustees for the time being, in trust for and for the benefit of himself and the other proprietors of the company."

Clause 44. "Whenever any share or shares in the capital of the company shall become actually forfeited, or shall be duly and effectually vested in any new proprietor, and such entry or alteration in regard to such share or shares shall have been made in the share register-book as hereinbefore stated, then, and not before, the responsibility of a previous owner, as a proprietor in the company, with respect to the same share or shares, shall, from and after the completion of such entry and certificate granted as aforesaid, and the payment of all instalments on such shares previously called for, cease and determine, as to the same share or shares; and such previous owner shall thenceforth be exonerated and released from all subsequent claims, demands, and obligations in regard to the same share or shares, and from all future observance and performance of the covenants, conditions, and stipulations contained in or referred to by this indenture, or in or by any deed or deeds relating thereto; and the certificate to be given by the directors as hereinbefore required of such entry, erasure, or alteration, shall at all times be evidence of such acquittance and discharge as aforesaid in respect of such share or shares: and the person in whom any share or shares shall or may become vested, and whose name shall be entered as the approved proprietor thereof in the share register-book as hereinbefore mentioned, shall immediately thereupon, but not before, have and be subject to all the same privileges, advantages and future liabilities in respect of such share or shares as the person originally owning such share or shares."

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

The 47th clause, providing for the transaction of business at annual general meetings, proceeded as follows:—"And such other business shall be transacted relating to the company, and such rules and regulations made for the better government and carrying into effect the objects of the company as may not involve a breach of, or be inconsistent with, the existing rules or regulations of the company." The 50th clause provided that the notice convening extraordinary general meetings should specify, amongst other things, the specific object or objects of the meeting.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Lewin, in support of the appeal.—The decision in Morgan's case does not apply to the present case, for Morgan's shares were never transferred in the share register-book to the name of the new proprietor; if it does apply, then it ought to be re-considered. The deed of settlement contains no prohibition of purchasing shares on behalf of the company. The purchase of Lawes's shares was not made until after the ordinary general meeting, which meeting adopted and ratified the resolutions passed at the previous extraordinary general meeting—Taylor v. Hughes (1). Again, this purchase was completed by the executor, and is, therefore, valid under the 42nd clause. Even if the transaction were irregular, the Court would refuse relief on the ground of acquiescence.

Graham v. the Birkenhead, Lancashire and Cheshire Junction Railway Company, 2 Hall & Tw. 450; s. c. 2 Mac. & Gor. 146; 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 445.

Ex parte Bagge, in re the Northern Coal Mining Company, 13 Beav. 162; s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 229.

Mr. James Russell and Mr. Terrell, contrâ.—Morgan's case was decided upon the broad ground, that it was not competent to the directors to enter into any such contract. The directors had authority to buy in two cases only: namely, where they refused the executor or his nominee, and in the event of their having a surplus fund—Ex parte Richmond's Executors (2) and

(1) 2 Jo. & Lat. 24.

(2) 3 De Gex & S. 96.

Bosanquet v. Shortridge (3). The directors had no authority to diminish the capital of the company, except in the cases provided by the deed. The doctrine of acquiescence cannot apply, because there are members of the company who are not sui juris.

March 17.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question whether this gentleman was or was not properly put on the list of contributories depends upon the validity of the transfer of the shares to Buckland. This company was strictly a trading partnership, though consisting of a great number of persons; and I am very far from saying that such rules as were laid down in Const v. Harris (4) would not still govern cases of that description. But in a joint-stock company consisting of a great number of partners, it becomes especially necessary to hold the parties strictly to the terms of their deed; because otherwise, when the property is dealt with in pursuance of resolutions passed at ordinary or extraordinary general meetings, which a great proportion of the members will never attend, a partner may find himself bound, or affected to be bound, by transactions wholly at variance with the terms of his original contract.

Now, this partnership, the profits of which at first it was thought could not be estimated too high, was at the time of the transaction in question wholly insolvent. And the deed of settlement provides, that if there be a surplus fund to the extent of 10,000*l.*, the directors may purchase shares on behalf of the company; that is, they may buy up the interest of partners who may wish to retire, increasing by that means the interest of the remaining partners. At the time when the company was greatly in want of funds to relieve them from their embarrassments, an extraordinary general meeting is called. Now, the deed says expressly that the notice convening an extraordinary general meeting shall state the object or objects of the meeting. It is, however, perfectly clear that the circular letter of the 10th of April did not state the specific object of the meeting; and, I think, it is equally clear from the wording of that letter that the directors did not intend thereby to disclose fully to the shareholders the scheme which they had to propound at the meeting. By a resolution passed at that meeting, authority was given to the directors to buy the shares of any shareholder wishing to retire, at a certain depreciated price, that is, below its nominal value; and upon the shareholder lending a sum of money equal to the amount of the purchase-money, a loan note was to be given for the aggregate amount, payable in five years, with interest. This was a singular transaction, for it was a mode of increasing the difficulties of the company by pledging them to more debt than was necessary, and withdrawing a portion of the capital from the trade, and thus increasing the liabilities of the remaining partners. The notice calling the meeting certainly gave no intimation that any such proposal was to be advanced. Mr. Lawes did not within the time limited avail himself of the privilege given by that resolution to tender his shares for purchase by the directors; but afterwards there was a general meeting at which a resolution was passed enlarging the time, and declaring that the shares of those who should continue defaulters after the expiration of the enlarged time should be forfeited. Now, the question argued before me was, whether that general meeting had such power or not. In my opinion they had not the power, for their powers are expressly confined to such things as are not inconsistent with the existing rules and regulations of the company. Now, the resolution of the general meeting was directly in opposition to the deed, and, therefore, must depend for its validity on the powers of the extraordinary meeting. If the notice had expressly stated the specific object of that meeting, I do not say that the resolution would have been extra vires; but I am clearly of opinion that it did not fall within the powers of the general meeting; and if it did, that it was confined to the liability of the parties to contribute their loans, and did not extend to the power which had expired by lapse of time of purchasing the shares of partners who were desirous of withdrawing from the concern. From the terms of the resolution, I can hardly doubt that it was so; for it speaks of defaulters and of forfeiture of shares, things involving liabilities, but is altogether silent as to the privilege of selling their shares to the company, and thus withdrawing themselves from a concern which was at that time confessedly in a state of insolvency.

Now, it was contended, that this was a concluded and perfect transaction, accompanied with all the formalities prescribed by the deed. That is nothing to the question, for though in form it was a transfer to a third person, yet it was confessedly in substance an immediate dealing with the directors, the seller being cognizant of the fact that no substituted shareholder was thereby introduced into the company. But it was said that this case might be distinguished from Morgan's case by this, that Morgan's case depended solely on the extraordinary meeting, this upon the general meeting as well; that there the transfer was imperfect, here perfect. From what I have said before, neither of those circumstances can influence the judgment I am about to pronounce. In Morgan's case the Vice Chancellor proceeded upon the ground of knowledge and acquiescence by all parties; but Lord Cottenham did not think that ground a solid one, and he reversed the decision. Now, it is impossible not to feel that the doctrine of acquiescence, as applied to these cases, must lead to enormous difficulty, because individual members of this one partnership may be bound or precluded by particular acts quâ partners, by which the general body would not be bound or precluded. However, I am not embarrassed with this difficulty in the present case, because I am of opinion that the notice calling the extraordinary general meeting did not sufficiently specify the object, so as to make the resolution valid; and that the general meeting, not having the power to pass such a resolution, could not give any such confirmation as was supposed to the resolution of the previous meeting; and, further, that the resolution passed at the general meeting did not extend to this case. Upon the merits of the case, I am of opinion that it is a transaction that ought not to prevail.

I make no imputation upon the gentleman who, unfortunately, is still to continue a contributory. I have no doubt that in his view it was a bond fide transaction, untainted with fraud or contrivance; but it was an improper transaction. The effect of it was to allow a certain number of persons who had the command of money to escape from further liability at the expense of their co-partners, and contrary to the express provision of the deed. I therefore think the Vice Chancellor came to a right conclusion upon this case, which I hold not to be distinguishable from Morgan's case; and, therefore, I must dismiss this appeal, with costs.

Railway Company—Persons under Disability—Money paid into Court—Surplus.

*Where money has been paid into court in respect of lands taken by a company from persons under disability, and, with the exception of a small surplus, has been afterwards laid out in the purchase of lands to be settled to the same uses, if such surplus is under 20*l., the Court will allow it to be paid to the tenant for life, but not otherwise.

A railway company took, for the purposes of their act, some settled lands, and the purchase-money was paid into court. This purchase-money, with the exception of 52*l.*, was laid out in the purchase of other lands. On the petition brought for completing the purchase under the sanction of the Court, the tenant for life asked that the sum of 52*l.* might be paid to him, he undertaking to lay it out in lasting improvements.

Mr. G. L. Russell, for the petition, cited Ex parte Barrett (1).

PARKER, V.C. said, that the rule which he laid down was not to allow sums exceeding 20*l.* to be paid out under the circumstances stated in the petition.

LORDS JUSTICES,

Feb. 28.

BARNETT v. SHEFFIELD.

Will—Bequest of Annuity to Trustee—Appropriation of Fund to meet Annuity—Lien on Annuity for Breach of Trust of Trustee, the Annuitant.

A testator directed three trustees to raise a fund sufficient to pay an annuity to one of them, and gave power to resort to the residue if the fund should become deficient. The three trustees invested more than enough on mortgage, and paid the annuity out of it. On the mortgage being paid off, the annuitant (a trustee) received the money, and misapplied it. The annuity had been assigned, and the assignment recited the appropriation. The purchaser filed a bill against all the trustees, to compel them to pay the money misapplied, or for a resort to the residue to make good the same:—Held, that there had been an appropriation, that the recital was binding on the purchaser as to appropriation, and that the purchaser had no claim upon the residue, the fund not having become deficient within the meaning of the will.

The testator in the cause, Hugh Hernishaw, by his will, dated the 14th of December 1829, directed his three trustees, Sheffield, William Webb, and Hernishaw, to raise a sum of money, the clear yearly dividends, interest, and produce of which, when invested upon government or real securities, would produce a clear annual sum of 100*l.*, clear of all deductions, and pay the same to William Webb (one of the trustees) and his assigns for his life; and he directed that, if at any time the dividends, interest, and annual produce of the trust fund should, from any cause or circumstance whatsoever, be insufficient to answer the annuity, the deficiency should be raised out of the dividends of the residue; and he declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the residue, and of the stocks, funds, and securities so appropriated for the said annuity and the dividends, interest, and annual produce thereof, (but subject and charged with the said annuity), upon certain trusts thereby declared. The testator died in January 1830, and his will was proved by the three trustees, who were also the executors. The three trustees invested 3,500*l.*, part of the personal estate, on a mortgage of freehold property, at 4 per cent. interest, and the same was conveyed to them in fee simple by deeds of the 30th and 31st of October 1831. The three trustees paid William Webb his annuity down to November 1831, when Hernishaw, the trustee, died, and then the two surviving trustees paid the annuity until the 2nd of January 1832. In that month Webb sold his annuity to Mr. Barnett for 900*l.* Before any assignment was executed, Matthew Webb was appointed a new trustee, and the mortgage was vested in him, William Webb, and Sheffield, upon the trusts of the will. The assignment of the annuity was made by a deed, dated the 28th of June 1832, between William Webb of the one part, and Mr. Barnett of the other part, which untruly recited that William Webb and Sheffield were the only trustees of the will, and recited that in pursuance of the trusts of the will, and for the purpose of securing the annuity, the 3,500*l.* had been invested on the mortgage, and then assigned the annuity, and directed the "trustees or trustee for the time being of the will to pay the annuity to Barnett, his executors, administrators, or assigns." William Webb received the interest on the mortgage debt and other estate of the testator, and with the privity of his co-trustees, Sheffield and Matthew Webb, paid the annuity to Mr. Barnett down to the 2nd of June 1846.

In 1846 the mortgagor paid off the 3,500*l.*; and William Webb and Sheffield received the money, gave a receipt, and conveyed, or professed to convey, the estate, there being no mention of the conveyance to the old and new trustees in 1832. The 3,500*l.* was taken possession of, with the permission of Sheffield, by William Webb, and misapplied by him. Mr. B. Barnett then filed a bill against Sheffield, Matthew Webb, and William Webb, praying a declaration that they were personally liable to make good the 3,500*l.* and interest, for an account of the trust estate, and a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to have the 3,500*l.*, or any deficiency, made good out of the residue. By a decree, made by the late Vice Chancellor of England, in 1850, was declared that Matthew Webb was personally liable to make good the 3,500*l.*, and that sum was ordered to be paid into court, and a reference was directed to the Master as to the outstanding personal estate, and what real estate remained unsold. From this decree, so far as it related to Mr. Matthew Webb, he appealed, and from the remainder, the other defendants appealed.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Malins, Mr. Metcalfe, and Mr. Terrell, for the appellants.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Rolfe, and Mr. Speed, for Mr. Barnett, the respondent, contended that there was no sufficient appropriation of the mortgage money to the purposes of paying the annuity; for, among other reasons, that the money secured afforded a greater amount of interest than was enough to keep down the annuity, and even if there were an appropriation, the annuitant had power given him by the will to resort to the residue for any deficiency. The purchaser had done all he could to protect himself by giving notice to Mr. W. Webb's co-trustee; and if the co-trustees permitted Mr. W. Webb to misapply the fund, as both Mr. Sheffield and Mr. Matthew Webb had done, they were bound to make good the misapplication, and could not rely upon the annuity as a security to them for any sums due to the testator's estate from Mr. William Webb. The learned counsel concluded by citing, observing on, and distinguishing this case from that of Morris v. Livie (1), and referred to Priddy v. Rose (2) and May v. Bennett (3).

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The decree appears to be wrong. The plaintiff claims as assignee of an annuity. This claim is resisted on several grounds: the first being, that the annuity was satisfied by the appropriation of a fund to meet it. In answer to this, it is said, that there was not, strictly speaking, any appropriation, because the debt of 3,500*l.*, invested upon real securities, produced, not 100*l.*, but 140*l.* per annum. It appears to us that this was perfectly immaterial. The trustees had power to invest the produce of the fund upon real security; and it is not often easy to find real security producing exactly a prescribed income, because a mortgagor does not in general wish to split the sum which he requires into different mortgages. From that circumstance it may be inferred that where, according to the terms of the trust, the fund to be provided to secure an annuity may be invested on real security, the security will not be an improper one because it produces rather more than the actual annuity required. Therefore, if there is nothing upon the will in the present case to denote a contrary intention, this appropriation may be inferred to have been proper. Now the will confirms that inference, for it provides that the trustees shall stand possessed of the appropriated fund, "subject and charged with the payment of the said annuity," upon the trust which it proceeds to declare. I do not build much on this expression, but it seems to shew that the testator did contemplate the possibility of the fund being more than sufficient for keeping down the annuity. This, therefore, appears to me an appropriation quite within the meaning of the will, if the executors intended it to be such an appropriation. Was it then so intended? That admits of no doubt. It was invested within a year and a half after the testator's death; and seems to have been invested for the sole purpose of answering the annuity. And it must at all events be so taken as regards the plaintiff, because in the assignment of the annuity to him there is an express recital that this appropriation had been made, and, therefore, a recognition of it to him. But in the next place it is said, that although there may have been an appropriation, that circumstance does not exclude the right to resort to the residue, because, independently of the general question, there is in the will an express provision enabling the plaintiff to resort to the residue, in case the fund from any cause or circumstance whatsoever should prove insufficient. I think, however, this clause contemplates an original deficiency in the funds only to answer the annuity. The rate of interest on money in the funds had been reduced shortly before the date of the will, and this circumstance might have led to the introduction of the provision. It is said that, as the trustees misapplied the trust money, the contingency arose which the testator contemplated. My opinion clearly is, that the contingency has not arisen. The fund has, it is true, been lost; but it was ample, and the produce of it was never insufficient to answer the annuity. I think, therefore, first, that there was an appropriation; and, secondly, that there was no falling off in the produce of the fund, so as to render it insufficient within the meaning of the will. But I also think that if all this were otherwise, still the case of Morris v. Livie governs the present. Mr. Barnett, when he took his assignment, took it, subject to the liability to the cestuis que trust under the will. He has got all that he stipulated for. He bought an annuity, subject to a liability; and he cannot retain the benefit, and transfer the liability to others.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I think that, consistently with the will, it was competent to the trustees and executors to appropriate for the annuity a fund producing an annual income more than sufficient to keep down the annuity, paying of course the surplus, from time to time, as long as there should be a surplus, to the persons entitled to the residue. That being the effect of the will, as to the power of the trustees, I am satisfied by the evidence that in fact a mortgage for 3,500*l.* at 4*l.* per cent. on which a portion of the estate to that amount was invested, was effectually appropriated under the will to the purpose of satisfying the annuity; and I am of opinion that thereupon the general residue became discharged, subject only to this observation, that it was possible that, by reduction of the rate of interest or variation of the security, the income of the 3,500*l.* might be reduced below 100*l.*, in which case there might be a title to resort to the residue to supply the deficiency. The loss in this case has been occasioned by no such circumstance. The whole was called in by the trustees, and has been spent and misapplied by them, or some or one of them. I am of opinion that such an event is not a case contemplated by the will,—is not one to which the language of the testator, properly interpreted, was intended to apply, or on which the provision was intended to come into operation. But if it were otherwise, still there would remain the liability of the annuitant, who was also a trustee, to account; and I am of opinion that it was incompetent to him, either for his own benefit, or for the benefit of a purchaser from him, to deliver the annuity from its liability as a guarantee for a full account on his part as to all the transactions in which he, as a trustee, should be engaged in respect of the trust.

LORDS JUSTICES. 1851. Nov. 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 22, 24. 1852. Jan. 23, 24.	}	THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. MURDOCH.

Clergy—English Presbyterians—Scotch Church—Free Church—Chapel—Costs—Stay of Execution of Decree pending Appeal to the House of Lords.

A chapel was founded in England, and was used, and the services therein were performed according to the mode of worship in the Established Church of Scotland. The Court below held, that no person could enjoy the office of minister who was disqualified to be a minister of the Established Church of Scotland; and it being proved that the minister had become so disqualified, he was ordered to be removed, and the trustees who co-operated with him were also removed, and he and they were ordered to pay the costs of the suit. He and they appealed from the decree, but the same was wholly affirmed; Lord Chief Justice Cranworth dissenting from part of the decree by which the Court below declared that "no minister or other person is qualified for, or is competent to exercise, the office of minister or pastor without being a licentiate and recognized minister of the Established Church of Scotland, and in full connexion therewith."

An application was subsequently made to suspend the execution of the decree of the Court below, pending an intended appeal to the House of Lords; but the Court refused the motion, with costs.

The facts of this case are fully reported in 19 Law Journal Reports (N.S.) Chanc. p. 3, before Vice Chancellor Sir James Wigram.

The appellants were Mr. Murdoch, the minister, and Mr. Smith and Mr. Wilson, two other adverse defendants, who were trustees of the meeting-house.

The Solicitor General, Mr. Little and Mr. T. Deere Salmon appeared in support of the decree below.

Mr. Lewin, for the defendants in the same interest as the relators.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The controversy in this suit (a cause by information and bill) concerns the trusts upon which a small landed property at Berwick-upon-Tweed, on part of which stands a building called the Low Meeting-house, or now as it seems, more generally, Hyde Hill Chapel, is held. It is and has for many years been a place of worship for Protestant Dissenters; that is, as the relators and plaintiffs say, for Protestant Dissenters of a particular class and description, not Protestant Dissenters generally—a limitation of the term, which, as I understand, the counsel for the appellants, who are three of the defendants in the cause, do not concede or admit. But, that it has always been, and ought to continue to be used as a place of worship for Protestant Dissenters in some sense; and that of this place of worship and its congregation there ought to be a settled minister having the right, while duly retaining that office, and willing and able for the purpose, to perform its functions, are propositions common to the disputants, and to be taken for granted; as, likewise, is the proposition that the term "Protestant Dissenters" must in the cause be understood as a term used in England concerning the congregation of a place of worship situate in England. The main, or perhaps substantially, the sole, question is, as to the fitness and qualification for the particular ministerial office that has been mentioned of the gentleman who at the time of the commencement of this suit filled it, namely, the appellant, Mr. Murdoch; and as to the fitness of the two other appellants, who are two of the trustees of the property for the purposes to which it is applicable, to continue in the trusteeship. But there is substantially, I think, no difference between the cases of the appellants. For if Mr. Murdoch ought not to continue to be the minister, it seems to me plain enough that, entertaining the same views, and associated and acting together as to everything material in this litigation, the three ought alike to be removed or retire; and if Mr. Murdoch ought to be allowed to continue as the minister, there is no case against either of the other appellants.

(1) The arguments in the above case extended to seven days, and the judgment, a transcript of which was upwards of 250 folios in length, occupied three hours in delivery. The judgment of the Lord Chief Justice consisted of an elaborate statement of the facts, but they are not repeated in this report. The arguments are most of them sufficiently noticed in the judgment of his Lordship.

The chief or sole contention of the relators and plaintiffs (the principal respondents in this appeal) may, with sufficient accuracy for every present purpose, be stated thus:—They may be considered as insisting, first, that it is absolutely necessary to a due administration of the trusts by which the property is bound, that the minister on the foundation should be, when appointed, and should, while its minister, continue to be, in communion with the Established Church of Scotland; should, when appointed, be or have been a licentiate of the Established Church of Scotland; and should, while the minister on the foundation, be and continue a minister of the Established Church of Scotland. They insist, in the second place, that Mr. Murdoch (with whom the other appellants make common cause) though when he became the minister on the foundation, and for some years afterwards, he had those qualifications, did subsequently, and before the institution of this suit, avow and pursue opinions and a line of conduct disqualifying him as a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, and cease not alone to be a minister of that church, but also to be in communion with her. Each of these propositions is combated by the appellants, who insist that Mr. Murdoch is a proper and fit person to be and continue the minister upon this foundation; that he was so when first elected and placed upon it; and that he has ever since continued to be so. Such is the main or sole issue, or such the main or sole issues, before us for determination; and that determination must depend (for the controversy, if not merely of fact, is more of fact than of law) on the evidence, the admissible evidence, before the Court; especially as it has been stated by the counsel on each side, that they believe the case as it stands to contain all the evidence capable of being usefully brought forward.

Now, though it will, I think, be convenient to deal with the second proposition of the relators and plaintiffs first, it may be as well previously to notice the earliest entry in one of the two only books belonging or relating to this meeting-house which have, so far as I am aware, been produced,—a book, namely, in the nature of a Kirk session record, or Kirk session book. That entry shews the manner in which Mr. Murdoch's election and appointment took place.—[Here his Lordship read a voluminous entry.]—These documents lead, by themselves, perhaps, necessarily to the inference that it was in the character of a person in communion and in connexion with the Established Church of Scotland, in the character of a person qualified by doctrine, opinions and conduct to be one of her ministers, that Mr. Murdoch was elected to be the minister upon this foundation, and that he became so in the character of an actual minister of the Established Church of Scotland. He seems to have continued, outwardly and apparently, at least, and perhaps sincerely, to be in the same communion and connexion, and at peace and in harmony with the Established Church of Scotland, and to all intents one of her recognized ministers, until the schism and disruption to which I must now refer,—stating preliminarily, though perhaps superfluously, that in every instance in which I have mentioned or shall mention the Established Church of Scotland, I mean, of course, that church in a Presbyterian state; and that whenever I shall use the word "Presbyterianism" or the word "Presbyterian," their sense with me is to be taken as Trinitarian, and not Socinian.—[His Lordship here referred to the secession that took place in 1843 from the Established Church of Scotland; the enactment of the General Assembly of that year; the meeting of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church in England, held in this chapel in April 1844, and the overtures there carried unanimously, Mr. Murdoch being present. Then, after reading the overtures at length, or the greater part of them, the learned Judge proceeded to read long extracts from the answers of the appellants, and among them the following as that of Mr. Murdoch.]—"And this defendant, A. Murdoch, for himself says, and the other defendants say, they believe it to be true that this defendant A. Murdoch has expressed his opinion that the expression Protestant Dissenters, used in the deeds relating to the said Low Meeting-house, comprised dissenters and dissenting ministers of every denomination tolerated by law, and that the deeds did not even restrict the trusts expressed in the deeds for the benefit of Presbyterians; and that this defendant, A. Murdoch, also stated, that so far as the expression Protestant Dissenters was concerned, the congregation and their minister might be anything but Episcopalians, who are not Dissenters,—Papists, who are not Protestants,—or Puseyites, who are a composition of both; and that in expressing such opinion this defendant, Alexander Murdoch, stated that he had referred simply to the term Protestant Dissenters used in the deeds."—[The answer then entered elaborately and argumentatively into the question of the jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland, and then proceeded as follows.] "Say that, under the circumstances and for the reasons herein mentioned, this defendant, A. Murdoch, does altogether deny all ecclesiastical obedience to the said Church of Scotland, and that he does insist that the said Presbytery of Berwick and the said Synod are alone his superiors in matters of church discipline, and these defendants make out the same as herein appears."

In the evidence, whether documentary or parol evidence, there is not anything that I have been able to discover leading or tending to a conclusion different, as concerning this part of the case, from that to which, in my opinion, the documents and circumstances that I have stated tend and lead, a conclusion, namely, against the appellants. It must necessarily, I think, on the materials before the Court, be taken that, before and at the time of the institution of this suit, which was commenced in the year 1846, Mr. Murdoch had ceased to be and no longer was a minister of the Established Church of Scotland,—had ceased to be and no longer was qualified to be a minister of that church,— had ceased to be and no longer was in communion with her.

Then comes the proposition of the materiality of that state of things, the proposition affirmed by the relators and plaintiffs, and denied by the appellants, that by ceasing to be a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, by ceasing to be in connexion with that church, by ceasing to be in communion with her, Mr. Murdoch became disqualified and unfit to continue or be the minister upon the foundation in question. This point, depending on the evidence in the suit, considered with due regard to the nature of the pleadings, is certainly, I think, not concluded by the deeds of 1717, 1719, 1734 and 1766, or any one or more of them, or any later deed; for I am clearly of opinion that neither the appellants' contention nor the respondents' contention is inconsistent with the language of any one of those instruments. The litigants on each side say that the congregation in question is a congregation of "Protestant Dissenters," and so has always been; and assert, therefore, that Master John Turner's congregation was a congregation of Protestant Dissenters. The appellants and respondents differ, it may be, as to the meaning of the term. But that difference does not necessarily involve, does not necessarily imply, a contradiction of any one of the deeds on either side. The affirmation or the denial that the minister on this foundation must needs be in connexion or communion with the Established Church of Scotland, or must needs be a minister of that church, may well be maintained by persons submitting to be bound by every word of each of the deeds.—[His Lordship then said it might be right to refer to some portions of the doctrine stated by Lord Eldon in The Attorney General v. Pearson, and then proceeded to read long extracts from the case as reported in the third volume of Mr. Merivale's Reports (2).]—It is to be observed, that (subject possibly to the question, if it is a question, whether

(2) To the reader who may wish to refer to the exact part of Lord Eldon's judgment, it may be useful to say, that the extracts commenced with the words—"But there is another view in which the case should be considered," and ended "and liable to be removed in the same manner as he was called upon to officiate."

Erastianism, or an opinion favourable to Erastianism, or analogous to Erastian views, is an opinion belonging to religious belief or religious doctrine, the dispute before us is not one that concerns religious belief or religious doctrine, or, except as to the qualification of the pastor or minister, the form or manner of conducting divine worship. But it cannot, I think, be considered that the manner of conducting divine worship is not at all touched by the question to what church, in point of discipline, the minister belongs; or the question whether, through his own conduct and proceedings, he has ceased to be a member of that church of which, when chosen, he professed, and must, by the electors, have been thought to be, a member. Nor, if the manner of conducting divine worship is not so touched, does it seem to me that Lord Eldon's doctrine is inapplicable to the mere qualification of the minister in other respects than those points of opinion upon which the plaintiffs and the defendants here are agreed. Now, it appears to me to be a just inference from the pleadings and evidence, and to be a fact established, that the congregation in question was, at the time of its original foundation in the latter half of the 17th century, and has thenceforth to the present day continually been, in theory, opinion, views, and profession, Presbyterian. Indeed, in a very early part of the appellants' first answer, they state their belief "that the doctrines, government and discipline" of this "congregation, from the time of their first assembly down to the time of putting in that answer, have always been such as were held and maintained by the Presbyterian Church in England" in the year 1685, and such as are contained in the standards called in the same answer "The Westminster Standards," and which standards (it states) "are always the standards of the Church of Scotland as formerly and as now established." It appears to me proved also that, during fifty years, at least, next before the election of Mr. Murdoch, and during sixty years, at least, next before the commencement of this suit, the uniform course, usage and practice of the congregation in question, and its trustees—the uniform plan and system upon which the property in question has been administered by the persons claiming for the time being under the conveyance of 1734—were, as concerning the choice, appointment, ordination, and settling of the pastor or minister, in accordance and conformity with the course pursued, as already mentioned, when Mr. Murdoch was elected, appointed, ordained and settled; and therefore support (I do not say conclusively establish) the contention of the relators and plaintiffs in this respect.

It must, upon the evidence, be taken that for full fifty years next before Mr. Murdoch's election, for full sixty years next before the institution of this suit, during which period more than five pastors or ministers have been chosen and appointed, each one of them who preceded Mr. Murdoch was, when chosen, a licentiate of the Established Church of Scotland, or an ordained minister of that church; was, when first settled in the office, an ordained and a recognized minister of that church, and so continued while in connexion with this foundation. Then, with regard to the period, more than fifty years before Mr. Murdoch's election, and more than sixty years before the commencement of this suit, Mr. Ogle (an Englishman, I believe, who held the living of Berwick at the time of the death of Oliver Cromwell, and was, upon or soon after the Restoration, ejected from it) seems to have been the founder and first pastor or minister, or at least the first pastor or minister, of this congregation, which may safely, I think, be taken to have had its origin and commencement between the Restoration and the Revolution. He died in the year 1696, I believe, and seems to have been immediately or otherwise succeeded in the office of its minister by Mr. John Turner, whose name is mentioned in the conveyance of 1766, probably an Englishman also. He died, I think, in 1760, and was succeeded immediately or otherwise by Mr. Gardner, who died, I believe, between 1777 and 1781, and whose immediate successor was Mr. Aitcheson, who was or had been a licentiate certainly of the Established Church of Scotland, and seems to have held the office of pastor or minister on this foundation for a period of fifteen years and upwards, commencing from the year 1781, or earlier. Of these gentlemen there is not, I think, the least reason to believe that any one was an Episcopalian, or not a Protestant Dissenter, or not in theory, not in opinion, not in profession, or not, so far as possible, in practice a Presbyterian.

The question, then, appears to be, whether it was originally, or had, before the election of Mr. Murdoch, become, in an effectual manner, a private law, or governing and binding regulation of this congregation, of this religious institution and foundation, that its minister or pastor at all times should be in communion with the Established Church of Scotland—should be, or have been, a licentiate of the Established Church of Scotland, and should be a minister of that church. I understand, however, the appellants to contend, in effect, not only that there was no such private law, no such governing regulation, but, moreover, that none such could effectually have been made, unless before, or contemporaneously with, the original formation of the congregation in the seventeenth century, or, at least, before or contemporaneously with the acquisition of the meeting-house, or its site, for the purposes of the congregation. To this I do not agree. It appears to me to be competent to a congregation of Dissenters, acting unanimously, and with the concurrence, where they have trustees, of those trustees, to introduce effectually into their system and constitution new regulations from time to time—regulations, at least, not in contravention of any deed of trust or of foundation—not subversive of the original system or constitution—not opposed in principle to it. Whether the unanimous votes of an entire congregation, and their trustees, could be of such force as to convert a Trinitarian into a Socinian foundation, a Protestant into a Popish, a Presbyterian into an Episcopalian, institution, is not a point before us. The congregation and foundation to which this suit relates were originally, are, and have ever been, Presbyterian; nor is anything sought by the information and bill, or done by the decree, not consistent with Presbyterianism, or not within Presbyterian limits. My opinion is, that upon the assumption (for the purpose of the argument) that before the year 1720, or before the year 1767, it was not necessary that the pastor or minister of this congregation should be, or have been, a licentiate of the Established Church of Scotland, should be a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, or should be in a state of communion with that church, it was competent to the entire congregation for the time being, acting unanimously, and with the concurrence of their trustee or trustees, if any, for the time being, to resolve and agree effectually (I am not saying irrevocably), that every future minister or pastor should be a person in communion with the Established Church of Scotland, should be, or have been, a licentiate of the Established Church of Scotland, and should be a minister of that church. Such a resolution, such an agreement, was not, nor would be, to extend or change though it was, or might be, to restrict the class from which the minister or pastor of the congregation was to be chosen. Nor could such a restriction, whether likely or unlikely to be approved by all rational and pious Presbyterians, be in the unquestionable circumstances of the case considered absurd or necessarily mischievous, necessarily inexpedient, or necessarily unprincipled. I think it to be a just and correct inference from the whole of the admissible evidence, that long before the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Murdoch's immediate predecessor upon this foundation, Mr. Crambe, because before Mr. Crambe's appointment or election, it was determined by the congregation—the whole of the congregation for the time being—approved by the trustee or trustees of the property for the time being, and agreed effectually so as to bind the property (I do not say irrevocably), that the minister for the time being on the foundation should always be, or have been, a licentiate of the Established Church of Scotland, should always be an ordained minister of the Established Church of Scotland, and should, therefore, necessarily be a person in full communion with that church. I use the term "ordained minister," not as meaning of necessity a person having previously had a parish, or, if the phrase may be allowed, a cure of any kind, or any charge or office. The effect which, whether by way of evidence or presumption, or otherwise, a continued and unbroken usage during a considerable number of consecutive years has in this country on rights of property, or questions concerning property in various instances is well known, and the present is a controversy about property. Whether it is affected by the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27, or by the principles on which the case of Lord Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton (3), (as decided by Sir Thomas Plumer and the House of Lords), or Stocker v. Berny (4), The Mayor of Hull v. Horner (5), Beckford v. Wade (6), Gibson v. Clark (7), Chalmer v. Bradley (8), Doe d. Harding v. Cooke (9), Doe d. Draper v. Lawley (10), and Doe d. Davidson v. Barnard (11), or any other case belonging to either of the same classes was decided, I do not express an opinion further than I have done, nor is it necessary that I should. But, certainly, I view the observations of Lord Eldon, in The Attorney General v. Pearson, as not without bearing on the present cause. That the appellants are defendants, is not, I think, a circumstance either in their favour or against them, with respect to the manner in which the dispute between them and the respondents ought to be dealt with. All the parties to the cause seem to be alike de facto in possession of the subject in controversy. I do not except even the Attorney General, considering the interest of which he stands as the representative of the suit. The appellants say that Mr. Murdoch is entitled to continue to officiate in the meeting-house as the minister of its congregation. But if he is so, that right, that title, is probably one capable of assertion effectually in a court of equity only, if anywhere. Supposing that to be so, I apprehend that the rules applicable to the case of a man who, if he has a title, has one capable of effectual assertion at law, do not necessarily apply to Mr. Murdoch's case. It has been suggested that the proximity of Berwick to Scotland, and the legal state and social condition in which as to religion, during the latter half of the seventeenth century and the whole of the eighteenth, Scotland and England respectively from time to time were, ought to be considered sufficient to account for the constant practice, during the sixty years next preceding the suit, of having as ministers or pastors upon this foundation such persons as during that period were so, on the appellants' theory, as distinguished from that of the relators' and plaintiffs'. To this view or argument, however, I find myself unable to accede, considering especially the support which the same facts may be reasonably argued to afford to the case of the relators and plaintiffs. It may be true, that if we suppose a case of an office requiring to be filled by a man of learning, which during sixty consecutive years and more has been uniformly filled by a graduate, for example, of the University of Oxford, it might be unsafe, therefore, to hold that only a graduate of Oxford could be appointed, and other such examples or cases might easily be suggested. But the circumstances of the particular occasion or instance must always be attended to. Long practice or usage as to one subject may be of more or less force than long practice or usage as to another. The person having judicially to decide on the fact, on the weight of circumstantial evidence, on the inference to be drawn from a series of events, must form the best estimate judicially that he can of the mass of materials before him, and all its particulars, and come to a conclusion accordingly. On the whole, the pleadings and evidence now before this Court leave me in no state of uncertainty what are the trusts to which the property in dispute is subject, so far at least as the disqualification of Mr. Murdoch is concerned,—leave me in no state of doubt whether a breach of trust has been committed by the appellants.

Upon this my deliberate view of the pleadings, this my deliberate estimate of the evidence, I am bound to act; and it not being possible, I think, to deal with the cause otherwise than in one of these five ways: namely, to declare the office of minister or pastor vacant, and do substantially no more; or to direct an inquiry as to the true nature of the trusts to which the property is subject; or to direct a scheme for its management and administration; or, fourthly, to dismiss the information and bill; or, fifthly, to affirm the Vice Chancellor's decree, or make one not importantly different from it,—I must conclude this: as to the first, it would probably leave the litigants in scarcely a better state on either side than when the dispute began, and would be, I conceive, to do justice defectively; as to the second, considering the small amount of property in dispute, considering the exertions already made to procure evidence, considering the quantity of testimony, oral and documentary, now before us, and considering the heat, eagerness, and animosity generally produced by conflicting endeavours at a perfect state of Christian discipline (a condition from which the present controversy seems to form no exception), I am of opinion that the due administration of justice does not require that any further investigation should take place. Thirdly, upon the same grounds, I am of opinion that a scheme should not be directed. In the fourth place, I am not of opinion that the information or bill can with propriety be dismissed wholly or partially.

There remains, then, but the course of affirming the Vice Chancellor's decree, or varying it only in a manner not important. I think it better and right to affirm it wholly, for I do not accede to the observations so ably made by the appellants' counsel upon the subject of costs, whether as to the Dumfries question or otherwise. With regard, however, to the form and language of the decree, it contains some expressions which, if it had been my province originally to make it, I should, perhaps, not have used without some change or qualification or explanation. I refer to the phrase "The model of the Established Church of Scotland," and the phrase "licentiate and recognized minister of the Established Church of Scotland, and in full connexion with that church." Still, I am not sufficiently persuaded that either phrase is inaccurate, or needs either any qualification not contained in the decree, or any explanation not afforded by the decree, to render it incumbent on me or proper for me, as I think, to say that the decree in either of these respects ought to be varied, considering the decree, as I do, to be certainly correct in all others. I should add that, with regard to the two phrases which I have just been quoting, I read and understand the former as meaning "The model of the Established Church of Scotland, so far as possible consistently with the fact of Berwick-upon Tweed being in England;" and the latter thus: a person may, I think, be a licentiate of the Church of Scotland within the meaning of the decree, although having ceased to be a licentiate of that church in the sense and by reason merely of having become one of her regularly ordained ministers. I conceive that the word "recognized" as used in the decree, means "ordained," that is to say, "regularly ordained." And when I say "regularly ordained," I mean, of course, "duly ordained" according to the rules and course of the Established Church of Scotland. I think, moreover, that the phrase imports that the character or authority conferred by the ordination must not have been taken away, or ceased to exist. I am of opinion that a man may be a "recognized minister of the Established Church of Scotland," within the meaning of the decree, whether duly ordained according to the rules and course of that church before and independently of his appointment or election to the foundation in question, or so ordained only upon the occasion of, and with reference to, that appointment or election. And I read and understand, lastly, the word "connexion" as used in the decree to mean neither more nor less than "communion."

The petition of appeal will, therefore, under the statute constituting our office, stand dismissed. The costs of the appeal, however, will depend on my learned Brother's view of the matter; for, though I am disposed to give them against the appellants, I apprehend that unless he shall concur in doing so they cannot be given. I have not hitherto mentioned a statute to which reference was made during the argument, the act of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, for my opinion upon this appeal has not been guided or affected by it. I may say, however, that the case of the appellants is clearly, in my judgment, not assisted by that statute; but is, perhaps, one against which the statute opposes an insuperable bar.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The principal question in this case is one of fact rather than of law. What were the purposes for which the founders of the Low

Meeting-house, in 1719, subscribed their money? For, as the rights of the parties are not, so far as I can discover, touched by the statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, the meeting-house must, according to my view of this case, continue to be used for the same purposes at the present day. Where the trusts on which a chapel has been founded have, at or about the time of the foundation, been declared in writing, there is not, in general, much difficulty in carrying them into execution. But where no such writing exists, where the Court is left to find out, from mere subsequent usage, what were the original purposes of the foundation, what was the doctrine which the founders considered essential to be preached, what the discipline which they considered essential to be followed, the task often becomes one of great difficulty. There will, indeed, in general be some prominent and leading points as to which no doubt will exist. If, for instance, in a particular chapel the doctrine preached has, as far back as living memory can go, been uniformly consistent with what has been called orthodox dissent, that is to say, has been based on the doctrine, amongst others, of the Trinity, there can be no difficulty in coming now to the conclusion, as a matter of fact, that the maintenance of that doctrine formed an essential part of the objects for which the chapel was founded,—that to preach Socinianism, or modern Unitarianism, would be in contravention of those objects, and so a use of the chapel which this Court would not permit. This would, I think, be a legitimate and reasonable inference, independently of the consideration that the Toleration Act did not extend to those who denied the doctrine of the Trinity. The ground on which such an inference rests would be just as applicable to a chapel which (there being no declaration of trust), having been always, so far back as evidence could go, used by a congregation of Baptists, should now fall into the hands of those who should preach and maintain the lawfulness and expediency of infant baptism. In all such cases the first inference is, that the same doctrines which, ex hypothesi, have been maintained in the chapel as far back as evidence can go had been always those maintained from the time of the foundation:—and, secondly, considering the vast importance which the founders must have attached to those doctrines, that the preaching of them must have been the objects, or one of the objects, for which the chapel was intended. No difficulty exists so long as we have to deal with these great primary objects of such a foundation. But it is obvious that the same reasoning will not apply where we have to draw inferences on minor matters. To put, for instance, an extreme case the other way. Suppose the hours of divine service at any particular chapel had always been at ten o'clock in the forenoon and two o'clock in the afternoon; but that a majority of the congregation should now desire to have this altered, and that the service should now be an hour later than heretofore. It would surely be a very strained inference to draw from the fact of the service having been always performed at a particular hour that this was one of the original purposes of the foundation, and so that it would be a breach of trust to permit the chapel to be used at a different hour. In such a case there would be no difficulty in saying that the circumstance of the service having always been performed at a particular hour was a mere accident, not in the contemplation of the founders; and so that it would be no breach of trust to permit the hours of divine service to be altered. I have thus pointed out two extreme cases: in the first, inference from usage would, from the important nature of its subject-matter, be irresistible, that what had been uniformly done constituted an essential part of the original purposes of the foundation. In the other, the unimportant nature of the usage would prevent any such inference from arising. In such extreme cases there is little or no difficulty. But there are many intermediate cases, in which the application of the principles resulting from usage is by no means easy; cases in which it is hard to say, whether what has been uniformly done has been so done because it constituted part of the original objects of the founders, or merely because it has been thought, from time to time, the most convenient mode of carrying those objects into effect.

I confess that some grave difficulties of this nature have presented themselves to my mind in considering what ought to be taken as the purposes for which this chapel was founded, and consequently as to what are the trusts on which the building is now held by the trustees. The nature of these difficulties I shall best explain by considering the precise terms of the material parts of the decree which was made in the Court below. The decree begins by declaring that the property comprised in the indenture of the 22nd of May 1719, and the chapel at Berwick-upon-Tweed, called the Low Meeting-house, erected on part thereof, in the pleadings mentioned, are subject to the trusts, as to such meeting-house, for the appropriation of the same, as a church or place of public religious worship, on the model of the Established Church of Scotland; and as to the residue of the said property, for the benefit of the congregation of the said meeting-house.

Now, to this part of the decree I entirely accede, understanding as I do the words, "on the model of the Established Church of Scotland," to mean only in the same mode in which worship is conducted by that church. It was, indeed, argued, on the part of the defendants, that there was nothing to shew any original intention of confining the use of the chapel to any particular class of Dissenters. Several books were referred to, written by eminent dissenting divines, for the purpose of shewing that, however strong the differences might at a previous time have been among the numerous bodies of Protestant Dissenters, yet the effect of common suffering and persecution, previously to the foundation of this chapel in 1719, had been to smooth down all those asperities and to induce the several sects to look at one another rather as members of one vast united body of Protestant Dissenters, than as distinct bodies of different denominations; and so to lead them to disregard the varieties of doctrine separating them among themselves. And from these considerations it was argued, that the fair presumption of fact ought to be, that the chapel was originally built, not for any one particular class, as, for instance, Presbyterians, but for Protestant Dissenters generally; and it was said, that this view of the case is confirmed by the circumstance that, in the conveyance to new trustees by the deed of 1734, the property conveyed is described as a burgh and garden, on part whereof had lately been erected a house, then used as a meeting-house for a congregation of Protestant Dissenters, not designating Dissenters of any particular denomination, but speaking generally of Protestant Dissenters. But I cannot say I feel at all affected by this argument. The property was aptly and sufficiently described, in the deeds of 1734, as a house then used as a meeting-house for a congregation of Protestant Dissenters. The only reason for describing it at all was to identify the property intended to be conveyed. For that purpose the description adopted was quite sufficient, and it was neither necessary nor probable that such a deed should contain any statement as to the nature of the doctrine preached or the discipline followed within the walls of the building conveyed. And, with respect to the suggestion, that at the time of the foundation of the chapel, Protestant Dissenters were generally inclined to overlook the differences among themselves, and to consider it a sufficient bond of union that they were opposed to the Established Church, I adopt the view taken by Vice Chancellor Wigram. However those principles might have prevailed in the case of a mere charitable gift, in a trust, for instance, to distribute money among indigent dissenting ministers or indigent dissenting poor, it never could have prevailed in the case of persons founding a chapel. In such a case the inference is almost irresistible, that the founders must have contemplated the erection of a building, in which they would intend that principles of religious belief should be expounded and religious practice be enforced in the mode considered by them most consistent with true and genuine Christianity, and to which they had themselves been accustomed.

I consider it, therefore, perfectly clear that the object of the foundation was the erection of a building in which religious services should be conducted according to some definite form of worship. The question, then, is, according to what form? This also appears to me to be free from all doubt,—according to the Presbyterian form. All the evidence shews that this has been the mode in which the worship has been conducted as far back as there are any means of inquiry; and I am perfectly satisfied that this has been the case from the very date of the foundation, and long before that date by the congregation by whom the chapel was built. I entertain no doubt but that the worship has been always conducted in conformity with "The directory for the public worship of God," by which the mode of worship in the Church of Scotland now is, and ever since the year 1690 has been, regulated. I am satisfied further, that the conducting of the services according to that mode must have been the main, if not the only, object of the founders. On such a point I cannot suppose them to have been indifferent; and therefore I think the declaration in the decree, to which I have already referred, and which appropriates the chapel in question as a church or place of religious worship on the model of the Established Church of Scotland is perfectly right, assuming that these latter words mean no more than according to the directory for public worship used in the Established Church of Scotland.

But the decree, after this, goes on to declare that no minister or other person is qualified for, or is competent to exercise the office of, minister or pastor of the Low Meeting-house without being a licentiate and recognized minister of the Established Church of Scotland and in full connexion therewith. To this declaration I confess I cannot accede. I do not think that the evidence justifies it. It imposes, as I think, a restriction on the future choice of ministers, for which I can discover no warrant. In the first place, I must remark, with reference to the particular language used in this part of this decree, that I do not clearly understand its precise import. It requires every minister of the Low Meeting-house to be not only a licentiate but also a "recognized" minister of the Church of Scotland. I nowhere find any explanation of what is meant by a "recognized" minister of the Church of Scotland. But as no one can be a minister of the Church of Scotland who has not been ordained by that church, I presume that a recognized minister must mean one who has been ordained by that body, and who still continues to sustain the character of minister derived from such ordination. Whether, however, I rightly interpret these words is not material; for, as I do not think it is made out that the minister of the chapel must, of necessity, be a licentiate of the Scotch Church, I certainly do not and cannot think he must be a licentiate and recognized minister of it, whatever be the correct meaning of those latter words. In order to sustain this part of the decree, the relators must, according to the view I take of this case, make out, first, that, in fact, all the ministers of the Low Meeting-house have, since its foundation, been licentiates and recognized ministers of the Church of Scotland (making due allowance for any occasional deviations from this general practice which can fairly be attributed to accident or oversight); and, secondly, if the fact is made out, then that the reasonable inference is, that this connexion with the Church of Scotland was one of the objects of the founders, to permit a departure from which would be a breach of trust.

Now, as to the fact, it appears that Mr. Smith, who became minister of the Low Meeting-house in 1797, and the six ministers who have, from time to time, succeeded him, were all ordained to this particular congregation by some Scotch Presbytery. Most of them, perhaps all, had previously been licentiates of the Scotch Church, though, as to some of them, that is by no means clear. James Aitchison, who was the immediate predecessor of Smith, and who became minister in or about 1780, and was removed for misconduct in 1797, was certainly a Scotch licentiate, having been licensed by the Presbytery of Selkirk in 1775; but I do not find any evidence to shew that he was ordained to the Low Meeting-house by any Scotch Presbytery. With respect to the three ministers who preceded Aitchison, namely, Turner, who was minister at the date of the foundation in 1719, Campbell, who succeeded him, and Gardner, who succeeded Campbell, and was the immediate predecessor of Aitchison, the evidence clearly shews Campbell to have been a Scotch licentiate; but I cannot say that it at all satisfies me as to either Turner or Gardner. I am not satisfied, as a matter of fact, that either of those persons were connected with the Scotch Church, either as licentiates or ordained ministers. But let it be assumed, for the purpose of argument, that they were; then arises the question, whether the connexion of all the ministers with the Scotch Church is to be deemed an essential part of the objects originally contemplated by the founders, or is it to be attributed to accident or some other cause?

I think that, even if all the ministers be shewn to have been licensed by the Church of Scotland, still it will not be reasonable to infer that it was in the contemplation of the founders that this connexion must always, and under all circumstances, so continue. I come to this conclusion from considering the history of Presbyterianism, as connected both with England and Scotland, and the condition in which the founders of the meeting-house and those who have since, from time to time, formed its congregation, have stood with reference to their religious wants. When I speak of the history of Presbyterianism I will, as far as possible, confine myself to that which may be collected without liability to error, from the law, or what for a time had the force of law, in this country, and from the laws of Scotland. It appears from Scobell's Collection of Acts and Ordinances, passed from the commencement of the Civil War up nearly to the death of Cromwell, that on the 12th of June 1643 the Lords and Commons, then in fact exercising the functions of government independently of and in hostility to King Charles the First, passed an ordinance, convening an assembly of divines, to meet at Westminster, in order to take into consideration the liturgy, government and discipline of the church, with a view to its amendment. That assembly accordingly met, and we know, not merely as matter of history but also from acts of the General Assembly of Scotland, that Commissioners from that country attended and formed part of the body of divines which so met at Westminster. One of the results of their deliberations was the forming of a new directory for public worship, to supersede the Book of Common Prayer then used in England; and by an ordinance of the Lords and Commons, passed in January 1644, o.s., it was ordained that the new directory should be henceforth used throughout England and Wales, instead of the Book of Common Prayer; and this was again enforced by another ordinance, made on the 23rd of May then next. In the following month of February, i. e. February 1645, o.s., the same directory was adopted by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland and by the Parliament of Scotland, the acts of both these bodies expressly noticing that it had been then already adopted by both Houses of Parliament in England. The same form of worship was thus introduced into both kingdoms, first into England and afterwards into Scotland. The Assembly of Divines at Westminster also framed a system of church government, by means of assemblies, congregational, classical, and synodical, which the General Assembly of Scotland adopted a few days after they had accepted the new directory for public worship, namely, on the 10th of February 1645, o.s., and both the directory and the form of church government, so accepted, have ever since their adoption (except for about twenty-five or thirty years, during which Episcopacy prevailed) continued to be and still are, the authorities regulating the mode of worship and the government of the church in Scotland. Probably it was found that the regulations as to church government, which were sufficient for Scotland, where Presbyterianism had previously been known, were not adapted to England, where it was all new; and accordingly we find that the document thus adopted in Scotland as to the form of church government was not introduced in this country. But on the 26th of August 1648, an ordinance was passed by the Lords and Commons, entitled, "The Form of Church Government to be used in the Churches of England and Ireland." By its terms provision was made for electing elders in every parish or congregation, and for dividing the whole kingdom into presbyteries, and for the general church government of the whole kingdom by assemblies, congregational, classical, provincial, and national, as in Scotland; and also for directing the steps to be followed in the ordination of ministers; on which latter head also there is an entire substantial conformity with the course directed in the form of church government, which, as I have already stated, had been adopted by the Scotch General Assembly. The effect of these enactments and of several others of minor importance was, to establish one uniform system of Presbyterian church government in the two kingdoms. In this state matters stood at the Restoration, at which time, or soon afterwards, all which had thus been done by the ordinances of the Lords and Commons in England and by the Parliament and General Assembly of Scotland was swept away, and Episcopacy was re-established in both kingdoms. In England, by the Act of Uniformity, 13 & 14 Car. 2. c. 4, all ministers were required, before St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662, to assent and conform to the Book of Common Prayer, as then amended, under pain of forfeiting any benefice they might hold. The consequence of this, as might naturally have been anticipated, was, that a large body of the clergy were ejected from their livings, which they had accepted while Presbyterianism was in the ascendant; and they, with such of their flocks as entered into their views of church government and discipline and doctrine, formed a body of Nonconformist Presbyterian Dissenters, scattered throughout the country, against whom many harsh laws were, from time to time, enacted, though apparently without the result of effectually putting them down. This state of things continued until the Revolution of 1688, when entire practical toleration was conceded to all orthodox Protestant Dissenters in England; and in 1690 Presbyterianism, as it existed before the Restoration, was re-established in Scotland. Of course, the dissenting congregations, which had continued to exist in England under all the difficulties imposed by the laws of Charles the Second, assumed fresh vigour under the new state of things which was consequent on the passing of the Toleration Act. They existed from that time openly and without disguise, under the protection of the law. One of those congregations was the congregation at Berwick, afterwards known as that of Master John Turner, during whose ministry, and for the benefit of whose flock, the Low Meeting-house was founded in 1719. I have already stated my reasons for thinking that this must have been a congregation of Presbyterian Dissenters, i.e., a congregation holding what are called the Westminster standards of faith, as laid down by the Assembly of Divines, whose public worship was conducted according to the directory of public worship adopted in England by the ordinances of January 1644, o.s., and who approved the Presbyterian form of church government, introduced into Scotland by the Act of Assembly of February 1645, o.s., and enacted in England by the ordinance of August 1648.

The history of the congregation, as it has been stated by the relators and plaintiffs, and which on the evidence may fairly be assumed to be correct, is this:—The information charges, in substance, that Luke Ogle was the minister of Berwick before the Restoration and while Presbyterianism prevailed in England. That he was ejected from that benefice in 1662 by the operation of the Act of Uniformity. That in the year 1685, at a time when, in spite of the then existing law against Nonconformists, the government was inclined to deal leniently with them, he established the congregation in question at Berwick, and continued to act as its minister up to his death in 1696. That he was succeeded by William Foster, the immediate predecessor of Turner. That Foster died in 1713, at or about which time, therefore, Turner must have become minister of the congregation by and for whom the chapel was erected six years afterwards. This being the state of the congregation when the meeting-house was built, the question is, whether it was part of the original intention of the founders that the minister should always be a licentiate of the Church of Scotland. In resolving this problem, the first question which suggests itself is this: why should they have had any such intention? Why should this English congregation have intended voluntarily to prevent those who should come after them from selecting as their pastor a minister, however competent and however pious, and who had been regularly ordained by an English Presbytery, merely because he was not a licentiate of the Scotch Church? Looking at the matter merely in the abstract, I can see no motive for such an intention. That ministers continued to be ordained in England by English Presbyteries is plain from the entry in the books of the Presbytery of Dunse, on occasion of the admission of Laurie as minister of Hutton, of the date of the 19th of December 1693. It is there stated that the said Mr. Laurie had produced an ample testimonial of his ordination at London, A.D. 1686, and of his good behaviour, and subscribed by several London ministers of good note. If, even under the pressure of the severe laws against Nonconformists as they stood in 1686 (though probably not at that particular epoch likely to be enforced), such ordinations took place in England, there can surely be no difficulty in supposing that the same practice continued in 1719, when the Act of Toleration had been in force for thirty years. Presbyterianism had once been established and once abolished in both countries. It had since been restored in Scotland, and tolerated, but not restored in England. Very likely, this Berwick congregation, looking to their close proximity to Scotland and to the fact that Presbyterianism had there become the national religion, and so that a supply of ministers would be more readily obtained from thence than from England, might contemplate the great probability that their ministers would often be drawn from Scotland. But that does not afford any reason why they should wish voluntarily to tie up their own hands and the hands of those who should come after them by making a Scotch licence and ordination indispensable, even if a minister, perfectly satisfactory in all respects, might be ordained from their own country. The circumstance that the English Presbyterians continued to adhere to their old faith, though not participating in the secular benefits of an establishment, would be likely to induce the belief that they would be more zealous and orthodox than their Scotch brethren, not that they would be less so. There either then was, or thereafter might be, an English Presbytery which would include Berwick in its bounds; and, if so, that Presbytery would be the only perfectly regular authority for ordaining a minister to the Low Meeting-house. For, according to the form of church government prevailing both in England and Scotland under the several acts and ordinances to which I have referred, it is clearly laid down that the Presbytery in which each congregation is situate is the proper body to ordain the minister to that congregation, though, no doubt, where there is a necessity, power is given to any other presbytery to ordain. So that, if and so soon as Berwick should be included in any English Presbytery, the only regular body to ordain their minister would be that presbytery; and in such a state of things, even though no such presbytery might exist in 1719, when the Low Meeting-house was built, it seems to me very improbable, reasoning à priori and without reference to the circumstances of that particular congregation, that the founder could have intended that, under all circumstances, a Scotch licence and ordination should be essential; that if a minister, pious, orthodox, and agreeable to the congregation, should offer himself, they should be bound to reject him if he had been licensed by an English Presbytery, by that of London, for instance, and not in Scotland; and that they should be bound, if a class should ever exist including Berwick in its bounds, to seek ordination, not from the body indicated by the form of church government as being the most proper authority, but from another source.

I am therefore of opinion, looking at the question merely in the abstract, and without reference to the circumstances of this particular congregation, that it was very unlikely that a congregation of Presbyterian Dissenters in England, founding a meeting-house in 1719, when possibly there were some who might recollect the Presbyterian form of worship as having been the established religion of their own country, and when the traditions as to the ascendancy of that mode of worship in this country must have been strong in the minds of all, should intend to make it an essential point that their minister should, under all circumstances, be a minister ordained by the Church of Scotland. And if this be a reasonable conclusion, looking at the question merely in the abstract, I think it derives great additional weight when we look to the particular circumstances under which the congregation of Master John Turner existed. They had been originally founded by Luke Ogle, who had certainly been ordained in England, for he had held what we should call the living or benefice of Berwick previously to the Restoration, and was ejected in 1662 on the re-establishment of Episcopacy and the re-introduction of the Book of Common Prayer. Surely, when he, as stated in the information, came to Berwick and formed this Presbyterian congregation in 1685, consisting, as it no doubt did, of many of those, and the families of many of those, over whom he had, twenty-three years previously, presided as their regularly English ordained minister, he must have been welcomed by his flock, not from any connexion between him and the Scotch Church, if indeed any such connexion ever existed, but by reason of his having formerly been their English Presbyterian pastor. Indeed, at that time (1685), as was pointed out in the argument, Episcopacy prevailed in Scotland as well as in England, so that there was then no more reason to look for orthodox ministers on one side of the border than on the other.

It seems that during some part of Luke Ogle's ministry, he had as a colleague or assistant Gilbert Laurie, who, in 1693, was then ordained to a Scotch church, but he had, as I have already remarked, been previously ordained in London, and I see nothing to satisfy me that, while he was Luke Ogle's colleague, he was anything but an English ordained minister.

The congregation thus appears, in its origin, to have been English and not Scotch, with reference to its Presbyterianism; and this must probably have so continued, at all events to the death of Luke Ogle in 1696; and it is a very improbable thing that between that date and the foundation of the chapel in 1719, the views and feelings of the congregation should have been so completely altered as that the same ordination which had no doubt recommended Luke Ogle to them, should never thenceforth be admitted as sufficient. I think, therefore, that the history of this congregation makes it particularly unlikely that the founders of the chapel could ever have contemplated what this decree declares to be essential, namely, that the minister of the chapel must be a licentiate and minister of the Church of Scotland.

Is there, then, anything in the subsequent history of the foundation, which ought reasonably to lead to the inference upon which this declaration in the decree is grounded? The circumstance relied on is one always entitled to great weight, namely, long continued usage, i. e. the fact that all the ministers, since 1719, have been Scotch licentiates and ministers. I have already stated that in my opinion it is made out that since the year 1780, or thereabouts, all the ministers of the meeting-house have been either Scotch licentiates or ministers ordained by a Scotch Presbytery, and I shall assume for the present that this has been so for the whole period. But what then? The question still arises, to which I have already adverted, how and why has it happened that this uniform selection of Scotch licentiates and ministers has prevailed? Is this a matter in which we can reasonably infer from the usage, that what has been so uniformly done was part of the trust, as we certainly may reasonably infer that the celebration of divine service according to the Presbyterian model was part of such trust? Where a course of practice has long prevailed on any particular subject, the inference that it has been a just and legal course, is consistent with law and reason, and, therefore, if any one were now to attempt to call in question the right of a Scotch ordained minister to be minister of the Low Meeting-house, on the ground that the original foundation was for English ordained ministers only, the fact that Scotch ministers had always been appointed would be most important, probably conclusive on the subject. The extreme improbability that for above a century such a practice, if illegal or contrary to the trust, should have been allowed to exist, would well nigh countervail any evidence which could be brought to shew that it was contrary to the original intention of the founders.

But that is not here the point in dispute: no one questions the right of a Scotch ordained minister to become the minister of this chapel, if he be duly chosen. The question is not whether he may, but whether he must, be a Scotch licentiate or minister; and on this latter question the usage, though certainly not to be disregarded, as affording no evidence on the point, is yet to be compared with the other circumstances, and to be weighed against them. The usage may have prevailed, because it was the only usage consistent with the trust; it may have prevailed because it was the most convenient usage. And I think the latter is the most reasonable inference from the facts of the case. For I assume, first, that there was an improbability, a priori, that any body of English Presbyterian Dissenters building in 1719 a meeting-house for Presbyterian worship, for their own convenience and edification, should intend to bind themselves, and all those who came after them, never to admit, as their minister, any one not licensed or ordained by a Scotch Presbytery; and, secondly, that this improbability was increased in the case of Master John Turner's congregation by reason of its having evidently originated and existed for ten or eleven years under a minister whose title to its favour and respect must have been his original English ordination, and not any connexion with Scotland. This being so, is it so very improbable that the uniform selection of Scotch ordained ministers should have resulted from anything short of absolute binding necessity arising from the nature of the trust, so as to outweigh the à priori improbability that the founders intended to impose on their successors such a necessity? I think not. Though, as appears from the evidence in the cause, there has never been a cessation in England of the practice of ordaining ministers according to the Presbyterian form of ordination, yet the number of ministers so ordained has not, I believe, been very large.

The progress of dissent in this country has gradually tended rather away from Presbyterianism and towards Independency. So that those who for the last half century and upwards wanted to obtain a regular orthodox Presbyterian minister to take charge of a true Presbyterian congregation, might not always have found it easy to get such a pastor from those ordained in England. Nothing, therefore, could be more natural than that a congregation so circumstanced should look to Scotland, where they were always likely to find a full supply of ministers. This would, to some extent, be true to whatever part of the kingdom the congregation might belong; but the observation applies with greatly increased force to a congregation in Berwick, a town originally Scotch, bordering closely on Scotland, and where the intercourse with Scotland must be as constant and uniform as with England. That a congregation thus situate should look to Scotland for its ministers, was so natural, that the mere fact of its having always done so has very little weight with me as tending to shew that in so doing it was acting in obedience to a positive trust, which left no discretion on the subject. In making these observations I have assumed that all the ministers have been licensed or ordained by the Church of Scotland; but, as I originally intimated, as to the earlier ministers I am not at all satisfied that such was the case. * * *

I am, therefore, of opinion that neither as to Turner, nor those who preceded him, nor as to Gardner, is there any evidence satisfactorily shewing that they were Scotch licentiates or ministers. The point is not, perhaps, very material as to those who preceded Turner, but as to him it is most important; for if he was not a licentiate and recognized minister of the Church of Scotland, it is very difficult indeed to suppose that those who built the chapel during his ministry, and for him, could have intended to impose such a qualification on all future ministers. It may, however, be said that as there is not any proof that Turner was not a Scotch licentiate and minister, it may fairly be assumed that he was so, by reasoning backwards from more modern times, that for more than half a century all the ministers have been Scotch licentiates; therefore, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it is fair to infer that all have been so ever since the foundation. This may be, in some cases, a legitimate mode of reasoning; but it is entitled to little weight when the more modern usage can be explained on grounds inapplicable to the earlier period. Now, here I have already stated that in my opinion the near neighbourhood of Berwick to Scotland, and the constant friendly intercourse between them, together with the probable difficulties which the congregation of the Low Meeting-house might experience in obtaining proper ministers from England, may well explain the reason why in fact they have always been obtained, for a long time back, from Scotland. But the matter does not rest on any general reasoning of this kind. There are circumstances in evidence which seem to me strongly to illustrate the view which I take of this part of the case, and to shew that the choice of Scotch ministers for the last half-century has arisen from other causes than the positive obligation of the trust. I allude to what took place on occasion of the removal of Mr. Aitcheson in 1797, and to the resolutions of the elders and trustees of the meeting-house in 1809 and afterwards. Mr. Aitcheson was certainly a licentiate of the Scotch Church. By what body he was ordained to the ministry of the Low Meeting-house does not appear by any direct proof, but the great probability is that he was ordained by the Northumberland class, i. e. by an English and not by a Scotch presbytery.

Probably in 1809, and at the subsequent elections, those who took an interest in the affairs of this congregation had discovered that the only effectual mode of securing to themselves the benefit of strict orthodox Presbyterian worship was to put themselves (so to say) under the Church of Scotland. This they did by express resolutions on three several occasions. But the question is not, what would now be the best means of securing a succession of strict Presbyterian ministers, but what were the conditions and restrictions contemplated by the founders? Perhaps, if they could in 1717 have foreseen what would happen a hundred or a hundred and twenty years later, they might have framed a trust conformable to the declaration in this decree. Perhaps they might not. But this is mere matter of speculation, in which we have no right to indulge. The question is, not what declaration of trust might have been expedient, but what trust can be inferred as having actually been in the contemplation of the founders? I do not think that any such restriction confining the ministers of the Low Meeting-house to licentiates of the Church of Scotland, as is required by this decree, can be so inferred.

In the foregoing observations, I have proceeded on the principle, that unless the restriction contended for was in the contemplation of the original founders, it could not have been, or at all events, in the present case, was not created subsequently. But I am aware it was argued at the bar, that, even if it was not part of the original trust to require that the minister should be a licentiate and recognized minister of the Church of Scotland, still such a qualification might at some subsequent time, by resolution of the congregation, have been made essential so as to bind succeeding congregations. And here, it was said, the facts of the case shew, that, if such a qualification was not among those required by the original terms of the foundation, then it must have been in some such mode subsequently established. On this head of argument it is sufficient to say, that the circumstances to which I have already fully adverted relating to the appointment of the several successive ministers, appear to me to negative the proposition that any such resolution ever was come to. I do not think that any minister, previously to 1797, is shewn to have been an ordained minister of the Scotch Church at all. The reasons which led to the ordination of Mr. Smith, in 1797, by a Scotch and not by an English Presbytery, were of a local and temporary character. There could not, as I think, have then been any general resolution intending to bind all future elections. Certainly no such resolution was passed in or since the year 1809; for from that date the minutes of all the proceedings of the Low Meeting-house are in existence, and no such resolution is found upon them. The resolutions passed in 1809, and at the two succeeding elections, seem to me inconsistent with the existence of any previous general resolution requiring, in all cases, a Scotch licentiate and ordination. For, if such general resolution existed, what could have been the use of the resolutions passed previously to the elections in 1809, 1821 and 1823, specially requiring those qualifications on those particular occasions? The facts do not, as I think, exist on which this branch of the relators' argument must rest, and therefore the question does not arise whether any such resolution could, consistently with the doctrines of this Court, bind future congregations so as to warrant this declaration in the decree, under which no one can be a minister who is not a licentiate and recognized minister of the Scotch Church.

For the reasons, therefore, which I have endeavoured to explain in detail, I am of opinion that the decree, so far as it declares that no person is qualified to be a minister or pastor of the Low Meeting-house without being a licentiate and recognized minister of the Established Church of Scotland, and in full connexion therewith, is erroneous, not being warranted by the evidence. I think it is sufficient that he is a Presbyterian minister, regularly ordained to the congregation according to the Presbyterian mode of ordination as practised in England, Scotland and Ireland.

I will now advert to the recent statute of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, because an argument was attempted to be built on it. But I think it wholly inapplicable to the present case. As at present advised, I incline to think it does not apply to a case where the question is, whether a minister has or has not been duly ordained according to the original trust; but, even if such a question would be within the power of the enactment, still the statute can have no operation here. The effect of it in this particular case can only be to make the Scotch ordination valid and sufficient, and of the validity of such ordination there can be no doubt. The statute leaves untouched the question whether such ordination is or is not essential.

I have thus gone fully into this part of the decree, because I think it is calculated unduly to fetter the choice of the congregation in their appointment of minister. But it now becomes my duty to state (and that I shall do very shortly) that, so far as the case of the defendant Murdoch is concerned, I am clearly of opinion that the decree is right in declaring that he had ceased to be qualified to exercise the office of minister of the Low Meeting-house, and so in giving the necessary directions for preventing him from using, and the trustees from permitting him to use, the chapel. The grounds on which I come to this conclusion are very short and simple. Mr. Murdoch's ordination was in fact a Scotch ordination. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Kelso. That ordination was certainly sufficient to qualify him to hold the office of minister of the Low Meeting-house. But it was necessary not only that he should be in the first instance duly ordained to the chapel, but, further, that such ordination should remain in force so long as he should continue in the post of minister. It is an essential part of the Presbyterian system that none but a regularly ordained minister or licentiate should preach or perform divine service. This is the rule, laid down in the acts regulating Presbyterian Church government both in England and in Scotland. Now it appears to me perfectly clear on the evidence, that Mr. Murdoch has absolutely ceased to be an ordained minister of the Church of Scotland. In fact, by his answer he repudiates all connexion with that church. Even if he had not done so, I am satisfied as a matter of fact on the evidence that Mr. Murdoch, being a member of the Synod held at Berwick on the 16th of April 1844, did adhere to the resolutions then and there adopted; and that being so, he was brought within the express terms of the act of the General Assembly of the 2nd of June 1845, entitled "An Act anent Presbyterian Churches in England," which enacts and declares that all members of the Synod who so adhered are no longer members of or in communion with the Established Church of Scotland. The effect of that enactment was not directly to remove Mr. Murdoch from his situation as minister of the Low Meeting-house. Neither the General Assembly nor any Scotch Church could affect his civil rights in this country. But it certainly was within the competence of the General Assembly to deprive him of his status as an ordained minister of the Scotch Church; and that has been effectually done. He is no longer an ordained minister of that church, and if not of that church, then of no other Presbyterian Church whatever, and therefore not now capable of being minister or pastor of the Low Meeting-house. On this part of the case I have nothing further to add.

The result of my judgment being that the decree is wrong in declaring that the minister of the Low Meeting-house must be a licentiate and recognized minister of the Established Church of Scotland and in full connexion therewith, it necessarily follows that in my judgment the directions consequent on that declaration are also wrong. Had my learned Brother taken the same view as I do on this part of the case, it would have been our duty to point out in what respects those directions must be varied, but as he concurs with Sir James Wigram, no such alterations will be requisite. The decree will stand in its present form; and I feel that I shall have done all which my duty requires of me in pointing out generally the grounds of the opinion I have formed, without indicating the precise modifications of the decree, which if the same grounds had been taken by my learned Brother, would have been necessary. The decree will of course be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

Jan. 24.—Mr. Roll now moved, by leave, that the execution of the decree of Sir James Wigram be suspended, pending an appeal intended to be presented to the House of Lords. He apprehended that if their Lordships were satisfied that the parties could not possibly be placed in their original position, supposing their appeal to the House of Lords should be successful, they would suspend the execution of the decree. He was quite ready to admit that the motion was made to the indulgence of the Court, and if their Lordships took into consideration the fact that the appellants considered the question of far higher moment than of any money value, he believed they would not refuse that indulgence. The Low Meeting-house, if the decree were put in execution, would no longer be the proper place for the worship of God to them, and the congregation would be dispersed. The effect of the dispersion of the congregation would lead to irreparable mischief. The Lord Chancellor, in Swift v. Grasebrook (12) observed, that the inference to be drawn from a case there cited, Walburn v. Ingilby, was, that if irreparable mischief had been substantiated, the operation of the decree would have been suspended pending the appeal, and if the Court did not accede to the motion, the appeal would be thwarted. On such a ground the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cottenham, in The Attorney General v. Munro suspended the execution of the decree, and in the present case the Vice Chancellor Wigram did so pending the appeal to this court. In Garcias v. Ricardo (13), an application was made to suspend the execution of a decree, and there the Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst, said that the defendant might apply to the House of Lords to advance the appeal, and, if they refused to advance it, he should refuse the motion. He said he would do what Lord Eldon did in Wood v. Milner; he would stay the proceedings, if he could apply the remedy, not otherwise. The note to that report was—"The House of Lords, on the application of the defendant, allowed the appeal to be advanced, and the order for staying process in the mean time was accordingly made." The appellants would willingly undertake to make as early an application to the House of Lords as possible for the purpose, and what they asked was the indulgence that for three or four weeks the execution of the decree might be suspended.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I do not see how the appellants will sustain irreparable injury. If the House of Lords should decide that the decree below was wrong, and our affirmance of it was wrong, the appellants will be entitled to repossess the chapel as before. Two Judges to one have agreed that the appellants are wrong, and I do not see why it is more reasonable that those who up to this time have been decreed to be in the right should forego what they are entitled to, than that those who are held to be wrong should have possession of what at present they are declared not to be entitled to hold. I have already given my opinion that the decree was wrong in saying that the minister must be a licentiate of the Scotch Church, and so on.]

The grievance is this, that supposing Mr. Murdoch not to officiate, his successor must be elected from a class distasteful to the congregation, or rather they would refuse to elect any other minister, being so confined in their choice. The result must be that the congregation must be dispersed, and the chapel abandoned. I ask the Court to grant either what I have asked, or to let Mr. Murdoch do duty to-morrow (Sunday), suspending so much of the decree.

The Solicitor General and Mr. T. Deere Salmon appeared to oppose the motion, but were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I should, speaking for myself alone, have been disposed to grant this motion; but, this Court having affirmed the decree below, I do not see that those who have been twice pronounced right are to be delayed. As to the dispersion of the congregation, the Court cannot listen to that.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The effect of the decree as it stands, whether it be erroneous or correct, is to establish or to restore that state of things which, for more than fifty years before the commencement of this litigation, existed quietly and undisturbed; and as every Judge before whom this case has been heard is of opinion that the minister should be displaced, I think that the application is altogether groundless, and must be refused, with costs.

LORDS JUSTICES.

WATTS v. SYMES.

Mortgagor and Mortgagee—Extinguishment of Debt—Redemption—Foreclosure—Reversionary Interest—Practice—Appeal from Part of a Decree.

The owner of a reversion in personality mortgaged it. He then mortgaged the equity of redemption to a second person, and then agreed to sell, subject to the mortgages, to a third party. The first mortgagee required to be paid off. The mortgagor in a memorandum, reciting that the purchaser had paid the first mortgagee in discharge of her debt out of the purchase-money, agreed to execute an assignment to the purchaser, and until it should be executed that the purchaser should stand in the place of the first mortgagee:—Held, reversing the decree below, that the debt of the first mortgagee was not extinguished, and that the purchaser was entitled to the benefit of that security.

The second mortgagee was also mortgagee of other property of the mortgagor:—Held, also, reversing the decree below, that one mortgage could not be redeemed without the other.

When an appeal is from part of a decree, the respondents are entitled, without a cross appeal, to open that part which is not appealed from.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—CHANC.

This was a suit for foreclosure, and the facts were as follows:—Mr. Symes was the owner of a reversion in personal estate vested in trustees, and in 1844 mortgaged it to a Mrs. Severne for securing 1,200*l.* and interest. In 1845, he mortgaged his equity of redemption to Mr. Watts, for securing 400*l.* and interest. Mr. Watts was at this time mortgagee of other property of Mr. Symes for securing 200*l.* and interest. In July 1846, Mr. Symes agreed to sell the reversion to Mr. Tanner for 1,500*l.* Before any assignment could be executed (and no assignment was executed) Mrs. Severne required to be paid off; and a memorandum was signed by Mr. Symes, dated the 30th of July 1846, in which he acknowledged that Mr. Tanner had agreed to buy the reversion for 1,500*l.*, and had at his request paid Mrs. Severne 1,200*l.* "in discharge of her mortgage out of the 1,500*l.*," and he (Symes) agreed to execute an assignment, and declared that until it was executed Mr. Tanner should stand in Mrs. Severne's place, and have the full benefit of her mortgage security.

Mr. Watts, by his bill, prayed a foreclosure against Mr. Symes and Mr. Tanner if they did not pay him the 400*l.* secured on the reversion, and the 200*l.* secured on the other property; and the Vice Chancellor of England decided that Mr. Tanner was not entitled to Mrs. Severne's security, for that the 1,200*l.* was extinguished, but held that he was entitled to redeem the reversion on payment of Mr. Watts's 400*l.* and interest secured thereon. Mr. Watts, the plaintiff, now appealed from the latter part of the decree; and on the opening of the appeal a discussion ensued, whether the counsel for Mr. Tanner was at liberty to open the whole case, although he had not presented a cross appeal on the point of extinguishment. The Court decided that the respondents were at liberty to open the whole decree.

Mr. Roll and Mr. Shapter, for the appellant.—As the Court has decided that the whole case may be opened, the first point is as to extinguishment of the debt; and it is plain it is extinguished, there being no satisfactory proof of a contract to keep Mrs. Severne's security on foot, and without such a contract Mr. Tanner had no right to a transfer of her security—Dunstan v. Patterson (1). What was here done was to give Mr. Tanner the equity of redemption; and he, as owner, cannot be a mortgagee on his own estate; and this case is in principle the same as Greswold v. Marsham (2) and Mocatta v. Murgatroyd (3), and the decision of Sir William Grant, in Toulmin v. Steere (4). The memorandum of July 1846 was not one contract, and Mrs. Severne's money was paid off without any stipulation for its being kept alive; and moreover, as the whole property was but an equitable interest in a reversion of personality, there was no legal estate to be kept on foot. The following cases were also cited:—

Wade v. Coope, 2 Sim. 155.

Brown v. Stead, 5 Ibid. 535; s. c. 2

Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 45.

Medley v. Horton, 14 Sim. 222; s. c.

13 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 442.

Farrow v. Rees, 4 Beav. 18.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—It can only be made out that Mr. Tanner is a purchaser by the memorandum, which has a stipulation that he shall have the benefit of Mrs. Severne's existing security; and I think he is entitled to it.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—No man can avail himself of one part of this contract without adopting the other. It is plain that a person who borrows money cannot be his own creditor, or set up an incumbrance of his own against his creditor. But Toulmin v. Steere carried the proposition a step further, and applied the same rule to a man who acquired an equity of redemption as to the original mortgagor. That decision proceeded upon two previous decisions. The language of Sir W. Grant is this: "The cases of Greswold v. Marsham and Mocatta v. Murgatroyd are express authorities to shew that one purchasing an equity of redemption cannot set up a prior mortgage of his own, nor consequently a mortgage which he has got in, against subsequent incumbrances." With the greatest deference to the authority of that eminent Judge, I always doubted, and still doubt, whether the cases mentioned by him go that length. In this case the payment and the agreement that Mr. Tanner should have the benefit of Mrs. Severne's security appears to us, on a reasonable view of the acts of the parties, to have been substantially one transaction. We do not think that there is any room for doubt as to what was Mr. Tanner's intention. And whether it was enforceable at law, or in equity only, is immaterial for the purpose of the present argument. Mr. Tanner made the payment with the intention of standing in the place of Mrs. Severne. She became, in effect, a trustee for him. As the purchase has not yet been completed, the time has not arrived at which extinguishment could take place. We think that Mr. Tanner, having paid his money to Mrs. Severne, is entitled to stand in her place in the particular circumstances of the case.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Dickinson were then heard upon the right of Mr. Tanner to redeem only one of Mr. Watts's securities.

Mr. Teed and Mr. Martindale, for the other parties.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The respondents are entitled to the 1,200*l.* secured by Mrs. Severne's mortgage; but if they desire to have the property, they must redeem both the appellant's mortgages.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is quite settled that, whether the suit is for foreclosure or redemption, the mortgagee has a right to say to the mortgagor, you must redeem entirely, or not at all.

decease of the survivor to the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Home Missionary Society:—Held, that the railway shares must be sold and the produce invested in stock; and that the question whether the railway shares were within the provisions of the Mortmain Act was premature.

This bill was filed by the treasurer of the British and Foreign Bible Society, for the administration of the estate of John Ellis, who, by his will, said, "the residue of my property of every description whatever it may be at the time of my death, I bequeath the interest and proceeds thereof to my dear sisters Elizabeth and Sarah Charlotte, during their joint lives, and to the survivor for life; and after the death of the survivor I bequeath the interest and proceeds of the residue to Mrs. Eliza Easy, now residing at No. 8, South Street Terrace, Rye Lane, Peckham, for life; and after her death I bequeath the interest and proceeds of the residue to her daughter, Emma Charlotte Easy, for life, provided she does not marry, but if she marries I bequeath the interest and proceeds of the residue to herself and her brothers, Thomas and William Easy, now at Port Phillip in Australia, (the share of Emma Charlotte Easy to be for her own use, independent of her husband) for life, and on the death of one, him or her, to the survivors for life, and on the death of two the whole to the survivor for life, and after the death of the survivor, I bequeath the residue as follows:—One moiety to the British and Foreign Bible Society, whose office is in Earl Street, Blackfriars, and the other moiety to the Home Missionary Society, for the benefit of the said societies and for carrying out the designs of the said institutions."

It having been referred to the Master to make the usual inquiries, with liberty to state special circumstances, he, by his report, found that the personal estate of the testator, at the time of his death, consisted, among other things, of twenty 100*l.* shares in the Great Western Railway Company and one hundred 25*l.* shares in the Great Northern Railway Company.

The cause came on upon further directions, and two questions were raised: first, whether the ultimate residuary legatees were entitled to have the railway shares sold, and the produce invested in consols; secondly, whether the railway shares were to be regarded as real estate within the provisions of the Mortmain Act, the 9 Geo. 2. c. 36.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Baggallay, for the plaintiff.—Upon the first point, Morgan v. Morgan (1), Hinves v. Hinves (2), Howe v. Lord Dartmouth (3); and upon the second point, Ashton v. Lord Langdale (4), Myers v. Perigal (5), and Tomlinson v. Tomlinson (6) were cited.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Beavan, for the tenants for life.—It is a general rule that where interests in terminable property are given in succession, it ought to be converted and invested; but this rule is always controuled by the intention appearing on the will; the words here plainly meant the enjoyment to be of whatever the property might consist at the testator's death, and slight circumstances have been considered a sufficient ground to induce the Court to depart from the general rule. In Collins v. Collins (7) a testator gave to his wife all and every part of his property in every shape, and without any reserve for life, and at her death the property so left was to be divided. In Bethune v. Kennedy (8) the gift was of "all I do or may possess in the funds, copy or leasehold estates;" the words, though residuary, were considered as a specific gift of the dividends accruing on long annuities. The gift is not a bequest of a general residue, but of "every description whatever it may be at my death," which clearly referred to the then state of investment. Upon the second question, the cases of Sparling v. Parker (9) and Walker v. Milne (10) would be decisive—The King v. the Dock Company of Hull (11). This Court has not adopted any general rule that property of every description shall be converted. In Howe v. Lord Dartmouth, the question arose whether it was the rule of the Court to call in mortgages which were a good investment, as a matter of course, and without inquiry; and it was held that an inquiry was necessary before they would be called in. Before the establishment of the public funds investments were made upon mortgages. The second question is premature, and cannot be decided until the death of the tenants for life.

Mr. Lewis, for Joshua Ellis, one of the next-of-kin of the testator, who was brought before the Court by supplemental bill.—The Master, by his report, finds that the railway shares are interests connected with land; and as no exceptions have been taken to the report, that ought to determine the question.

Mr. R. Palmer.—After finding the general state of the testator's property, the Master finds that the testator was possessed of no real estate other than as aforesaid, which leaves the question open to the Court.

Without any reply,

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I do not find anything in the will to entitle the tenants for life to enjoy the property in specie; the rule of the Court is now settled and invariable, and any person who may have an interest in the fund, though a discretion may be given to the trustees, can apply to have the property converted, and the produce invested in the funds—Prendergast v. Prendergast (12). I am, therefore, of opinion that the railway shares must be sold, and that the produce must be invested in consols. I make no observation upon the question arising under the Mortmain Act, but no exceptions to the Master's report were necessary, as it did not decide anything.

ELVY v. NORWOOD.

Mortgage—Redemption—Arrears of Interest—Statutes of Limitations—Heir.

A. mortgaged an estate in fee to B, and covenanted to pay B. the mortgage debt and interest. A. died intestate, leaving C. his heir-at-law. At the time of the death of A. an arrear of more than six years' interest was due. Suit for redemption by C. against B:—Held, that C. was not entitled to redeem, except on the terms of paying the principal and the whole of the interest due.

By indentures, dated the 22nd and 23rd of February 1830, Mr. Elvy mortgaged freehold hereditaments to Mr. Norwood, to secure 100*l.* and interest. The mortgage deed contained the usual covenant for the payment of the mortgage debt.

Mr. Elvy died, leaving his two sons his co-heirs; the mortgaged lands being of gavelkind tenure.

This was a claim filed by the heirs of the mortgagor against the mortgagee for redemption. At the time of filing the claim an arrear of interest of more than six years was due, in respect of which no acknowledgment had been made. The only question on the claim was as to the amount of interest payable by the plaintiffs.

By the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. s. 42. it is enacted, that no arrears of interest in respect of money charged upon land shall be recovered but within six years next after the same shall have become due, or next after an acknowledgment, &c.

By the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42. s. 3. it is enacted, that actions of covenant that shall be brought at any time shall be sued within twenty years after the cause of such actions, but not after.

Mr. Bird, for the plaintiffs, contended that they were not bound to pay more than six years' interest.

Mr. Speed, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiffs were only entitled to redeem on the payment of the whole arrear.

Hunter v. Nockolds, 1 Hall & Tw. 644; 1 Mac. & G. 640; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 407.

PARKER, V.C.—I think that this case is not decided by any of the authorities referred to. A mortgage deed was executed in February 1830, for securing the payment of a principal sum and interest, with a covenant therein, for payment of the interest. The mortgagor has since died, and the present plaintiffs, who are his co-heirs, seek to redeem that security. There is a long arrear of interest unpaid, and the question is as to the amount of interest which the plaintiffs are bound to pay in this suit; whether they are to pay the arrears for six years or beyond that period. Upon the construction of the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. it has been decided that the only arrears of interest that are a charge upon the land are arrears for six years, and that, as regards the land, there is a right to recover only the arrears for six years. On the other hand, there is the other statute, the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 42, which leaves the personal liability on the covenant open for twenty years. The covenant in this case is one in which the heirs of the mortgagor are bound, and the present plaintiffs, being his co-heirs, are, consequently, bound by the covenant to the extent of the assets descended to them. The case, therefore, stands thus:—as regards the land, there is a mortgage security for only six years' arrears of interest, and the heirs, who are the persons interested in the land, are liable, by means of the covenant, to pay twenty years' arrears. Suppose that, instead of a covenant, the heir had been liable on a bond given by the mortgagor, then, by the settled course of this court, the heir could not redeem the mortgage of his ancestor without submitting to discharge the bond debt. So, in the case of a collateral mortgage debt, for which the ancestor had given a covenant, on the ancient authorities the mortgagee would have had a right to tack that obligation against the heir. Beyond all doubt he could not tack a mere covenant against the ancestor, but, having a covenant in which the heirs are bound, he is right in tacking it against the heir. In deciding that the plaintiffs cannot redeem, unless upon the terms of paying twenty years' arrears of interest, I am not deciding anything contrary to the cases of Hughes v. Kelly and Hunter v. Nockolds. Having here a covenant of this nature, and this being a suit to redeem the land which was another security for the same debt, I consider that the Court has a right to tack these securities, and that by so doing the Court is acting in accordance with the view taken in Du Vigier v. Lee.

Sale, Conditions of—Interest on Purchase-money—Sale of a Reversion.

Real estate, including property in possession and in reversion, was put up for sale by auction in lots, under a condition that the vendors should confirm the Master's report of purchases on or before the 25th of December 1849, and that, on or before that day, each purchaser should pay his purchase-money into court, and be entitled to the rents of his lot from that day, and that if, from any cause whatever, the purchase-money should not be so paid, he should pay interest on it at 5l. per cent. from that day. A. purchased a reversion in fee, being one of the lots. Through the default of the vendors, the Master's report was not confirmed until August 1851. Motion that A. should pay his purchase-money into court with interest from the 25th of December 1849:—Held, that interest was payable from that day at 4l. per cent.

On the 22nd of September 1849 certain real estate was put up for sale by auction in lots. To the greater part of this property the vendors were entitled in possession.

The second condition of sale was as follows:—"The vendors undertake at their own expense to procure and confirm the Master's report of all purchases, and obtain an order for each purchaser to pay the amount of his or her purchase-money into court on or before the 25th of December 1849; and, on or before that day, each purchaser is to pay into the Bank the amount of such purchase-money, and then be let into possession of, or be entitled to the receipt of the rents or an apportioned part of the rents of, his or her lot; but if, from any cause whatever, the purchase-money shall not be so paid in on the 25th of December 1849, the purchaser is to pay interest thereon at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from that day to the time of payment." By the third condition the vendors undertook to have an abstract of their title ready for delivery to the purchasers within ten days after the confirmation of the Master's report of the sale.

Lot 6, the property in question on this motion, was a reversion in fee, subject to a term of ninety-nine years, determinable on the deaths of two persons aged fifty-seven and fifty-three, at a rent of 3*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*

Owing to circumstances in which the purchaser of this lot had no concern, the vendors did not confirm the Master's report as to this lot until August 1851, and the abstract of title was not delivered until September 1851.

This was a motion on the part of the plaintiff that the purchaser of this lot should pay his purchase-money into court with interest from the 25th of December 1849.

Mr. Moxon, for the motion, contended that, although the purchaser was not in fault as to the delay, he was still liable to pay this interest. The sale being of a reversion, the purchaser had the benefit of the wearing out of the lives, and was to be considered as having been in possession from the time of the sale. He cited—

Trefusis v. Lord Clinton, 2 Sim. 359.

Morris v. Wood, Dart on Vend. and Purch., p. 330, 2nd edit.

Mr. Nichols, for the purchaser, contended, that as the delays in confirming the Master's report and delivering the abstract were to be attributed to the vendors, and had not in any way been caused by the purchaser, the purchaser was not bound to pay the interest required. He referred to

De Visme v. De Visme, 1 Hall & Tw. 408; 1 Mac. & G. 336; s. c. 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 159.

PARKER, V.C. said, that he thought that the sale in question, being of a reversion, the case of De Visme v. De Visme did not apply. The purchaser had had the benefit of the wearing out of the lives, and he must pay interest from the 25th of December 1849. This interest ought, however, to be at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum only, according to the usual practice of the court, and the purchaser was to be entitled to the rents received in the mean time.

Stay of Proceedings—Costs—Bill—Dismissal.

A new next friend of a feme covert having been substituted, the old next friend, who was a defendant to the suit, was ordered to give security for costs up to the time of his appointment, and proceedings were stayed in the mean time. No security having been given, it was asked that in default of its being completed within a limited time, the bill might be dismissed, with costs, but the application was refused.

This suit was instituted by Anne P. Payne, a feme covert, by the defendant, Charles H. Payne the younger, as her next friend; and upon a motion for staying the proceedings until the bill should be amended by substituting a new next friend, it was decided that a defendant could not act as the next friend of a plaintiff feme covert—Payne v. Little (1). A motion was subsequently made that the bill should be dismissed, with costs, in case the last order should not be complied with; and on the 2nd of July 1851, an order was made, with the consent of the plaintiff, to amend the bill within a week, by substituting E. W. Hardy as the next friend, and that C. H. Payne should give security for the costs up to the time of making the amendments: such security to be approved of by the Master, and in the mean time all further proceedings were stayed.

The Master rejected the security proposed by C. H. Payne; and a motion was made on behalf of the defendants to dismiss the bill, with costs, unless the security should be completed within a limited time: and in support of this application,

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Bagshawe referred to Giddings v. Giddings (2), in which a plaintiff who was ordered to give security for costs, gave an insufficient security. An order was then made that he should give other security within a month; but having made default, he was ordered to give security within a limited period, and in default the bill was to stand dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Selwyn opposed the motion.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS made the order.

The Registrar stopped the minutes dismissing the bill, and the case being again mentioned, it was asked that the words "and in default, that the bill be dismissed, with costs," be introduced into the minutes.

March 29.—The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I have communicated with Mr. Bedwell, the Registrar. I cannot make the order asked. Who would there be to pay the costs, if the bill was dismissed? The substituted next friend would not be liable to pay them: were he liable, no security would be necessary; and C. H. Payne would not be liable to pay them, as he had ceased to be the next friend: the plaintiff, also, if this bill should be dismissed, might file the same bill to-morrow. The case of Giddings v. Giddings was not the next friend of a married woman; the plaintiff, there, lived out of the jurisdiction: the case, therefore, does not apply, and I am unable to make any order upon this application; but I shall give no costs.

MANT v. LEITH.

Trust, Breach of—Investment—Real Security—Railway Debentures—Cestui que Trust—Acquiescence.

A trustee, at the request of his cestui que trust, a married woman, who was entitled for her life to the dividends of a sum of 4,000l. consols, sold out the trust fund, and invested it upon a railway debenture. Upon a suit by her to have the fund re-invested in stock,—Held, that railway debentures were not real securities contemplated by the deed, and that he must replace the stock and account for the dividends as if it had not been sold; that no costs ought to be given on either side, as he had acted only as requested by the plaintiff; and that the costs of the parties entitled in remainder must be paid by the plaintiff.

Sarah Iggulden, the great-aunt of the plaintiff, Elizabeth, the wife of Thomas Mant, transferred the sum of 3,100l. consols, into the names of William White and John Iggulden, both since deceased, and the defendant, James Leith; and by an indenture, dated the 24th of March 1832, she conveyed to them certain freehold estates, upon trust, that they and the survivors of them, after the decease of Sarah Iggulden, should, from time to time, pay, apply, and dispose of the rents and profits of the freehold premises, and the interest, dividends, and produce of the stock, and of every addition thereto, as the same should respectively accrue due and be received by them, into the proper hands of the plaintiff, to and for her separate use and benefit, exclusive of marital controul and without power of anticipation, the receipt or receipts of the plaintiff only and alone, notwithstanding her coverture, to be good and effectual discharges to the trustees for the same; and after the decease of the plaintiff, upon trust, to pay, apply, and dispose of the rents, issues, and profits of the trust estates and premises, unto and for the benefit of two daughters of the plaintiff therein respectively named and their children; but if either of them should die without leaving issue, then to the other of them and her children. It was also provided that it should be lawful for the trustees and the survivors or survivor of them, when and as often as it should be found necessary or expedient, with the consent and approbation of the person or persons then in the receipt and enjoyment of the annual or other periodical produce thereof, to be testified in writing, under her or their hand or hands, to sell and dispose of the trust stock, and to place out the money to arise thereby, or which should arise by the same or any part thereof in any of the public stocks or funds of this kingdom or on real securities; and such monies, funds, and real securities from time to time to change, alter, call in, and dispose of, with such consent as aforesaid, as should be judged necessary, replacing and laying out the money to arise thereby in or upon any or either of such securities as aforesaid, in the names or name of the trustees or trustee thereof for the time being, upon the before-mentioned trusts of and concerning the first-mentioned stock and realty or as near the same as the nature of the case and the then circumstances would admit of.

On the 26th of January 1837 Sarah Iggulden died. During her life the freehold premises were sold and the produce was invested by the trustees, in their names, in the purchase of 900*l.* consols.

Elizabeth Mant, being in receipt of the income arising from the 4,000*l.* consols, requested James Leith, the then surviving trustee, to alter the investment, that it might produce a larger income. James Leith opened a communication with the Great Northern Railway Company, and on the 26th of October 1850 he, by letter, informed the plaintiff that it was proposed to advance the trust funds on mortgage to the company at 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent.; to which he received a reply.—

“Dear Mr. Leith,—I have really of late been almost prevailed upon to write to you relating to the circumstance of the present high rate of 3*l.* per cent. consols, but as often repulsed the attempt, considering that you were still on the look out, which your letter of the 26th inst., received on the 29th, confirms, and now places the matter almost to a certainty of its being carried out to the extent of so desirable a transaction, it having had my serious attention;

yet all I can further or more say upon so important a business will be for myself to repeat and sanction your proceedings of investing the property in allusion, that is, upon mortgage at 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. interest, paid regularly, half-yearly, upon the trust of the Great Northern Railway Company, agreeable to the document you inclose, the money emanating, say 4,000*l.* consols, from the deed of trust executed by my aunt, Miss Sarah Iggulden, of the county of Kent, as over which you are the absolute trustee. I am happy in confessing the cautious and judicious measures you have hitherto exemplified, as on many other occasions, towards my property.—Sincerely yours, Elizabeth Mant.”

On the 5th of February 1851, James Leith advanced the sum of 3,700*l.*, part of 3,850*l.*, the produce of the 4,000*l.* consols, after deducting expenses, to the Great Northern Railway Company; and by an indenture, dated the 11th of February 1851, the company, under their common seal, assigned unto James Leith the undertaking and all future calls on shareholders, and all the rates, tolls, and sums of money arising by virtue of their act, to secure the repayment, on the 5th of January 1858, of the sum of 3,700*l.*, with interest in the mean time at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly, on the terms therein mentioned.

Upon being informed of what had been done, Elizabeth Mant, on the 11th of February 1851, wrote to the defendant:—

“Your letter of the 6th inst., together with the account of broker, selling of stock, and the secretary’s letter of the 5th, also to the Great Northern Railway Company and Messrs. Baxter, Rose & Norton, of the 31st ult., have been received this morning through the bank at this place, which information I conclude you wish me to acknowledge. You also observe you will indorse the indenture declaratory of your trust and send it to me or attested copy at your earliest capability, and for all which I am obliged.”

After this investment the defendant paid the remainingsum of 150*l.* into the National and Provincial Bank at Deal, where the plaintiff then resided, until a proper investment could be found.

Disputes having arisen in consequence of the irregular payment of the dividends, the plaintiff instituted this suit to impeach the investment as a breach of trust, and to have the trust funds restored to a proper state of investment. It also asked that new trustees might be appointed in the place of James Leith.

There were two daughters of the plaintiff at the date of the settlement, Elizabeth Iggulden Mant and Sarah Alderton Mant. The former married Henry S. Shrapnell, and had two children, and they were all made parties to the suit. The other daughter married Henry Frederick Tyler, but died shortly after without issue.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Terrell, for the plaintiff.—The fund in this case was the subject of a trust which the trustees might, in their discretion, invest upon real securities; but railway debentures do not come within that description—9 & 10 Vict. c. lxxi. s. 9, 8 Vict. c. 16, Robinson v. Robinson (1). The securities would not sell in the market for half their value, and when the investment was made no information as to their value was given. The money could not be called in until after the expiration of a term of years. If there were other incumbrances upon the railway, and there should not be sufficient to meet the demands, how were the priorities of the creditors to be determined? The whole success of the company must depend upon the carriage of passengers; neither the toll-houses nor the line were included in the mortgage. The undertaking and its profits were alone pledged. If the toll-houses had been included, they might have yielded a rental; but still they would not have been such a security as this Court would consider proper for an investment of trust property. The stock must, therefore, be replaced in the funds, and the trustee must pay the costs—Russell v. the East Anglian Railways Company (2), Doe d. Myatt v. the St. Helen's and Runcorn Gap Railway Company (3).

Mr. Smythe, for Thomas Mant, the plaintiff's husband, and for Mr. and Mrs. Shrapnell and her children, who were entitled in remainder.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Shebbeare, for the trustee.—If a cestui que trust caused a trustee to commit a breach of trust, the Court would indemnify the trustee out of the estate of the cestui que trust who induced it—Phillipson v. Gatty (4). The plaintiff sued on her title as a feme sole, and she had the sole power of allowing the change of investment. She never averred that she acted in ignorance or that she was misinformed. The trustee had acted upon her authority, which controuled his own. It was the plaintiff alone and not the infants who now complained of the investment, and she must indemnify the trustee against all loss.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I cannot consider this a proper investment or such a one as, under the power in this settlement, ought to have been made. Assuming this to be a real security, it is not sufficient for a trustee to say so and rely upon that as his defence. It is his duty to consider the nature of the property and the conditions upon which it is held. It may possibly be involved in litigation or subject to liabilities which may prevent its being an available security; and in this very case the security under the provisions of the act of parliament for making the railway cannot be enforced in the ordinary manner in which real securities are made available. No ejectment can be brought, neither can any foreclosure be obtained. Repayment cannot be demanded for eight years; the security may be sold, but the value is diminished by the enjoyment being made reversionary; and the parties entitled in remainder may become entitled in possession before the time of payment. In all respects, therefore, it was a breach of trust; and the practice of conveyancers confirms this; and in modern settlements powers are introduced to invest the trust funds upon railway debentures. Mrs. Shrapnell and her children did not, neither could they give any authority. The trustee, therefore, could not protect himself on the ground that it was done upon the request of the cestui que trust. He must, therefore, reinvest the money in consols. Mrs. Mant, however, did give express authority to the trustee to alter the investment; and I cannot permit her to complain of the particular species of investment, which, though improper, she sanctioned, and which she might have known was not such an investment as should have been made by a trustee. I cannot allow her to receive the costs from the trustee, since he did no more than he was requested; and I cannot make her pay him the costs, as that would imply that he had no duty to perform, and that the request of the cestui que trust would be a sufficient indemnity to him. The duty of a trustee was to protect the fund; and if one cestui que trust asks what is improper, such a request can be no justification as against other parties. I will not therefore give any costs on either side. Mrs. Shrapnell and her children must have their costs from the plaintiff, as they are brought here in consequence of this litigation; and Mr. Leith, having replaced the fund, must account for such dividends as would have arisen from the stock. He is also entitled to a reasonable time to replace the 4,000*l.* I think also the cestui que trust has a right to attach this fund, as it is property to which the trust funds have been traced; but I will not permit him to dispose of it, unless it is to raise money to replace the trust funds. In that case the Court will afford him an opportunity of selling the debentures; but, except for that purpose, it will not part with them. The 4,000*l.* must be replaced before the last day of June.

Will — Construction — Defective Suit — Omitting to demur — Successful Defendant — Costs of Hearing refused — Interest on Balances not prayed for.

A testator gave his freehold estate and "property whether real or personal" to M. S. for life, and after her decease he gave all his said freehold estate and property to S. H. and his wife for their lives, and after their decease he gave all his said freehold property to their children for an estate of inheritance in fee simple; but in case none should attain twenty-one, he gave his freehold estate and property to W. M. his heirs and assigns in fee simple. He charged his personal estate with the payment of several legacies, and the residue of what he should die possessed of was to become the property of M. S. — Held, that M. S. was entitled to the personal estate, and that S. H. his wife and children took no interest in the personal estate.

A plaintiff, whose case wholly fails, will not be allowed to perfect it by the gift or waiver of one defendant against another.

If the case made by the bill is clear, a defendant who brought the cause to a hearing instead of demurring, was refused all costs though he succeeded.

Interest on balances may be charged against an executor, though it is not prayed by the bill.

John E. Steygould, by his will, dated the 14th of May 1817, gave and bequeathed to Margaret Steygould all his freehold estate, situate in Wapping or elsewhere, and property, whether real or personal, as well as money and effects, &c. in trust for her use for life; and after her decease, he gave and bequeathed all his freehold estate and property unto his cousin Samuel Hollingsworth and Martha Elizabeth his wife, or the survivor of them, in trust for their lives; and after their decease, he gave and bequeathed all his said freehold estate and property in trust for their children, or the survivors or survivor of them, if more than one share and share alike when they should have attained the age of twenty-one years, for an estate of inheritance in fee simple to such children or child, and his, her or their assigns. But in case none of the children should attain the age of twenty-one, he gave and bequeathed his said freehold estate and property unto William Wilson, his heirs and assigns, in fee simple for ever. He then charged his personal property with several bequests, and then gave "all the rest, residue and remainder of which I shall die possessed, interested in or entitled unto, to become the property of Margaret Steygould."

The testator died on the 19th of August

1829, and his will was proved by Margaret Steygould, Samuel Hollingsworth and Charles Shakeshaft, his executors, whom he also named his trustees.

The personal estate consisted of two sums of $,300*l.* consols, and 3,000*l.* reduced Bank annuities, which the executors invested in their joint names, and the dividends were received by Margaret Steygould until her decease, which took place on the 16th of June 1833. After the decease of Margaret Steygould, Charles Shakeshaft, the executor, received the dividends accruing due upon the several sums of stock, and paid them to Samuel Hollingsworth up to October 1834; but early in 1835 he refused to continue the payments,—alleging that it was doubtful whether Samuel Hollingsworth had any right to them under the will; and after his decease, he transferred the two sums of stock into his own name and received the dividends, but never took any proceedings for obtaining the sanction or opinion of the Court.

Charles Shakeshaft also sold out a part of the residuary estate, and applied the proceeds to his own use.

The suit of Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft was instituted by Martha Elizabeth Hollingsworth, the widow of Samuel Hollingsworth, and her son, who was the administrator of his father, against Charles Shakeshaft, the executor of the original testator, and against Robert Williams Andrews who claimed the fund as the legal personal representative of Margaret Steygould, praying for a declaration that Samuel Hollingsworth, upon the decease of Margaret Steygould, became entitled to the dividends of the residuary personal estate during her life, and that upon his decease the plaintiff, M. E. Hollingsworth, became entitled to the dividends during her life, and that subject thereto the other plaintiff became entitled to the residuary personal estate. It also asked that Charles Shakeshaft might be charged with interest on the monies received by him and with the value of the stock sold out and applied to his own use.

The defendant, Charles Shakeshaft, died after the institution of the suit, and his widow and executrix, against whom the suit was revived, voluntarily replaced the sum sold out, and admitted assets of her testator, Charles Shakeshaft, sufficient to answer the purposes of the suit; and the several sums of money in question in the cause were paid into court to the general credit of the cause.

Andrews v. Shakeshaft, the second cause, was between the same parties, but the plaintiff, R.W. Andrews, the legal personal representative of Margaret Steygould, claimed the residuary estate of the testator against the other defendants. The plaintiffs in the first and second suits compromised the matter in dispute between them, and then presented a petition to come on with the causes proposing a distribution of the fund according to that compromise. Under those circumstances, it would not have become necessary to decide the question of construction between the parties were it not that the defendant, the legal personal representative of Charles Shakeshaft, who, for fifteen years, received and retained the dividends which he knew himself not to be entitled to, proposed that one decree should be made by consent in both causes, giving the defendant her costs in the suit out of the residue of the fund administered, but charging the estate of the executor, Charles Shakeshaft, with interest at 4*l.* per cent. on the dividends received and retained by him. And she insisted on the two causes being tried strictly and separately, and contended that if upon the true construction of the will the Court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs, in Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft, were not entitled to these funds, that bill must be dismissed; and that the Court should then, in the other suit of Andrews v. Shakeshaft, make such a decree as might be proper, but which she insisted would not be a decree charging the estate of Charles Shakeshaft with interest, inasmuch as there was no prayer to that effect contained in the bill.

Dec. 2.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I at first thought that the defendant R. W. Andrews might, in the suit of Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft, have waived his right in favour of the plaintiffs, and that by that means I might have avoided the decision of the point, and although this might be transferred where independently of the interest of Andrews, the plaintiffs the Hollingsworths had a distinct interest sufficient to sustain the suit; yet I think that where the plaintiff's interest wholly fails, it cannot be set up against the defendant who has an interest, but the case must be tried according to the interest of the plaintiff as it stands upon the record, and that if he has acquired a subsequent interest, it must be brought before the Court by a supplemental bill. I am of opinion, that I must yield to this objection, and the defendant is entitled to require the Court to determine whether the plaintiffs, in Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft, can maintain the suit against the defendant.

Yielding, therefore, to this objection, and having taken the cases separately, and having to consider the true construction of the will, I must adhere to the opinion that I expressed strongly at the hearing of the cause, that according to the true construction of the will, Margaret Steygould took all the residue of the personal estate, subject to the payment of the legacies, and that consequently the plaintiffs the Hollingsworths having no title to this fund, this suit cannot be maintained by them. I am, therefore, compelled to dismiss the bill. As this question arises exclusively upon the construction of the will of the testator, which is fully set forth by the bill, it was the duty of the executor if he intended to take this objection, to do so at the earliest stage of the cause, that is, by demurrer to the bill, by which all further expenses in the suit would have been avoided, and the right of R. W. Andrews would have been conclusively settled and ascertained. He has not thought fit to adopt this course, and having regard also to the other circumstances of the case to which I have already adverted, I shall dismiss the bill without costs. The same observations apply to both the defendants.

In pursuing this course, I follow the rule adopted by Lord Langdale in Sanders v. Benson (2). The result of this dismissal will be that the defendant Mrs. Shakeshaft would, in the ordinary course, be entitled to have the three sums of money paid out again to her; but I shall not at present give any direction for that purpose, but wait till some application is made for it. The plaintiff, R. W. Andrews, may, if he thinks fit, apply to have the fund transferred to the cause of Andrews v. Shakeshaft.

It remains to be considered what decree is proper to be made in the suit of Andrews v. Shakeshaft. The bill in this suit prays for an account of the dividends which have accrued due on the sums of stock constituting the residue, and also for payment of the arrears due, but it does not pray for interest on those dividends; and it is contended by the defendant that the Court cannot make the estate of Charles Shakeshaft liable in this suit to the payment of such interest; but I am not of that opinion. I consider that the Court cannot in the present stage of the cause, and according to the existing practice, direct such interest to be paid: but in a great variety of cases, the Court has given interest on further directions, although the question has not been reserved at the hearing. Cresset v. Hunter (3) and Sammes v. Rickman (4) are cases of this description. So also was Goodyere v. Lake (5). In Melland v. Gray the original bill does not appear to have prayed for interest, but by the decree on further directions the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce directed the Master to inquire what sums had been from time to time retained by the executor; and on the cause coming on for hearing on further directions, the executor was charged with interest on the several sums from time to time received by him. My own experience agrees with this decision, that the Court has ultimately in many cases charged the executor with interest when it has not been prayed for by the bill. I entertain no doubt that the Court will properly direct such inquiry to be made, and accounts to be taken as will, if a proper case for the purpose appears by the Master's report, enable the Court to fix the estate of the executor, Charles Shakeshaft, with interest on the dividends received and retained by him; although this course of proceeding will be more dilatory and expensive than if the Court had, in the first instance, made an adverse decree settling all questions between the parties. Accordingly, this is the course which I shall adopt here. I shall, in the case of Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft, dismiss the bill, without costs, and in the case of Andrews v. Shakeshaft, I shall declare the plaintiff R. W. Andrews entitled to the three sums of stock, and the dividends that have accrued thereon since the decease of Margaret Steygould. Direct the defendant, Mrs. Shakeshaft, to transfer and pay the same accordingly, and refer it to the Master to take an account of the dividends which have accrued due on the sum of 3,300*l.* consols, and the 3,000*l.* reduced 3*l.* per cent. annuities, since the decease of Margaret Steygould. The Master must also inquire and state to the Court when and by whom such dividends respectively have been received, with liberty to state special circumstances; and I shall reserve further directions and costs. The petition also must stand over.

Trust, Breach of—Annual Rests—Costs—Compromise—Letters—Evidence.

*A trustee of a marriage settlement, who allowed a sum of 350*l.* to remain in the hands of a trading firm for a period exceed-* *ing fifteen years after the death of the tenant for life, but who eventually, and before the bill was filed, paid the principal, with 5*l.* per cent. interest:—Held, liable to account, with annual rests, and also to the costs of the suit.*

The Court will discountenance all attempts to convert offers of compromise, by letter, into admissions prejudicial to the parties using them.

Observations as to the limited purpose for which such letters may be used.

Ann Minchin previous to her marriage was possessed of a sum of 350*l.*, which she had lent at interest at 5*l.* per cent. to Thomas Clark, Francis Clark and Joseph Foxall, who carried on business in co-partnership as toy-makers at Birmingham, under the firm of Thomas Clark & Co.

In June 1830, upon the marriage of Thomas Jones with Ann Minchin, she assigned the 350*l.* due from the firm of T. Clark & Co., together with certain stock in trade, &c. belonging to her, to Charles Chamberlain and J. Foxall, upon trust, to stand possessed of the trust monies and effects for the separate use of A. Minchin for life, and to pay, assign and deliver the same, or any part thereof, to her or to such person or persons as she should by writing, or by her last will appoint, with full power for her to carry on the said trade, and to vary the stock, debts and effects employed therein, as a feme sole, for such time as she should think proper. And upon further trust, that the said trustees should, when requested by A. Minchin by any note or writing, and after her decease, of their or his own proper authority, collect, get in and receive the sum of 350*l.* and interest, and other the monies, effects and premises, and invest the produce in their names in the public funds of Great Britain, and pay the dividends to A. Minchin for life for her separate use, and after her decease in trust for the child and children of the marriage.

The marriage was duly solemnized, and A. Jones received the interest during her life, and never required the 350*l.* to be got in. She died on the 5th of November 1834, leaving George Jones, the plaintiff, an infant, her only child, but no step was taken to get in the 350*l.*, or to receive the interest, until this bill was filed in January 1850.

At the time of the execution of the settlement, the 350*l.* was due from J. Foxall, the trustee, and his co-partners jointly and severally, and so it continued until October 1847, when T. Clark died, and F. Clark and the defendant, J. Foxall, continued to carry on the business until the beginning of the year 1850, a fortnight before the filing of this bill, when the partnership was finally dissolved.

In March 1836, C. Chamberlain retired from the trust, without having taken any step to get in and invest the money settled; and on the 24th of March 1836 Thomas Willson was appointed co-trustee with J. Foxall in his stead. C. Chamberlain subsequently died, and this suit was revived against his legal personal representative, but neither F. Clark, nor the legal personal representative of T. Clark, deceased, were made parties to the suit.

The bill prayed an account of the profits made by J. Foxall on these balances, and for a reference to the Master to ascertain whether it would be for the interest of the plaintiff to take the amount of the profits realized by the use of these sums of money; or if the Court should be of opinion that he was not entitled to such relief, then that it might be paid, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, with yearly rests.

The defendant, J. Foxall, by his answer said, that before the 31st of December 1849, and above a fortnight before the bill was filed, the whole of the principal and interest at 5*l.* per cent. was invested in the funds in the joint names of J. Foxall and T. Willson, upon the trusts of the settlement, and that the plaintiff was entitled to nothing more, and that consequently whatever decree the Court might make as to the security of the fund, they, the defendants, were entitled to have their costs of the suit.

A long correspondence was entered into between the solicitors of Thomas Jones, the plaintiff's father, and the solicitors of the defendant J. Foxall, a great portion of which was embodied in the answer of the defendants, and was given in evidence to prove admissions against the plaintiff, and which was justified on the ground that an issue would have been necessary to try a fact stated in the letters, which might have defeated the suit, though written without prejudice, if they had not been put in evidence.

Mr. James and Mr. Selwyn, for the plaintiff.—Upon the death of Ann Jones, a clear breach of trust was committed by both the trustees. If a partner died, leaving a capital in the firm, it was a debt due from the surviving partners to the estate of the deceased partner; and in this case, as the debt was not received, and the surviving partners have made a profit, it is a debt due from them. They had full notice that the money was the subject of the trust. The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to an account, with annual rests.

Mr. James, in reply.

March 29.—THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The question is, whether the defendant, J. Foxall, is liable as a trustee of the settlement made on the marriage of Ann Minchin, the mother of the infant plaintiff, for more than the principal, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. for a sum of 350*l.* secured by that settlement. The defendant admits his liability to that extent, and before the filing of the bill expressed his readiness to make the amount good without suit. The plaintiff, by his next friend, claims more than this, and contends that the defendant is liable to account for the profits produced by the 350*l.* or for interest at 5*l.* per cent., with annual rests, on the ground that the money was employed by the defendant in his trade and in violation of his duty as trustee. The settlement provided that the trustees should call in the debt of 350*l.* during the life of Ann Minchin when they should be requested by her so to do, and after her decease the settlement made it imperative upon the trustees, without any application or request from any one, to call in this sum and interest due on it, and to invest the amount in government or real securities upon the trusts of the settlement.

The rules which apply to cases in which executors are charged with interest on balances retained by them are subject to difficulty, arising not so much from any doubt as to the principles themselves, as from the practical application of them to particular cases. Generally, it may be stated that, if an executor has retained balances in his hands which he ought to have invested, the Court will charge him with simple interest at 4*l.* per cent. on those balances. If, in addition to this retention, he has committed a direct breach of trust, or if the fund has been taken by him from a proper state of investment in which it was producing 5*l.* per cent., he will be charged with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum. If in addition to this he has employed the money so obtained by him in trade or speculation, for his own benefit and advantage, he will be charged either with the profits actually obtained by him from the use of the money, or with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, and also with yearly rests, that is, with compound interest. The principle on which the Court charges an executor with profits which have actually arisen from the property of the cestui que trust employed by him, is obvious, and of general application when such profits are proved to have been made. It was the money of the cestuis que trust, and they are entitled to receive the profits that are earned. The principle upon which executors and trustees, when charged with interest on balances, are made to account with yearly or half-yearly rests, is not so clearly defined, nor are the decided cases by any means free from obscurity or contradiction. In some cases the Court has charged the trustee with annual rests, because the trust under which he acted, in distinct terms required him to accumulate the fund with compound interest. In other cases the principle seems to have been, that the Court visits the trustee or the executor with an account in the nature of a penalty for his misconduct, where he has not merely committed a breach of trust, but where he has himself actually endeavoured to derive, or has, in fact, derived, some pecuniary advantage from the use of the money of which he has thus obtained possession. In all these cases, however, a large discretion seems to have been exercised by the Court, which has regarded the facts and circumstances attending each particular case, and it is to the exercise of this discretion that the difficulty of discovering the principle in some of the reported cases is to be attributed, and it is only upon this principle that the later cases, in which the rule has been drawn more stringently against the trustee, can be reconciled with some of the earlier cases.

In the case before me, a direct and positive breach of trust was committed. It was not merely negligence by omitting to perform the duty incidental to trustees, but a direct disobedience by the defendant J. Foxall in his character of trustee of the plain and positive trust which he had been directed to perform, and which, by accepting the trust, he had undertaken to perform. The trustees were enjoined by the deed on the decease of the mother to get in the sum of 350*l.*, and to invest it upon the trusts of the settlement, and if this had been done the fund would have produced compound interest for the plaintiff; for as he was then, and still is, an infant, and as his father appears to have been of ability to maintain him, the dividends might and ought to have been re-invested from time to time for his benefit until he attained twenty-one. Instead, however, of adopting this course, the defendant J. Foxall continued his money as part of the capital engaged in the firm carried on by himself and his partners, and, besides the advantage resulting from the increase of capital to the concern

It was argued that the sum was of small amount, and that it can scarcely be supposed any great advantage was to be derived from a sum of 350*l.* to a trading concern. I feel myself bound, however, to disregard that argument. The principle must be the same, whether the sum be large or small; and if the benefit is small, the sum charged upon the trustee will be proportionately small also. In all this J. Foxall acted in direct violation of his duty as trustee. It was a violation of his duty not to endeavour to obtain payment of the principal or interest of this sum of money for the benefit of the infant cestui que trust from the month of November 1834 up to the month of January 1850, when this bill was filed, a period exceeding fifteen years. The rate of interest secured by the conditions on which the loan was originally made was 5*l.* per cent. per annum. Interest, therefore, at a less rate than 5*l.* per cent. could not be charged, and if paid and advanced to the benefit of the infant, it would have accumulated at compound interest. The neglect to pay off this money is a tacit acknowledgment by the partners, the trustee being one of them, that the retention and employment of it by them was beneficial, even though 5*l.* per cent. per annum was paid for it. It is obvious, therefore, that J. Foxall must be charged with something more than the mere repayment of the principal and the interest retained by him and his partners for fifteen years.

The question is, in what way he is to be charged. I cannot charge him as trustee with a greater amount of profits than he has actually received; and according to the evidence before me, as indeed was probable, the trustee, J. Foxall, received only a third part of the profits produced by this sum. It would clearly, therefore, not be for the interest of the plaintiff to make him account only for one-third of the profits. But with regard to the question of annual rests, there are various considerations that have led me to the opinion that he must be charged with them. These considerations are, first, the direct breach of trust committed by the trustee not requiring payment of this money. Secondly, the long time that has elapsed since the breach of trust was committed. Thirdly, the absence of any attempt either to repair the breach or to perform the trust till complaint was made shortly before the filing of the bill. Fourthly, and more especially, that during all this time the whole of the trust fund has been employed in the trade carried on by the trustee and his partners, from which, in common with them, he has derived some benefit. To which may be added, the circumstance I have mentioned, that if the defendant J. Foxall and his partners had regularly paid the interest they had contracted to pay, even if the principal money itself had not been repaid, the infant would have had the benefit of that interest which has been retained by the trustee and his partners in their trade.

Taking all these matters into consideration, I am of opinion that the defendant J. Foxall must be charged, not only with interest at 5*l.* per cent. on the balances, but in taking such account he must be charged with yearly rests. In addition to that, as this suit has been occasioned by the necessity of resorting here to repair the breach of trust committed by him, and as he has not offered to do without suit what in my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to recover, I am of opinion that he must also pay the costs of the suit.

I should here conclude what I have to say; but I think it proper to add that I have paid no attention to the correspondence and negotiation which occurred between the father of the plaintiff and the defendant J. Foxall, which has been given in evidence and commented upon in this case. In the first place, the plaintiff, who is an infant, cannot be bound by admissions by any one professing to act on his behalf; but, in addition to this, I find the offers were made without prejudice to the rights of any parties, and I shall, as far as I am able, in all cases endeavour to suppress a practice, which, when I was first acquainted with the profession, was rarely, if ever, ventured upon; but which, according to my experience has been common of late, namely, that of attempting to convert offers of compromise into admissions and acts prejudicial to the parties making them. If this were permitted, the effect would be that no attempt to compromise a suit would ever be made. If no reservation of the parties who make an offer of compromise, could prevent that offer and the letters from being afterwards given in evidence, and made use of against them, it is obvious that no such letters would be written or offers made. In my opinion, such letters and offers are admissible for one purpose only, videlicet, to shew that an attempt has been made to compromise the suit, which may be sometimes necessary; as, for instance, in order to account for lapse of time, but never to fix the persons making them with admissions contained in such letters, and I shall do all I can to discourage this, which I consider to be a very injurious practice.

The estate of the other trustee is liable to make good the principal and interest, but the annual rests are to be decreed only against J. Foxall, whose firm derived benefit from the money, and who was the principal acting trustee.

Charity—Trust Funds—Investment—Real Estate.

The Court will sanction the sale of a piece of land, which in 1747 was purchased by trustees with charitable funds and conveyed to them, it being plainly advantageous to the charity. It will also sanction the re-investment of the money in real estate; and the Court will confer upon the trustees powers to perpetuate themselves, as well as to lease the land, there being such powers in the deed conveying the land to the trustees originally purchasing.

This petition was presented under the 52 Geo. 3. c. 101, and the Trustee Act, 1850, praying for the appointment of trustees for a trust or charity, and to obtain an order vesting a close of land, called "The Carr," in Ecclesall, with the appurtenances, in the petitioners as trustees, and to confirm a contract made to sell the same to John Shortridge, and that the trustees, upon payment of the residue of the purchase-money and interest might be at liberty to convey the land to the purchaser and his heirs. It also asked for the confirmation of a scheme for the investment and management of the trust property; or for a reference to the Master to appoint new trustees, and state whether the contract should be carried out, and to settle and approve of a scheme for the investment and management of the trust property, and that the trustees to be appointed might be invested with powers of appointing new trustees, and of demising the lands to be purchased, similar to those contained in the indentures originally conveying the lands to trustees. It also asked for payment of the costs, and that they might retain them out of the purchase-money.

In 1747 the trustees of certain charitable funds laid them out in the purchase of a piece of land called "The Carr," situate near Hawlin, otherwise Machon Bank, in Ecclesall Bierlow, in the parish of Sheffield, and by indentures dated the 10th and 11th of February, 1747, which were registered at Wakefield, and enrolled at the Chapel of the Rolls, the piece of land, which contained about three acres, and was let for 4*l.* 10*s.* a year, was conveyed to John Nodder and his heirs, to the use of John Nodder, John Fenton, Thomas Waterhouse, Richard Dalton, Thomas Bright, Joseph Parker and William Fox and their heirs, upon trust out of the yearly rents to expend the sum of 40*s.* in the purchase of good wholesome bread to be distributed on four several Sundays, which were specified, in equal proportions, in the chapel of Ecclesall immediately after divine service in the forenoon among thirty poor persons, inhabitants, who should have attended service in that chapel, so that each of such thirty poor persons might have a loaf of the same bread of the true value of 4*d.*, and in case there should be more than thirty persons, entitled to partake, then among such as the trustees should think fit; and as to the residue of the rents, after deducting all expenses, one-third part was to be applied for the relief of twenty poor housekeepers within Ecclesall, and for that purpose to be paid to the overseers to be distributed, and the remaining two third parts of the residue of the rents were to be paid by the trustees to the overseers of the poor of Ecclesall, to be distributed among the poor of the township of Ecclesall. The deed also contained a power that as often as three of the trustees should die, the survivors of them or the major part of them should appoint three other inhabitants of Ecclesall to be trustees jointly with the survivors, and to convey the premises, so as that the same might be vested in them jointly. It also contained a power authorizing the trustees to demise the premises for twenty-one years at the best rent that could be obtained.

It appeared that since 1789 the overseers of the poor of Ecclesall had received the rents, and that since 1839, 6*l.* 6*s.*, being one-half of the rent, had been paid by the overseers to the churchwardens to be distributed by them in bread, and that the other 6*l.* 6*s.* had been divided by the overseers of Ecclesall amongst the poor persons inhabitants of the township.

The Carr field having increased in value, and being well situate for building purposes, the overseers on the 3rd of September 1851, put up the same to auction, when John Shortridge was declared the purchaser at the sum of 680*l.* subject to conditions, the fourth of which was "that the vendors should within twenty-one days from the day of sale make out a possessory title to the land, &c., in the overseers of Ecclesall for the last fifty years and upwards, by producing to the purchaser on application at the office of the vendors' solicitor the books of account of the overseers of the poor for the time being in which the rent of the land is from time to time entered, and should also produce a statutory declaration and furnish a copy thereof to the purchaser to identify the land and to shew the possession thereof by the overseers for the last twenty years, which should be deemed sufficient evidence of title in the vendors, who should not be bound to give or deduce, or the purchaser to require any other evidence of title whatever to the land." Fifth: "that on payment of the remainder of the purchase-money, the purchaser should be entitled, at his own expense, to a conveyance of the land, but should not in such conveyance require any other party or parties to join therein in conveying the land to him except the present overseers of the poor for the time being, and in such conveyance the vendors should not be required to enter into covenants for title, but only that they or any of their predecessors had not to their knowledge done any act to incumber the land," &c.

It was also provided by the eighth condition that if from any cause whatever the contract on the part of the vendors according to these conditions could not be carried out by them, or any dispute should arise between the vendors and the purchaser, the vendors should, at their option, either enforce the contract against the purchaser or be at liberty to rescind the same and return the deposit money, but without interest, each party paying his own expenses.

John Shortridge refused to accept a conveyance of the land from the overseers of the poor, on the ground that it was held upon a special trust for charitable and not for general parochial purposes, and was not legally vested in the overseers, but in the heirs or devisee of the surviving trustee named in the indenture of the 11th of February 1747; he also refused to allow the contract to be rescinded until an application had been made by the overseers to the Court under the act above mentioned, to confirm the sale, and to authorize and enable the overseers to convey the land to him, or until the Court had refused to grant such application. J. Shortridge was willing to complete the purchase on having a conveyance, while at the same time the sale would be for the benefit of the charity. It was not known who of the trustees was the survivor, or in whom the close of land was legally vested.

The petitioners then stated that they were willing to be trustees, and that the purchase-money should be invested until it could be again laid out in land.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Humphry, on behalf of the overseers and other inhabitants of Ecclesall, appeared in support of the petition.

Mr. James appeared for the Attorney General.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I think upon the authority of In re Parke's Charity (1) that I may make the order, and give the trustees power to appoint new trustees, from time to time, when they are reduced to, or below the number of five; but the surviving trustees exercising that power must not be less than three, and at each appointment the number of new trustees to be appointed must not be less than ten. A fortnight's notice of the intention to appoint new trustees, and the names of the persons proposed, must be placed upon the doors of Ecclesall Church; and the trustees are to distribute the income amongst the poor of the parish not receiving parochial relief. The costs of all parties, including those of the Attorney General, to be retained out of the purchase-money.

SPARROW v. THE OXFORD, WORCESTER, AND WOL-VERHAMPTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Part of a Manufactory—Tunnelling.

By the special act for a railway company certain clauses were introduced, requiring the securing to the owner of a certain property particular benefits by arching, making roads, &c., if that property or adjoining property were taken. By another section no building was to be erected on part of the land required by the company; and by another section, the company were required to buy certain specified property. The 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act requires a company, if it takes part, to take the whole of a manufactory, and that act was incorporated with the special act. The company gave notice of an intention to take a small strip of land which was within the boundary line of a manufactory, but which was not, at the time of the passing of the special act, nor at the time of the notice, built upon, but which was soon afterwards covered with buildings:—Held, first, that the land proposed to be taken formed part of a manufactory within the meaning of the 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and secondly, that the sections in the special act were not inconsistent with the 92nd section of the general act.

At the hearing, the company produced evidence to shew that what they required could be attained by making a tunnel under the land, and so not touch any part of the surface; but the Court held, that it was not competent for them to set up such a case at the hearing; and

Semble—that such a tunnel would be taking part of a manufactory; and finally,

Held, that where the construction of an act of parliament, which gives authority for the compulsory taking of land is doubtful, it should be construed most favourably to those who seek to protect the land from innovation.

The bill, in this case, was filed to restrain a railway company from taking part of a manufactory. The company denied that the land they wanted was part of a manufactory. The motion for the injunction was heard, before Vice Chancellor Turner, on the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 13th of November 1851, when he declined to grant it, but did not decide the dispute whether the land was part of a manufactory. On the 21st of November the Lords Justices, differing from the Vice Chancellor, granted an interim injunction, and directed that the question of manufactory or not should be tried at law. Upon this point the case was mentioned several times; but no arrangement could be come to as to the frame of the pleadings, and ultimately it was agreed that each side should file affidavits which should be considered as the evidence in the cause, and the whole dispute be settled by the judgment of their Lordships. The following narrative, principally taken from the earlier part of the very elaborate judgment of Lord Cranworth, contains the substance of the case.

The bill was filed on the 10th of September 1851, the object of which was to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants, the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company, from entering upon, or taking possession of certain pieces of land required by them in the notices they gave on the 25th of June 1851, mentioned in the schedule and the defeazance of the bond, which they afterwards gave; and from proceeding to take measures to acquire the said pieces of land by compulsory purchase. The plaintiffs were Messrs.

Sparrow, one of whom was owner, and both of whom were occupiers of large tin-plate works and manufactory, at Horsley Field, near Wolverhampton, and it appeared that one of those gentlemen purchased the manufactory from some person of the name of Henderson, about three or four years ago, shortly before the time when the particular act of parliament under discussion (the Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company (Deviation) Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. cxxxiii.) passed, which obtained the royal assent on the 14th of August 1848, and soon after they purchased it, it having been left rather in a dilapidated state, they improved it, and added some buildings, which buildings were situate upon the line of the projected railway. The company having been previously incorporated, the act of parliament passed on the 14th of August 1848; and they took no steps with reference to the land they required, for this portion of their intended line at least, until the 25th of June 1851, nearly three years after the royal assent was given to their bill, and nearly, therefore, at the expiration of the time during which they had a power, by compulsory process, of taking land on giving such notice within the time limited for that purpose by the act. They did give a notice to the present plaintiffs that the railway would pass through their land, and that 19½ perches would be required by the company; that it was their intention to take the same, and contract for it; and they thereby offered to contract for the purchase of the plaintiffs' interest, and for compensation for damages, &c. It was such a notice as was required by the act to be given by the company when they wished compulsorily to take land belonging to another person, through whose land the railway was to pass. The plaintiffs, upon the receipt of that notice from the company, delivered a counter-notice, claiming, that if the company took the piece of land which they proposed to take,—a small portion of that which the plaintiffs alleged to be their manufactory,—then they would require the company to take the whole of the manufactory; and that counter-notice which they gave was authorized, as they contended, by the 92nd section of the general act, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and which provides shortly, "That no party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking" (that is, of the railway) "a part only of any house or other building or manufactory, if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof." The company disputed their obligation to take the whole, and contended that they were entitled to take a part only, which was included in their notice, namely, about nineteen perches, being the little portion that ran to the southern end of what the plaintiffs called their manufactory, skirting along the Stour Valley Railway. In this state of things, on the 10th of September 1851, the plaintiffs filed their bill for an injunction to restrain the defendants (the company) from proceeding to take a part only. That was substantially the object of the injunction.

An application was made, shortly after to the Vice Chancellor Turner, to obtain an interim injunction; but His Honour did not grant that injunction, thinking, amongst other grounds for his refusal, that the 92nd section of the general act did not form part of the company's act; that it was not by implication incorporated with it; and there were other grounds also upon which he refused to grant the injunction. The plaintiffs appealed from that decision, and the case was argued, at considerable length, in the month of February last, and on that occasion the Lords Justices considered that all they had then to decide was, whether a sufficient case was made out to make it expedient that, in the mean time, and until the cause could be heard, the defendants should be restrained from doing what they were proposing to do, and that matters should be left in statu quo till the cause was heard; and, thinking that it was expedient, they therefore granted an interim injunction; and, at the same time, by arrangement with the parties, gave them a facility to have the cause heard speedily, both parties agreeing that, instead of examining witnesses, each party should make what affidavits he thought fit, and those affidavits should be treated as evidence in the cause, and that the cause should be set down to be heard before their Lordships speedily, and not in the ordinary course.

Sir W. P. Wood, Mr. Malins, Mr. Shapter, and Mr. Gray, for the plaintiffs, cited the following cases:—

Brocklebank v. the Whitehaven Junction Railway Company, 15 Sim. 632; s.c. 16 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 471.
Barker v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company, 2 De Gex & Sm. 55; s.c. 5 Railw. Cas. 401.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Roll, Mr. J. W. Bovill, and Mr. Willes, for the company, after referring at length to the 12th, 13th, and 14th sections of the special act, which will be found fully stated in the judgment, argued that there would be an absurdity to suppose that the legislature intended the clause in the general act to be incorporated into the special act, the effect of which would be that if the company took part of the Messrs. Sparrow's tin-plate works they must take the whole, and taking the whole they must build arches, make roads, maintain ways, and perform other important acts to their own property, whether they intended or wished to use that property in such manner or not; and that, on the other hand, there was obvious common sense in excluding the 92nd section of the general act from the special act; because, then, all these particular clauses of the special act would be operative to protect the interest of the landowner, his protection and benefit being the grounds for their insertion by the legislature. It was further contended that so much of the land as the company required was no part of the manufactory at the time of the passing of the special act; and, therefore, that the plaintiffs had no right to build on and so deal with this land as to render it so. The land was land, and only land, when the act passed, and if it was rendered something more by the act of the owners they could claim no benefit of such conduct. Lastly, it was argued that as the company only now intended to make a tunnel under the land, instead of over the surface, there was no interference with the entire superficial uses of the land, and therefore the only objection to the taking of the land was utterly untenable. Such a taking of land under the surface was not a taking of part of a manufactory contemplated by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. They cited the following cases:—

Taylor v. Clemson, 3 Railw. Cas. 65, 725.

Doe d. Armistead v. the North Staffordshire Railway Company, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 249.

Regina v. the London and South-Western Railway Company, 12 Q.B. Rep. 775; s.c. 17 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 326.

Sir W. P. Wood was not called upon to reply.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH, after detailing the facts, said,—The question now is, upon this hearing, whether or not the plaintiffs have entitled themselves to the relief which they ask. There are two main questions for consideration: one a question of fact, and the other a question of law. The question of fact is this: whether that which the defendants propose to take does, within the meaning of the general act, constitute a "part of the manufactory;" and, secondly, the question of law is, supposing it to constitute part of the manufactory, are they enabled to take it without taking the whole? Now, on the question of fact, that again divides itself into two questions: one of which is, perhaps, rather a question of law and of fact, arising out of the consideration of that which is mere fact.

What they propose to take is, a certain piece of land enclosed within the wall that surrounded the manufactory, but which, at the time the act passed, was not covered with buildings, though it was within the wall of that which is called the manufactory. Soon after the passing of the act (the plaintiffs having made their purchase just before the act passed) considerable additional buildings were put upon that piece of land, which was vacant at the time the act passed, or the greater portion of it was vacant; the whole, probably, was vacant when the act passed; additional buildings were put upon it, and there can be no possible doubt but that these additional buildings constitute part of the manufactory in the strictest sense; but then it was contended, that what was to be looked at was, not the state of matters when the company proceeded to take the land, but the state of the property at the time when they gave the notice; and it was said, at that time those buildings did not exist; at that time it was vacant ground, within the wall, it is true, of the manufactory, but not having any manufacturing process carried on upon it, and therefore not constituting, within the meaning of the act, part of the manufactory. Now, we do not feel it necessary to decide the question, as a matter of law, whether what is to be regarded is the state of the property at the time the act passed or at the time when the land was taken by the company. We do not consider it at all necessary in the case to look at or to discuss that question; because we are both most clearly of opinion, without the least difficulty or hesitation, that this was, to all intents and purposes, part of the manufactory at the time the act received the royal assent; and we think so, as a jury coming to the conclusion what did or did not, at that time, constitute a part of the manufactory. Well, on all these questions there may be nice lines sometimes, on which it may be difficult to say on which side of the line a particular piece of land or a particular building lies; whether it be outside, so as not to be part of the manufactory, or inside, so as to be part of the manufactory. But we do not feel ourselves driven to any refined discussion about this case, because, looking at the model submitted to our inspection, which is agreed to be an accurate representation, it appears (I speak this only for myself) that there is singularly little of vacant space within the wall. I can easily believe what one or two of the witnesses said, that they were always pressed for room in order to have a place where they might deposit their rubbish and the scoria that came from the furnaces. The manufactory could not go on without that, any more than it could go on without the furnace itself. It seems to me, and I am sure also, to my learned Brother, to be perfectly clear that, in this case, everything included within the wall constitutes part of the manufactory. Sometimes there is a little vacant space between the buildings and the wall, which is meant for the purpose of enclosing and surrounding that which evidently, and particularly, and rationally constitutes part of the manufactory. Therefore, it seems to me to be perfectly immaterial to consider whether the buildings were on that vacant space after the act received the royal assent, or whether we are to consider the state of the property after the buildings were erected, or before, because, whether considered in the one light or the other, they clearly constituted part of the manufactory, within the only rational meaning that could be attributed to that word.

Then, constituting part of the manufactory, the company giving notice that they would take a piece of land that constituted part of the manufactory, are they, or are they not, bound to take the whole of the manufactory? Now, that depends upon a question of law, whether or not the 92nd section, which I have already read, was or was not, expressly or impliedly, incorporated into the special act (11 & 12 Vict. c. cxxxiii). Now, Mr. Willes referred to the language of the Lands Clauses Act itself, to shew (as if that was the test) whether it was incorporated or not. It may be one mode of ascertaining it; but it is not the best mode. The best mode is to look at the special act, and see what the special act says. The second clause of that act says, "Be it enacted, that the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act shall, so far as the same are applicable, and are not inconsistent with the provisions hereinafter contained, be incorporated with and form part of this act." Now, it is not disputed that the provisions of the 92nd section are applicable in the sense in which the words are thus used; but what was contended was, that the 92nd section was inconsistent with the provision thereinafter contained; and it is upon that point that we have had—the greatest difficulty I will not say,—but I will say the greatest pressure upon our minds; because it appears to have been the opinion of a Judge of the highest eminence, and for whom we both, in common with all the profession, feel the most profound respect, that it was not incorporated with the act; therefore we have felt very diffident (I speak for myself, and, I may say, my learned Brother is diffident) of the opinion we have formed; and the reason is, because it certainly clearly appears to us that it is to be decided in the contrary way from that which Vice Chancellor Turner decided. We thought it almost clear from the beginning, that there was nothing in any of the subsequent provisions inconsistent with the notion of the 92nd section being incorporated in that act; and I proceed, therefore, shortly to see what are the grounds on which it was contended, here and before the Vice Chancellor, that the 92nd section was not incorporated as being inconsistent with the act.

Now, I think the argument has always proceeded upon a fallacy. It was assumed that the 92nd section was imperative; it was assumed that the enactment was, that they must take it; whereas it only is, that they must take it if the other party requires it to be taken; but it would have been the height of injustice to enact that in all cases they must take it in invitum. The owners of the manufactory might say, in many cases, "It is quite immaterial whether you take the whole or not; it is immaterial to us whether you take merely this part or the whole;" and then they are not bound to take the rest. It seems to me, the whole argument on the part of the defendants has proceeded on this fallacy; for when one looks at the different arguments which have been deduced from the 12th, 13th, and 14th sections, and considering that the 92nd section is not that under all circumstances the land must be taken, but only that it must be taken if the owner of the manufactory requires it to be taken, all the difficulty appears to me to vanish.

The 13th section, which was mainly relied on, has enactments to this effect. It appears that a gentleman of the name of Crane was the owner of other adjoining land to this manufactory, and by arrangement between the plaintiffs (the owners of this property) and Mr. Crane, for their common convenience, it was arranged that there should be a side line, as it is called, a little private railway, that was to run on for the accommodation both of the plaintiffs' works and Mr. Crane's, for a considerable way down to the west, so as to join, not this railway, but the Stour Valley Railway, evidently with a view to the accommodation of those parties who were interested in that side line or private railway. The 13th section enacted, "that such part of the railway by that act authorized to be made as should pass through any of the several plots, pieces, or parcels of land, in the parish of Wolverhampton, &c., numbered 159, 160, 161, and 162, on the plan, and so much of the piece of land numbered 158 as was thereafter defined," (that is, those pieces of land on which this side line or private railway was to be formed,) "should be arched or covered over, &c.; and such arching or covering should commence at the centre of the south-eastern pier of the sixth arch of the Birmingham, Wolverhampton and Stour Valley Railway Viaduct now erecting, &c.; and such arching or covering should be contrived in such manner and of such strength as should make it sufficient to bear and carry over and upon the same a branch railway, or branch railways to be worked by horse power; and in case the owner or owners for the time being, and other parties interested in the said plots, pieces or parcels of land, and the said company should differ as to the manner of constructing, or as to the strength of such arching or covering, the same should be settled by arbitration in manner prescribed by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to the settlement of disputes by arbitration."

Now, the argument was, that that provision is inconsistent with the notion that the company should take the whole of this manufactory; if so, it was said, for what purpose make an enactment about making a railway, which will in truth be their own railway? They might deal with it as they thought fit. But there are two answers to that: first, the answer I have already hinted at, namely, that non constat the railway company would be called upon to take the manufactory, it might be that the plaintiffs might choose to retain their manufactory, and then this secures to them the benefit; and secondly, there is another argument which completely satisfies this clause, which is this, that this side line or private railway was not for the exclusive benefit of those parties: certainly one other proprietor, Mr. Crane, was interested. I do not know that I rightly collected whether any other persons were or not—it is quite immaterial. There is no doubt the party mainly interested was Mr. Crane; therefore, the provision in the 13th section was absolutely necessary to secure Mr. Crane if there is nobody else interested in the private railway—it was absolutely necessary to secure the interests of the plaintiffs if they should not call upon the defendants, under the 92nd section, to take the whole of the manufactory. Therefore, it seems to me that there is nothing whatever inconsistent with the 13th section in supposing that the 92nd section was to have its full operation.

With regard to the 14th section, it is there by enacted "that the owner or owners for the time being of the said several plots, pieces or parcels of land last hereinbefore mentioned, and all other persons interested therein, shall have and enjoy the same powers, rights, privileges, easements and authorities over and above and upon the upper surface of the said arching or covering, including the power of making, maintaining and working the said branch railway or railways, to be worked by horse power as aforesaid, over and upon the said arching or covering as the said owner or owners or other persons now have and enjoy in, upon and over the said several plots, &c., provided always, that the said owner or owners or other persons shall not be at liberty to erect upon the said arching or covering any building or buildings without the consent in writing of the said company," &c. Now, it is argued that what the 14th section shews is this, that it is impossible that the 92nd section can be considered as incorporated, for this reason, when this railway was made there was a provision in the 14th section, that no buildings should be erected upon the new side line or private railway (which included part of that which therefore is now to be taken from the plaintiffs) without the consent, in writing, of the company. They would be running over this railway, therefore the company were interested in seeing that nothing should be done to damage them. For what purpose, it is said, stipulate for that, if the company itself is to become the proprietor of the manufactory, as an adjunct to which the private railway is to be erected? But the same answer applies. The company may become the proprietors, and then this would become superfluous. Of course they could not give a consent in writing to themselves. They may do what they think fit with their own property. It may be that they may not become the proprietors, then such stipulation is necessary.

Then, again Mr. Willes has particularly directed our attention to the 12th section, which he says is inconsistent with the notion that the 92nd section was part of this act. The 12th section provides that certain properties as they are called, numbered respectively 90, 91, 130, 131 and 140 (being, I will assume for the present, all of them manufactories; they are all either houses or manufactories, or something that would come within the same class as that which is referred to in section 92.)—the 12th section enacts, that the company shall, and they are hereby required to purchase all these properties, being all included within the line of deviation, but not apparently according to the parliamentary plan that was handed up to us, not the properties that would be taken, unless there should be a deviation from the intended line of railway. Then, it is said, for what purpose do you enact that these particular manufactories should be taken when the 92nd section would have effected all the purposes? That is a complete fallacy. The 92nd section only gives authority to the owner of a manufactory to insist upon the whole being taken if any part is taken, while this enactment, as to the properties numbered 90, 91, 130, 131, and 140, positively stipulates that they shall take the whole of it. It is obvious on looking at the plan, that a large portion of this must have been taken in some way to stop the mouths of the opposing parties, who were the owners of properties, because they cannot use them all for the purposes of the railway; they are all along out of the line that was contemplated, though within the line of deviation; and therefore, I conclude, it was to buy off opposition that this enactment was introduced. It is sufficient for the purposes of the present object to say, that it is a perfectly different enactment from the 92nd section. The 92nd section does not say that you shall take every manufactory that is within your line of deviation; but it says, if you take a part of the manufactory you shall, if the owner wishes it, take the whole of the manufactory. What is enacted by the 12th section is different, namely, with regard to five several manufactories within the line of deviation, but not probably in the line that will be touched by the railway, you shall take and pay for those whether you use them or not. It appears that this also wholly fails as a reason for inducing us to suppose that the 92nd section is inconsistent with the provisions of this act. * * Now, that being the state of the case, the conclusion at which we have arrived is, that, in point of fact, the property that the railway company has given notice to take was, at the time they gave the notice, part of the manufactory, and that the 92nd section entitles the owners of the remaining part of that manufactory to insist upon the whole being taken.

The only remaining question (which has now been raised for the first time—it came upon us entirely by surprise), is that, although they had given notice in the ordinary way that they meant to take the land, they are now entitled, if they cannot take the land, to burrow under it as it were, to make a tunnel, which they say they are able and willing to do without taking or touching any part of the surface. It is a sufficient answer to that argument to say, that it has been raised since the matter was before us, and since we granted the interim injunction. The notice is a notice which entitles them to take the land if they are not restrained from proceeding under that notice. Many arguments were urged to shew the title of the defendants to make a tunnel. It was said, suppose the manufactory was at the top of a hill, and you were burrowing under it, at the distance of 1,000 feet, are you then taking part of the manufactory? I do not feel myself called upon to answer that question; but if I were, I rather believe that you are, on the principle of the maxim "Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad inferos." Do you mean to say that if you were an inch below the surface you would not take a part of the manufactory? It might all fall down if you undermined any portion of it; and I am rather inclined to think that, however deep below, it would be within that enactment. If that has been a casus omissus, I think it ought to be construed in a way most favourable to those who have been seeking to defend their property from innovation. I do not think that arises, because here is a notice to take the land, and upon that notice they are proceeding to take it in the ordinary way. That is virtually what was contemplated when the notice was given; and it is perfectly obvious from the language of the bond they gave, that that is what they are to do; for they have given a bond under the 83rd section to enter, and in that bond they have stated thus, that 150*l.* has been assessed as the value of the purchase in fee simple of the messuage, tenements, hereditaments, and the several lands mentioned numbered 161, and that 350*l.* has been assessed as the value for severance. It is perfectly obvious that what is meant is, that they are to take land, and pay 150*l.* for the value of the building, and 350*l.* for the inconvenience occasioned by the severance. This is the way they put it themselves; and I cannot but come to the conclusion that this is a mere afterthought. I do not think they would have the liberty of doing it, unless they had given a proper notice for the purpose; but it is quite obvious either they are entitled under this notice to take the land or to do nothing.

I think, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief they ask. The injunction, therefore, will be made perpetual in the terms in which it was made before, except with this suggestion: that there should be something, I think, of this sort:—the plaintiffs being ready and willing, and undertaking to make a good title to the same, and to convey the same. I suppose there will be no difficulty about that. Of course, if they have not a good title to the manufactory they will not be able and willing to convey it.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I have but a very few words to say after what Lord Cranworth has said, being very clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree,—perhaps the few words I am about to say are superfluous. I continue to entertain an opinion differing from the judgment which I hold in the highest respect and estimation, upon the question of the effect of the 12th, 13th and 14th sections. I am of opinion for the mere reason that it is competent to the plaintiffs, if they should think fit, to sell part and not the whole, that those three sections do not prevent the application or incorporation of the 92nd section in the special act. I am, however, clearly of opinion, upon the undisputed facts of the case, that, whether the state of the property at the time when the notice of June last was given, or at the time of the passing of the special act, is regarded for the purpose, the land which the company require is part of the plaintiffs' manufactory within the meaning of the 92nd section, incorporated, as I have said that I think it is, in the special act. * *

Then, with regard to the design now said to be practicable, and intended, of carrying the railway under the surface of the land in question, in such a manner as not to disturb or interfere with it, one sufficient answer to that has been stated independently of others that might be given, which is this, that the notice of June was a notice to purchase merely and absolutely the fee simple of the land specified in it. That notice (whether amounting to a contract or a declaration of intention, forbidden by law to be receded from, is of no importance) had the effect of a contract, and, moreover, the effect of giving the plaintiffs the right to say that their lands should not be taken, that their land should not be used (I mean the land mentioned in the contract), unless if they desired to sell the whole of the manufactory, the defendants should purchase it. From that position the defendants, however desirous to recede, are, in my opinion, not entitled to recede.

Substantially, therefore, I agree entirely that the decree must be with the plaintiffs; and I believe that my learned Brother also agrees with me, that these defendants ought to pay the costs of the suit, including the costs of the original motion for the injunction.

LORDS JUSTICES.

Feb. 27.

WELLESLEY v. WELLESLEY.
THE COUNTESS OF MORN-INGTON v. THE EARL OF MORNINGTON.

Married Woman suing in Formâ Pauperis
—Costs.

The Court of Chancery having given a married lady leave to sue in formâ pauperis, on evidence that she could not procure a next friend, made a decree in her favour. One of the defendants appealed, but the appeal was dismissed, with costs:—Held, that the appellant defendant must pay the lady herself dives costs.

On the 23rd of July 1848, the Countess of Mornington, then living apart from her husband, obtained from the late Vice Chancellor of England leave to sue in formâ pauperis, on an affidavit of her poverty, and that she was unable to procure any one to act as her next friend. In the month of July 1849 the two above-mentioned causes came to a hearing, the question being whether the lady had a right to have all the means which were put in the power of Lord Mornington (one of the defendants), acted upon by Lord Wellesley, his son by a former marriage, (the other defendant), so as to carry into effect as far as possible a certain agreement, under which Lady Mornington would be entitled to an annuity of 1,000*l.* a year, when the same learned Judge decided in the lady's favour. From this decree Lord Wellesley appealed; but, after hearing arguments, their Lordships, being of opinion that there was "no colour, no shadow, no pretence for the appeal," agreed that it must be dismissed, and, if possible, with costs. Counsel were, therefore, directed to argue the question whether the lady, a peeress of the realm, having sued as a pauper, could claim her costs on the dismissal of an unsuccessful appeal, in the usual way.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Nalder, for the appellant, submitted that the plaintiff, suing in formâ pauperis, was only entitled to such costs as she had sustained out of pocket; but no cases were cited.

Mr. Rolt, Mr. Willcock, and Mr. Free-ling, for Lady Mornington, argued that being successful, her ladyship was entitled to the costs in the same manner as any other suitor, and relied on, as a modern authority, the case of Rubery v. Morris (1), where Lord Cottenham laid it down that it was "most consistent with principle, and most reconcileable with the weight of authority, to hold that any party asserting an unfounded claim by a bill, or resisting a well-founded claim by answer, should not profit by the poverty of his opponent, but should, upon failure, pay the ordinary costs of the litigation."

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The reason is plain enough: professional men are engaged to afford their aid and experience to the pauper, and not to the pauper's opponent. These costs ought, in my opinion, according to the weight of authorities, to be dives costs; but then comes the difficulty, there being no next friend to whom they are to be paid. The Countess is a married lady, and therefore the Earl would be entitled to the money when paid. I can hardly conceive it possible that Lord Mornington will interfere with their receipt.

Mr. Lloyd.—Lord Wellesley, the unsuccessful appellant, is in this difficulty: that he is ordered to pay costs, and, conversely, the hand to receive those costs is uncertain. He may incur hazard of double payment should he pay to the wrong person.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—If the Court had authority to permit Lady Mornington to sue without a next friend, and that authority has not been called in question, it has now authority to do all necessary acts consequential upon it. The costs must be the usual dives costs, and the order will be made in the ordinary way: and, on the one hand, if there be any difficulty raised whether Lady Mornington can receive them, her ladyship can come to the Court, while, on the other hand, if Lord Wellesley finds any difficulty on the point spoken of on his behalf, he, too, can come here, and this Court will hear him. At present the order is, that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

Lunacy—Leave to attend Inquisition.

A party interested under a deed executed ten years back was allowed to attend the execution of a commission de lunatico inquiring when the lunacy was alleged to have existed for a period antecedent to the date of the deed, but upon an undertaking to abide by such order as the Court might make as to the party's own costs and the increased costs occasioned by the attendance at the inquisition.

The petition in this case was presented by an infant by his next friend, which stated that a commission de lunatico inquiring had been issued against Mr. Richards, of which the petitioner had received no notice, and of which he had only casually heard within the last three days; that the commission was issued on an allegation of a lunacy having existed for thirty-five years; that Mr. Richards, the alleged lunatic, had, by deed, dated the 14th of January 1842, made a settlement of his property, whereby, after reserving a life interest to himself, he settled a life interest on the father of the petitioner, then a life interest on the infant himself, and then declared various trusts over for the benefit of other parties; that the commission was issued at the instance of a first cousin and of a third cousin of the alleged lunatic, and that the petitioner was the child of a first cousin; that the petitioner's father was dead, and that the petitioner was therefore interested in the property, subject only to the life estate of the alleged lunatic; that the day appointed for the holding of the inquisition was the 1st of April then next, and that the petitioner feared great injury would result to him unless he were permitted to be represented at the hearing of such commission, and he therefore prayed leave to attend accordingly.

Sir W. P. Wood and Mr. Locock Webb, in support of the petition.—In Re Nesbitt (1), before Lord Cottenham, the rule is recognized, which is not now denied, that mere relationship without interest will not give a title to ask leave of the Court to be present at the execution of a commission. But his Lordship, on a petition by parties who were interested under a settlement, praying for leave to attend, distinctly declared that the application was in the discretion of the Court, and added, "It is for the interest of all parties that the truth should be ascertained; and therefore, although it occasions some additional expense, unless the estate be a very poor one, it is desirable that they should have leave to attend." That this infant has an interest no one can dispute, and a very material interest too, and that there is hazard of that interest not being properly protected except by an attendance on his behalf is but too probable, since he had no notice of the issuing of the commission.

Mr. Karlake, contra.—The only recognized ground for the allowance of any party to attend at the execution of an inquisition such as this, is the protection of the interest of the alleged lunatic; and so it is laid down in Ex parte Snook, in re Watts (2), by Lord Lyndhurst, where his Lordship said he would not be the first to make an order giving leave for the attendance of a party whose object was not to shew that the person was not insane, but to fix a particular date to the commencement of the lunacy, with a view to his own interest, and not to the interest of the lunatic. And on a subsequent day and on another petition in the same matter, Lord Lyndhurst said, "I do not think there is any case to be found in which a party has been allowed to intervene for an object of the kind here stated, I mean where the object is not to benefit the lunatic, but the party himself who makes the application." That case seems from the report not to have been mentioned again. Now, the allegation of this petition that the petitioner fears that great injury will result to him if the execution of the commission be not attended on his behalf, shews that the purpose was not the benefit of the alleged lunatic, but the advantage of some other party; and therefore, on the authority of Ex parte Snook and of Ex parte Newbury (3), recognizing the same principle, the petition ought to be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Speaking for myself I should have been disposed, without the authority cited in support of the petition, to grant the prayer. My impression is, that, as counsel, I have been engaged to attend the execution of an inquisition for the sole purpose of seeing that the lunacy was not carried back beyond a certain date, my clients being no further interested than in that fact. Here the purpose for which the attendance is sought, is plain. If the petitioners will undertake to abide by any order the Court may make as to costs—not only their own costs, but the costs so far as they may be increased by their attendance at the inquisition—I am disposed to give leave to the infant by his next friend to attend. I do not say I should not have acted upon the reasoning given in the petition; but the fact that the lunacy is said to have existed for thirty-five years is quite sufficient for me.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I consider that the order should be made on the undertaking spoken of by my learned Brother being given. The object of the attendance—a very reasonable object—of course is, to prevent the finding of the jury overriding the settlement.

Sir W. P. Wood.—The undertaking is given, and the order, therefore, will be as prayed.

Mr. Cole opposed it, and cited Drinan v. Mannix (1).

Will—Construction—Power of Sale—Devise of Trust Estates.

A. devised freehold and leasehold estates to B. and C, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with a power for B. and C, or the survivor of them, his heirs, executors and administrators, to sell the devised property. A. survived B, and died, leaving C. his heir-at-law, and having by his will devised all his trust estates to C. and D, and appointed them his executors:—Held, that neither C. alone, nor C. and D. together, had the power of selling estates devised by A.

The case of Wilson v. Bennett is reported in 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 279.

After the decision in that case had been pronounced, it was ascertained that S. Wilson was the heir-at-law of the surviving trustee. The special case was amended by inserting that fact, and was set down to be argued again.

The case then assumed this form.—N. Hyde devised his real, personal, copyhold, and leasehold estate to J. Hyde, J. Wilson, and J. Leigh, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and empowered his trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, his heirs, executors and administrators, to sell his said property. J. Wilson survived the other trustees, and died leaving S. Wilson his heir-at-law, and having, by his will, appointed S. Wilson and P. Wilson to be his executors, and devised to them all the estates vested in him on trust.

The question argued was, whether S. Wilson, as the heir of the surviving trustee, and S. Wilson and P. Wilson, as the devisees of the trust estates, could compel a purchaser to take a title from them.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Humphry, and Mr. Russell and Mr. Hardy, and Mr. Osborne, for the different parties.

PARKER, V.C. said, that the case of Cooke v. Crawford had often been misunderstood. It was not an authority that a trustee ought not to devise trust estates, but that, if a trustee had an estate and also a power, he might devise the estate, but could not devise the power. The present title was too doubtful to compel a purchaser to accept it. The power was intended to be exercised by the persons who had the estate; and, now that the estate and power had been severed, the persons who entered into the contract had not the power to sell the estate. The contract could not be enforced.

Will—Construction—Residuary Bequest—Children living at Death.

A testator gave to his wife all his stock in trade, working jewellery and implements of every description whatsoever, and all his book debts, ready cash, money in the funds, bills, bonds, notes, or other securities whatsoever, for her life, if she should so long continue his widow; but at her death, or second marriage, he gave the said stock in trade, monies, debts and assets, and also all his household furniture, to be equally divided among the children he then had, or might thereafter have. But in case his wife should not marry again, then the testator bequeathed to her, all and every his personal estate and effects whatsoever for her life, and the same to be equally divided amongst such of his children as should be living at her decease, share and share alike:—Held, that the first clause in the will was not intended to be a specific bequest, and the last a residuary bequest; but that both clauses were intended to deal with the whole property, and were applicable to different events: the first applying to the testator's widow marrying again, the latter to her dying without marrying again; and the latter event being the one which happened, the children living at her death became entitled, to the exclusion of the representatives of those who had died.

A question was raised in this case upon the construction of the will of Clarke Wiggins, a working jeweller, dated the 17th of September 1809, which was in the following terms:—"First, I will and direct that all my just debts, funeral expenses, and the expenses of proving this my will be fully paid and discharged by my executrix hereinafter named, as soon as conveniently may be after my decease. And I hereby give and bequeath to my dear wife, Ann Wiggins, all and every my stock in trade, working jewellery and implements of every description whatsoever, and also all my book debts, sum and sums of money due or owing to me from any person or persons whomsoever, all the ready cash that may be in my house at the time of my decease, money in the public stocks or funds, bills, bonds, notes, or other securities whatsoever, for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue my widow. But it is my mind and will that at her death, or in case she marry again after my decease, then that the said stock in trade, monies, debts and effects, and also all my household furniture, which I hereby give to her for her sole use and benefit, for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue my widow, shall belong to, and I do hereby give and devise the same to be equally divided, share and share alike, among the children that I now have, or may hereafter have by my said wife. But in case my wife, Ann Wiggins, shall not marry again after my decease, then I do hereby will and direct that she shall peaceably have and enjoy, and I do hereby give and bequeath to her all and every my personal estate and effects whatsoever, for and during the term of her natural life, and the same to be equally divided to and amongst such of my children as shall be living at her decease, share and share alike. And I do hereby appoint my said dear wife sole executrix of this my will; hereby revoking all former wills by me at any time heretofore made."

The testator died soon after the date of his will (which was proved on the 5th of October 1809), leaving his widow and six children surviving him. A suit was then instituted by the children against their mother for an account, and upon a decree in the suit, the property of the testator was ordered to be brought into court. The widow having lately died, leaving three children only surviving her, the said three children presented a petition, praying that they might be declared entitled to the money equally between them. This was opposed by the representatives of the three deceased children who claimed to be entitled to share in the property.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Eddis, in support of the petition, contended that there were two distinct clauses in this will. In the first, provision was made by the testator for his widow marrying again, and in that case all his children were to share equally in the property; but, in the second clause, the testator provided that if his widow should die without marrying again, those children only who should be alive at her decease were to take. It was clear that the testator intended to give the whole of his property in both clauses. The second event contemplated was that which happened, and consequently the petitioners, who were the only children alive at the death of the widow, would be entitled to the whole of the property, equally to be divided between them.

Sherratt v. Bentley, 2 Myl. & K. 149.
Morrall v. Sutton, 1 Ph. 533; s. c. 14
 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 266.

Mr. Chandless and Mr. Fisher, contra, submitted that the evident intention of the testator was to provide for all his children; but if the latter clause were to prevail, independently of the first, the issue of deceased children would be wholly unprovided for. The first clause was, in fact, a specific bequest, and the latter clause was a residuary bequest. If it were held that both clauses comprised the whole of the property, then they would be repugnant, and the general intention of the testator must be collected from the whole will. There could be no reason for supposing that, in the event of his widow marrying again, the testator meant to give the property to all his children, but if she should not marry again, then only to such children as were living at her death: such an intention would be repugnant to common sense.

The following authorities were cited :—

Cook v. Oakley, 1 P. Wms. 302.
Rawlings v. Jennings, 13 Ves. 39.
Sims v. Doughty, 5 Ves. 243.

Judgment reserved.

May 5.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—This will is very inartificially and inaccurately drawn, but one thing is clear, namely, that it was the testator's intention that his widow was to have the whole of his personal estate during her life, provided she so long continued his widow; and after her death, or after her second marriage, it is also clear that he meant the property to go to some class or classes of his children, either to all, or to some class; and with regard to the benefit which he intended for the wife, it was that her life interest should be determinable on her second marriage.

Now, the last clause in the will is as distinct as it is possible for anything to be. "In case my wife shall not marry again, then I hereby will and direct that she shall peaceably have and enjoy, and I do hereby give and bequeath to her all and every my personal estate and effects whatsoever, for and during the term of her natural life." So far, nothing can be more plain and distinct, but that if she continues single and his widow after the testator's death, she is to have and enjoy the whole of his personal estate and effects whatsoever during the term of her natural life; then it goes on, "and the same to be equally divided to and amongst such of my children as shall be living at her decease, share and share alike." So far, of course, if there had been nothing more in the will it is clear that there never could be an argument raised on the question, and that is the very event which has happened.

But then there is the clause in the prior part of the will, on which the question is raised, whether that prior part of the will does not vary the construction which ought to be put on the plain words of the last clause. By that prior part of the will the testator has purported to give to his wife (not in terms) all and every his personal estate whatsoever, by description, in this way, "all and every my stock in trade, working jewellery and implements of every description whatsoever," that is a specific portion; "also all book debts," that is another specific portion; "sum and sums of money, ready cash in my house," &c., that is another specific portion of the personal estate; "money in the public stocks or funds, bills, bonds, notes or other securities," and so on. In this manner he gives a variety of goods and chattels personal, not in terms, comprising the whole of his personalty; indeed, it is clear that he could not have intended to comprise the whole of his personal estate, because in the very next branch of the will he mentions another kind of personal property, which he knew that he had, and therefore merely meaning to describe some parts, "for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue my widow; but it is my mind and will that after her death, or in case she marry again after my decease, then that the said stock in trade, monies, debts and effects" (the whole of which he had before described), "and also all my household furniture, which I hereby give to her for her sole use and benefit, for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue my widow, shall 'belong to,'" (that is another specific portion of personal estate); "and I do hereby give and devise the same to be equally divided share and share alike among" (not the children living at her death, or at her second marriage, but among) "the children that I now have or may hereafter have."

Now, I observe, that the testator's will is dated the 17th of September 1809, the precise date of his death is not stated, but I find that the will was proved on the 5th of October 1809,—that is, the will was proved eighteen days after the date of the will, and I must, therefore, presume that the testator must have died almost immediately after making his will,—a very few days after; and I think, at least, that it is a fair presumption, that what his personal estate consisted of at the time of his death was precisely the same as at the execution of the will, nothing being shewn to the contrary; and it therefore appears, and I think I may fairly assume, that it was the same personalty which he had just before been describing. It appears to me that I may fairly suppose that in the prior portion of the gift, although he describes it only by specific items, he did, in fact, describe seriatim the whole of his personal estate. I at first thought it possible that the prior gift was only a specific bequest, and the latter a general residuary clause; but I think I may fairly assume that the residuary clause would, in that case, have been expressed in special terms; here he says, "all and every my personal estate and effects whatsoever," and that is all that is capable of constituting a residuary clause; but looking at the whole of the will, the question is, whether the prior clause is not inaccurately expressed, in making that prior clause depend upon the residuary clause. Looking at the whole will, therefore, it appears to me that it was a very fair interpretation, which was suggested by counsel, that the first clause meant to apply to the case of the widow marrying again, and the second, not marrying again; but that both clauses meant to deal with the whole personal estate; why he should direct that if she did marry again, the property was to be divided between all the children, but if not, to go to the children living at her death, I confess I do not quite understand, although he might have had a reason: as it stands, however, it appears merely capricious, but it does not appear to me to be worth consideration. Then, it might have happened that a child might have married, died, and left issue during the widow's life, which would have been unprovided for; but that consideration is not enough to lead to the conclusion that the prior clause was merely giving specific portions, the remainder to be given by a residuary clause; and another consideration which tends to confirm my view is, that if, as the plaintiff contends, the latter clause is a residuary clause only, and the prior, specific; then, in the event of the widow marrying again, the residuary personal estate is entirely undisposed of during the remainder of her life; this would produce an intestacy, because the residuary estate would thus be undisposed of, but this is not, therefore, conclusive. Upon the fair construction of the will, I think, there must be a declaration that, in the events which have happened, the whole personal estate, on the death of Ann Wiggins, should go to the three children who survived her.

GRAY v. GRAY.

Trust, Intention to create.

*A testatrix, by her will, gave 2,000*l.* stock to two trustees, in trust, to pay the dividends to the plaintiff for her separate use; and after making her will, she expressed her intention of giving a further sum of 2,000*l.* to the plaintiff upon the same trusts. One trustee died during the life of the testatrix; the surviving trustee transferred two separate sums of 2,000*l.* stock, at two different times, into her own name, and gave the plaintiff a power of attorney to receive the dividends upon both sums. There was evidence to prove that the trustee knew of the desire of the testatrix to give the second sum of 2,000*l.* to the plaintiff, and that the trustee had expressed her intention of carrying that desire into effect. The trustee afterwards became of unsound mind:—Held, that the second sum of 2,000*l.* so transferred by the trustee was sufficiently impressed with a trust in favour of the plaintiff.*

This bill was filed by Harriet Gray, a legatee under the will of Mary Margaret Cave, against the executors of the will, for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that a sum of 2,000*l.* reduced annuities, which had formed part of the testatrix's estate, was impressed with a trust in favour of the plaintiff. The testatrix, by her will, dated in November 1843, gave a sum of 2,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. consols, part of a larger sum in the same stock standing in her name, to her brother, David Cave, absolutely. She also gave the sum of 2,000*l.* consols to David Cave and her sister, Cecilia Cave, in trust, for the benefit of the plaintiff, Mrs. Gray, who was also a sister of the testatrix, during the life of herself and her husband, for her separate use; and if the plaintiff survived her husband, then the said 2,000*l.* stock was to be for her own use, but if she died in his lifetime, then the said stock was to fall into the residuary personal estate of the testatrix. And the residue of her personal estate the testatrix gave to Cecilia Cave.

After the date of the will, David Cave, the brother of the testatrix, died; and the bill alleged that the testatrix, previously to her decease, had intimated to Cecilia Cave, her sister and the only surviving trustee of her will, that, in consequence of the death of her brother David, she wished to alter her will, and to give the sum of 2,000*l.*, which she had bequeathed to David Cave, to the plaintiff, in addition to the other 2,000*l.* which she had given her by her will. That the testatrix was, for some months before her decease, in a very weak and infirm state of health, and had not sufficient strength, except at great personal inconvenience, to attend to any alteration in her will, but that she had exacted a promise from Cecilia Cave that the said 2,000*l.* so bequeathed to David Cave should be given to the plaintiff.

In support of these allegations, there was the evidence of W. Woodward, a nephew of the testatrix, who deposed that, after the death of the testatrix, and on the 29th of July 1845, he had accompanied his two aunts, the plaintiff, Mrs. Gray, and the defendant, Cecilia Cave, to the Bank of England, and was present when the said Cecilia Cave executed two transfers of stock, each of 2,000*l.* consols, which had formed part of the testatrix's estate, into her own name. That the transfers were effected by a stockbroker, named Chant, who at the time suggested that, as one of the sums of 2,000*l.* was to be held by the said Cecilia Cave in trust for the plaintiff, and the other sum of 2,000*l.* was for her own benefit, it would be better that the two sums should be placed in different stocks; and accordingly one of such sums was transferred in the name of Cecilia Cave into the 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities and the other sum was allowed to remain in the 3*l.* per cent. consols. That upon the occasion of such transfers being made, the said Cecilia Cave stated to the deponent that she knew it had been the intention of the testatrix, Mary Margaret Cave, to increase the legacy to the plaintiff to 4,000*l.* in consequence of the death of David Cave. That the testatrix had mentioned this intention to her upon several occasions, and had desired her to carry out this intention, saying, she wished her sister, the plaintiff, to have the other 2,000*l.* upon the same trusts as the original legacy bequeathed to her. The deponent further stated that the said Cecilia Cave had declared to him that she should carry out her late sister's instructions.

There was also evidence to prove that, on the 12th of August 1845, the said Cecilia Cave added 2,000*l.* to the said 2,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, making that sum 4,000*l.*; and that the plaintiff had ever since received the dividends upon the whole sum of 4,000*l.* under a power of attorney executed by Cecilia Cave. It further appeared that Mr. Chant, the stockbroker, was still living, but had become subject to infirmity of memory, and was unable to give any testimony regarding this transaction; and that Cecilia Cave had, since these transactions, become of unsound mind.

Mr. Walker and Mr. Terrell appeared for the plaintiff, and cited—

May 8. — KINDERSLEY, V.C. after stating the facts of the case, said — The question here is, whether the second sum of 2,000*l.* transferred by Cecilia Cave into her name in the Reduced Bank Annuities is so completely impressed with a trust in favour of the plaintiff that it can be enforced in a court of equity. When the case was argued, I felt some doubt about it; but I must confess that, after consideration, I have come to the conclusion, that there is a complete trust. There is no doubt whatever that the first sum of 2,000*l.*

3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities, which was bought and transferred into the name of Cecilia Cave on the 29th of July, was a complete appropriation of that sum to satisfy the legacy to the plaintiff given by the will, for it was transferred into her name as the sole surviving trustee. No doubt, if David Cave had been living it would have been placed in the joint names of him and of Cecilia Cave. By the evidence of Mr. Woodward (the nephew of the plaintiff and of Cecilia Cave), who does not appear to have any interest in the matter, it is sufficiently proved, as against Cecilia Cave, that it was the intention of the testatrix to have increased the legacy to the plaintiff, and that she meant to carry out what the testatrix had desired. Then it appears that on the 12th of August, after the first 2,000*l.* had been transferred, Cecilia Cave again went to the same stockbroker, Mr. Chant, and bought a second sum of 2,000*l.*, which was also transferred into her name, and she, at the same time, executed a power of attorney authorizing the plaintiff to receive the dividends upon the whole sum of 4,000*l.* The only doubt in my mind has been, whether Cecilia Cave parted with the stock. She certainly retained the legal title; but it is clear that the only way she had of carrying out what she herself said was the intention of the testatrix was by doing exactly what she did. She was the only surviving trustee of the will, and she was bound to place the additional sum in her name as trustee upon the same trusts as the original sum. It is true that she might have executed a deed declaring the trusts of both sums. That course, however, was not necessary with reference to the original legacy of 2,000*l.* in order to make the investment of it a due appropriation, and if not necessary for the original legacy, it was not necessary in order to constitute a trust in respect of the further sum of 2,000*l.* The rule is, that if the person creating the trust has distinctly expressed the purpose of his act, and has done all that is necessary to complete the intention, the Court will hold the trust completely imposed; and this case appears to me to come within that rule, since Cecilia Cave did all that was necessary to impress a trust on the stock in question. Since these transactions Cecilia Cave has unfortunately become of unsound mind; and Mr. Chant, the stockbroker, who might have proved the transaction, has become subject to an infirmity of memory, so that I must decide the case upon Mr. Woodward's evidence, which is confirmed by the transactions themselves. Under all the circumstances, I shall make a declaration that the second sum of 2,000*l.* reduced annuities was impressed with the same trusts as the original legacy.

Lunacy—Funeral of a deceased Lunatic.

A lunatic died without leaving ready money to pay the expenses of his funeral, and of whose person or of whose estate there was no committee. The heir-at-law, who was one of the next-of-kin, petitioned that a sufficient sum belonging to the lunatic should be paid out of court for such purpose; but the Court directed the persons with whom the lunatic had resided to proceed with the funeral, and ordered the petition to stand over.

A petition for this purpose is necessary; a warrant from the Lunatic Office is not sufficient.

This was the petition of the heir-at-law and one of the next-of-kin of the lunatic, Mr. Townsend, which, after setting forth that there was no committee of either the person or estate, although one had been approved of by the Master in Lunacy, and that the lunatic had died on Friday, the 23rd of January (then instant), but there was no money in the house to defray the expenses of the funeral, prayed that the Court would order a sufficient sum out of the money standing to the credit of the lunatic to be paid to the petitioner for the purpose of burying the deceased, the petitioner undertaking duly to apply it.

Mr. Grove, in support of the petition, stated that the petitioner was a nephew of the lunatic, who had lived with him. The petitioner's wife had had an allowance of 50*l.* a year out of the lunatic's estate, for her trouble in attending upon him, but since the death of the committee of the estate in October last, no part of that money had been paid.

Mr. Follett, for the other next-of-kin and for the person who had been approved of as the new committee, appeared to oppose the petition, as being wholly unnecessary and a burthensome expense on the lunatic's estate. The report of the Master, approving of the new committee, had not been confirmed; and the proper course would have been for the petitioner to have gone to the Lunacy Office, and taken out a warrant for the purposes proposed to be effected by the present petition.

The officer from the Lunacy Office, who was in attendance, stated to the Court that a petition was the proper course.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—A petition is necessary. Is any one making preparation, so far as can be, for the funeral?]

Mr. Grove.—Yes; the petitioner and his wife are doing so as far as they are able, but they are poor people, yet they are willing to continue in the performance of that duty. The lunatic has made a will, which is sealed up, and is in the Lunacy Office, and it is proposed that the same shall be opened, in order to see whether the lunatic has given any directions.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — Let there be no unseemly wrangle or dispute to interfere with the performance of the last offices to this lunatic. Let the will be opened, the funeral be completed, and the petition in all other respects stand over.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH. — Primâ facie the nephew and his wife, with whom the lunatic has lived, are the most proper persons to be engaged in such a matter. Let them proceed with the funeral, but we can now give no directions as to payment; as to that, the petition must stand over.

Lunacy—Payment of Lunatic's Allowance to a Survivor of two Committees.

Two committees of the estate of a lunatic were appointed, one of whom died, and no new committee was appointed in his place. The estate being small, the Court permitted the income to be paid to the survivor on the production of an affidavit of his solvent circumstances.

The petition in this case stated, that two committees of the estate and one of the person of the lunatic had originally been appointed, but that one of the committees of the estate had died, but no new committee had been appointed in his place; that the estate of the lunatic consisted solely of consols, the dividends of which produced a few shillings over 100*l.* a year; that the Master had reported that it was proper that the whole income should be applied for the lunatic's maintenance, and that that had been hitherto done; that the expense of the appointment of a new committee would seriously deduct from this small income, and that, therefore, it would be for the benefit of the lunatic that such expense should be saved. The petition then prayed that the income might be paid to the surviving committee alone.

Mr. Osborne appeared in support of the petition.

Mr. Cottrell, for the next-of-kin, offered no opposition.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Is there any evidence as to the solvency of the surviving committee? It may be very right to appoint A. and B. committees, and to entrust them with the lunatic's income, but it may be far from proper that B. alone should be trusted. If such an affidavit as I have adverted to is produced to the officer, and it is satisfactory to him, I think, to save expense, as the estate is so small, the order may be made.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I quite concur in the view that some account should be given of the solvency of this gentleman. On the production of a proper affidavit, let the order be made.

Lunacy—Committee—Loss to Estate—Liability.

A sum of money having been lost to the estate of the lunatic under circumstances which the Court considered to be the fault of the committee in not taking steps to enforce payment, the estate of the committee, who had died, was charged with the same.

The question on this petition, which came on for the confirmation of the report of the Master in Lunacy, related to the liability of the estate of a deceased committee to make good a sum of money. Mr. John Rose Swindell was, on the 21st of February 1828, found a lunatic, and Mr. Thomas Pearsall was, in July following, appointed committee of his person and estate, and so continued until his death in the latter end of November 1838. Mr. B. T. Balguy acted for Mr. Pearsall during the whole time as his solicitor in the matter of the lunacy. In February 1838, Mr. Balguy became bankrupt, and in May following obtained his certificate. On the 19th of March 1839, after a considerable contest between Mr. Edward Ordish and other parties, in which Mr. Balguy acted as his solicitor, Mr. E. Ordish was appointed committee, and he continued Mr. Balguy as his solicitor, both in the matter of the lunacy and in his private affairs, down to the month of October 1842. In October 1839 Mr. Balguy offered to occupy the mansion-house called Borrowash House, part of the lunatic's estate, at the rent paid by the former tenant, namely, 132*l.* a year; and Mr. Ordish agreed, and, accordingly, Mr. Balguy became yearly tenant at that rent. Mr. Balguy's costs for the litigation, on the appointment of the committee, were taxed at 98*l.* 3*s.*, and were subsequently paid by Mr. Ordish. Mr. Balguy occupied the house until Michaelmas 1843, but he was discharged from his office of solicitor to the committee in October 1842. No rent was paid. After Mr. Balcuy's discharge as solicitor, Mr. E. Ordish employed Messrs. Jessopp in his place, and they, by their client's direction, put a distress into Bor-rowash House for rent, but in consequence of the insufficient value of the levy and the promise of Mr. Balcuy to pay off the money by yearly instalments of 100*l.*, and to pay down 100*l.*, which was more than the value of the goods, the distress warrant was withdrawn. Mr. Balcuy paid the 100*l.*, and afterwards 79*l.* was realized by a sale of some of his property. Mr. Balcuy, in March 1843, had executed a warrant of attorney to confess judgment for the whole of the arrears, 395*l.* Mr. Ordish never enforced the warrant of attorney, and part of the money was ultimately lost, but in passing his accounts before the Master, as stated in an affidavit, he called attention by his solicitors to the fact of the arrear, "but the Master acquiesced in the course adopted by the said E. Ordish in delaying to put the judgment in execution against the said Bryan Thomas Balcuy."

Mr. E. Ordish died, in August 1851, intestate, and letters of administration of his estate were granted to his son, Mr. John Pearsall Ordish, in March 1852. The Master reported that the money was not lost by the wilful default of the committee, and that the administrator of his estate ought not to be charged therewith. It now shortly appeared that besides the 395*l.* there was subsequently due one more year's rent, but the committee having received the 100*l.* and 79*l.*, and having paid the 98*l.* 3*s.* costs to Mr. Balcuy, on account of the lunatic's estate, the amount ultimately lost was the difference between those sums.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Smythe, for the administrator, in confirmation of the report, relied on the Master's finding, and on the fact that it was reasonable that the tenant should not pay rent when costs would accrue to him.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. J. V. Prior contended that the administrator ought to be charged, but were willing to allow to him the 98*l.* the committee had paid for costs. They claimed the whole of the loss extra that, as having been occasioned by the wilful neglect of Mr. E. Ordish.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This is a very distressing case, and a very objectionable one. This committee chooses to employ, as his solicitor, a gentleman who had been but a few months before a bankrupt, and had re-established himself. The first act done by the committee, after that, is, that he lets this house to his own solicitor,—a very objectionable proceeding,—at a rent of 132*l.* per annum. The solicitor continues tenant for four years, and never pays a sixpence of rent. Being the solicitor to the committee up to nearly the fourth year of his tenancy, or rather to the end of the third year, about the third year he is dismissed, and continues tenant for a year afterwards. The question is, whether, there having been no rent received, except a certain sum on account, that was not lost through the fault of the committee in not enforcing its payment. The only excuse is, that there were accruing costs, which is put into his mouth by his solicitor himself, putting that as a sort of set-off against the payment of rent. Eventually there are no costs, except the 98*l.*, which the parties are willing to allow to be deducted, and the whole of this rent, except the two sums of 100*l.* and 79*l.*, is lost. No other conclusion can be arrived at than an answer in the affirmative to the question I have stated, because the committee has been wanting in that vigilance which the Court is bound to require from one holding that fiduciary situation. I am extremely grieved that such is the result at which I am bound to arrive; but considering how important it is to keep strict guard upon the conduct of persons undertaking to watch over those who, by the visitation of God, are incapable of taking care of themselves, there is no other conclusion to be arrived at but to charge the committee with the whole amount of 395*l.*, but to give him credit for the 100*l.* and the 79*l.*, then adding another year's rent, after deducting from it the 98*l.* the amount of costs he paid to Mr. Balcuy.

Specific Performance—Purchase by a Solicitor from his Client—Infant.

Bill by a solicitor against his client for specific performance of a contract for sale by auction dismissed, with costs; the purchase being made by the solicitor (who had the conduct of the sale) whilst his client was a minor, and the sale not having been conducted with due regard to the interests of the client or the protection of the estate.

The solicitor for the vendor, bidding in person at the sale on his own behalf, is bound to state that fact publicly, in order to exclude the inference that he is bidding on behalf of the estate.

A reserved bidding is proper in the case of a sale of an infant's estate; but where there is no reserved bidding, that fact should be publicly stated.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff against a decision of the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce dismissing the bill, with costs. In 1845 certain lands in Essex, of which three brothers, the defendants, were tenants in common in fee, were put up to sale by auction. The plaintiff, an attorney, was employed by the defendants to conduct the sale, and he gave instructions to the auctioneer to prepare the particulars of sale. The auction took place in June 1845, and all the lots were sold. The plaintiff attended the sale and bid for and was declared the purchaser of one of the lots adjoining to some property of his own, and the usual memorandum was signed by the auctioneer; but, as to this lot, the conditions of sale requiring an immediate deposit of 10*l.* per cent. were not complied with. The plaintiff obtained possession of the land so purchased by him, and had ever since continued in possession. At the time of the sale, Edmund Salmon, the youngest of the brothers, was a minor, and he did not attain his majority until the month of November following. The sale of this lot had never been completed. In 1848 the defendant, Edmund Salmon, repudiated the sale to the plaintiff, having, however, between 1845 and 1848 received from the plaintiff upwards of 200*l.* as his share of the purchase-money of the lots; and in the same year, he filed his bill against the present plaintiff, praying that the sale to him might be set aside as fraudulent and void, and for a re-sale. This bill was dismissed, on the ground of acquiescence. The present bill was filed, by Mr. Cutts, for specific performance of the agreement for sale, and was dismissed by the Vice Chancellor, with costs.

Mr. Lee and Mr. Sims Williams appeared, for the plaintiff, in support of the appeal; and Mr. C. P. Cooper, Mr. Malins, Mr. Elderton and Mr. Goodwin, for the defendants.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — This case admits of little doubt. The rule of law is clear that an attorney may purchase from his client; but if he does purchase from his client, he must shew that he deals with him at arm's length; and no attorney would be well advised in dealing with his client without the intervention of another solicitor. I do not mean to lay down a rule that a purchase by a solicitor from his own client, without the intervention of a third party, could in no case be sustained, but I say that no prudent man would take such a course.

This is a singular case. It appears that Mr. Cutts was the solicitor of the testator who devised this property, and was in the possession of the title-deeds and of the will, and he had all that knowledge of the estate which properly belonged to what I may call a family solicitor. By the will, the trustees took at most an intermediate estate up to the time of the youngest of the three brothers coming of age; and upon the happening of that event, the young men became absolute legal owners of the estate as tenants in common in fee. It is clear from the evidence that the defendants did wish to sell the estate; but there was reason to think that they were led to believe that the legal estate was in the trustees for sale. If that was a mistake, it arose from total ignorance of the commonest rule of law with respect to the operation of the will. The first advertisement, announcing the sale of the estate, was as early as March 1845, and was in these words:—"The valuable farms to be sold, in the month of June next, by order of the trustees named in the will of the late Mr. John Smith ; possession will be given at Michaelmas next." " Further particulars will be given, and the estate may be looked over on application to Mr. Cutts, solicitor, &c." Now, this I must consider a representation, brought home to Mr. Cutts himself, as early as March 1845, a representation by him to the purport and effect that the estate was in the trustees for sale, and was to be sold in June, and that possession was to be given at Michaelmas. Now, the error was afterwards discovered, but how, is not explained ; and the particulars of sale were altered, making it a sale generally without reference to the trustees ; and yet the trustees continued to act as if they had some authority to sell. Now, it appears that there were three closes constituting part of the estate, which Mr. Cutts very naturally desired to have, as adjoining his own property. As far as my opinion goes, I absolve Mr. Cutts from anything like fraud in the odious sense of the term. The question then arose as to how the property should be lotted, and this business of lotting the auctioneer took principally upon himself. It appears that several persons, amongst whom was Mr. Cutts, went in a body to look over this estate with a view to the allotment ; but when they came to that portion of it which Mr. Cutts wished to purchase, and did eventually purchase, it appears that Mr. Cutts withdrew : a fact which impresses one with the notion that he then thought that the trustees could not interfere with the sale. The three closes in question, with other property, formed lot eight in the particulars. Mr. Cutts bought this property for 2,500*l.*; and I may observe he made a very good purchase ; for after retaining in his own hands the three fields which he was particularly desirous of possessing, and which contained upwards of twenty-four acres, he let the remainder of the lot for 100*l.* a year. This is no proof of fraud, but it must be regarded, at least, as a good bargain on the part of Mr. Cutts. I am not prepared to say that the amount of the purchase-money was so inadequate as to justify the Court in setting aside the conveyance ; but when Mr. Cutts made up his mind to purchase this part of the property, he ought strictly to have withdrawn himself from all dominion over it. Instead of doing that, he allowed himself to be put forward on the advertisement as the solicitor having the conduct of the sale, and as the person to be referred to in case further information were required. It is admitted that he drew such of the conditions of sale as bear upon the title, and with full knowledge of the title. Those conditions stipulated that an abstract should be delivered in twenty-one days ; that the abstract should shew a good title ; and that possession should be given and the purchase completed in Michaelmas 1845, the sale being to take place in the month of June previous. What was the state of circumstances at that time ? Edmund, the youngest of the three brothers, and on whose attaining the age of twenty-one the estate would vest in the three, was then a minor, and did not attain his full age until the November following. Now, observe the first false step taken by Mr. Cutts after he had discovered the mistake as to the trustees. I am bound to consider him as cognizant of the fact that Edmund, not being of age, could not sell, and could not convey at the time stipulated for by the conditions of sale. What, therefore, is to be said of the conduct of an attorney who puts up for sale the estate of a client who is under age, and stipulates that that client shall convey when he is under age ? He must have known at the time that every dissatisfied purchaser might turn round after the sale had taken place and throw up his purchase, and bring an action, on the ground that the sale had taken place without the possibility of making a title according to the stipulations. It is not possible to sustain such a transaction if it stood upon these grounds only ; but this is not all.

Mr. Cutts, whose name appeared on the particulars as solicitor to the estate, and whose person was known to everybody in the room, attends the sale and bids openly, and bids for himself. What would be the fair inference which every person present at that sale, and who knew anything of the ordinary transactions of this nature, would have drawn from this circumstance ? Undoubtedly, that Mr. Cutts, the solicitor for the vendors, was bidding on behalf of the estate, that is, for the vendors, and not for himself. Now, let us inquire what effect that would have had upon the sale. The case of Twining v. Morrice (1) shews the effect the Court has given to a circumstance of this nature. If a solicitor, known to be the solicitor of the vendors, attends the sale and bids without mentioning publicly the fact that he is bidding on his own account, the public are led to believe, as they naturally would without evidence to the contrary, that the solicitor is bidding on behalf of the estate. He thereby damages the sale, making it appear not to be a bond fide sale, and by that very circumstance enables himself to buy at an undervalue.

But I observe further that the sale took place without a reserved bidding. Mr. Cutts, intending to buy part of the estate himself, put up the property of these young men, one of whom was an infant, without any reserved bidding. What is to prevent his buying the estate at any price when it is without any protection of that kind? Can a solicitor maintain a sale against his client when he has put that client in a condition to have his estate sold for, it may be, a fourth or a fifth of its proper value? A reserved bidding is not necessarily for the purpose of screwing up bidders to the highest point, but for the purpose of preventing the estate going for a grossly inadequate price. But even supposing that omission could be justified, which I am of opinion it cannot be, he ought undoubtedly to have told the public that it was a sale without reserve, for the open knowledge of that fact would have assisted the sale; and the vendors were entitled to that advantage.

Again, Mr. Cutts, as solicitor for this infant vendor, by the particulars of sale imposes upon the rest of the world a condition that 10% per cent. should be paid down instantly as a deposit, and the remainder of the purchase-money at Michaelmas 1845, and possession should be given at the same time. Mr. Cutts purchases part of the estate. His clients were entitled to 10% per cent. down, a large proportion of the purchase-money, the remainder to be paid at Michaelmas. This early period of payment was of course a great benefit, if this young man had been then competent to receive it, which he was not. Let us see how Mr. Cutts executes this contract between himself and his client. He pays no deposit; but he takes possession at the day named; so that he bids with this advantage, knowing that he was bidding without a liability to pay the deposit, and with the impression on his own mind that he would pay the purchase-money when it suited his convenience. But suppose at the sale he had told the public, "no deposit will be required, and you may pay your purchase-money at any time it suits you best." Such a communication would, it is highly probable, have raised the biddings much higher. However, he does no such thing. The conditions imposed must be presumed to be proper as between the seller and the buyer, whoever the buyer might be; yet he dispenses with the whole of them in his own favour, and at the expense of his client. If such a dealing can constitute a contract between a solicitor and his client, this Court must cease to be a court of equity. There is no proof that the money was paid to his client until the beginning of 1847. Possession was taken of the estate, and the money represented the estate; and two years afterwards, the money is doled out to the client by fifties and twenties, and hundreds and twenties, just in a way to induce a young man to spend his patrimony instead of making a solid investment of the whole of it, which he would have had the inducement to do, and most probably would have done, if he had that which was his undoubted right, namely, payment of the whole in a lump on his attaining twenty-one.

I think that no part of the transaction can be defended; and though I acquit Mr. Cutts wholly of fraud in a felonious sense, yet I think there was fraud in the sense in which this Court uses the term: unfair dealing with the estate, advantage taken of the client by not giving him those benefits to which he was entitled, and by assuming to himself all the benefits to which as solicitor he was entitled. I have not the least hesitation in affirming the decree, and dismissing the appeal, with costs.

Lunacy—Traverse.

A person found lunatic by inquisition is entitled as of right to traverse the finding; but before granting the writ the Court will be satisfied by personal examination that the alleged lunatic is competent to exercise volition upon the subject, and desires to have a traverse of the finding.

Where a personal examination of the alleged lunatic by the Court is impracticable, the Court will adopt some other mode of inquiry—semble.

Whether a party may file a traverse in the Petty Bag Office without the intervention of the Court—quære.

In this case a commission of lunacy had been issued, under which Mrs. Cumming had been found to be a person of unsound mind. Mrs. Cumming then presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor, praying that she might be at liberty to traverse the finding, and that in the mean time all further proceedings in the lunacy might be stayed.

In consequence of the alleged conflict of authority on the question of law involved in the petition, the case was heard before the full Court of Appeal.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Roundell Palmer, and Mr. Southgate, for the petition.—In some of the early cases it was held that the granting or refusing a traverse of an inquisition was in the discretion of the Court—Ex parte Roberts (1), Ex parte Barnsley (2), Ex parte Southcote (3), Re Fust (4); but it is now clearly established that a traverse is matter of right at law—Ex parte Ferne (5), Sherwood v. Sanderson (6), Ex parte Ward (7); and the only discretion to be exercised by the Chancellor is to ascertain whether the lunatic is capable of volition, and that the application is the application of the person on whose behalf it is made—In re Bridge (8).

The following statutes were also referred to :—

17 Edw. 2. c. 10.

2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 8. s. 6.

6 Geo. 4. c. 53.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—If this is a positive right, that is, ex debito justitiæ, in case of refusal is there any remedy by mandamus or otherwise?]

That consequence must necessarily follow as in any other case of a similar right. In Bridge's case, though Lord Cottenham thought there was no doubt of the lunacy, he nevertheless granted the traverse.

The LORD CHANCELLOR at this part of the case directed that the lunatic should be sent for, or that an affidavit should be made that her health would not permit her attendance.

The Attorney General, Sir W. P. Wood, Mr. Rolt, Mr. Petersdorff, and Mr. Morris, contrà.—This matter of traverse is a creature of the statute law, and the party seeking to avail himself of it must take it with the conditions attached to it by the statute. There was no right of traverse at common law—4 Co. Rep. 55 a. Lord Cottenham was mistaken in saying in Re Bridge that at the time the right of traverse was given, the Crown took the profits of lunatics' property to its own use; for by the 17 Edw. 2. c. 10. "the King shall take nothing to his own use." The right of traverse was given first by the 34 Edw. 3. c. 14; then the 36 Edw. 3. c. 13. for the first time gave traverse in all offices found for the King, but, upon condition of the party shewing his title by good evidences; and therefore "the Chancellor by his good discretion, &c. shall let and demise the lands so in debate to the tenant." The same condition is imposed in the 8 Hen. 6. c. 16. and the 1 Hen. 8. c. 10. Then came the statute 2 & 3 Edw. 6. c. 8. The sixth section enacts, "That if any person be or shall be untrue founden lunatic, &c., be it enacted, that every person and persons grieved or to be grieved by any such office or inquisition shall and may have his or their traverse to the same, immediately or after, at his or their pleasure, and proceed to trial therein, and have like remedy and advantage, as in other cases of traverse upon untrue inquisitions or offices founden," &c. These words clearly point to a preliminary investigation before the right of traverse is conceded, namely, that the Chancellor should have good grounds for supposing it was "untrue found." As in the case of lands a prima facie title must be shewn, so in the case of lunacy the state of mind must be shewn—Sir John Cutts's case (9), Scowre-field's case (10), Ex parte Duplessis (11), Buller's Nisi Prius, 216, Anonymous case (12), Ludlam's case (13), Ex parte Saumarez (14).

[THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—In that case the order was discharged because the traverse was not followed up.]

The person coming for a traverse is bound to shew some reason for supposing the finding of the jury incorrect. The statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 53. removes all doubt upon the subject. It directs a petition to be presented to the Chancellor, who is "to hear and determine such petition." But if the traverse is matter of absolute right, then it must issue, even though it were proved that the order was sought for some collateral and dishonest purpose. In Robert's case, Lord Hardwicke went into the evidence. In Ex parte Ward, Lord Eldon dismissed the petition because it laid no foundation for impeaching the finding of the jury. The practice of serving the heir-at-law and next-of-kin of the lunatic with this petition proves that the order is not a matter of course.

Mr. Bethell replied.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question which has been argued before us is one of great importance in a constitutional point of view, though it lies in a very narrow compass. There are two questions: first, whether a party has a right to traverse the finding of a jury upon a commission against a person who has been found lunatic; and next, whether the traverse is at all times "as of right." The true meaning of that expression I will consider afterwards. The whole question depends in the first instance upon the statute of Edw. 6, and must be decided upon the words of that statute fairly construed, and with regard also to the view of other Judges from the time of the passing of that ancient statute. Now, the 6th section of that statute, after providing for other cases, proceeds as follows—"Or if any person be, &c."—[His Lordship here read the section as set out above.] Much reliance has been placed on these words, "and have like remedy and advantage, as in other cases of traverse upon untrue inquisitions or offices founden." Now, if in an application for a traverse the Court is not simply at liberty, but is bound, to enter into the whole question which was before the jury, it must hear all the evidence which was before the jury, before it would be at liberty to grant or refuse the application. And in order to establish the claim to enter into the whole of the evidence, the case is put upon the ancient statute regarding escheators; and the proposition of the Attorney General, founded upon that statute was, that there could be no right to traverse until you had established your title; and that being so as to escheats generally, he argued that the law, as applied to the present case, required, according to the words of the statute, that a party should have the like remedy and advantage as in other cases of traverse upon untrue inquisitions found, and therefore a title must be shewn before the Court could grant an order to traverse. Now, that argument proceeds upon a mistake; for the right to traverse there given in regard to lands, and upon ordinary escheats and offices found, was of this nature: that the party had by the act not only a right to traverse, but to have the lands demised to him at a rent for a certain time during the existence of the trial. Now, this is explained very satisfactorily by Staunford in his book on Prerogative. After stating several of these old statutes which have been referred to, he says—"Hereupon it is to be noted that the shewing of the evidence is only rehearsed as to the letting of the lands to farm, and not to the traverse; for by this statute he may traverse without shewing any evidence, but not have the lands to farm. Also by these statutes he is not bound to any certain time for taking of his traverse, but only for taking of the lands to farm; for he may tend his traverse when he will, so he desire not the farm of the lands. But if he will have them to farm, he must tend his traverse within the month, as appeareth." So that in this book, which is always considered as one of great authority, it clearly appears that it is a misapplication of that statute to bring it to bear upon the statute which governs this case. Now, if this point had to be decided for the first time upon the meaning of the statute of Edw. 6, I can hardly conceive that stronger words could have been used to give the party the right to traverse; it is to be "at his or their pleasure." It is, indeed, to be governed by the usual laws as regards traverses as far as they may be applicable, but that does not take away the right given by these express words.

The authorities of an early period do not much assist us. I will come down at once therefore to the time of Lord Hardwicke. In the cases referred to, though he did put it in some sense as a matter of right, yet it cannot be denied that he went into the cases and examined the circumstances to satisfy himself that it was a proper case for a traverse. How, then, did it come that the Chancellor was applied to? For if it were an absolute right, the party might at once lodge his traverse in the Petty Bag Office. In a case which I shall presently state that course was taken, and though objected to, was not interfered with. I do not mean to say anything upon the question whether a party might not, behind the back of the Court, and irrespective of the statute 6 Geo. 4, lodge his traverse at once in the Petty Bag Office. It is plain, however, how petitions came to be presented to the Court. The traverse cannot, of course, take place until the party has been found lunatic under a commission issued by the Great Seal. The Great Seal grants the custody of the persons and estates of lunatics. If a person goes behind the back of the Court and exercises his legal right to traverse (if he has such right), could he come and ask for his costs as upon a proceeding instituted under the authority of the Great Seal? He must depend upon his rights at law whatever they may be. The reason, then, is evident why parties come with their petitions to this Court. The Chancellor has the duty of issuing this very writ, and therefore the parties come to ask permission to take this step; and from all the cases it appears that the Court has exercised, not so much a discretion, as a care and caution in issuing the writ. The authorities have all been referred to in the case of In re Bridge. Lord Hardwicke, I conceive, went to a greater length, in point of evidence, than any subsequent Judge would have gone. Lord Thurlow, in Re Fust, following Lord Hardwicke, did go into the circumstances of the case, and I am not clear that he was wrong in so doing. In that case it became necessary to impeach a marriage. The husband came here to assist the traverse, to prevent the marriage being impeached by the commission; and the Chancellor, perceiving the collateral and improper purpose for which the traverse was to be used, refused to grant the order. As regards the latter cases, it is apparent that every successive Chancellor, from Lord Thurlow to the present time, has been of opinion that the granting of the writ is, in some sense, a matter of right. Lord Eldon's opinion as to the rule of law is perfectly clear; he states it again and again without limit; and, even in the case of a third party aggrieved by the finding, he is of opinion that he has a right to traverse—Ex parte Hall (15); and in Ex parte Ward, though the applicant was a stranger, having no personal interest, he did not deny the right. The opinion of Lord Rosslyn upon the point admits of no doubt. Lord Lyndhurst was never called upon to express any opinion upon the point. Lord Brougham in a case before him, Re Tubb, in 1834, makes this observation—"My predecessors seem to have considered it as matter of right." Lord Cottenham's authority was to the same effect. Lord Truro twice decided the point in accordance with the decisions of his predecessors. The authorities, therefore, as far as they go, are conclusive upon the question.

In the case of Gervais Healy, which was in 1748, the party seems to have gone to the Petty Bag Office and entered a traverse without the intervention of the Court. The cousins and co-heirs of the lunatic petitioned the Court that the traverse might be discharged. It appears that no order was made, but the costs of the petition were reserved until the traverse should be tried. Before the traverse could be tried, Gervais Healy died. That seems to be a very considerable authority to shew that at that time, not only was it considered as of right, but so much so that the party might behind the back of the Chancellor file his traverse in the Petty Bag Office, and carry the same down for trial; but in that case the costs were to be reserved until the issue was tried. It appears from a case in the Lunacy Office in February 1825, that a petition was presented by a lunatic for a traverse, and also a petition by the lunatic's son-in-law to be appointed committee, and thereupon an order was made by Lord Eldon, appointing an interim manager of the lands, and directing that the lunatic should be brought before him. A note was taken by Sir George Turner, V.C. of what fell from Lord Eldon upon that occasion. He said, "I will see the person who is the subject of this commission, and learn from him whether it is his real intention to traverse."

The effect of the decisions has been, that the party himself has a right to traverse, and also any other person having an interest in the question; but then he must do it within a limited time: and even with respect to the party himself, Lord Eldon says he is not so confident that there is not a right to limit him as to time. These authorities, therefore, are of the greatest weight, and it would require very great deliberation, and very strong reasons operating upon the mind of any Judge to induce him to oppose his opinion to so much authority. But I am clearly of opinion that these decisions are authorized by the true meaning and spirit of the act itself upon which they are founded; and if I had had to decide the case now for the first time, I should have come to the same conclusion.

Now, the traverse being as of right, the question remains how that right is to be exercised. It is impossible to deny that in every case that has been cited the Chancellor has addressed himself to the consideration of the question, whether it was a proper case for the writ to issue; and if that was so, whether the determination of the question was made to depend upon an examination of the lunatic or the affidavits of parties. In order, then, satisfactorily to decide that question, you must first decide whether in any proper sense the writ is of right or not. Because if it is of right, as I think it will be now decided to be, then the considerations affecting the propriety of issuing the writ, or not, would be very different from those to which the Court would address itself if the writ were not strictly of right. But being strictly of right, it is still, as it ought to be, under a certain controul. For instance, if, upon a petition for the writ, I were to call, as I necessarily must in every such case, for the attendance of the lunatic, and I saw instantly the signs of absolute raving madness, nobody could suppose that the person holding the office I fill would be at liberty to allow the writ to issue. In such case, it would be apparent that there was no untrue finding, and consequently no necessity for a traverse; and the duty imposed upon the Court of protecting the person and estate of the lunatic would require it to deny the writ. In some of the cases, before Lord Hardwicke particularly, and also before Lord Eldon, matters have been entered into in a manner hardly consonant with the strict interpretation of the term "as of right." But this is not matter of surprise, when one considers that a petition is presented, and served, and the common order made that all parties should appear and be heard; but it is no proof of the right or duty of the Court to enter into the general question of the correctness of the finding of the jury.

I cannot admit the authority of Lord Eldon for that proposition, when I find it deliberately stated, again and again, that it is of right, and that the Chancellor shall personally examine the lunatic upon the question.

Now this brings me to the consideration of my duty with reference to the decision in the present case. My first duty, without doubt, is to satisfy my mind that the application is bonâ fide, and that the lunatic is so far competent as to be able to satisfy me that she really does desire to have a traverse as against the finding. If I were in any doubt upon that point, I do not now mean to say that I would hear evidence as to her state of mind; but if I were not satisfied as to what her intentions and wishes were, if she herself did not appear to know her own mind upon the subject, I do not say that in such a case the Chancellor might not feel himself at liberty to consider by whom she was surrounded, by whom the application was made, and what were their objects and views. It will be time enough, however, to enter into these considerations when that question arises. The case now before me is one in which the Court will decide that the traverse is of right, in the proper sense of the term. I have myself examined Mrs. Cumming, and have represented to her what may be the consequences of this traverse in point of expense. I have had a considerable conversation with her; and, whatever may be her delusions upon other subjects, upon this point she is as reasonable, as free from heat or passion, as any reasonable person with whom I ever conversed. Though she is aware that it may put in peril the remainder of her property, she desires this traverse may issue. She is content to make this sacrifice for, what she calls, her liberty of action; and she has satisfied me that, as far as such person can have volition, she has it. I am of opinion, therefore, that, the traverse being decided to be as of right, this is a case in which I am bound to allow it to go.

I have one further observation to make, though it does not bear upon the question of law. This lady's property is said to be of small amount; without great caution the whole of it may be swallowed up in litigation; and, at the age of seventy-six, she might be stripped of the whole of her means of subsistence by the operation of a law brought in for her protection. It will be a reproach to all parties and also to the law if this matter is carried on with unnecessary expense. Upon this occasion, eight counsel have appeared; three on the part of Mrs. Cumming and five on the other side. I make an order that the costs of two counsel only on each side be allowed; and I will make an order that, in whatever further steps are taken on either side, the expense shall be restricted within the smallest possible limit, in order to preserve to this lady, if it is in the power of the Great Seal to do it, some remnant of her fortune for the remainder of her days.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The observations of the Lord Chancellor render it almost superfluous for me to add anything. An inquest under a commission of lunacy is, I apprehend, in reality a proceeding to which the alleged lunatic is not a party, and therefore, whether he shall have appeared before the jury for the purpose of contesting the allegation of lunacy or not, his rights after the finding of the jury are the same. If he is not in default for not appearing and contesting, then it would be a monstrous principle to hold that he is not entitled, as of right, to dispute the finding; nor do I understand law and principle, or, in other words, law and justice, to differ in that respect. The jurisdiction, therefore, in my judgment, is only to ascertain whether the application is an act of free will on the part of the person, and not whether the will is that of a person of sound mind. When in the judgment of that jurisdiction, there is a plain and sufficient expression of free will, the traverse cannot, I think, be refused, however clearly beneficial to the alleged lunatic it may appear to the mind of the Judge that the finding of the jury should remain undisturbed. It is the right of an English person to require that his personal freedom and the free use of his property should not be taken from him on the ground of alleged lunacy, without his being allowed the opportunity of establishing his sanity before a jury as a contesting party, and not merely as a subject of inquiry. Whether, in the present case, there has been such a plain and sufficient expression of free will as has been mentioned (though I consider it highly probable) I do not know, and therefore I cannot give any opinion upon it, it having been thought right by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth and myself, that the Lord Chancellor alone should see and converse with Mrs. Cumming.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I have only to express my entire concurrence in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor and my learned Brother, adding a few words to what has been said. I think that under the statute of Edw. 6. the party aggrieved by an inquest which has found her a lunatic has a right to traverse: and that that right is clear under the words of the statute, independently of authorities. This right may appear inconsistent with the fact that the Lord Chancellor exercises a sort of discretion. But that is a discretion to see that the party herself is really applying for the traverse; because the peculiar nature of the subject-matter of the inquiry makes the analogy from ordinary cases to a great extent inapplicable. If a person sues out a writ to recover land or other property, it is presumed to be his own act; but where there are prima facie grounds for supposing the party to be incapable of having the will, it is fit that some precaution should be adopted for the purpose of seeing that that which is to be done as the exercise of the will of the party, is really so done. This is ordinarily effected by the Lord Chancellor personally examining the party. I do not, however, mean to say that, even without such personal examination, some inquiry might not be made on the subject; ex. gr., where the person is in that state of bodily illness which would render it impossible that he should be seen by the Lord Chancellor. I do not say that a case might not occur in which some discretion might not be exercised; but in the general observations that have been made I entirely concur; and I have added these few words lest it should be supposed that I entertain some doubt when I really entertain none.

Lunacy—Care of a Lunatic's Person and Application of the Estate pending a Traverse.

Where, in the opinion of the Court, it will be for the benefit of the lunatic that the care of the person should remain undisturbed, it will so direct, and will direct the whole of the income of the property to be paid to the lunatic, pending a petition to traverse; although the Court will confirm the report of the Master in Lunacy, appointing a committee of the person and a committee of the estate.

At the time (after the hearing of the lastly reported case) when the residue of Mrs. Cumming's petition for a traverse was heard before the Lords Justices, a petition also came on for hearing, presented by the next-of-kin and co-heiresses-at-law, on the 4th of February 1852, which prayed the confirmation of the Master's report, approving of Miss L. Baker as committee of the person, and Mr. James Spark as committee of the estate of Mrs. Cumming, and for other purposes as to costs. By orders made on the 20th of November and the 22nd of December 1851, arrangements were made, under the sanction of the Court, for the personal care and comfort of the lady.

Sir W. P. Wood and Mr. W. Morris, in support of the petition, urged that it was important to provide in the ordinary way for the safety of the lunatic and her property, pending the traverse, and that as, until the traverse had been heard, the lady must be treated in all respects as insane, and her property be administered accordingly, the Court should proceed in the ordinary manner by confirming the Master's report. If, however, the counsel for Mrs. Cumming could shew any good reason for a contrary course, the matter might be different.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Roundell Palmer, and Mr. Southgate argued that, with regard to this particular case, it was of the utmost importance that no change should be made in the establishment of the lunatic pending the traverse. That if the Master's report was confirmed, appointing a committee of the person, and Mrs. Cumming was placed in the hands of the friends of those who sued out the commission, and deprived in consequence, either wholly or to a great extent, of intercourse with those friends in whose good wishes and upon whose advice she relied and was now proceeding, she would not have it in her power to contest, in a fair and proper manner, the validity of those proceedings, by which she was declared a lunatic and unfit for the management of her own affairs. It was not shewn that the person who resided with Mrs. Cumming was not in every way a proper and fit person to be with her. With regard to the appointment of a committee of the estate, the property was not of such a nature as to render such an appointment at the present time a matter of immediate necessity or expediency. That in such cases the Court had full power to act according to its own discretion; and in this particular case, the evidence shewed that if the proceedings were not stayed, according to the prayer of the petition of Mrs. Cumming, not only would her comforts and health be most materially affected, but even the administration of justice in a fair and impartial manner would be endangered. That pending a traverse, the stay of proceedings, before the passing of the 6 Geo. 4. c. 53, would have been a matter of course. That it was not the object of the legislature by that statute to make it imperative upon the Court to take proceedings, as if the right to traverse the inquisition was not conceded, and as if the validity of the commission was not called in question. That statute was merely passed in order to give jurisdiction to the Court in matters wherein it was defective.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — It is my opinion that the benefit of Mrs. Cumming will be best consulted by interposing not at all, or as little as possible, with the system of personal care of her which exists at the present time. No sufficient reason has been shewn why the committees shall not be appointed, or why the grant shall not take place, care being taken that the income of the property shall be received by her as if the grant were not made. The present system of personal care shall not be interfered with till further order. I think, therefore, that the petition should stand over so far as relates to costs.

Lunatic—Mortgage — Re-conveyance — Costs.

The costs of obtaining a re-transfer of premises mortgaged to a lunatic are to be paid out of the lunatic's estate where the petition for that purpose is presented by the committee of the estate. If the petition be presented by the mortgagor, he will not be allowed the costs, except in a case where the committee has refused to proceed.

Certain leasehold estates were vested in the lunatic as mortgagee. The present petition was presented by the committee of the lunatic's estate and by E. Young, the mortgagor, praying that Young might be at liberty to pay the mortgage money into court, and that thereupon the mortgaged estates might be vested in Young, freed from the mortgage debt, &c. An order was made according to the prayer of the petition, but the question of costs was reserved.

Mr. G. M. Giffard now appeared for the petitioners, and asked that the costs might be paid out of the lunatic's estate, and cited—

May 26.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Ex parte Richards (3) before Lord Eldon, disposes of this case. If I had had originally to decide this question, I should not have so decided it. Though that case has been doubted, yet I find it has been so repeatedly followed that I do not feel myself at liberty to alter the practice. I do not, however, approve of it, thinking it contrary to principle, and opposed to the settled rule that the costs occasioned by the mortgagee putting the mortgaged estate in settlement are to be borne by the mortgagor. I think in these cases the petition ought not to be presented by the mortgagor, though that seems to have been the common practice. In future, if the mortgagor presents a petition, in a case where the committee has not refused to do so, I shall not give the mortgagor his costs.

Vendor and Purchaser—Conditions of Sale—Lessor's Title.

Leasehold property put up for sale with the condition that the lessor's title would not be shewn and should not be inquired into. In the inquiry as to the title in a reference to the Master, the purchaser shewed that the lessors were a canal company, and that the company had, under their act, the power of selling the property, but not the power of leasing it:—Held, that the purchaser was precluded by the conditions of sale from taking that objection to the title.

Certain leasehold property was put up for sale by auction, with the following condition of sale:—"That the vendor shall, at his own expense, on or before the 14th of May, deliver to the purchaser or his solicitor a proper abstract of title, and the lessor's title will not be shewn and shall not be inquired into."

(3) 1 J. & W. 264.

The property was purchased by the defendant, who declined to complete the purchase. A bill for specific performance was filed by the vendor, and the usual reference for title was made. In the investigation of the title in the Master's office, it appeared that the property had been leased by a canal company. An objection was raised by the purchaser that, under the act of parliament by which the canal company had been constituted, they had no power of leasing the property in question, though they had a power of selling it. The Master reported in favour of the title.

Exceptions were taken to the report on the above ground; which now came on to be heard.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Renshaw, for the exceptions.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Giffard, for the plaintiff, contended that, by the condition of sale which has been mentioned, the defendant was not at liberty to raise any question as to the title of the lessor.

The following cases were cited—

Duke v. Barnett, 2 Coll. 337; s. c. 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 173.

Spratt v. Jeffery, 10 B. & C. 249; s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. K.B. 114.

Warren v. Richardson, You. 3.

Shepherd v. Kealey, 1 Cr. M. & R. 117; s. c. 3 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 288.

PARKER, V.C.—The question here is, whether it was open to the purchaser to take objections to the lessor's title. This is purely a question upon the construction of the contract for sale. A vendor of leasehold property, by the general rule, is under an obligation to deduce and shew the lessor's title, but there is no doubt that a stipulation may be made that the vendor should be relieved from that obligation. In the case of Shepherd v. Kealey it was decided that the contract did not amount to a stipulation that the purchaser should accept the title without objection or inquiry. A different construction was put upon the contract in Spratt v. Jeffery. Comments have been made upon that case, but I do not see any inconsistency between the two cases. The Court, in one of them, construed the conditions of sale as more extensive than in the other. It may be that the Court, in Spratt v. Jeffery, erred in construing the contract as importing an acceptance of the lessor's title without objection; but there can be no doubt that, if the parties stipulate that the purchaser shall accept the title without objection or inquiry, that would be a lawful agreement. Now, what is the contract here? The condition is, "that the lessors' title will not be shewn, and shall not be inquired into." Does that oblige the purchaser to accept the lessor's title, such as it is, or what was the meaning of it? In addition to the terms of the contract I find "that the lessor's title will not be shewn," with other words that ought to have effect given to them—"that the title shall not be inquired into." The only reasonable meaning of this stipulation is, that inquiry was altogether precluded for every purpose. I find that the purchaser did call upon the Master to look into the vendor's title to some extent; that is, he produced before the Master the act of parliament, which he asked the Master to look into. I think that the purchaser was precluded from going into that inquiry by the terms of the condition of sale. I do not see what force can be given to the words "that the title should not be inquired into," except that it should be accepted by the purchaser without objection or inquiry. The exceptions to the Master's report must be overruled, on the ground that this is a matter which the purchaser has precluded himself from going into by the terms of the contract.

HUGHES v. MORRIS.

Specific Performance—Contract for Sale of Ship—Ship Registry Act.

A court of equity will not enforce specific performance of a contract for a sale of a ship or part of a ship.

By the 34th section of the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89. (the Ship Registry Act), every sale or transfer of a ship, or part of a ship, must be registered, and a court of equity must construe the section to extend to any contract for sale or contract to transfer. Whether under this statute an action could be maintained on a contract for sale of a ship or part of a ship—quære.

The bill in this case was filed for the specific performance of an agreement for the sale of forty sixty-fourths of the ship Virtue, formerly the property of Messrs. Williams & Sawtell, bankrupts. In the month of March 1847, Mr. W. T. H. Phelps, the solicitor appointed by the creditors' assignees, prepared and issued a handbill, announcing the intended sale by auction of the forty sixty-fourths of the ship on the 28th of April 1847, and this handbill purported that the sale was to be by order of the assignees, and the bill referred to Mr. Acraman, who had been appointed and was described in it as official assignee, for further particulars; and copies of the handbill were sent to Mr. Acraman. In pursuance of the announcement contained in the handbill, the forty sixty-fourths of the ship were put up to sale by public auction, under conditions of sale, in which they were described as belonging to the assignees. By the third condition the purchaser was to pay a deposit, and on the payment of the balance at a stated time, "possession of the vessel was to be given up to the purchaser;" and the sixth condition was, "that upon the payment of the remainder of the purchase-money, together with all other charges and dock dues, the purchaser should have a bill of sale from the assignees, of the interest of the forty sixty-fourths in the schooner, together with the ship's stores, sails, and appurtenances enumerated and described in the schedule prepared, and that the vendor should not be obliged to produce any documents or evidences of title whatever other than and except the certificate of registry and bill of sale from E. Phillips to the assignees of the bankrupts."

The plaintiff, Capt. Hughes, through the medium of Mr. Edwards, became purchaser of the forty sixty-fourths, at the auction, for the sum of 375*l.*; and thereupon Phelps & Edwards signed the following memorandum of agreement between W. T. H. Phelps, agent of the vendors, of the one part, and H. Edwards of the other part: "The said H. Edwards hath this day become purchaser of the share in the premises comprised in the annexed particulars, subject to the conditions of sale also annexed, for the price of 375*l.*, and has paid unto W. T. H. Phelps, the vendors' solicitor, the sum of 37*l.* 10*s.*, as a deposit of 10*l.* per cent. upon the purchase-money in part payment, and the said H. Edwards agrees to pay the remainder of the purchase-money at the time of payment mentioned in the said conditions, and upon payment thereof the vendors will execute to H. Edwards a transfer or bill of sale of such shares, according to the said conditions." The deposit was, in fact, paid to the auctioneer, and not to Phelps, as stated in the memorandum, upon the 28th of April 1847. On the 29th of April the plaintiff paid the sum of 240*l.* to Phelps, further on account of the purchase-money, and upon the 10th of May 1847 he paid him a further sum of 50*l.* The residue of the purchase-money was not paid, and the bill of sale was not executed. Disputes then took place between Mr. Acraman and Phelps, as to the money paid, Phelps refusing to pay it over to the assignees, on the ground, as it appeared, that costs were due to, or claimed by him. Mr. Acraman arrested the ship in the Admiralty Court. The plaintiff then offered to pay the balance of the purchase-money, and made a tender of that balance; the defendants refused to accept the tender, and therefore this bill was filed for specific performance, for an injunction, and for damages which had been incurred by the detention of the ship by the proceedings taken by the assignees in the Admiralty Court. Upon the 4th of December 1849, an injunction was granted by the Vice Chancellor of England on the terms of the money being paid into court.

The case came on for hearing, before Vice Chancellor Turner, in the month of March 1852, when he dismissed the bill upon a question of agency and on other grounds wholly apart from any considerations under the Ship Registry Act, observing that with regard to that point, "I think it would be improper in me to give any opinion upon it, as I find that in Davenport v. Whitmore (1), where the plaintiff's claim was founded upon an alleged equitable title to a ship by contract, Lord Langdale allowed a demurrer to the bill, and upon appeal, Lord Cottenham, though he overruled Lord Langdale's decision upon another point, declined to give any opinion upon the general question." The plaintiff appealed from the decision of the Vice Chancellor; and by desire of the Lords Justices, the arguments were addressed to the undecided point under the Ship Registry Act, which being adverse to the plaintiff, the argument of the other question became unnecessary.

Sir W. P. Wood and Mr. W. Collins, for the appellant.—All the cases in the books which have decided that the Court of Chancery will not decree specific performance of executory contracts for the sale of a ship, or the part of a ship, have been cases where the Court has felt itself bound to declare the contract void for want of registration, and have arisen under the statutes 26 Geo. 3. c. 60. and 34 Geo. 3. c. 68, and where from the very stringent words of the statutes the Court has had no alternative. Those words, in express terms, relate to such contracts, and, therefore, the courts of equity being bound to follow the law, cases decided under such circumstances are not sufficiently in point or analogous to warrant the Court, since the passing of more recent statutes, in feeling itself bound to follow such a train of decisions. The present case comes under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89, the words of the 34th section of which reiterate literally those used in the previous act, 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 55, and the still earlier statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 110; and all these three statutes are silent on the subject of executory contracts, the inference from which appears to be irresistible that the legislature did not intend any statute after the 34 Geo. 3. to apply by way of prohibition to executory contracts. It is necessary before going further, to refer to the exact words of the 34th section of the statute 8 & 9 Vict., and they are:—
"That when and so often as the property in any ship or vessel, or any part thereof, belonging to any of her Majesty's subjects, shall, after registry thereof, be sold to any other or others of her Majesty's subjects, the same shall be transferred by bill of sale, or other instrument in writing, containing a recital of the certificate of registry of such ship or vessel, or the principal contents thereof, otherwise such transfer shall not be valid or effectual for any purpose whatever either in law or in equity: Provided always, that no bill of sale shall be deemed void by reason of any error in such recital, or by the recital of any former certificate of registry instead of the existing certificate, provided the identity of the ship or vessel intended in the recital be effectually proved thereby." From this nothing can appear more plainly than that the legislature no longer forbade such contracts.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Divested of all technicality, the present appeal calls on this Court to repeal so much of the navigation laws as are comprised in the Ship Registry Act. I have always understood, and will continue to so think, until shewn differently by authority, that public policy requires this Court to construe this particular act of parliament so as to effect the intention of the legislature. What was the intention of the legislature to be gathered from decision it is not difficult to collect from the case of Davenport v. Whitmore, where the Lord Chancellor refused to give any effect to the contract, so far as it related to the sale of a ship, although he decided contrary to Lord Langdale on the question of demurrer, so far as it related to the freight.]

The opinion of Lord Tenterden, expressed under his authority in the 5th edition of his book upon Shipping, after the passing of the 6 Geo. 4, shewed that he considered the question of executory contracts to be different since, from what it was before that statute. At page 50. occurs the following passage (2):—"Upon the subject of transfer of property, it seems fit to notice a distinction between this and the former statutes. A recital of the certificate of registry is not now made necessary to the validity of an executory contract or agreement for the transfer of property, as was expressly required by the 34 Geo. 3. c. 68. s. 14; neither is an indorsement of such a contract on the certificate now required, which was held to be necessary under that statute—Mortimer v. Fleeming (3); and by the language of the new act, if the certificate be not recited in the bill of sale, the transfer shall not be valid and effectual, whereas by the 26 Geo. 3. c. 60. s. 17. the bill of sale was made void." And the learned author does not stop there, for he even alludes to the effect of covenants depending and not depending on the contract, thus:—"The latter difference, however, is probably of no great importance; for, under the former statutes, covenants not depending upon the transfer of the property, such as a covenant to pay money for the security whereof a ship had been mortgaged, was held not to be avoided by reason of an omission to recite the certificate—Kerrison v. Cole (4). Whereas covenants depending upon a contract to transfer, such as an agreement to indemnify the seller against expenses, to which he might be liable on account of his interest in the ship, were held to be void in a case where the contract to transfer was invalid—Biddell v. Leeder (5). This distinction between covenants, which, according to their subject, are connected with or dependent upon the transfer, and those which are unconnected with or independent of it, may be found applicable to the new statute." The case of Langton v. Horton (6) was decided by Lord Langdale on that view.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I suppose it is not contended that this contract can be registered; what the bill, I conclude, seeks is this, that the defendants shall be compelled to sign such an instrument as the authorities at the Custom House will register.]

That is exactly what is sought, and the state of the law is such that this circuitous mode of proceeding is necessary. That a mere formality will not be allowed to stand in the way of substantial justice is plain from the important case of Mestaer v. Gillespie (7). And, again, in the case of Pritchard v. Ovey (8), non-compliance with the requirements of the Annuity Act did not prevent a suit for enforcing a contract for the sale of an annuity.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I am not satisfied that that case came within the Annuity Act at all, or if it did that it was rightly decided.]

The case of Ex parte Wright (9) was to the same effect. It is clear that mere regulations, the policy of which has long passed away with the altered state of circumstances, can never be of avail against the settled wishes and practice of the mercantile world. Such contracts as this are daily and hourly entered into in the city of London, and a decision adverse to the reasonable demand of the plaintiff would be an utter surprise upon the merchants of London, who are accustomed to see unchallenged daily contracts for the sale of portions of ships, and which have been submitted openly by public auction. Mr. Rolt and Mr. A. J. Lewis, who appeared in support of the decree of the Court below, were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The question before us, as to this part of the case, turns upon the construction of the 34th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89, assisted more or less by the residue of the act. It is a section which differs, in its phraseology at least, from the law upon the same part of the subject as it had at some time before existed; and it has been plausibly contended that that difference ought to have a material effect upon the construction of the language used in this section. It certainly is not to be disregarded, and it is a fair subject of observation; but, still, if the language used in the statute in force is language plain, and necessarily attended with a plain effect according to the principles of law, it must be expounded according to that interpretation, and upon those principles. It is plain that the legislature considered itself as providing for that which was a matter of public policy—of general interest—in this provision; and with a view to the general interest, and with a view of supporting and effecting the public policy with regard to this particular subject, it required "that when and so often as the property in any ship or vessel, or any part thereof, belonging to any of Her Majesty's subjects, shall, after registry thereof, be sold to any other or others of Her Majesty's subjects, the same shall be transferred by bill of sale, or other instrument in writing, containing a recital of the certificate of registry of such ship or vessel, or the principal contents thereof, otherwise such transfer shall not be valid or effectual for any purpose whatever either in law or in equity: Provided always, that no bill of sale shall be deemed void by reason of any error in such recital, or by the recital of any former certificate of registry instead of the existing certificate, provided the identity of the ship or vessel intended in the recital be effectually proved thereby."

Now this is the case of part of a vessel belonging to some or one of the Queen's subjects. It has been registered, and it has been sold to another of the Queen's subjects, in this sense, that it has been contracted to be sold by agreement in writing, one provision of which is that the purchaser shall be at the risk of the vessel and stores from the time of knocking down the hammer, which is a time either simultaneous with the signature of the contract, or previously to it. Any provision, therefore, which should make the property (being the risk of the vessel and stores on the one side, and the profit on the other) at all different, or as from a different time, would be to change that property in the vessel. Now this contract does not, to any extent or in any sense, either accurate or inaccurate, recite the certificate of registry. It is said that that is of no importance, because this is not a bill of sale, and although it is an instrument in writing, yet it does not effect a transfer. That appears to me to be immaterial with regard to the equitable principles which are here called into action.

What the legislature had in view was not merely, as I apprehend, the passing or not of what we call the legal estate, but it had in view substantially this, that wherever the property in a vessel was to be changed under certain circumstances, it was to be changed in a particular way. Now whether it was a sale or a contract for sale can make no difference. A contract for sale is, in the view of a court of equity, a sale. Whether an actual transfer was made is of no importance, if an actual transfer was agreed to be made, because that which is contracted to be done is, in the view of a court of equity, for many or most purposes held to be done. If the argument were to prevail, that that which the act directs with respect to a sale or transfer does not extend to a contract for sale, or a contract to transfer, we should in effect, as it appears to me, be repealing the provision of the act of parliament, because the legal title might remain unchanged on the register, and the equitable interest might be continually the subject of transmission made from hand to hand, and from person to person, in a manner utterly disregarding the provisions of the act: and I must say that, in my opinion, upon a question such as this affecting public policy and the general interest, it would be in effect to repeal the act of parliament. A court of equity is bound to follow the law where the public interest is concerned, and where provisions are enacted for such a purpose it must give effect to them.

The case appears to me to stand on exactly the same footing, or even stronger against the plaintiff than the case would be of a parol contract for the sale of lands without part performance. A parol contract for the sale of land, though all the money may be paid without part performance (for the payment of money is no part performance), cannot be carried into effect if the person sued chooses to avail himself of the defence; and this, as I have already said, appears to me to stand upon a principle, at least as unfavourable to the plaintiff as a case of that description, because it is suing on a contract, which the legislature has forbidden this Court, or any other Court, to recognize: an opinion certainly at variance with the opinion which a very eminent lawyer and a most distinguished common law Judge and author has published or permitted to be published in a most valuable work (Abbott on Shipping, p. 50, 5th edit.); and it may possibly be at variance with one decision of a learned Judge, the late Master of the Rolls, from whom also another judgment has proceeded plainly at variance with any such opinion.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that a court of equity is bound to follow the law in this respect, and to declare that there is no contract which can be recognized. How the case would be if there had been fraud, it is unnecessary to say. Fraud is as much out of the question here as in the simple case under the Statute of Frauds, where performance of a parol agreement is resisted, although all the money has been paid. There is no fraud in the sense in which this Court uses the term in reference to subjects of this description. It appears to me that relief cannot be given here to the plaintiff, and that he must be left to such remedy by action or by actions, as he may think fit, as far as the parties to this record are concerned.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I am of the same opinion; and although some doubts have been ingeniously raised, I confess that my impression has always been clear that, under the present statute, as under the old statutes of the reigns of Geo. 4. and Will. 4, there could be no transfer in equity that was not also a transfer in law of a ship. The only question is this, whether the law has been altered since the year 1816, when Lord Eldon decided the case of Brewster v. Clarke; because then Lord Eldon distinctly decided that there can be no bill for specific performance for the transfer of a ship upon a contract of sale. That was the necessary result of that decision. Has the law altered in any way so as to affect the principle upon which that decision went? The suggested alteration is, that whereas originally the legislature had said no transfer should be valid which is not in a particular mode, a few years after the original statute, doubts were entertained whether it extended to contracts; and then it was enacted that contracts and agreements for sale should also be void. That was the state of the law when Brewster v. Clarke was decided.

But, then, it is said that since that case was decided, namely, first by the statutes 6 Geo. 4. cc. 109, 110, 114, when the navigation laws were consolidated; and, subsequently, by the acts 3 & 4 Will. 4. cc. 54, 55, 59, when they were again consolidated; and ultimately by the act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89, when they were lastly consolidated, the provision as to agreements has been omitted. That is so; and Lord Tenterden undoubtedly says, (having, no doubt, in his mind several decisions at law that had taken place during the time that he was Chief Justice, shortly before the passing of the first consolidation act, 6 Geo. 4. c. 110), that that alteration makes a difference, for that now contracts are not prohibited, in terms. I am not clear, he may not be quite right in that. It may be that now an action may be maintained upon a contract for the sale of a ship, which would have been void before, under the laws as they were before they were consolidated in the reign of Geo. 4. That may be so, but what we have to consider is, what is the effect of the statute now in force, without the enactment as to agreements, upon equitable contracts? I confess it seems to me that it leaves the matter exactly where it was before, because what the statute enacts is, in very informal language, "that so often as any property in any ship or vessel, or any part thereof belonging to any of Her Majesty's subjects, shall be sold, the same shall be transferred by bill of sale," containing such and such particulars, "otherwise such transfer shall not be valid for any purpose whatsoever."

It was argued that a contract, although not valid to transfer the property, may make the party an owner in equity. That would be to get rid of the whole policy of the statute, which is (whether a sound policy or not we need not inquire), that there should be the means of seeing conclusively, by tracing from the original "grand bill of sale" as it is called, from owner to owner, the ownership for all time. But if this doctrine that is contended for be right, there never need be anything appearing in any document from the very first sale, because by means of successive sales in equity (which in that case would be just as effectual) the property in the ship might be transmitted from party to party; and the whole policy of the statute might be got rid of entirely and effectually. Even supposing there be an alteration of the law, by the omission in the statute, that is merely an alteration with respect to a right of action, and not an alteration that can affect the question of equity. I would observe, moreover, that the notion of a bill for a specific performance of the sale of a ship is a doctrine that rather stands on its own footing. It is a sale of a chattel, and I am not clear (if Lord Tenterden is right) that the remedy by action at law does not give complete relief. But I do not, however, rest upon that, though it has a great deal pressed on my mind; but, supposing I am wrong in that, still the effect of the present statute is the same as the old statute, and its effect is to prevent any transfer in equity, either by contract or otherwise.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The decree we make is without prejudice to any action.

Mr. Roll having applied for the costs of the appeal,—

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Wherever the blame may be I think that the plaintiff, a seafaring man, has been as hardly treated, to use no harsher term, as it is possible to conceive. He has been treated in a way in which no man could expect to be treated in a civilized country. He has honestly paid his money, and can get nothing in return, because it is said that Mr. Phelps, having the money, refuses to pay it over to the assignees, on the ground that they owe him money for costs. Still the Court having felt bound to decide against the plaintiff, the question is, what will be the course least wrong as to the costs of the appeal? And, on the whole, both my learned Brother and myself are of opinion that will be effected by giving the respondents the deposit, and no other costs.

WORCESTER EXTENSION AND CHESTER JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY, ex
parte SHARP AND JAMES.

Winding-up Acts—Contributory—Allotment—Committee-man.

At a meeting of the managing committee of a provisionally registered railway company, at which A. and B. were present as members, it was resolved that the shares of the company should be allotted according to a certain scheme, by which 500 shares were to be allotted to each member of the managing committee under the head of "reserves." In fact, 100 shares only were allotted to and accepted by A. and B. respectively, and for that number only they signed the parliamentary contract. On the winding up of the company the Master placed A. and B. on the list as contributories in respect of 500 shares each:—Held, upon appeal, that A. and B. were liable in respect of the 100 shares only; and that the reservation of the 500 shares in their favour did not amount to a contract binding upon them to accept that number of shares.

In this case the Master had placed the names of Major Sharp and Mr. James on the list of contributories of the company, in respect of 400 shares each, in addition to the 100 shares each for which they had executed the parliamentary contract. By permission of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Truro), the appeal was brought directly from the Master's decision, on the ground that the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce had, in a similar case in the same company (Morrison's case, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 296,) affirmed the Master's decision to the same effect as in the present case.

The company was formed in 1845, and provisionally registered pursuant to the act.

The facts upon which the appellants' liability as to the additional 400 shares each arose were as follows:—

Both Major Sharp and Mr. James were members of the provisional committee and the managing committee, but neither of them were members of the allotment committee. At a meeting of the managing committee, held on the 15th of September

1845, before the appellants had joined the company, the committee by a resolution of that date, appointed an allotment committee, and further resolved, "That 250 shares be offered to each of the provisional committee, and that the secretary be desired to write to that effect to each member of the committee, and request him to state, on or before the 24th instant, whether or not he will take that or any less number; and that 250 in addition be offered to each member of the managing committee."

At meetings of the managing committee, held on the 30th of September and the 7th of October, at which Mr. James was present, it was resolved that the secretary should send letters of allotment to the provisional committee for 100 shares only for the present, accompanying the same with an intimation that that number was part of the 250 originally offered them, and that if, when the committee of management had finally completed their arrangements, they should find themselves in a position to make up the original number, they would be happy to do so.

At a meeting of the managing committee, held on the 10th of October, at which Mr. James was present, it was resolved, "That the committee of allotment be requested to make the allotment in accordance with the accompanying scheme, and that the capital be reduced to 100,000 shares in accordance therewith." The scheme referred to provided that to each of the provisional committee should be issued 100 shares, making 9,100 shares; to the public 30,900; to Mr. Jackson and friends 5,000; making in all 45,000 shares. The scheme then proposed to dispose of the remainder as follows:—

Reserves:	Shares.
16 Managing Committee at 500 . .	8,000
91 Provisional Committee at 150 . .	13,650
Promoters	3,000

At a meeting of the managing committee, held on the 21st of October, at which Major Sharp and Mr. James were present, the secretary of the company reported that the allotment committee had completed the allotment of shares, and in doing so had carried out the views of the managing committee as conveyed to them at the last meeting. But in the "allotment book" the names of Major Sharp and Mr. James appeared as allottees each of 100 shares only.

On the 9th of December, at a meeting of the committee of management, at which Mr. James was present, it was resolved that "the directors be requested without delay to execute the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement in respect to the 100 shares allotted to them"; and it was further resolved, that in consequence of the depressed state of the money market, &c., the further prosecution of the company should be postponed. Major Sharp and Mr. James signed the deed for 100 shares each, and paid the required deposit.

The Master placed the names of Major Sharp and Mr. James on the list as contributories for 400 shares each, in addition to the 100 shares for which they had signed the deed. The question raised on the appeal was as to their liability in respect of the 400 shares.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Terrell, for the appellants.—The scheme of the 10th of October 1845 was inchoate only, and not binding upon the parties without some further act to be done. The appellants can only be liable for the shares which they have accepted, that is, the 100 shares for which they executed the deed. Hutton v. Upfill (1) does not apply, the question here being the extent of liability only.

Mr. Cairns, for the official manager.—The situation of the appellants in this case is not that of strangers to the company, for they are themselves the parties making the allotment, and therefore must be held by that to have pledged themselves to take that particular portion of the stock of the company.

Ex parte Davis's Executors, 15 Law Times, 541.

Morrison's case, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 296.

Ex parte Barber, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 146.

April 21.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after observing upon the difficulty of ascertaining the real facts of the case from the manner in which the materials were presented to the Court, and intimating that in future cases under the Winding-up Acts it would be desirable to have a state of facts agreed on and signed by counsel, proceeded as follows:—Now, as far as relates to the scheme of the 10th of October 1845, it is impossible, I think, to say, that there is an absolute and binding contract on the parties to take these shares; for, first of all, the resolution is that the committee of allotment "be requested" to make the allotment in accordance with that scheme. It appears, in fact, that that scheme was not carried out; for I do not find any evidence that the allotment of 500 shares was ever made to the members of the managing committee, nor that these gentlemen ever signified their intention to take the larger number of shares. As soon as matters began to assume a disagreeable aspect, it was resolved, at the meeting of the 9th of December, that the directors be requested to execute the parliamentary contract and subscribers' agreement for 100 shares each, and Major Sharp and Mr. James executed the deeds for that amount accordingly; and there is no proof of any allotment beyond that, except in the statement of the secretary, that the shares had been allotted in accordance with the scheme. To the extent of 100 shares they are confessedly liable; but it is insisted that they are liable in respect of 400 additional shares, and there was a case arising in the same company (Morrison's case), before the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, in which it was decided in a case similarly circumstanced, that a member of the managing committee was liable for all the shares so reserved for him. The decision appears to have proceeded upon Upfill's case; and without giving an opinion upon that case, I think the circumstances upon which I have now to decide are materially different. In that case there was an offer and an acceptance of shares; in the present case, neither an offer, strictly speaking, nor an acceptance. Beyond that circumstance, on the face of the report of Upfill's case, there is a strong reason why, independently of his being a provisional committee-man, Mr. Upfill should have been held liable. By the prospectus under which all the parties were acting, the managing committee were authorized to carry on the concern and to incur all necessary expenses before the act of parliament was obtained. The man who makes himself a party to such a transaction must be liable to contribute to the expenses incurred according to his own contract and by his own sanction. In this case, I am of opinion that each of these gentlemen, having had 100 shares only offered to him out of the 500 which were within the scope of the scheme, and which 100 shares only he accepted and for which he subscribed the deeds, his liability must be limited to those 100 shares; and I shall, therefore, order the names of the appellants to be struck off the list as to all the shares except the 100, and I shall make no order as to the costs of this appeal.

March 30. } HOLLIDAY v. OVERTON.

Appointment—Restriction on Execution—Deed—Recital—Words of Limitation.

A widow, upon her marriage, settled her real and personal property on herself for life, and reserved to herself a power to appoint by will during the intended coverture, with remainder over on default:—Held, that an appointment by will, after the determination of the coverture, was invalid.

Real estate was vested in a trustee in fee for a party for life, with remainder to her children equally:—Held, that the children took life estates only, all words of limitation being omitted.

Recitals will not be allowed to cut down the clear effect of the operative part of a deed.

By a settlement, dated the 23rd of September 1825, made upon the marriage of Mary Heathcote, a widow, with Edmund Drayton, after reciting that it was agreed to settle the property for her separate use for life, and after her decease for "making the reversion and principal thereof a provision for the children of her former marriage, subject nevertheless to the power of appointment, on the part of Mary Heathcote, by will or testamentary instrument to be executed in manner hereinafter provided upon such trusts and with and under and subject to such powers, provisoes and declarations as hereinafter contained," certain real and personal property which respectively belonged to her, were conveyed and assigned to Thomas Ventom, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, upon trust to pay the income and annual profits to her for her separate use for life, and after her decease, in trust for such person or persons, and for such trusts as Mary Heathcote, in and by her last will and testament, or instrument testamentary or in the nature of a will in writing, to be signed and published by her in the presence of three or more credible witnesses, upon testamentary considerations only during the intended coverture, should direct or appoint, and in default of such appointment, in trust for the children of Mary Heathcote, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants.

Under a power contained in this indenture, the defendant William Overton was, on the 20th of August 1830, appointed to be a trustee thereof jointly with the defendant Thomas Ventom. There was no issue of the marriage, and Mr. Drayton died on the 19th of May 1835, leaving Mary Drayton, his widow, surviving, and, on the 13th of November 1845, she, in exercise of the power contained in the settlement, made her will, by which she appointed all her estate and effects real and personal, unto and for the use of her daughters, the plaintiffs Mary Henry Holliday, Julia Henry Oukama, and Laura Henry Heathcote, and the defendant Sabina Henry Wenman, their respective heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, as tenants in common, with this exception, that in consideration of Mary H. Holliday having had the sum of 500*l.* left to her, it was her, the testatrix's, desire that she should receive 500*l.* less than any of her sisters. The testatrix appointed William Overton and Thomas Heywood executors of her will.

On the 16th of May 1848, Mary Drayton died, and on the 16th of November following her will was proved by both the executors. Mary Drayton received the income during her life, but Messrs. Ventom and Overton, after her decease, insisted that under the limitation contained in the marriage settlement, she had no power to appoint the settled property by a will executed after the death of her husband, and consequently that the trust fund was divisible amongst all her children as in default of appointment.

This claim was then filed by Mary Henry Holliday, widow, Julia Henry Oukama, widow, and Laura Henry Heathcote, spinster, three of the children of Mary Drayton by a former marriage, against Messrs. Ventom and Overton, to establish the validity of the appointment. It appeared that there were six children of Mary Drayton by her former marriage, the three plaintiffs, Sabina H. Wenman and Henry Spencer Heathcote deceased, and Caroline H. Kuckenthal also deceased. Henry Spencer Heathcote died on the 21st of April 1844 intestate as to real estate, leaving the defendant, Alfred Spencer Heathcote, his heir-at-law, and having appointed his wife, the defendant Ann Heathcote, his executrix. Caroline Henry Kuckenthal, the remaining child, died on the 6th of June 1826 intestate, leaving the defendant Henry Philip Kuckenthal, her husband, and the defendant Henry Kuckenthal, her heir-at-law, her surviving, and letters of administration to her were granted to the defendant Charles Wenman.

On the 24th of January 1832, Mrs. Drayton, in the life of her husband, executed a will, and also a codicil, dated the 11th of April 1843, by which, in pursuance of the power contained in the settlement, she appointed all the trust estates and premises to the plaintiffs, and the defendant Sabina Henry Wenman, in a manner similar to the appointment made by her will of the 13th of November 1845, and both the will and codicil were unrevoked and uncanceled after the decease of Mr. Drayton, her husband; but having been advised that Julia Henry Oukama could not take any benefit under either the will or codicil in consequence of her husband and herself being attesting witnesses to the will, Mrs. Drayton destroyed both the will and codicil which she had made in her husband's life, and executed the will of the 13th of November 1845, which the plaintiffs now asked might be declared a valid testamentary execution of the power of appointment contained in the indenture of the 23rd of September 1825, and that the plaintiffs and the defendant, Sabina Henry Wenman, or she and her husband in her right, might be declared entitled in equity to the trust estate, monies and premises comprised in the indenture of settlement, and to the rents, interest, dividends and profits thereof which had accrued due since the death of the testatrix.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Speed, for the plaintiffs.—The property in respect of which the power was reserved, belonged to the wife, and, notwithstanding the determination of the coverture, could still be exercised by her. When she married Mr. Drayton she was a widow, having children living by a former husband. She was desirous of reserving to herself the power of dealing with her property, and in stating the purposes of the settlement, there was nothing to limit the time within which the power was to be executed. The words "testamentary considerations only" had reference merely to the gifts to be made during the coverture, upon the determination of which she was remitted to her right of dealing with her own property as she pleased—Onions v. Tyrer (1).

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. Sheffield, for Richard Wenman and Charles Wenman.—The words of the power give to the testatrix a double power of appointment. First, by will without any restrictions whatever; and, secondly, by an instrument testamentary, which was to be executed upon testamentary considerations only during the coverture. The will of a married woman was a testamentary instrument which, in accordance with the law, was in this case directed to be executed by three witnesses.

Mr. Amphlett, for Ann Heathcote and Alfred Spencer Heathcote, and

Mr. Cairns, for the trustees, were not heard.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I cannot make a distinction between the two modes of appointment. The words "during coverture" are applicable to the whole clause; and I cannot from any consideration of inconvenience restrict it to the other part only. I am of opinion that the power of appointment has not been exercised, and I must make a declaration accordingly. I direct an inquiry as to who has received the rents.

Feb. 21.—The cause was again brought on to consider who were the parties entitled, as the limitation to the children of Mary Drayton, in default of appointment, was without words of limitation.

It was contended, on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendants, Richard Wenman and Sabina Henry, his wife, that they were entitled only to a life estate, and that subject to that, the fee vested in Mrs. Drayton, and consequently passed under the devise in her will to the defendants, Richard Wenman and his wife.

Mr. Amphlett.—Previous to the Statute of Uses, 27 Hen. 8. c. 10, a use might have been raised without any words of limitation, and the words used in this case would have carried the fee—Shelley's case (2). Yet, since the statute, a contrary opinion prevailed—Shep. Touch. 522; but if this Court finds a contract to have existed between parties based upon a valuable consideration, and that it has been carried out contrary to the intention of the parties, it is the constant rule of this Court to give effect to the contract. The recitals in the deed clearly shew an intention to deal with the fee—Fletcher v. Lord Sondes (3); and as the settlement was made by a declaration of trust instead of a conveyance of the legal estate, there was no necessity for rectifying the deed. It was, therefore, apparent that the parties intended the consideration for the settlement upon the second marriage to extend to the children by the first.

Mr. Lloyd, in reply.—This Court will not apply a construction to equitable estates different from that applicable to legal estates. If the parties had any intention apparent which has not been yet carried out, that is a ground for rectifying the settlement. The children of the first marriage were no parties to the deed: can they, therefore, raise any equity from the recitals in the deed? None of the cases cited arose upon a deed. The parties have no ground for applying to rectify the settlement. A father may be under a moral obligation to provide for his children, but there is no case extending it to the mother; and a merely meritorious consideration is insufficient.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS. — The question raised by this claim was, whether the power given to the wife by the deed made upon her marriage could be executed by her when not under coverture, and upon the words of the deed, I was of opinion that the exercise of the power was limited to the coverture. There appeared, however, to be a gift over in default of appointment arising upon the words "in trust for the children of Mary Heathcote, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants," which, however, did not contain any words of inheritance, which, by the ordinary rules of construction, would restrict the interest of the children to estates for life.

It has been argued that the rules governing executory instruments apply to this case on the ground that it was a contract to convey the fee, and that the children were purchasers within the contract. But there is nothing executory on the frame of this instrument: it is a deed executed, and requires nothing additional to give it validity.

The true construction was then said to be, that the children were to be considered as purchasers, and that such a construction of the declaration of trust would vest the fee in them without words of inheritance. The passage cited from Shep. Touch. 522, is in effect, that in the case of a purchaser for value, a declaration of the use to the purchaser, omitting the word "heir," would not deprive him of the fee. The passage in Shelley's case is to the same effect. It refers to a case where the words of the instrument are governed by the interest of the parties to shew that a use before the 27 Hen. 8. was merely regarded as a trust. It is to this effect—"that a man shall not have a fee simple by a feoffment or grant without these words, 'his heirs.' And yet the law is plain, that if a man had before the statute of 27 Hen. 8. bargained and sold his land for money without these words, 'his heirs,' the bargainee hath a fee simple. And the reason is, because by the common law nothing passeth from the bargainor but a use, which is guided by the intent of the parties, which was to convey the land wholly to the bargainee; and forasmuch as the law intends that the bargainee paid the very value of the land, therefore in equity, and according to the meaning of the parties, the bargainee had the fee simple without these words 'his heirs,' as it is held in," &c., and then he refers to several cases in the Year Books to establish that proposition. If these children, mentioned in the settlement, could be considered as purchasers within the meaning of the words employed in these passages, some arguments might be founded upon those authorities; but the observation, that the children are purchasers within the meaning of the settlement, does not advance the argument a single step. They are not purchasers of the fee simple or of any estate of inheritance under any contract; though they may be purchasers within the consideration of the marriage contract, they are purchasers only of such contract as the settlement gives them, which brings it back to the question of what is the interest which is given to them by that settlement, and this is a mere question of intention. Newstead v. Searles does not advance the case beyond what I have already stated.

It is then attempted to controul the effect of the limitations contained in the deed by force of the recital in the earlier part of the deed; but even if this were admissible, it would not advance the argument, for in the recital there is, in my opinion, nothing leading to the conclusion that the children were to take the fee. On the contrary, the recital is simply for the purpose of making a provision for the children upon the trusts after mentioned. The recital is for the purpose of making a provision for the children by a reversion of principal. It is then limited upon the trusts, and according to the provisions and declarations contained in the subsequent part of the instrument. This obviously leaves the trusts, declarations, powers and provisions to be construed according to such import as the Court shall consider ought to be applied to these words when you look at the limitations themselves.

The cases of Challenger v. Shepherd, Knight v. Selby and Moore v. Cleghorn were all cases of wills where the Court held that the fee passed to the devisee, although the word "heirs" was omitted; but the rules applicable to the construction of wills or executory instruments are not applicable to the present case, which is the simple case of a deed executed, where I am bound by the strict rules applicable to a case of that description. I must, therefore, hold that the children only take life estates in these limitations in default of the due execution of the power, but I am very much disposed to believe that it is a slip in making the settlement.

June 9.—Upon appeal, the LORDS JUSTICES affirmed the decree, deciding that the power of appointment could be alone exercised by Mary Drayton during her coverture.

April 16. } EVANS v. PROTHERO.

Evidence — Contract for Sale — Unstamped Receipt.

A document, purporting on the face of it to be a receipt for purchase-money, but inadmissible as evidence of the payment of the money for want of a sufficient stamp, is nevertheless admissible as evidence of the agreement for sale, if it contain the requisite terms—semble. Vide s. c. 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 448, contra.

The facts of this case are fully stated in the report of the motion for a new trial—20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 448. On that occasion Lord Cottenham was of opinion that the following document, purporting to be a receipt for the purchase-money, but which was, originally, impressed with a sixpenny receipt stamp only, had been improperly admitted as evidence of the contract; and he granted a new trial accordingly.

"Received this 25th day of August 1827 of Mr. Jenkyn Richards, now and before, the sum of 21*l.*, being the amount of the purchase for three tenements sold by me, adjoining the river Taff. Received the contents, + Evan Richards."

"Witness, John Swaine."

The case came on for trial, in July 1850, before Baron Parke, when the plaintiff's counsel tendered the document in evidence, but its reception being objected to, the objection was allowed by Mr. Baron Parke. The jury, notwithstanding, found in favour of the plaintiff on both issues.

A motion was then made, before Knight Bruce, V.C., for a new trial of the issues, and was refused. The defendants now appealed from that order. The grounds of the motion were, that, after the decision of Lord Cottenham, the plaintiff ought not to have tendered this document; and that, notwithstanding the objection was allowed by the Judge, the minds of the jury had been unduly influenced by its production.

Mr. Walker and Mr. Pulling, for the defendants, contended that to render the document admissible for any purpose it ought to have been stamped according to its legal character; and they referred to Lord Cottenham's observations (20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 450), distinguishing the present case from Matheson v. Ross (1). They cited also—

Mr. W. M. James, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

(1) 2 H.L. Cas. 286.

The LORD CHANCELLOR,—after observing upon the facts of the case, and reading the document purporting to be a receipt for the purchase-money of the property in question, proceeded to the following effect:—This document, if receivable in evidence, would have proved the plaintiff's case undoubtedly. I am strongly of opinion that this document was admissible as evidence of the agreement; for, on the face of it, it has every ingredient necessary to constitute a valid agreement within the Statute of Frauds. It contains the names of the seller and buyer, a description of the property sold, and the amount of the purchase-money. If I were to direct a new trial, I should not exclude this document, holding the opinion I have expressed, that it is admissible as evidence of the agreement. Two questions were sent to the jury: first, whether there was a contract for sale; and, secondly, whether any money was paid. This document having been rejected for want of an additional sixpenny stamp, and the defendants having brought forward a cloud of witnesses as to conversations, the Judge put the case to the jury thus:—"If you believe the evidence for the defendants, there is an end of the plaintiff's case." The verdict was for the plaintiff, shewing that the jury disbelieved the defendants' witnesses. My firm impression is, that if I sent the case for a further trial, the jury would come to the same conclusion. I am perfectly satisfied that in refusing this motion, I am not only saving the parties from ruinous litigation, but am furthering the ends of justice upon the merits. The motion must be refused, with costs.

PARKER, V.C. { In re THE LIVERPOOL
June 1. { MARINE ASSURANCE COMPANY, ex parte GREENSHIELDS.

Company—Winding-up Act—Partnership—Bankruptcy.

A, a shareholder in a joint-stock company, was made a bankrupt in October 1848. In November 1850, the company ceased to carry on business, and was shortly afterwards ordered to be wound up. The assignees disclaimed the shares. The Master put on the list of contributories the assignees of A, in respect of losses incurred before the bankruptcy, and A, in respect of losses incurred after the bankruptcy. The Court ordered the name of A. to be erased from the list of contributories.

The above-mentioned company was a joint-stock company formed under a deed of settlement.

On the 30th of October 1848, Mr. Greenshields was made a bankrupt; and on the 26th of June 1851 he received his certificate. Mr. Greenshields, at the time of his bankruptcy, had 100 shares in the above-mentioned company. In November 1850 the company ceased to carry on business, and in November 1851 an order was made for winding it up.

In December 1851, Sir George Rose, the Master charged with the winding up of the company, placed the assignees of Mr. Greenshields on the list of contributories, in respect of losses incurred up to the date of the fiat. The assignees disclaimed all interest in the shares.

On the 27th of March 1852, Sir George Rose made the following order:—

"I, the Hon. Sir George Rose, the Master, &c., hereby certify that on reading the deed of settlement and the certificate of conformity of John Greenshields, a bankrupt, and the assignees of his estate and effects having disclaimed all interest in the shares held by the said bankrupt, I have not fixed the said bankrupt with any liability in respect of any debt or demand arising or existent at, and previously to, his bankruptcy, but have left the same to be tendered as a proof against his estate, and that I have held the said John Greenshields to be personally liable, notwithstanding his certificate, for any demand or call that may have been made subsequent to the fiat against him, and have included him, or shall include him, in any call accordingly."

This was a motion, on the part of Mr. Greenshields, that he might be excluded from the list of contributories.

The 45th clause of the deed of settlement of the company enabled assignees of bankrupt shareholders to sell their shares under certain conditions. The 49th clause alluded to sales by assignees. The 73rd and 74th clauses provided for the dissolution of the company. These were the only clauses that related to the question before the Court.

Mr. J. V. Prior, for the motion, contended, that the liability of the bankrupt in respect of the shares, ceased on his bankruptcy. He referred to The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Burnside (1) as a case which could be cited in support of retaining Mr. Greenshields' name on the list; and contended that that case did not apply, as, in the case before the Court, it must be considered that the partnership had been dissolved.

Mr. Selwyn, for the official manager, relied on The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Burnside. The bankruptcy did not extinguish the shares, and after the bankruptcy they must have been in existence. They could not be in the assignees, as they had disclaimed. They must then be in the bankrupt, and, being in him, he was liable in respect of them for all losses since the fiat, notwithstanding his certificate. He also referred to the 45th and 49th clauses of the deed of settlement.

PARKER, V.C. — As a general rule, bankruptcy dissolves a partnership. It is true, that, in most cases, partnerships are for limited terms; and here the partnership was to be for an indefinite term, and was to continue until dissolved under the provisions of the deed of settlement. This, however, I think, makes no difference; and I must consider that, so far as regards the bankrupt, the partnership was dissolved by his bankruptcy. The position of the parties, then, was this: the bankrupt had a right to have the accounts taken, the affairs wound up, and the results ascertained. If, on these investigations, it should appear that there was a debt due from the bankrupt, there would be a right of proof against his estate. If, on the other hand, anything should be found due to the bankrupt, the assignees would be entitled to receive it. Under one of the clauses of the deed of settlement, the assignees might have parted with the shares, if they could have found any one to take them, and the person so taking them would have become a shareholder. If this, however, was not done, the partnership was dissolved so far as relates to the bankrupt. I do not see what right the company had to incur debts affecting the bankrupt after the bankruptcy. Suppose a case not affected by the Winding-up Act; as, for instance, that there were six bankers in partnership, and that one became bankrupt, it could not be said that liabilities could be incurred by the bankrupt in respect of the business being carried on by the other parties after the bankruptcy. The case in the Exchequer Reports has, I think, no application to the present. That was not a case of an ordinary partnership, but of a company existing under an act of parliament, the shares of which were of a continuing nature, and remained after the bankruptcy, and which, if the assignees did not take them, must have belonged to the bankrupt, who must, therefore, have been liable on his covenants in respect of them. The principles of an ordinary partnership do not apply to such a case. I think, however, that they apply to this. On the principle that the partnership was dissolved by the bankruptcy, and that the bankrupt ceased to have any interest in it, except for the purposes of ascertaining what was due from or coming to him, the Master's order must be discharged.

PARKER, V.C. }
 June 8, 9. } WRIGHT v. WRIGHT.

Will—Construction—Condition—Direction to pay.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees, upon the usual trusts for conversion and investment, and directed them to pay such sums for the maintenance and education of his sons M. and N, during their minorities, or for apprenticing them, as his trustees should think proper; and declared that, when his sons should have attained their ages of twenty-one years, his trustees should pay the then residue of the monies unto his two sons, provided that they should be, in the opinion of his trustees, of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage and take due care thereof. M. and

N. were both lunatic at the time of their attaining their majority:—Held, that the qualification as to the sons being of competent understanding did not make the gift to them conditional, and that the testator's estate vested in them absolutely.

William Wright, by his will, dated the 3rd of September 1813, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to Lupton Wright, William Wright, and John Lambert, their heirs, executors, and administrators, upon the usual trusts, for sale and conversion into money, and directed that, out of the monies arising thereby, certain legacies therein mentioned should be paid to his daughters Hannah and Isabella. The will then proceeded as follows:—“And also that they, my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, shall, from and out of the said monies, pay and apply such sums of money for the maintenance and education of my said sons Joseph Wright and Jonathan Wright, during their minorities, and for apprenticing them to any trade or business, and paying any fee or fees in respect thereof, as they, my said trustees, shall think most proper and for their advantage; and when they, my said sons, shall have attained their said respective ages of twenty-one years, then, upon trust, that they, my said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor, shall pay all the then residue of the monies which may have arisen from my said real and personal estates as aforesaid unto my two sons, Joseph Wright and Jonathan Wright, in equal parts and proportions, share and share alike, as tenants in common, for their own respective use and benefit; provided that they, my said sons, shall be at that time, in the opinion of my said trustees, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage and take due care thereof; and, if it shall happen that either of my said sons shall die during his minority, then my will is, that the part and share of such son so dying shall be paid unto the survivor of them my said sons, upon his attaining his said age of twenty-one years, provided he shall then be of sufficient discretion to manage and take proper care thereof. And my will is and I do hereby direct that my said trustees and the survivors or survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor, shall, from time to time, as occasion shall require, during the minority of my said children, place out at interest, upon some sufficient mortgage security or securities, all the monies which they may receive from and in respect of my said real and personal estates, except what may be then paid and applied in discharge of my debts, funeral expenses, and the charges of my will, and in the maintenance and education of my said children during their minorities, or in the payment of any apprentice fee or fees to be paid upon the apprenticing of my said sons to any trade or business as aforesaid."

The testator died soon after the date of his will. Joseph Wright attained his majority in 1819 and Jonathan in 1823. Jonathan Wright afterwards died.

The will was proved by Lupton Wright, William Wright, and John Lambert. William Wright died in 1825, and John Lambert in 1840. Joseph Wright had been found a lunatic.

The bill was filed in 1851 by Joseph Wright, by his committee, and the administratrix of Jonathan Wright, against the surviving trustee and the representatives of the deceased trustees, for the administration of the estate of the testator.

It appeared that Joseph Wright and Jonathan Wright were both lunatics at the time of their attaining their majority, and it was stated in an affidavit of Mr. Lupton Wright, the surviving trustee, that, in his opinion, and, as he believed, in the opinion of his co-trustees, they were not of competent understanding and sufficient discretion to manage and take due care of property on their attaining their majority.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Prior, for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Amphlett, for the defendants.

PARKER, V.C.—The question in this case is, whether Joseph and Jonathan Wright, who both attained their majority, took absolute interests under the will, or whether the gift to them was subject to the condition that, at that time, they should be, in the opinion of the trustees, of competent understanding to manage and take due care of the subject of the gift. Considering the anxious provision which the testator has made for them until their attaining twenty-one, to take effect, not only out of the income, but the corpus, the gift over as between themselves in case one should die under age, and the general scheme of the will, it seems to me that the testator was making a complete disposition of his property. I think that the construction of the will which would make the provision for the sons conditional on their being of competent understanding to take care of the property would be against the intention of the testator. I think that the provision as to being of competent understanding was not annexed to the gift, but is a part of the direction to pay. Such a qualification as to the direction for payment does not, in my opinion, make the gift conditional. I think, then, that the two sons took absolutely.

Order made on a petition by a rector for the investment of the money arising from the sale to a railway company of a part of the rectory lands. Pending the proceedings in the Master's office the rector died. The new rector consenting that the proceedings should go on, no supplemental order necessary—semble.

On the petition of the Rev. D. Legard, rector of Lea, an order was made that the Master should inquire as to the propriety of a purchase of, and as to the title to, some land proposed to be bought with the purchase-money of some land belonging to the rectory, which had been taken by a railway company.

Mr. Legard having died during the reference to the Master, the Master declined to go on with it. A new rector was appointed.

Mr. Nalder, on the part of the new rector, now applied for a supplemental order.

Creditor—Defective Execution of a Power —Married Woman—Wilful Default.

The trusts of a bond debt due to A, a married woman, were declared to be for A. for her life, for her separate use, with remainder for such persons as A. should by deed, to be executed by her, in the presence of two witnesses, appoint, with remainders over. B, the husband of A, was indebted to C. A. signed a letter without any attestation, which contained a declaration that she deposited the bond as a collateral security to C. for the debt due to him from B, and the letter and bond were given to C. The body of the letter had been written by C. and given to B, who placed it suddenly before A, requiring her signature, and, in consequence of his urgent request, she signed it. In a suit to enforce C.'s lien on the bond,—Held, first, that A.'s life interest in the bond was bound by the letter; but, secondly, that the Court would not, in C.'s favour, supply the defect in the execution of the power.

A, a woman, being entitled to a bond debt due to her from B, by a settlement made on her marriage, and dated in 1829, assigned it to a trustee upon trust for A. for her life, for her separate use, with remainders over. In 1836, a part of the debt was paid to A. and her husband. In 1842, C. was appointed sole trustee of the settlement. In 1843, A. charged her life interest in the bond debt in favour of D, by way of collateral security for a debt due from her husband to D. In 1843, B. died, and A. took out administration to B. Bill by D. against C. to enforce the security, charging him with wilful default for omitting to get in the part of the debt paid to A. and her husband, and the residue of the debt due from the estate of B:—Held, that C. was not liable, and the bill was dismissed.

By a settlement, dated the 1st of October 1829, and made on the marriage of R. W. Gardiner with Miss Charlotte Gardiner, a debt of 1,500*l.* due on a bond from Harriett Gardiner to Charlotte Gardiner was assigned to T. Gwillim, upon trust to compel payment of the debt, to invest the proceeds, and to pay the income of the investment to Mrs. Gardiner for her life, for her separate use, and, after her death, to hold the trust funds for the benefit of the children of the marriage, and, in default of children, "in trust for such person and persons and in such manner as Mrs. Gardiner alone, notwithstanding coverture, should, by any deed or deeds, or instrument or instruments in writing, with or without power of revocation, to be by her sealed and delivered in the presence of, and attested by, two or more witnesses, from time to time, direct or appoint, give and bequeath the same;" and, in default of appointment, in trust for her next-of-kin, as if she had died unmarried and intestate.

In 1842, Mr. Gardiner opened a banking account with Messrs. Thackwell, J. Webb, Spencer & Holbrook, bankers at Ledbury, and was, on the 17th of April 1843, indebted to them on his account in the sum of 458*l.*

On the 17th of April 1843, Mrs. Gardiner signed the following letter:—

"Gentlemen,—In consideration of your paying, or having already paid, the cheques of my husband, Mr. R. W. Gardiner, or otherwise advancing him sums of money, I hereby guarantee the repayment thereof upon demand, to the extent of 600*l.*, and I furthermore deposit, as a collateral security, a certain bond bearing date the 1st of March 1827, from Harriett Gardiner to me, which bond I undertake to assign to you at my expense whenever called upon to do so."

The bond and letter were then delivered by Mr. Gardiner to the bank.

In 1846, Mr. Holbrook retired from the partnership, and E. J. Webb and Moore were introduced into it. The business was thenceforward carried on by Messrs. Thackwell, J. Webb, Spencer, E. J. Webb & Moore. On this change, the usual deeds of assignment of debts, &c. were executed.

In 1847, Mr. Gardiner became bankrupt. Mr. Gardiner had continued his account with the bank at Ledbury from April 1843 until his bankruptcy, at which time he was indebted to the new firm in 715*l*. This debt was proved by the bank in the bankruptcy, and, by means of the dividends received on the proof and the proceeds of other securities, was afterwards reduced to 321*l*.

The bill, which was filed by Messrs. Thackwell, J. Webb, Spencer, E. J. Webb and Moore against Mrs. Gardiner, prayed for a declaration that the plaintiffs had a lien on all Mrs. Gardiner's interest in the bond for the sum remaining due to them.

Mrs. Gardiner, by her answer, stated that her husband had placed the letter of the 17th of April 1843 hastily and suddenly before her, saying that he wished her to sign it immediately, and that he was in a great hurry, and that the bank had become very troublesome; and that, in consequence of this urgent request, she signed it. Mr. Holbrook, who was examined by Mrs. Gardiner, stated, in his evidence, that the body of the letter was written by a clerk of the bank, and that it was then delivered to Mr. Gardiner to get signed by Mrs. Gardiner, and, when so signed, was returned to the bank by him, and that all the communications on the subject of the transaction took place with Mr. Gardiner, and that he never saw Mrs. Gardiner on the business at all.

The only evidence of the plaintiffs was proof of the signature of Mrs. Gardiner to the letter.

There were no children of the marriage.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Bird, for the plaintiffs, contended that they were entitled to Mrs. Gardiner's life interest on the bond, and that they were also to be considered as appointees of the fund in default of children of the marriage.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Torriano, for Mrs. Gardiner, contended that the letter failed as a guarantee under the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, as no consideration was expressed on the face of it, and that it could not, at any rate, affect the corpus as the formalities as to witnesses had not been complied with.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Haldane, for Mr. Gardiner.

Mr. L. Wigram and Mr. Archibald Smith, for the trustees of the settlement.

Mr. Bacon replied.

The following cases and authorities were cited.—

s. c. 8 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 35.

1 Sugden on Powers, 94.

PARKER, V.C.—The plaintiffs' title is founded upon a letter of the 17th of April 1843, signed by Mrs. Gardiner, and addressed to Messrs. Webb, Holbrook, and Spencer, which is in these words.—[His Honour here read the letter.]—It is contended by the defendants that this letter contains no consideration moving to Mrs. Gardiner; and that, for that reason, it cannot be put in force as against her; and Wain v. Warlters, Raikes v. Todd, and other cases were referred to. It is to be observed that the instrument in question is not a mere letter of guarantee. It purports to deposit with the bankers, as a collateral security, the bond, which is the subject of this suit, and it cannot be doubted that a conveyance or pledge made by one man as a security for the debt of another is supported by sufficient consideration. The plaintiffs sue on Mrs. Gardiner's letter as an equitable assignment and appointment; and, viewed in this light, the discussions on the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds do not appear to me to have any material bearing.

The next question is, as to the effect of the instrument. Mrs. Gardiner, under the settlement of October 1829, was entitled to the income of the money secured by the bond for her separate use, for her life, without any restraint on anticipation. To the extent of this interest she is to be regarded as a feme sole, so that her life interest is bound by the security given to the bankers. Subject to this life interest, and in default of issue of the marriage (and it appears there are none), the trust monies were to be held in trust "for such person or persons and in such manner as Mrs. Gardiner alone, notwithstanding her coverture, should, by any deed or deeds, or instrument or instruments in writing, with or without power of revocation, to be by her sealed and delivered in the presence of and attested by two or more witnesses, from time to time, direct or appoint, give or bequeath the same; and, in default of appointment, in trust for her next-of-kin as if she had died unmarried and intestate." It is contended, by the plaintiffs, that Mrs. Gardiner's letter operated as an execution of this power in favour of the bankers, who, it is said, as creditors or purchasers for value, are entitled in this court to have an execution of the power, though defective for want of the formalities prescribed, established in their favour. There is no doubt that this Court will supply a defect in the execution of a power in favour of a creditor or a purchaser, and that it will do so, although the donee of the power be a married woman. But the Court, in such cases, must be satisfied that the formalities, which have not been observed, are no more than matters of form, and that the donee of the power has not, by their non-observance, been deprived of any protection which a due exercise of the power would have afforded him; and the Court looks with especial jealousy on a transaction in which the wife may have acted under the influence of her husband. The case of Hopkins v. Myall, referred to in the argument, illustrates the principles of this Court in this respect. In the present case the plaintiffs proved nothing beyond Mrs. Gardiner's signature to the letter. Mrs. Gardiner, by her answer, states "that her husband placed the letter hastily and suddenly before her, saying that it had been written by Mr. Spencer, one of the banking firm, and that he wished her to sign it immediately; and that he was in a great hurry, and that the bank had become very troublesome; and that, in consequence of this urgent request she signed it." In support of this case she has examined Mr. Holbrook, who proves, in substance, "that he and his partner were desirous of having Mrs. Gardiner's guarantee; and that the body of the letter was written by a clerk of the bank, as he believes, in his presence, and that it was then delivered to Mr. Gardiner to get signed by Mrs. Gardiner; and that, when so signed, it was returned to the bank by him; that all the communications on the subject of the transaction took place with Mr. Gardiner; and that he never saw Mrs. Gardiner on the business at all." It thus appears, that Mrs. Gardiner's signature was obtained by her husband, for his own purposes, without that protection against his influence which the power contemplated in requiring any appointment by her to be made in the presence of, and attested by, two witnesses; and I am of opinion that the Court cannot regard the power as duly exercised to bind Mrs. Gardiner, as if she had signed it in the presence of witnesses.

The consequence will be a declaration that the life interest of Mrs. Gardiner was charged by the letter of the 17th of April 1843, in favour of the banking firm of Messrs. Webb, Holbrook & Spencer; and that such charge included any interest, or arrears of interest, then due on the bond. There must be a reference to the Master, to inquire and state to the Court whether any and what balance was due, on the 31st of December 1845, (the time when the banking firm was changed), from Gardiner to the firm of Webb, Holbrook & Spencer, in respect of their having paid or otherwise advanced him any sums of money, and whether such sums, or any part thereof, still remain due.

Another point in the case arose under the following circumstances: Harriett Gardiner was indebted to Charlotte Gardiner in 1,500*l.*, secured by bond. In 1829, Charlotte Gardiner, on her marriage with R. W. Gardiner, assigned the debt to Gwillim, on trust to enforce payment of the debt, invest the proceeds, and pay the income to Mrs. Gardiner for life, for her separate use; and, in default of children of the marriage, to hold the trust funds for such persons as she should by deed appoint. Gwillim disclaimed the trusts of the settlement. In 1832, 100*l.*, part of the bond debt, was paid to Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner, and the receipt of it was acknowledged by them. In 1836, James Barrett was appointed a trustee of the settlement. Subsequently, in the same year, 645*l.*, further part of the bond debt, was paid to Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner; and the receipt of it was acknowledged by Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner and James Barrett. Harriett Gardiner, the obligor, married James Barrett. In 1841, James Barrett died. In 1842, Brown was appointed a trustee of the settlement. In 1843, Mrs. Gardiner, by a letter addressed to Messrs. Holbrook, Spencer & Webb, bankers, charged the debt due to her with sums advanced by them to her husband, Mr. Gardiner. In 1843, Harriett Barrett, the obligor, died; and letters of administration of her estate were granted to Mrs. Gardiner.

In 1847, Mr. Gardiner became bankrupt.

A bill was filed by the bankers against Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner, for the purpose of enforcing their claims on the bond debt, in respect of Mrs. Gardiner's letter.

Between 1843 and the time of filing the supplemental bill the matter stood thus: Mr. Gardiner, in respect of the payments made to him, of the sums of 100*l.* and 645*l.*, on account of the bond debt, was indebted in those sums to Brown as trustee of the settlement, and Mrs. Gardiner as administratrix of Mrs. Barrett, the obligor, was indebted to Mr. Brown as such trustee in the securities of the debt. Mr. Brown had not taken any steps in the matter. There were no children of the marriage. A supplemental bill was filed by the bankers against Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner and Mr. Brown, stating the above circumstances, and praying that Mr. Brown might be charged with wilful default for omitting to recover the two sums of 100*l.* and 645*l.* from Mr. Gardiner, and the remainder of the debt from Mrs. Gardiner, as administratrix of Mrs. Barrett, and for the administration of the estate of Mrs. Barrett.

PARKER, V.C.—The original bill is filed by the plaintiffs, as bankers, asserting their title, under an instrument of deposit, against Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner, and seeking to have an interest in the bond. A supplemental bill was filed by the plaintiffs proceeding upon this; and, assuming that they have a title in the bond, seeking, as it were, to realize the amount due on it, partly calling on Mr. Brown, the trustee, to make good some payments that had been made by the obligor on the bond, and partly to administer the estate of the obligor for the purpose of recovering the balance due on the bond, and seeking relief against Mr. Brown, the trustee, on the ground of wilful default. It appears that, long before Brown became a trustee, payment had been made on account of her bond by the obligor to Mrs. Gardiner, in which Mrs. Gardiner had joined with the husband in a receipt. I think that nobody claiming under her can possibly dispute the propriety of those payments. As to this, I can see no foundation of any claim for wilful default.

Then, there is a further case of wilful default made, that Mr. Brown, after his appointment as trustee, allowed the money to remain out in the hands of the representative of the obligor who was dead, and that he ought to have taken proceedings to have compelled the payment. I think, however, that this claim of wilful default admits of the same answer. The bond was to be paid out of the assets of the obligor, Mrs. Gardiner being the personal representative. Of course, any claim in respect of the assets must have been a claim to be asserted against her husband. It must be supposed that, if Mr. Brown forebore to institute proceedings against her and her husband, it was a proceeding which had her concurrence; and, therefore, it appears to me the parties claiming under her cannot complain of Brown's conduct in not taking those proceedings. So far, then, as this bill seeks to charge Mr. Brown with wilful default the case fails, and that part of the supplemental bill must be dismissed, with costs. Mr. Brown, however, is a necessary party, because he is the person to whom the bond was to be made over on the trusts of the settlement.

Company — Contributories — Power of Attorney—Revocation of Power.

In July 1849 A. gave B, the secretary of a joint-stock company in the course of formation, a power of attorney authorizing him to execute the deed of settlement in the name of A. for five shares. In August a correspondence passed between A. and B. to this effect: A. desired to terminate all connexion with the society; B. requested A. to pay the calls; A. hoped the directors would excuse him, and B. stated that the directors would not release him. Nothing further took place between A. and B. In October the company was completely registered, and B. executed the deed of settlement in the name of A. The company was wound up:—Held, that A. had not revoked the power of attorney, and was properly placed on the list of contributories of the company, in respect of five shares.

Whether A. could revoke the power of attorney—quære.

On the 30th of July 1849 Mr. Collingridge, the secretary, and one of the directors, of a joint-stock company, then in the course of formation, called "The Sea, Fire, and Life Assurance Society," called at the residence of Mr. Burton, at Monmouth, and proposed to him that he should be one of the agents of the company. There had not been any previous acquaintance between them. Mr. Burton readily acceded to the proposal. Mr. Collingridge then added that, as it was considered desirable that the agents of the society should have some direct interest in its welfare, he must impose the condition that Mr. Burton should take at least five shares in the concern. To this Mr. Burton demurred, but, ultimately, signed a power of attorney, authorizing Mr. Collingridge to execute the deed of settlement of the company in the name of him, Mr. Burton, for five shares.

On the 2nd of August Mr. Collingridge sent a letter to Mr. Burton, informing him that five shares had been allotted to him.

Mr. Burton, having repented of the course which he had taken, wrote a letter to Mr. Collingridge, dated the 17th day of August, in which he expressed his desire "to terminate all connexion with the undertaking." In reply to this, Mr. Collingridge wrote the following letter, dated August 18th:—

"Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th inst., and the directors accept your resignation to act as agent for the district of Monmouth. I have also to remind you that the amount of 5*l.* on your five shares was due on Saturday, the 11th inst., of which notice was given. I am requested to inform you that the directors require that you pay the same on or before the 25th inst."

In reply to this, Mr. Burton then wrote the following letter, dated August 20th, 1849:—

"Sir,—In answer to yours of the 18th inst., I trust the directors of the Sea, Fire, and Life Assurance Society will not insist upon making me a proprietor of shares, which I certainly should never have thought of applying for, but for the circumstance of being very much urged to take the agency for the district of Monmouth. It was merely to comply with the society's regulations, upon becoming an agent to them, that I applied for them; and, when I requested the favour of being exonerated from the agency, I meant the shares also; and, as the directors have been pleased to excuse me the one, I hope they will also the other."

Upon this the following letter, dated August 21, was sent by Mr. Collingridge:

"Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th inst., and am requested by the directors to inform you that they cannot, in duty to the shareholders whom they represent, release you from the shares you subscribed for; but, to meet your convenience, the directors will allow you to nominate another party to pay upon the shares."

No further communication took place between Mr. Burton and the company.

The company was completely registered in October; and, on the 15th of that month, Mr. Collingridge executed the deed of settlement for five shares in Mr. Burton's name.

The company was ordered to be wound up, and the Master placed Mr. Burton's name on the list of contributories for five shares.

This was an appeal by Mr. Burton from the Master's decision.

Mr. Malins, for the motion.—Mr. Burton gave Mr. Collingridge a power of attorney to execute the deed of settlement. This was revocable—The King v. Wait (1). Then did Mr. Burton revoke it? In the letter of the 17th he says "I desire to terminate all connexion with the undertaking." This prima facie would operate as a revocation. Mr. Collingridge misunderstands, or affects to misunderstand, this letter; and, by the letter of the 18th, discharges him from the agency only. The following letter of the 20th removes all doubt as to the question of the shares; it is as if he had said by the expression "terminate all connexion with the undertaking; I mean both shares and agency." These two together then amount to a complete revocation; and, as the deed of settlement was not executed until after these letters, Mr. Burton is not bound by Mr. Collingridge's act.

Mr. Roxburgh, for the official manager.

Mr. Malins replied.

PARKER, V.C.—I think that the Master has come to a right conclusion. Before the 17th of August, Burton had done all that was necessary to render him liable as a contributory. He had agreed to take shares by a formal instrument, which contained a power of attorney to Collingridge to execute the deed for him; and, upon this, shares were allotted to him. It may be a matter of question whether the power given to Collingridge was revocable by Mr. Burton. However this may be, I think that it was not revoked. In a letter of the 17th of August, Burton asked to have the connexion put an end to. To this letter he received an answer, which discharged him from the agency, but reminded him that 5*l.* was due on his five shares. The reply to that was, "I trust the directors will not insist."—[Here His Honour read the letter of the 20th of August.] That was a request to be discharged from the liability under which he had come. This request was, by the letter of the 21st, refused, a part of this answer being "to meet your convenience the directors will allow you to nominate another party to pay upon the shares." Nothing more was done. Mr. Burton's silence left the matter where it was. He made a request, which was refused. I think that Mr. Burton is liable, and the motion must be refused, with costs.

MOORHOUSE v. COLVIN.

Marriage Contract—Promise—Portion.

*A father bound himself to give his daughter a marriage portion of 2,000*l.*, and said that she was and should be noticed in his will. He had previously made a will, giving her a lac of rupees; but afterwards he made another will, which, after giving all his property to his wife for life, and then to his two sons, gave the same, if they should die without issue, to his daughter's issue:—Held, affirming a decree below, that there was no contract by the father to give more than the 2,000*l.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, against a decree of the Master of the Rolls, pronounced on the 4th of December 1851, and which, with the whole facts of the case, are fully reported ante, p. 177.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Toller appeared for the appellant.

Sir W. P. Wood, Mr. Willcock, Mr. Anderson, Mr. G. W. Collins, Mr. Giffard, and Mr. W. Morris, for the respondents.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This is a bill filed for the purpose of establishing the right of Mr. and Mrs. Moorhouse to a lac of rupees, that is to say, a sum of not less than 12,000*l.*, out of the estate of the late Dr. Peter Cochrane; and the foundation of this claim was a letter written by Dr. Cochrane, on the 6th of July 1825, to a gentleman of the name of Dr.

Thomas, in India, on the occasion of Mrs. Moorhouse, then Miss Cochrane, going out to that country with a view to establishing herself for life, the lady being then of the age of nineteen. Dr. Cochrane sent her to India, and simultaneously wrote a letter to Dr. Thomas. By it he bound himself to give her, on marriage, 2,000*l.* in the following terms:—"You may assure the young gentleman who may meet with your and Mrs. Thomas's approbation, that on his marriage with her he shall have 2,000*l.* sterling;" and then he adds, "nor will that be all; she is and shall be noticed in my will, but to what further amount I cannot say, owing to the present reduced and reducing state of interest, which puts it out of my power to determine at present what I may have to dispose of. I hope, however, that he will have no objection to admit of the 2,000*l.*, and whatsoever else may follow, being settled on herself and children. Should she die before him, without issue, he shall have the 2,000*l.* to himself."

Now, the real question is, what is the correct interpretation to be put on that letter? I will assume that the letter was shewn to Mr. Moorhouse previous to his marriage with Miss Cochrane, and on that assumption even I still concur with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. The letter means this, "I leave you, Dr. Thomas, in charge of my daughter. I wish her to marry, and you have my authority to say she will have 2,000*l.*, with a proviso that it shall be settled; but I further add, I have made a will, and have made a further provision, but to what amount I cannot and will not say; as to the amount of 2,000*l.* I bind myself to pay it, but no more than the 2,000*l.*" Dr. Cochrane, then, having paid the 2,000*l.*, she has no further claim on his estate.

But then it is contended that by his writing to Dr. Thomas "she is and shall be noticed in my will," he had, at any rate, bound himself not to reduce the provision made for her by will below a lac of rupees, or 12,000*l.* to which she was then entitled under a then existing will; but that is not so. The testator, in effect, says, "I have or shall make a will, but I reserve to myself full power either of increasing or reducing by it the provision for my daughter." It is a case of great hardship on Mr. and Mrs. Moorhouse, who were, doubtless, led to expect a large fortune; but we must not allow any private feelings to make us swerve from our duty. The contract is to give 2,000*l.*, and nothing more, unless it be something which is left entirely to his discretion by will, but he has given nothing. The party might, perhaps, have a right of action, in which nominal damages could be obtained, but that the Court would disregard.

The authorities the counsel for the plaintiff relied on were the case before the House of Lords, Hammersley v. De Biel (1) and Luders v. Anstey (2); but both cases are distinguishable materially from the present. The question in each of those cases was, whether the expressions made use of amounted to a contract between the parties, and Lord Loughborough, in the one case, and the House of Lords in the other, held that they did. Whether, on the question in Luders v. Anstey, all minds would have arrived at the same conclusion, it matters not; but there was no difficulty, assuming that there was a contract in that case, in knowing what was to be done; but in this case the difficulty is, even if there had been an express contract, that the Court cannot tell what sum is to be given. The authorities fail, therefore, in supporting the case of the plaintiff.

On the whole, my opinion is, that this amounts to a contract to do a deed which has been done, that he would give her 2,000*l.* The Master of the Rolls has acted correctly in dismissing the bill.

[Mr. Toller asked for a reference as to whether Mr. Moorhouse had the contents of the will communicated to him previous to his marriage, and whether Dr. Cochrane was aware that such communication had been made to him.]

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I am most clearly of opinion that there was no contract beyond the 2,000*l.* The only question which could possibly arise would be whether, notwithstanding our opinion on that subject, a case should be directed on the question of contract to a court of law: first, on facts as they stand proved; and, secondly, with the addition of the facts, which it is suggested can be proved. I do not think a case would do the plaintiff any good; but I should disregard my own view as to sending a case to law, if my learned Brother thought it ought to be sent. I am not strongly impressed that a case should be sent, but if Lord Cranworth thinks it should, I shall not dissent.

(1) 12 Cl. & F. 45.

(2) 4 Ves. 501.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I do not think a case should be sent.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—We both think it right to dismiss the appeal; but it must be dismissed, without costs, and the deposit must be returned.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } In re WARING.
July 9. }

Baron and Feme — Covenant to settle — Trustees Relief Act — Costs.

Upon the marriage of an infant the husband by an ante-nuptial settlement covenanted that upon his wife attaining the age of twenty-one he would join and concur with her, if she would consent thereto, in settling upon her and the children of the marriage certain property to which she would become entitled for her separate use. The wife attained her age of twenty-one, and refused to join in settling the property:—Held, that the settlement was inoperative.

After the wife had attained her majority, information was given by her, to the trustees of the will under which she was entitled to the above property, that a bill would be filed against them charging them with breaches of trust and seeking an account. The trustees, after this notice, paid her share into court, under the Trustee Act. Upon petition for payment of the money out of court, the trustees were refused their costs.

This was a petition for the payment out of court of a sum of money paid in under the Trustee Act by John and James Tellwright, the trustees under the will of William Tellwright, dated the 18th of October 1841, who gave the residue of his estate to his two sons John Tellwright and James Tell-wright, upon trust to sell and convert the same into money, and to divide the proceeds amongst his children equally, the shares of sons to be paid on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years, and the shares of daughters on their respectively attaining that age or being first married. And the testator directed that the shares of his said daughters respectively should be paid to their separate use, and should not be liable to the debts or controul of their respective husbands, and their receipts alone to be sufficient discharges for the same.

The testator died in 1841, and his daughter Martha, while under the age of twenty-one, married William Waring; and by the settlement made previously to her marriage, the said William Waring covenanted with the said John Tellwright and James Tellwright, that he would, as soon as conveniently might be, after the said Martha Tellwright should attain the age of twenty-one years, if she should be then living, join and concur with her, if she would consent thereto, and would also use his utmost endeavours to procure her to join and concur with him, or in case she should have departed this life, then that he would alone duly execute all such deeds, conveyances, and assurances as should be advised for conveying and assigning all and singular the part or share to which the said Martha Tellwright, her executors or administrators, or the said W. Waring in her right, should or might become entitled under the said will, unto the said John Tellwright and James Tellwright, upon certain trusts therein mentioned for the benefit of Martha Tellwright and William Waring and the children of the marriage.

Martha Tellwright attained the age of twenty-one in the year 1851, and shortly afterwards information was given to John and James Tellwright that a bill would be filed against them by Martha Tellwright and her husband, charging them with breaches of trust and seeking an account in respect of the estate of the testator.

The bill was accordingly filed on the 13th of March 1852, after which a notice was served upon the said Martha Tellwright by the said John and James Tellwright, that they had transferred into court, under the Trustees Relief Act, the sum of 1,112*l.* consols. as her share under the will. An affidavit was at the same time filed by the said trustees, setting out the accounts of the testator's estate.

The petition now presented was by Mrs. Waring, praying a declaration that the settlement made upon her marriage might be declared void, and that the sum so paid into court might be transferred to her upon her separate receipt.

Mr. Lewin, in support of the petition, contended that the settlement was inoperative. The covenant on the part of the husband was to the effect that he would settle the future property of the wife in case she consented to its being so settled. It now appeared that she refused to consent, and therefore the settlement could have no operation in respect of the wife, who was an infant when the settlement was executed. The property, therefore, remained impressed only with the trusts under the will for her separate use, and she was now entitled to have it paid to her—Simson v. Jones (1). It was also submitted, that the trustees had no right to pay this money into court after notice had been given to them that a bill was to be filed, and, under such circumstances, they ought to bear the costs of their improper conduct.

Mr. Haddan appeared for the trustees, and contended, that the settlement ought to be executed, and that the trustees were entitled to their costs—Lloyd v. Williams (2).

Mr. Jessel appeared for the husband and for an infant child; and Mr. Malins, for other parties.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I regret to be under the necessity of deciding that this settlement cannot prevent the petitioner from having the benefit of that which is her separate estate. If there had been no settlement, then there could have been no question but she would have had it for her separate use. If in that state of things the trustees had paid the money into court, the petitioner would at once have been entitled to have it paid out to her. The question, therefore, is, whether the fact of a settlement having been made when she was an infant alters the case. I must say I think it is no more than mere waste paper as against her. I cannot treat it otherwise without overruling every principle which has been laid down with regard to infants. The only reason which could ever make such a settlement binding would be, that inasmuch as the husband binds himself he binds the fund, because it would be his if he did not, but that applies only to a case where the husband would be entitled jure mariti, but not so under a case where the property was given to the wife so as to exclude the jus mariti. The fact of the property being given to the separate use of the lady I consider to be decisive, and, therefore, I regret to be obliged to decide according to the prayer of the petition. There is certainly one thing which does away with my regret in thus deciding, and that is that I am informed the husband and wife intend to re-settle the whole of this fund, with the exception of 300*l.* or 400*l.*

Then, as to the costs. It is quite evident that the intention of the legislature in passing the Trustees Relief Act was only to enable the trustees to pay into court a legacy or share of a trust fund under peculiar circumstances. The object was to relieve trustees; that is, to relieve them from the position of having in their hands money which they do not know what to do with: as, for instance, where a legacy is given to A. B, and the trustees cannot find the A. B. to whom it is made payable, or where trustees cannot take upon themselves the responsibility of distributing a fund, or cannot take upon themselves to decide all the questions of law raised, and then the trustee is required to file an affidavit stating, not the whole history of the administration of the trust, to shew that the residue after administration was so and so, but that he admits it to be the residue under such a settlement or will. Then, that act being passed for the relief of trustees, would it not be absurd to apply it to cases where it was not for the relief of trustees? If the trustees are informed that a suit is to be instituted, the effect of which will be to try the question, and that it will at the same time call the trustees to account for the sums received about the trust, surely under such circumstances the trustee ought not to avail himself of the act to avoid the responsibility of accounting. It appears to me that a trustee abuses the act of parliament, if in such a case he pays the money into court. At the same time the legislature has, no doubt, enabled him to do so. I think it would have been better if the legislature had required the affidavit to contain some indication that he has no reason to believe that a bill has been filed; but where a trustee knows that a bill is to be filed, and then pays the money into court, that looks as if it were not for the purpose of escaping from the responsibility of the trust fund, but of escaping from the liabilities which might be incurred under the charges in the bill. In this case information was sent to the executors that a bill was about to be filed. It is said that the whole question arises out of the refusal of these gentlemen, as trustees, to pay a small sum of money to the petitioner independent of the settlement. I sympathize with the wishes of the trustees to keep the trust fund safe; but at any rate notification was made to them that a bill was about to be filed, and it was notified to them that their accounts would be investigated, and that they would be charged with fraud: and then without any notice this money is paid into court under the Trustees Relief Act. It appears to me that if the legislature had contemplated just such a case as this, it would have prevented the money being paid in at all, and I think it would be a very great improvement if the trustees in paying in money, were compelled to make an affidavit that they did not know of any litigation about to be instituted. How then, under these circumstances, am I to deal with this case? In the case of a simple legacy, the trustees are not necessarily entitled to costs, but then the expense of paying in the money is part of the act of administration; but this is the share of a residue, and in that it differs materially. Finding, therefore, as I do that this money was paid in, in abuse of the act of parliament, where it was not necessary for the relief of the trustees that it should be paid in,—where a proceeding was communicated to the executors for the purpose of exonerating them from the responsibility, under such circumstances I should be doing wrong if I gave the executors any costs; but the other parties who have appeared in order that the petition might be presented must have their costs out of the fund.

(1) 2 Russ. & M. 365; s.c. 9 Law J. Rep. Chanc. 106.

(2) 1 Madd. 450.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } PIDDUCK v. BOULTBEE.
April 19.

Motion by Next Friend—Irregularity.

In a suit by adult plaintiffs and infant plaintiffs, an order was obtained for changing the next friends of the infants. The order was drawn up and entered. The adult plaintiffs obtained at the Rolls an order for changing the solicitor to the suit, and alleged that the order appointing a new next friend had not been drawn up and entered. The new next friend moved to discharge the order obtained at the Rolls:—Held, that the order for changing the solicitor was irregular; but that the motion to discharge ought to have been by the infants by their next friend, and not by the next friend in his individual capacity.

Application refused, but leave given to amend notice of motion.

This bill was filed, by two adult plaintiffs and by three infants, by Elizabeth Mary Pidduck, their next friend. In November 1851 an order was made by this Court for changing the next friend, and Dr. Wardell was substituted for E. M. Pidduck. The order was drawn up and entered, and counsel appeared at the time the order was made for E. M. Pidduck.

An order of course was subsequently obtained at the Rolls Court, upon the petition of the adult plaintiffs, by which it was ordered that the petitioners might be at liberty to change their solicitor by appointing R. Pugh as such solicitor in the place of Messrs. Crosby & Co. That petition was intituled in a cause in which the two adult plaintiffs and the four infants, by their next friend E. M. Pidduck, were plaintiffs; and it was stated that the order made by this Court for changing their next friend had not been drawn up and entered.

Mr. Stuart now moved, on behalf of Dr. Wardell, the new next friend, to discharge the order made at the Rolls for leave to change the solicitor on the ground of irregularity, it having been made without notice to Dr. Wardell, and having falsely stated that the order appointing Dr. Wardell was not drawn up and entered. Evidence was produced to shew that the order had been properly drawn up and entered.

Mr. Follett appeared for the defendants in the same interest.

Mr. Willcock, for the plaintiffs, contended that the order made at the Rolls was not irregular, since the order for changing the next friend had been made without the consent of E. M. Pidduck, the original next friend. This statement was supported by an affidavit made by E. M. Pidduck. It was also submitted that this motion could not be made by Dr. Wardell alone in his individual capacity, but should have been on behalf of the infants by their next friend.

Mr. Stuart, in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. — I cannot help thinking that some rational course ought to be taken to prevent the waste of time occasioned by all these nonsensical proceedings. All this is about the machinery of the cause, and not the merits. With regard to the question whether the order of the Rolls was regular or not, my opinion is that it was irregular. It was an application for changing the solicitor in the cause, on a suggestion that delay had taken place, and on a representation that E. M. Pidduck was the next friend of the infants, when in fact she was not, the order appointing Dr. Wardell having been drawn up and entered. Being of opinion, therefore, that the order was irregular, I should discharge it, provided the party moving to discharge had a right to do so.

Then comes the question, whether the next friend coming to the Court as an individual has a right to discharge the order. I will not say that a next friend merely in his own individual capacity may not be entitled in some cases to ask for such an order, but as a general rule the next friend asks because the application is by the infants by their next friend. Now, in this case, after the order of November 1851, Dr. Wardell became the next friend of the infant plaintiffs, and the suit was thus constituted: there were two adult plaintiffs and four infant plaintiffs by Dr. Wardell as their next friend. Some of these plaintiffs, that is, the adult plaintiffs, behind the back of the next friend of the infants, go to the Rolls and obtain an order to change the solicitor, who is solicitor for all the plaintiffs. Now, as the solicitor is instructed by the adult plaintiffs and by the next friend of the infants as such next friend, what right have the adult plaintiffs to get such an order behind the back of the next friend? It was infringing on the rights of the infants as well as their next friend. The infants, therefore, should come to discharge the order by their next friend, and not the next friend in his individual capacity.

Upon these considerations, I think the objection is valid, and I cannot grant the motion. On a proper application by the infants by their next friend, I should discharge the order, but as it is I must refuse the motion.

Leave was then asked to amend the notice of motion.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. said, if amending the notice would save expense, he would allow it.

WRIGHT v. CALLENDER.

Will — Construction — Annuity — Deficiency — Appropriated Fund — Residue.

A testator directed the investment of personal estate sufficient to pay 2l. a week to J. W. during his life; and after his death, the capital to fall into the residue. He directed that when his youngest child attained twenty-one, the residue of his personal estate should be divided equally among his, the testator's children, except J. W. and in like manner, on the death of J. W. to divide the fund invested for the annuity among all the testator's other children then living, and the issue of such as were then dead equally. The residue was invested, and was not sufficient for payment of the annuity. The Court below held, that, as the corpus was given in a subsequent clause of the will to different persons than the residue, the annuitant was only entitled to the dividends of the fund, for that there was no specific gift of the annuity charged on the whole personal estate; but, on appeal,—Held, that the annuitant was entitled to his annuity in full, and to have the arrears and future payments made good by a sale, from time to time, of the capital of the appropriated fund.

This was an appeal from a decree upon a claim made by Vice Chancellor Kindersley. William Wright, the testator, by his will, dated in July 1851, bequeathed a legacy of 100*l.*, and directed his executors to pay his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses out of his personal estate, and directed them to get in such personal estate, and to stand possessed thereof as follows:

“Upon trust to invest a sufficient portion thereof in the public funds of Great Britain, or upon other government securities, to produce an income of 2*l.* a week to be paid by my executors to my son James Wright during the term of his natural life, to and for his own use and benefit, for his support and maintenance; the said annuity to be in bar and satisfaction of all claim, right, or title to my real and personal estate, or any part thereof; and from and after the decease of my said son James, the said sum so invested to fall into and become part of the residue of my said personal estate.” (The will, after reciting that the testator was seised and possessed of certain freehold and leasehold estates therein mentioned, and giving the same in specified allotments to the testator’s other children, Thomas, Isaac, Rebecca, and Hannah absolutely, at the age of twenty-one respectively, concluded with the following clause.)—“And whereas when and as soon as the youngest of my said children shall attain that age, upon trust that my said executors do and shall pay and divide my said residuary estate (all such parts of which as do not already consist of public stocks, funds, and securities, I direct may in the mean time be invested in the public funds or on government securities), after deducting the several payments aforesaid, and all due allowances to my said executors, unto and amongst all and every of my said children, except my said son James Wright, share and share alike, to and for their own absolute use and benefit. And in like manner, I direct that upon the decease of my said son James, the sum to be invested to produce and pay his annuity of 2*l.* a week shall be divided unto and amongst all my other children who shall be then living, or the issue of such of them as may be dead, share and share alike.

The testator died on the 20th of July 1851; and the executors having proved the will, paid his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacy of 100*l.* They also assigned over the leasehold estates to the children of the testator, to whom they were respectively bequeathed by the will. The residue of the testator’s personal estate they invested in the purchase of 2,200*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, 3*l.* per cent. consols, which was all that it was adequate to purchase. The dividends of this sum were regularly applied in payment of the 2*l.* per week in respect of the annuity given to the testator’s son James Wright, until January 1852, the deficiency of such dividends for payment of such annuity being from time to time made up out of the capital. From that time, however, the executors declined to pay more than the actual dividends of the fund; whereupon James Wright filed his claim, praying that a sufficient sum might be set apart out of the personal estate of the testator, and invested in the public funds or upon government securities, pursuant to the terms of the will; or otherwise to have the annuity valued, and the sum at which the same should be valued, paid to the annuitant out of the testator’s personal estate.

The case was heard before Vice Chancellor Kindersley, on the 24th of April, who held that the plaintiff was entitled to no more than the dividends of the fund after payment of the costs of the suit (1), and from this judgment the plaintiff now appealed.

(1) The judgment of his Honour (from Mr. Gunning’s note) was in substance as follows.—

“The main question is, whether this is a simple gift of an annuity to James Wright, or whether it is a gift of such a sum of stock as will produce the sum to be paid to him for life; and after his death the specific stock is given over to persons who are

Mr. Malins and Mr. Drewry, for the appellant.—The annuity in this case is charged upon the whole personal estate, and the legatee's right to be paid the entire annuity cannot be affected by any appropriation—Gordon v. Bowden (2). The fund to be appropriated to secure the annuity is directed to sink into the residue after the death of the annuitant, and the residue is afterwards given to the children of the testator other than the annuitant. By a subsequent clause, the appropriated fund is given, "in like manner," for the benefit of the children other than the annuitant of the testator and their issue; a bequest differing as to those benefited from the bequest of the residue. Vice Chancellor Kindersley considered this material, but it is, in truth, nothing more than an inartificial and untechnical mode of expressing what the tesjust as much the objects of the testator's bounty as the tenant for life. * * If a testator says, 'I give an annuity of 20*l.* to A,' A. has a right to say, 'pay me the annuity, whether it exhausts the assets or not;' but if the testator says, 'invest so much stock as will produce 20*l.*, and pay it to A. for life, and after his death that particular fund is not to fall into the residue, but is to go over to B., or to a class,' it appears to me that it does not come within those cases where, on the mere gift of an annuity, the annuity may exhaust the corpus of the fund. The only case where that was not so was May v. Bennett. It is true the testator there does not begin by giving an annuity, but he says that the executors shall lay out as much as will produce one; so that the conclusion of the Court was, that it was in effect a gift of an annuity payable out of the estate generally, and it appears that in that case there was a residuary legatee, but non constat whether there had been any other assets than the particular fund. If there had been any other assets, they would have been paid over to the residuary legatee. The Court said, if there were any other assets, the annuitant was entitled to have the fund to secure the annuity; but if no other assets, then the annuitant would be entitled to all. But in May v. Bennett there was no specific gift of the fund to answer the annuity. It appears to me that makes the difference. I am, therefore, of opinion, that, if the plaintiff chooses, he is entitled to an account of the assets; i. e. to ascertain whether there were any other assets, which, with the 2,200*l.*, would make up a fund sufficient to produce the annuity. If the plaintiff chooses to waive that account, then, without the necessity of any further discussion, I shall declare, the plaintiff waiving a decree for an account, that he is only entitled to the dividends of so much of the stock as shall remain after payment of the costs."

The account was waived, and the decree made as above.

(2) 6 Madd. 342.

tator had previously signified to, be his intention; namely, that the appropriated fund should go with the residue. The annuity bequeathed is not the income of a particular fund, but an annual income of a given amount; and although the executors are directed to set apart a sum of money sufficient to produce the income, the annuity is a charge upon the whole personal estate, as well as upon the sum so appropriated. In substance, the gift is a gift of an annuity, the direction for investment being merely a means of securing the annuity. That being so, the plaintiff is entitled to have the annuity valued, and to be paid the amount of the valuation—Wroughton v. Colquhoun (3), Carr v. Ingleby (4), Long v. Hughes (5); or if not entitled to a gross sum, the amount of a valuation, he is, at all events, entitled to have the deficiency in the dividends of the appropriated fund to meet the annual payments in respect of the annuity made good, from time to time, by a sale of part of the capital of the fund; as in the case of May v. Bennett (6), where a testator directed his executors to lay out, in what government security they pleased, as much money as would produce a certain annual interest for his wife's use during her life. The executors invested in the 5*l.* per cents. a sum which yielded dividends equal to the sum mentioned. These were afterwards diminished by the conversion of the stock into 4*l.* per cents., and Lord Gifford, the Master of the Rolls, ordered that the deficiency should be made up to the grantee out of the general estate, or by the sale, from time to time, of portions of the appropriated stock. The learned counsel then cited and commented on Davies v. Wattier (7).

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Shebbeare, for the executors.—The testator directs his executors to invest a sufficient portion of his personal estate in the public funds to produce an income of 2*l.* a week to be paid to his son James, after whose decease the fund is directed to fall into the residue of the testator's estate. By a subsequent clause, however, the fund is given, not to the testator's other children, to whom alone the residue is given, but for the benefit of those children and their issue, and is thus disposed of in a manner different from the residue. The last clause affecting the appropriated fund after the death of the annuitant is different from the first clause directing it to fall into the residue; and where there are two inconsistent clauses in a will, the rule is to reject the first, and give effect to the last.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Whatever may be the order of the clauses of the testator's will, every part of the instrument becomes the testator's will at the instant of execution by the testator. The rule of construction you rely upon is never applied till every other resource has failed. Your point is, that the general residue of the personal estate is given in one way, and the capital of the appropriated fund in another, notwithstanding the introductory words "in like manner" to the latter clause, and notwithstanding the direction of the prior clause that it shall become part of the residue.]

It is submitted that that is so, and that the effect of the two clauses is a gift of the fund to James for life, with remainder for the benefit of others; in fact, that all that the plaintiff can take is, the income of the particular fund. The other children of the testator were objects of his bounty as much as James, and it could never have been intended that the capital of the appropriated fund should be sunk in the purchase of a government annuity, or in the payment of a gross sum equivalent to the price of such an annuity.

Mr. Drewry was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I do not express a very confident opinion. On a will so obscurely worded it is not to be wondered at that different minds arrive at different conclusions. I am, however, bound to confess that I do not concur in the view taken by the Vice Chancellor. The view he took is this:—The testator has, by his will, given to his son James an annuity of 104*l.* per annum, and has directed that such annuity shall be secured by means of a fund out of which it may be paid. He left assets insufficient to raise a fund of which the dividends could be applied to pay the annuity in full; in fact, it would not be sufficient for the payment of more than 60*l.* or 70*l.* per annum. The question then arises, what is to be done under these circumstances? It is hardly controvertible that if there had been a mere gift of the annuity, and afterwards a simple gift of the residue, the annuitant would be entitled to be paid in full. The Vice Chancellor, however, proceeded upon this distinction, that the fund to be appropriated to secure the annuity, though directed by the will to fall into the residue of the testator's estate, is, by a subsequent clause of the will, in effect given to a different class of persons from those who are to have the residue. So far, I go with the Vice Chancellor in thinking that the same persons do not take the appropriated fund and the general residue, but that does not affect the question. The testator, in substance, says that an annuity of 104*l.* shall be secured to his son James, and, as a means of doing it, directs an investment in consols; now, that is nothing more than the law itself would direct to be done. There is nothing in the terms of the gift over shewing that the testator intended the fund to be preserved in its integrity during the life of James. It is a gift over in that event of so much as shall then remain. There is, in reality, no distinction between this case and that of May v. Bennett. There, as in the case before the Court, the question arose between the annuitant and the residuary legatee. The testator in that case having directed his executors to lay out in what government security they pleased as much money as would produce an annual interest, and having given that annual interest to his wife during her life, in case she did not marry again, the executors invested in the 5*l.* per cents. a sum which yielded dividends exactly equal to the specified income. Eighteen years afterwards the dividends were diminished by the conversion of the 5*l.* per cents. into 4*l.* per cents., and became, therefore, insufficient to meet the annuity. Lord Gifford (Master of the Rolls) held that the setting apart the fund was only a means to the end, and that if that means failed the intention was, that the nominal amount of the security should be made up out of the other assets. What Lord Gifford said is this: "If there is any difficulty in making good the difference out of the general estate of the testator, the widow must have the deficiency raised, from time to time, by the sale of parts of the appropriated stock." Now, that is, in my opinion, equity, and the only equity which the annuitant in the principal case has.

I cannot agree that the law is as has been stated by the counsel for the appellant, viz., that where the question arises between the annuitant and those entitled to the residuary estate, the annuitant is entitled to have the annuity valued, and to be paid the amount of the valuation in respect of his annuity. In all the cases which have been cited in support of that view of the law, the question has arisen, not between the annuitant and the residuary legatee, but between the annuitant and pecuniary legatees. But as between an annuitant and pecuniary legatees, the Court holds that there must be an abatement pari passu in case of deficiency of assets, and knows of no other way of dealing with the subject but by means of a valuation. The case is different where the claimant is entitled as against the residue to an annuity, and something else; namely, the investment of a fund as a means to secure the payment of the annuity.

Then, all that can be asked is, payment of the annuity, and an investment of the fund by way of security; and in the event of the dividends of that fund being insufficient to meet the annual payment in respect of the annuity, then to have the deficiency made good from time to time, either by a sale of portions of the appropriated stock, or out of any other part of the residue which can be made available. It may happen, certainly, that by this means the whole appropriated fund would in the end be exhausted, if the annuitant lived long enough. In that case, the annuitant will only be in the situation of any other person to whom a testator bequeaths a benefit without leaving assets to provide for it.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — In electing between the two different constructions which have been put upon the language of the will in question, I arrive at the same conclusion as Lord Cranworth; different from that of the Vice Chancellor. The opinion which I formed when I first read the will, and which has continued unchanged during the argument, is, that the plaintiff is entitled to have the will read as if he was named in it simply and merely as a legatee of an annuity of 2*l.* per week for life. I certainly am not at present disposed to direct that the annuity should be valued, or to do more than allow the annuitant, from time to time, to break into the capital of the appropriated fund, for the purpose of making good any deficiency in the dividends to pay his annuity. If the parties can agree upon that mode of raising the deficiency, the case may, as to that, be mentioned again to the Court.

The order ultimately made declared that the plaintiff was entitled to be paid his annuity in full, and to have the arrears then due, as well as any deficiency in the dividends of the appropriated fund to meet the future payments, raised by sale, from time to time, of part of the capital of such fund.

March 2; }
July 12. }

Insolvent—Property—Annuity by way of Compensation to a Country Commissioner of Bankrupts—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. s. 56.

An annuity awarded to a country Commissioner of Bankrupts, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, passes to his assignee in insolvency; and is not within the excepted cases mentioned in the 56th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

Where the insolvent refused to make the requisite affidavit that he did not hold any public office or employment in the terms of the 58th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, the Court allowed other evidence to be given of that fact to enable the assignee to receive the annuity.

The question raised by the proceedings in this case was, whether an annuity of 199*l.* granted to a Commissioner of Bankruptcy under the 1 & 2 Will. 4. c. 56. passed to his assignee under the Insolvent Acts. The cause coming on for hearing, Knight Bruce, V.C. sent a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, which Court certified that under the Insolvent Act and the proceedings had therein, all the defendant's right and title to the annuity vested in the plaintiff, as his assignee. See 18 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 401, where the facts of the case and the sections of the acts of parliament are fully set out.

The cause coming on for further directions, the Vice Chancellor made a decree, whereby it was declared that the plaintiff was entitled to receive the payments then due and thereafter to accrue due in respect of the annual sum of 199*l.* granted by the Lords of the Treasury to the defendant Payne. Subsequently, the defendant Payne was applied to to make the affidavit required by the order of the Lord Chancellor of the 28th of February 1844, for the purpose of enabling the assignee to receive the arrears; but he refused to do so: and the Accountant General in Bankruptcy refused to pay to the plaintiff without the production of that affidavit. The plaintiff then presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor, praying that the Accountant in Bankruptcy might be ordered to pay to the plaintiff, as such assignee, the annuity and arrears, upon proof to the Accountant in Bankruptcy by the affidavit of the plaintiff, that, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, the defendant Payne had not held, and did not hold, any such employment as in the act and certificate mentioned, or upon such other proof thereof as the Lord Chancellor should think proper to direct. The Lord Chancellor declined to interfere, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to dispense with the requisitions of the certificate of the Lords of the Treasury; but he directed the petition to stand over, to give the petitioner an opportunity of presenting a memorial to the Lords of the Treasury. A memorial was presented, but the Lords of the Treasury declined to interfere.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Faber appeared for the respondent, the plaintiff.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Wright, for the appellant, contended, first, that the affidavit by the grantee was a personal condition, and could not be supplied by the affidavit of another person; and that where the Court could not give to the assignee the necessary directions consequential upon his right, it would not restrain the grantee from receiving the annuity; and, secondly, that it was contrary to public policy that the annuity should be assignable.

Mr. Stuart, for the Accountant General in Bankruptcy.

Mr. Bacon replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question is a simple one. Mr. Payne, as a country Commissioner in Bankruptcy, became entitled to compensation. That compensation became vested in him, and, unless upon some special grounds either of public policy or arising out of the act, that property would pass to his assignees, as part of his general estate, unless the words of the 56th section of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. should except this peculiar property out of the operation of the act. It is quite clear that this case is not within the principle of Wells v. Foster (1), because the ground of that decision was, that there was a continued right to the service of the persons to whom the pension was assigned; and therefore the Crown had a right to insist upon the payment to him. There is no doubt of the propriety of that decision, but it would be difficult to apply the principle of it to the present case. The Vice Chancellor thought originally that there might be grounds of general policy affecting this case in a somewhat similar way, namely, as this particular compensation was to cease, either wholly or pro tanto, according to the income the party might hereafter acquire, and that as he might have an office conferred on him, the public, who were interested that the compensation should cease, might also have an interest in keeping up his respectability by means of this annuity, so as to qualify for holding any such office. I do not, however, understand the learned Judge to have persevered in that opinion. I rather collect from what passed afterwards that he withdrew it; and my impression is that it cannot be maintained.

It is then said, that this compensation cannot be assignable, because it has not the incidents of property. With regard to Mr. Payne, it is said, that until the year has expired, and he then makes an affidavit that he has not an office, the money does not become payable, and that it is only payable when he has made an affidavit; and it is argued that, until the affidavit is made, there is no payment due, and consequently no property vested. But from the moment this grant was made, this was property existing in Mr. Payne beyond all possibility of doubt, and to which he or his personal representatives were or would be entitled; though, in order to shew that he has not forfeited or lost, or been compensated for the annuity, he is to swear that he has not received from the Crown or the Government certain other payments, that is to verify the fact, that the case had not occurred which is provided for by the condition annexed to the grant. That fact must be proved; and if Mr. Payne dies without proving it himself, the fact must be proved by some other evidence. Suppose he were to die when there was a half-year's compensation due to him, that amount would form part of his assets, and there would be some other proof; and upon that other proof being given the money would be paid to his personal representatives.

Then, does it vary the case because the right to the property has passed to an assignee? I think it only amounts to this: that there is no condition imposed upon this property which makes it personal in Mr. Payne; there is no condition to be performed which is not capable of being performed; there is no clog upon the alienation of the property itself. It is quite a different thing to say that Mr. Payne cannot assign the property quod property, and to say when he has assigned it, he may, by withholding a document which is necessary to get possession of it, prevent the assignee from receiving it. Now, suppose the property were to accumulate in the way in which it has accumulated; suppose that from want of power (which I hope it will be found does not exist) the Court cannot enforce the payment of the money to the person to whom it belongs: when Mr. Payne dies, beyond all question, if the property has passed to the assignee, then the assignee will not be prevented from taking it, because the impediment is removed, and other evidence will be admissible to shew that he never did hold any other office. Suppose, also, the case of lunacy: would any one say that Mr. Payne was to be deprived of the property because an act of God had visited him by which he had been deprived of the power of making an affidavit? Therefore, I apprehend, clearly, that the property, although it may accumulate, when so accumulated will belong to the assignees. Upon all general principles, I should say it would pass to the assignee; and by the provisions of the Insolvent Debtors Act, it would pass under the first part of the act.

And then the question comes, whether or not it falls within the 56th section.—[His Lordship here read the section].—The words are, “being or having been an officer of the army or navy, or an officer or clerk, or otherwise employed or engaged in the service of her Majesty in the Customs or Excise, or any civil office or other department whatsoever.” Those last words are clearly still governed by the words “service of her Majesty.” Well, then, it is to be an employment in the service of her Majesty. And then it says the act shall not extend to that. But I am clearly of opinion that this person was not in the service of her Majesty, and, therefore, not within the exception. But the section, instead of taking the property out of the general operation of the act, and making it depend upon the act of the debtor, whether his creditors shall be entitled to it or not, provides that the assignee shall be entitled to a portion upon application to the heads of that department to which the officer shall be attached. It is not intended, therefore, by the act, that an officer, for example, because his half-pay could not be assigned, should be entitled to retain the whole of it; but the parties who represent the government have the duty imposed upon and the power given to them to apportion the half-pay between the creditors and the officer. Where is the provision with regard to Mr. Payne which is to exempt him from the operation of the act? Can anybody suppose that a person in the situation of Mr. Payne, a country commissioner of bankrupts, with 200*l.* a-year compensation, is to retain the whole of the income without making any compensation, or the least contribution to his creditors, when all persons of the highest grades in the military or naval service, although the half-pay is protected on the ground of public policy, are obliged to give up a portion of it to their creditors? I am clearly of opinion that this case falls within the general provisions of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and that it is utterly impossible to include this person in the exceptions of the 56th section of that act.

If, therefore, as it appears to me, this property was assignable, then the consequence is, that the assignees would be entitled to take it. I believe that Mr. Payne, who, by the nature of his office must know what his duty is, when he learns what the decision of the Court is, will give his assistance to enable his assignee to receive the fund in order to distribute it among his creditors. This petition, therefore, must be dismissed, but without costs, as this gentleman sues in forma pauperis.

July 12.—Mr. Payne subsequently refused to make the affidavit required by the Lord Chancellor's order of the 28th of February 1844; and, upon the application of the assignee, the Lord Chancellor made an order that upon the affidavit of the assignee that Mr. Payne had declined to make an affidavit, and that he, the assignee, had made inquiries, and that to the best of his belief Mr. Payne did not hold any office (in the words of the act), notwithstanding the former order, such affidavit should be received as evidence of the right of the assignee to receive the money, and that the money should be paid accordingly; and as to accruing payments, the assignee was to furnish the Lord Chancellor with a similar affidavit in substitution for Mr. Payne's, without the necessity of presenting a formal petition, and thereupon the order for payment was to be made from time to time, with liberty to the Accountant in Bankruptcy to apply.

July 15, 16. } BARKER v. BARKER.

Will—Construction—Period of ascertaining a Class—Issue of deceased Child—Vesting—Direction to pay.

A testator gave to trustees a sum of money on the usual trusts for investment, and directed them to pay the income to A. for life, and, after his death, to divide the principal between the children of A. who should be living at the time of his (A.'s) death, and the issue of such as should be then dead, leaving issue, so that the issue of such child so dying should take the part which their deceased parent would have taken if living, to be paid to such children and issue, upon their attaining, and in case they should live to attain, twenty-one. A. had a child B, who died in his lifetime, leaving four children. Two of these children died in their infancy, in the lifetime of A. :—Held, that the class to take was all the children left by B, and that the gift had vested absolutely in all those children.

This was a special case under Sir George Turner's Act.

P. Protheroe, by his will, dated the 30th of August 1803, made the following bequest :—

"I give and bequeath unto my said sons E. Protheroe and P. Protheroe, my executors hereinafter named, the sum of 22,000*l.* of lawful money aforesaid, upon trust to place the same out at interest on such security or securities as they shall think proper and approve, and to pay the interest and income arising therefrom, as the same shall be received, unto my daughter Elizabeth Barker, wife of the said William Barker, for and during the term of her natural life, to and for her proper use and benefit; and from and after her decease, then in trust, as to the said principal sum of 22,000*l.*, to divide the same equally between all and every the children of my said daughter Elizabeth Barker, who shall be living at the time of her decease, and the lawful issue of such of them as shall be then dead leaving issue, so as that the issue of such child so dying shall take the part or share which their deceased parent would have taken if living, and so as that such issue of each child shall take equally share and share alike, to be paid to all such children and issue, upon their respectively attaining, and in case they should live to attain, the age of twenty-one years; and, in the mean time, I order and direct that my said executors shall apply all or any part of the interest and income of the same sum of 22,000*l.* for and towards the support and maintenance and education, or otherwise for the use and benefit, of such children and issue respectively, as my executors shall think fit.

The testator died in September 1803.

Mrs. Barker died in 1844.

Mrs. Barker left only two children who survived her, Mrs. Miller and Susan Barker.

Mrs. Barker had another child, Philip, who died in 1838, in his mother's lifetime, having had five children. One of these children died in the lifetime of his father. Two died in their infancy, after the death of their father, and before the death of Mrs. Barker, the tenant for life. The other two survived their father and Mrs. Barker.

The opinion of the Court was desired as to the interests which the children of Philip Barker took in the fund.

Two questions were argued: first, at what period the class of the issue of Philip Barker was to be ascertained; and secondly, whether the vesting of the share of each child was contingent on his or her attaining twenty-one years.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Metcalfe, Mr. Elmsley and Mr. Carter, Mr. Bacon and Mr. Charles Hall, Mr. Piggott, Mr. Walker and Mr. Hanson, for the different parties.

PARKER, V.C.—There are two questions in this case. The first is, what is the class of persons who take under the gift contained in the will; and the second, whether the individuals of that class did or not take interests which vested at the death of the tenant for life. The gift is, after the death of the tenant for life, to be equally divided between all the children of the tenant for life who should be living at the time of her death (as to whom no question arises) and the lawful issue of any child then dead leaving issue. Two constructions have been contended for: one, that the issue of a child are a class to be ascertained at the death of the child whose death is contemplated; the other, that the class is to be ascertained at the death of the tenant for life. I reject the construction which would include a child dying in the life of the person whose death is contemplated, for the gift seems to be confined to the class of issue left by the child. The Court has to determine between the two constructions which I have mentioned, and it is a question of considerable doubt and difficulty.

The general rule of law is not to import a contingency into gifts of this kind; and there can be no doubt that, if the gift had stood alone to the lawful issue of such child as should die in the life of the tenant for life leaving issue, the class would include all the children left by the child who died, and would not be confined to the children only who happened to be in existence at the time of division. That is the general rule. The question is whether, in the words of the will, there can be found enough, not upon a conjectural ground merely, to make the death of the tenant for life the period for ascertaining the class, and not the death of the stirps, concerning whose issue there is this question. I do not think there is enough in this will so to confine the gift. If the words "leaving issue" could be read as referring to issue living at the death of the tenant for life, then, no doubt, that might be the period for ascertaining the class. Having considered the words as carefully as I can, I think that the words "leaving issue" mean the issue at the death of the child in question, and not at the death of the tenant for life, and that, consequently, the time for ascertaining the class is the death of such child. No doubt the testator, with respect to the children of the tenant for life, says that those only are to take who are living at the period of the division of the property. It might very well happen that grandchildren whose parents were dead might have had issue in the life of the tenant for life, and making the gift to the grandchildren conditional in the same way would take it away altogether. In that event, without substituting their issue, I cannot see how to import this additional contingency into this gift. The persons then to take are the children left by Philip at the time of his death: Mrs. Miller and Susan Barker take each one-third, and the children of Philip take the remaining one-third between them.

The next question is, whether the children left by Philip took vested or contingent interests, there being a clear gift to them. I think that this is the ordinary case of a gift with a direction to pay super-added to it, which has not the effect of divesting the gift, although words of contingency are attached to the direction to pay at the age of twenty-one years. A gift to parties to be paid to them at twenty-one is not materially different from a gift to be paid to them, if they attain twenty-one, or in case they attain twenty-one. I therefore think that these interests vested in the children of Philip who survived him. I may observe, that it seems hardly possible to distinguish this case from Masters v. Scales, but I must say that I consider that the questions upon this will are very doubtful.

Will—Construction—Separate Use.

A testator, by his will, gave to A, a married woman, an annuity for her life for her separate use, and, by a codicil, gave to A, in addition to the legacy mentioned in his will, the sum of 300l. No legacy had been given to A. by the will:—Held, that A. was entitled to the 300l. for her separate use.

William Bayley, by his will, dated the 4th of July 1846, gave to Ann Warwick an annuity of 100l. a-year for her life for her separate use, free from legacy duty. The testator, by a codicil dated the 5th of November 1850, directed his executors to pay to Ann Warwick, in addition to the legacy mentioned in his will, the sum of 300l. to be paid to her free of legacy duty.

No legacy had been given by the will to Ann Warwick.

The testator died in November 1851.

Mrs. Warwick was married, but her husband was out of the jurisdiction.

This was a claim, by Mrs. Warwick, against the executors of the testator, for the purpose of obtaining the legacy of 300l.

The only question on the claim was, whether the legacy given by the codicil was given to Mrs. Warwick for her separate use.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Faber, for the claim, cited Day v. Croft (1).

Mr. Malins and Mr. Dawney, for the trustees.

PARKER, V.C. said that, on the authority of the case which had been cited, the plaintiff was entitled to the legacy for her separate use.

Aug. 4.—LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.

—The question of revocation, the only question argued before us in this case, relates to two distinct portions of the real estate of Mr. Henry Chicheley Plowden, the testator in the cause: one included in the mortgage of the 1st of May 1811, and a conveyance of the 7th of December 1813, the other included in neither of those instruments, but comprised in a deed of the 9th of November 1811. With regard to the latter portion, I am unable to distinguish this from the case of Rawlins v. Burgess (1), which was decided in 1814, by a careful Judge, since followed in more than one instance, and never, so far as I am aware, overruled. I do not think that we ought to refuse to follow it now. Whether, if the point of revocation that it determined were new, I should have held an opinion in conformity with that decision or not, is a question as to which it is unnecessary for me to say anything.

With respect to the other portion, the title stands thus: the hereditaments of which it consists having been acquired by the testator, were, by his desire, conveyed, on the 23rd of April 1811, in this manner, "To such uses as the testator should by deed or will appoint, and in default of, and until such appointment, to the use of the testator for his life, with remainder to the use of Mr. Dyneley, his executors, administrators and assigns, during the testator's life, in trust for the testator, with remainder to the use of the testator, his heirs and assigns for ever." Very soon afterwards, namely, on the 1st of May 1811, he mortgaged those hereditaments in fee, Mr. Dyneley, as his trustee, joining in the mortgage to the mortgagee, Mr. Newton, whom, in December 1813, the testator paid off, whereupon, by his direction, Mr. Newton, on the 7th of December 1813, conveyed the mortgaged hereditaments to the testator and his heirs, "to such uses as the testator should, by deed or will appoint, and in default of, and until appointment, to the use of the testator for his life, with remainder to the use of Dyneley, his executors, administrators and assigns, during the testator's life, in trust for the testator, with remainder to the use of the testator, his heirs and assigns for ever."

The testator's will, devising these hereditaments, having been made on the 15th of May 1811, the point has arisen whether the effect of the conveyance of the 7th of December 1813, was, or was not to render the will inoperative as to them;

(1) 2 Ves. & B. 382.

a suggestion, which, however startling to common sense, however foreign to natural equity, is yet rendered plausible, if not sound, by the state of the law of England, as it stood before the testator died in 1821, — a state upon this particular subject which was discreditable to a civilized country. It has since been altered, but not with reference to the property of men who had ceased to live before 1838. Their property is subject to the old law, which, however, was such that, upon the present point, no man, I suppose, would be willing, without absolute necessity, to treat a case as falling within it. Does the necessity exist here? I think not. I am of opinion that the object, the intention of the deed of the 1st of May 1811, was to make the mortgage in fee, and not otherwise, to affect the title of the mortgaged property; and the conveyance of the 7th of December 1813, having been to the same uses and for the same purposes as the uses and purposes by which it stood affected immediately upon the making of the mortgage of the 1st of May 1811, my view of the matter is, that the conveyance of 1813 did not, by freeing the property from the mortgage, affect the title to the lands, or the testator's interest in them, or his power over them, otherwise than so far only as to make that wholly or in part legal which before had been merely equitable. It is true that Mr. Dyneley never was more than a mere trustee for the testator: this, however, seems to me to make no difference; for if it is conceded, as in my opinion it ought to be, that by the deed of mortgage the testator meant to mortgage merely, and nothing more, why should it be supposed that he ever intended the lands to be re-conveyed by the mortgagee simply to the uses of the testator in fee, — he himself having before the mortgage, as well as after the mortgage, caused them to be conveyed for his benefit to the uses usual for preventing dower? From the only report (2) that I have seen of the argument before the able Judge in whose court this petition originally was, I collect that neither Ruscombe v. Hare nor Innes v. Jackson (3), before Lord Eldon, nor Jackson v. Innes (4), before the House of Lords, nor any of that class, were cited.

[Mr. Russell and Mr. Malins said they were cited.]

From the only report that I have seen neither of those cases appears to have been cited. This I regret, for I might otherwise not have been placed under the necessity of differing from one whose judgment I estimate at least as highly as my own. He seems to have considered the proviso for redemption without reference to those authorities; that is the effect of the judgment. The judgment does not allude to them, and I am not quite sure that were I to do so myself, (that is, consider the proviso for redemption without reference to that class of cases,) I should not arrive at his conclusion, but neither am I convinced that I should; for, perhaps, if my opinion ought to turn upon the language of the proviso, the expressions used are at least as much in the appellant's favour as against him, the clause being thus worded: "That after the money is paid, the mortgagee will, upon the request and at the costs and charges of the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees or assigns, re-convey the said capital and other messuages, farms, &c. unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees, or assignees, or to such uses and in such manner as he or they shall direct, free from all incumbrances to be created" by the mortgagee.

On the whole, having, since the argument before us, read the authorities then cited, and every other within my knowledge that it could on this dispute be important to refer to, and thinking that, as to the question of revocation, this case stands exactly on the footing on which it would have stood if the testator, having immediately before the mortgage been simply seised in fee, had, upon paying it off, taken from the mortgagee a simple re-conveyance to himself in fee; because, having immediately before the mortgage held the property, subject to the usual limitations for preventing dower, he, upon paying it off, took from the mortgagee a conveyance or re-conveyance having limitations, the same in form and substance and object, as existed when the mortgage was made, I am of opinion that it may, consistently with Tickner v. Tickner (5), with Rawlins v. Burgis, and with every established rule of law, be held, as I do hold, that this testator's testamentary dispositions are equitably in force with respect to the mortgaged portion of his real estate; and that so far, at least, it is not incumbent upon the Court to defeat his wishes, disappoint his intentions, and subvert his will.

(2) By reference to the Law Journal Report, p. 331, ante, it will be seen that Innes v. Jackson was cited.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I concur in the result at which my learned Brother has arrived, and in a great measure upon the same grounds. It might be unnecessary for me to do more than to express my concurrence; but as we differ from the learned Vice Chancellor, I thought it right, unconnected with my learned Brother, to put my view of the case down, so that I may state that also. It is unnecessary for me to go through the facts, because that has been already done.

The question divides itself into two branches: first, as it regards the South Baddesley land; and, secondly, as it regards the property at Boldre, mortgaged to Mr. Newton. With respect to the former, there is no doubt of the soundness of the opinion appealed from, unless we are prepared (which we are not) to act in opposition to the case of Rawlins v. Burgis, decided by Sir Thomas Plumer in 1814. The purchase in this case was made at an auction, and, in the absence of evidence, we cannot assume that there was any special stipulation as to the form of conveyance to be made. The purchaser, therefore, became the equitable owner in fee; and Rawlins v. Burgis decides that in such circumstances a conveyance to the purchaser to the usual uses to bar dower operates as a revocation of the previous devise of the equitable fee. As to the lands at South Baddesley, therefore, the present case cannot be distinguished from, and must be governed by, that authority. Indeed, as to those lands, the petitioner can hardly be said to have seriously questioned the correctness of the Vice Chancellor's decision.

The main contention before us was,

as to the messuages and lands at Boldre, mortgaged to Newton. The Vice Chancellor decided; that the devise of this property was revoked by the re-conveyance in December 1813, and my impression during the argument was in favour of that decision, but subsequent consideration of the doctrine applicable to such cases has led me to a different conclusion. Sir Richard Kindersley reasoned thus:—If a person seised in fee made a mortgage in fee in the ordinary way, reserving the right of redemption to himself and his heirs, and then, before the 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 26. had come into operation, devised his equity of redemption, a subsequent re-conveyance to him and his heirs, by the mortgagee, upon the mortgage debt being paid off, did not affect the previous devise of the equity; but if the re-conveyance was made, not to the mortgagee in fee, but to him, to the usual uses to bar dower, this effected a revocation, for the same reasons as are applicable to the case of a purchaser. The conveyance in such a case was not merely a uniting of the legal with the equitable estate; it effected and created new rights and incidents in the property, and so operated as a revocation of the devise. Assuming that to be clear in the case of a simple mortgage in fee, with the right of redemption reserved to the mortgagor and his heirs, the Vice Chancellor then proceeded to consider how far that general principle was affected by the special terms in which in this case the redemption was reserved. The re-conveyance is to be "unto the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs, appointees or assigns, or to such other person or persons, to such uses, and in such manner as he or they shall direct." Even taking these words to indicate the form of re-conveyance, which was the most favourable interpretation for the appellant, still, though such a proviso would have warranted a re-conveyance to such uses as the mortgagor should appoint, and in default of appointment to him and his heirs; and though a re-conveyance so made would not, upon this construction of the proviso, have effected a revocation, yet the language used did not, in the judgment of the Vice Chancellor, warrant a re-conveyance in the form actually adopted; namely, to such uses as the said H. C. Plowden should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment, to the use of the said H. C. Plowden for life, with remainder to the use of the said J. Dyneley, for the life of and in trust for the said H. C. Plowden, with an ultimate limitation to the use of the said H. C. Plowden, his heirs and assigns. His Honour was of opinion that these uses differed materially from those warranted by the proviso for redemption; and so that the re-conveyance not having been made in the stipulated mode, operated as a revocation of the previous devise.

Of the correctness of this reasoning, so far as relates to the first branch of it, there cannot, I think, be any doubt. Taking the case of Rawlins v. Burgis to be a binding authority, I can discover no distinction in principle between the case of a person entitled in fee to the equity of redemption in lands mortgaged in fee, and that of a person equitably entitled to lands under a contract to purchase them. If a conveyance to the ordinary uses to bar dower caused, before the statute of 1837, a revocation of the will in the latter case, it must have had the same effect in the former. Such a construction is in conformity with what would have happened if the devisee had been the owner of the legal instead of the equitable fee. If a person seised in fee made his will before the statute, and thereby devised his inheritance, and afterwards conveyed his legal estate so as to take it back to himself, not in fee simple absolutely, but to the usual uses to bar dower, this unquestionably was a revocation of the devise, and on this analogy the decision in Rawlins v. Burgis was founded; applying to the devise of the equitable fee, the doctrine applicable to a will affecting the legal estate. As I have already stated, I see no reason for thinking that a different rule should be applied to the devise of an equity of redemption, from that governing the case of a person entitled to the fee simple by contract as a purchaser. So far, therefore, I concur in the view taken of the law by the Vice Chancellor.

But as to the second branch of this reasoning, I think there is, at all events, very considerable doubt. I am not prepared to assent to the proposition that, if an equity of redemption in a mortgage in fee had, before the act, been reserved to such uses as the mortgagor should appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the mortgagor and his heirs, that a re-conveyance to the usual use to bar dower, would have operated as a revocation of a devise made before the re-conveyance. When the legal owner in fee, after devising his estate, conveyed it by feoffment, or by lease and release, to such uses as he should appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of himself for life, with remainder to a trustee during his life, and with the ultimate use to himself in fee, there was a change of the seisin; but if the owner of an estate had an absolute power of appointment as well as the legal fee, that is to say, if his estate stood limited to such uses as he should appoint, and in default of appointment, to the use of himself in fee, the consequence might be different. In such a case, if the owner, after making his will and devising, had made an appointment so as to take an estate with the ordinary uses and limitations to bar dower, I know of no authority deciding that this would be a revocation of the will; there would in such a case be no change of seisin, and so the principles applicable to a devise by a person having a mere estate in fee simple do not necessarily apply. And if this would not have been a revocation at law, it would seem to follow that it would not have been a revocation in equity, when the subject-matter of the devise was an equity of redemption. Upon this point, however, it is not necessary for me to say that I differ from Sir Richard Kindersley; for, even assuming his view of the law to be correct on this second point, as well as the first, still I think that here there was no revocation. The principle upon which I conceive this case must rest is, that by the deeds of the 6th and 7th of December 1813, the estate was re-conveyed to precisely the same uses to which it had stood limited previously to the mortgage. It is a well-established principle that in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, a mortgage is to be considered in this court as a mere charge, taking out of the property so much as is necessary for accomplishing the object, and leaving all not so abstracted precisely as it stood before the mortgage. The equity of redemption, therefore, attaches on the estate of the mortgagor, with all the same rights, restrictions, and qualifications to which his legal estate had been previously subject; when, therefore, the mortgagor pays off the mortgage, and takes a conveyance of the property to the same uses to which it had stood limited previously to the mortgage, he is, in fact, only doing that which has been described as bringing home the legal estate, or as clothing the equitable with the legal estate; and all the authorities shew that there would be no revocation of a devise of the equitable interest made while the legal interest was outstanding. That is precisely what was done here. The estate, previously to the mortgage, stood limited to such uses as the said H. C. Plowden should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment, to the use of him for life, with remainder to the use of J. Dyneley, his executors and administrators, during the life of, and in trust for, the said H. C. Plowden and his assigns, and after the expiration of these estates to the use of the said H. C. Plowden and his heirs; when the mortgage was paid off in 1813, the property was re-conveyed to the same uses, bringing the case within the rule to which I have referred. Of course, however, if the mortgagor had expressly stipulated that the right of redemption should be reserved in a manner not according to the previous state of the property mortgaged, the general rule would then give way to such express stipulation; and the only remaining question, therefore, here is, whether there is any such express stipulation to be found on the face of the mortgage. I am clearly of opinion that there is not. I have already adverted to the language of the proviso for redemption. Sir Richard Kindersley reasoned on the assumption that it was intended to point out a peculiar mode of re-conveyance. He did so, because he considered that was the view the most favourable for the party against whom he was deciding; and not because it was the correct construction of the proviso. This, I think, may be fairly inferred from the whole tenour of his observations in this case, in which I concur. There is a profusion of words in the proviso in question; in truth, it is no more than a proviso for repayment of the mortgage money to the mortgagee, and a re-conveyance to Mr. Plowden, his heirs or assigns. The word "appointees" can hardly be said to have any meaning beyond the word "assigns," and like those which follow, "such person or persons," are, in fact, tautology. It must, therefore, be treated merely as a re-conveyance to the mortgagor and his heirs, and it does not shew any intention affecting the nature of the estate out of which the mortgage was granted. I am very glad, therefore, consistently with what I consider the principles applicable to this case, to be enabled to support and give effect to the will of this testator.

DARBY & BAINES.

Ship and Shipping—Jurisdiction—Agreement between Part Owners, Construction of.

Where part owners of a ship differ on the terms of an agreement to manage and charter the vessel, the construction of such agreement is within the province of a court of equity; and the question of its concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Admiralty cannot be raised.

This was a motion, on behalf of the plaintiffs, Messrs. Darby & Sim, to restrain the defendant, James Baines, from preventing the plaintiffs from receiving, or interfering with them in receiving, the freight due, and from preventing or interfering with the sailing of the ship Deborah, in fulfilment of a charter-party made by the plaintiffs for a voyage to South Australia, either by withholding the certificate of registry, then in the defendant's possession, or otherwise; and to restrain the defendant from in any manner preventing the plaintiffs from having the management of the ship under an agreement stated in the bill; and for a receiver and manager.

The bill stated that the plaintiffs were the registered owners of fifty-six sixty-fourth parts or shares of the barque Deborah, and the defendant of the remaining eight sixty-fourth shares; and that they had entered into the following agreement:—

"Liverpool, 19th Nov. 1849.

"It is agreed by the owners of the barque Deborah, that the ship shall be managed by Messrs. Darby & Sim (the plaintiffs), who shall receive a commission of 2½l. per cent. on all disbursements, and to James Baines (the defendant) the usual brokerage on any charter he may procure for her; but in case it shall be deemed advisable not to charter the ship on her homeward voyage, he shall only receive a commission of 1l. per cent. for collecting freight, &c., and no other brokerage. It is agreed that Thomas Robinson, Esq. and William Roberts, Esq. shall be appointed auditors to examine the accounts. The insurance of the ship to be effected by Darby & Sim for all the owners. Ship to be valued at 3,500l."

Signed by the plaintiffs and the defendants.

The bill also alleged that the ship returned to London in August 1850, and the defendant's clerk then obtained from the master, and the defendant still retained the ship's certificate of registry by untruly representing to the master, that the plaintiffs had requested the defendant to report the ship to certain brokers; that the defendant had given notice to those from whom the freight was due not to part with it, and alleged that he had chartered the vessel for the next voyage; that the plaintiffs, as managers of the ship under the agreement, had chartered her to the Patent Fuel Company for a voyage to South Australia, which the defendant repudiated, and that the ship could not clear outwards at the Custom House because of the non-production of her registry certificate. The bill prayed in the terms of the notice of motion as above stated.

The affidavits of the defendant and his clerk denied the alleged untrue statement, and the defendant stated that he had entered into a beneficial charter-party, under the above agreement, whereby he was entitled to commission for such chartering; that the plaintiffs' charter-party was not beneficial, and had been made after notice of the defendant's; and that the plaintiffs' object was to obtain the exclusive chartering of the ship, and to procure the defendant's share in the ship at an under-value.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. W. M. James appeared for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion; and—

Mr. Rolé and Mr. Dickinson, for the defendant, opposed it.

The argument was divided into two parts: first, whether this Court had concurrent jurisdiction with the Court of Admiralty in disputes between the owners; secondly, whether, under the terms of the agreement, the plaintiffs or the defendant had the right to charter the ship.

Nov. 10.—TURNER, V.C. delivered the following judgment.—The question whether the injunction should be granted or not mainly depends upon the construction of the agreement; and I am of opinion that, upon the true construction of the agreement, the right to charter the barque belongs to Messrs. Darby & Sim. The first clause of the agreement runs thus:—"It is agreed by the owners of the barque Deborah that the ship shall be managed by Messrs. Darby & Sim, who shall receive a commission of 2½l. per cent. on all disbursements." And I take the effect of this clause to be to place Messrs. Darby & Sim in the position of managing owners, or, in other words, of the ship's husbands; and the powers and duties of ships' husbands are thus stated in Abbott on Shipping, p. 106, 7th edit.: "He is to see that the ship is properly repaired, equipped and manned—to procure freights or charter-parties—to preserve the ship's papers—to make the necessary entries—adjust freight and averages—disburse and receive monies, and keep and make up the accounts as between all parties interested. His acts for these purposes are considered to be the acts of all the part-owners, who are liable on all contracts entered into by him for the conduct of their common concern—the employment of the ship." The defendant, therefore, must, I think, be considered to have given all these powers to Darby & Sim by the first clause of the agreement.

Is, then, the power of chartering thus given to them taken away from them and given to the defendant by the subsequent clauses of the agreement? I am of opinion that it is not. The next clause merely provides that the defendant shall have the usual brokerage in any charter he may procure for the ship. There is a marked distinction between the absolute language in the first clause, "shall be managed," and the contingent expression in the second clause, "may procure." If the intention had been that the defendant should have the unqualified right to charter, why was not the language in the second clause as absolute as in the first? I am much disposed to think that the second clause had reference to some doubt which was entertained, whether the defendant being part-owner could charge brokerage on any charter he might procure, and was inserted for the purpose of securing to him the right to do so; but whether this was so or not, I think that, at all events, this clause could not take away the right given by the preceding one.

It was said, however, whatever might be the effect of the second clause, the last clause clearly gave the right to the defendant; but I think that it does not; and, on the contrary, that it confirms the construction contended for by the plaintiffs. The terms of the clause are, "but in case it shall be deemed advisable not to charter the ship on her homeward voyage, he shall only receive a commission of 1*l*. per cent. for collecting freight, and no other brokerage." I think the true meaning of this clause is, that in case any charter which the defendant might procure should not extend to the homeward voyage, he should only receive the 1*l*. per cent. commission. I think this must be the true meaning of the clause, because the introductory words import a qualification of the previous clause, providing for the allowance of the usual brokerage, and the words, "no other brokerage," at the end, seem to confine the allowance to be made to the commission only. I think this clause confirms the construction contended for by the plaintiffs, for the words "in case it shall be deemed advisable" cannot be construed to mean in case the defendant shall deem it advisable, but must be taken to refer to the judgment of the parties to whom the power of management was given.

This being my construction of the agreement, I am of opinion that the order for the injunction and manager must be granted. I grant it the more readily, because without reference to the question, whether the certificate was obtained by false representation or not, I think the defendant cannot be entitled to use it in contravention of the agreement. It being the province of this Court to deal with the agreement of the parties, there is no difficulty about the jurisdiction.

Order according to notice of motion.

SMITH v. MULES.

Partnership—Dissolution—Construction of Articles.

Under articles of agreement between three partners, the partnership was to be dissolved by notice from any of them, on breach of the articles by the others or other. Notice of dissolution having been given by one of the partners, in consequence of a breach of the articles by another, and the third partner having adopted the notice, it was held that the partnership was dissolved as to all, but without the consequences to the non-offending partner which attached, under another clause of the articles, to a general dissolution.

This was a suit for the dissolution and account of the partnership between the plaintiff and the defendants (solicitors and attornies), for a decree that the defendants might resign certain offices held by them, or either of them, which, according to the articles of partnership ought to be considered partnership offices, and for an injunction against the defendants practising as attornies and solicitors for twenty years within thirty miles of the place of the partnership business, and from removing or keeping otherwise than at the partnership offices the partnership books and papers.

The bill stated to the effect that the defendant, Philip Mules (the father of the defendant Horace Mules), represented to the plaintiff that he was carrying on a lucrative and extensive practice as solicitor at Honiton, to the amount of 1,500*l*. a year, and that the plaintiff advanced the sum of

2,300*l.* for a share of half the profits, under articles of the 22nd of June 1847, to the effect, amongst other things, as follows :— First, the partnership to be carried on under the firm of Mules, Smith & Mules, for the lives of the three partners, or any two of the partners ; secondly, the partners to employ themselves diligently in their professional business, and to communicate to each other, on request, all information concerning the practice ; fifthly, that P. Mules should forthwith use his best endeavours to procure for the firm the several appointments and offices which he then held of clerk to the Honiton Turnpike Trust and to the Honiton and Sidmouth Turnpike Trusts, and clerk and registrar to the Honiton Poor-Law Union, and that H. Mules (the son) should conduct the duties of those offices, and so long as his father, P. Mules, remained co-partner, receive the emoluments as his share of the partnership profits, such emoluments, on the retirement or death of P. Mules, to be divisible as partnership profits between the continuing partners ; sixthly, all other offices compatible with the partnership, and obtained by either partner, to be obtained, if possible, in the name of the firm, and the emoluments divided as partnership profits (P. Mules and the plaintiff being each entitled to one-half share) ; thirteenthly, P. Mules to be at liberty to assign any part of his share in the partnership to H. Mules, who, during the continuance of P. Mules in the firm, was to be interested in such share as sub-partner only ; fifteenthly, in the event of the retirement of P. and H. Mules, or either of them, or upon the death of any of the three partners, their respective shares to accrue to the continuing or surviving partners or partner, in equal moieties ; and in case of the retirement of P. and H. Mules, they should use their best endeavours to secure to the continuing partner or partners the partnership practice and all offices and appointments of the partnership, or either of the said partners, not incompatible with the partnership practice ; and in case of such retirement, the retiring partner should not practise within thirty miles of Honiton for twenty years ; sixteenthly, if either of the partners, except from illness or unavoidable accident, should not diligently employ himself in the partnership practice, or (amongst other things) should not immediately upon receiving money, &c. duly enter the same in the partnership books, then, and in any of the cases therein specified, the other partners or partner, if they or he should think fit, should be at liberty to dissolve the partnership by giving to the partner so offending or by leaving for him a written notice of dissolution.

The bankers of the partnership became bankrupt shortly after the commencement of the partnership, and it was then discovered that P. Mules was indebted to them in the sum of 5,000*l.* on his own account, and in a much more considerable sum on a former partnership account. In January 1849, P. Mules absconded, and in May following the plaintiff gave both the defendants notice, under the 16th clause of the articles, of dissolving the partnership, for breach of the covenants and agreements by each of the defendants.

The present bill was filed in June following, stating as above ; and, inter alia, that, contrary to the special clauses in the articles of partnership, the plaintiff had not been introduced to the clients, nor furnished with means of keeping the accounts ; that the defendants had respectively conducted the partnership business, without giving the plaintiff information, and received money without entering it in the partnership books ; that they had not endeavoured to procure the said offices for the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, had procured them for the defendant H. Mules alone ; and that the defendants had subsequently to the commencement of the partnership procured for themselves two other offices, viz., clerk to the Honiton and Ilminster Turnpike Trust, and clerk to the Land, Assessed and Property Tax Commissioners for the Axminster division.

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood) and Mr. Dickinson appeared for the plaintiff.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Eddis, for the defendant H. Mules, the son.

The defendant P. Mules did not appear, and the bill was taken pro confesso as against him.

Talbot v. Ford, 13 Sim. 173.

Feb. 17.—TURNER, V.C., after stating the facts, and making a few preliminary observations on part of the evidence, which, in consequence of the bill not seeking to recover the 2,300*l.* paid by the plaintiff, his Honour thought was immaterial, said—The question to be determined is not whether the articles of partnership are valid, but what, in the events which have occurred, are the rights of the parties under them? In determining this question, I think it necessary to distinguish between the several heads of relief which are prayed by the bill, viz., the dissolution of the partnership as from the 14th of May 1849; the injunction to restrain the defendants from practising; and the relief which is asked as to the offices. As against the defendant P. Mules, I am of opinion that a sufficient case for the dissolution of the partnership, under the provisions of the 16th clause of the articles, upon a proper notice given for the purpose, is proved to have existed. The fact of this defendant having absconded in January 1849, and not having returned to the business, constituted a sufficient case for such a dissolution as against him; but I do not think it follows that because a case for such a dissolution existed as to the defendant P. Mules, the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to dissolve the partnership as against the defendant H. Mules. In order to give him that right, I think the plaintiff was bound to shew that a case for dissolution, under the 16th clause, had arisen as to that defendant also. It is to be considered, therefore, whether he has proved such a case.

There are several events on which the right to dissolve is given by this clause; but two of them only are material to be considered, it not being suggested that the case falls within any of the others. The two events material to be considered are these: first, "If, contrary to the stipulations hereinbefore contained, either of the partners shall not (not being prevented by illness or unavoidable accident) diligently and faithfully employ himself in carrying on the partnership practice;" and, secondly, "If either of the partners shall not, as often as he shall receive money, bills, notes or other securities, immediately thereupon make or cause to be made due entries thereof in the proper books of accounts of the partnership, and shall knowingly or wilfully make such omission." With reference to the first of these events, I think it is pointed only to the diligent and faithful management by each partner of the business conducted by him; and I think so for these reasons: the provision in terms applies to the partnership practice, and, like the other provisions of this clause, evidently refers to the previous provisions of the articles, and was intended to enforce them; and, on referring to the second clause of the articles to which this provision relates, it will be found that it applies to the diligent and faithful conduct by each of the partners of the professional business of the firm. It was argued, on the part of the plaintiff, that the defendant, Horace Mules, could not be said to conduct the business diligently and faithfully when he did not communicate with the plaintiff upon the subject of the business; but it is to be observed that the second clause expressly stipulates for each partner communicating with the other on matters of business upon request; and I think, therefore, that a request, at all events, was necessary to bring this part of the clause into operation, and finding no allegation or proof of any such request or of any want of diligence or faithfulness on the part of the defendant, Horace Mules, in the conduct of the business undertaken by him, I am of opinion that the case as to him does not fall within this branch of the 16th clause. I am of opinion also that the case as to this defendant does not fall within the other branch of the 16th clause, which has been relied on by the plaintiff. In order to bring the case within that part of the clause, I think it must be shewn, not only that there was an omission to enter receipts, but that the omission was knowingly and wilfully made; and I think that the plaintiff has failed to prove that there was any designed or wilful omission on the part of the defendant,

Horace Mules, in entering his receipts. On the contrary, all the sums which have been pointed out as having been received by him and not entered in the regular books of the partnership were, with one exception only, entered in his diary ; and the bill does not allege, nor is it proved, that they were not entered at the time when they were received. With respect to the excepted item, it is of small amount, and it would be going much too far to infer any culpability from the omission of it. One witness, it is true, proves that this defendant admitted that he had received monies which he had not entered ; but his evidence does not shew what was the extent of the omission or that the omission was either knowingly or wilfully made. The conclusion at which I have arrived on this part of the case is, that the plaintiff has proved such a case as entitled him, on giving a proper notice for the purpose, to dissolve the partnership under the 16th clause of the articles as against the defendant Philip Mules, but not as against the defendant Horace Mules.

Has, then, the partnership been well dissolved under the 16th clause of the articles ? I am of opinion that it has not, and that the notice given by the plaintiff did not work a dissolution under that clause. The clause provides that, in the event of a breach by any partner, the other or others of the partners may give notice to dissolve ; and whatever might have been the effect of the plaintiff's notice, if he had established a breach by both the defendants, I think that having failed to establish a breach by Horace Mules, it was not competent for the plaintiff alone, without the concurrence of that defendant, to give a notice of dissolution which should be effectual under the clause. In this state of circumstances, I think that the plaintiff's case for the injunction to restrain the defendants from practising falls to the ground, there being no title to the injunction unless the partnership be dissolved under the 16th clause. It cannot, however, I think, be said that because the partnership was not effectually dissolved under the 16th clause by the notice which was given, it is therefore to be considered as subsisting. The conduct of the defendant Philip Mules was such as entitled the plaintiff to dissolve as to him, though he could not alone do so under the provisions of the 16th clause. The defendant Horace Mules, by his answer, adopts the notice, and treats the partnership as dissolved ; and the plaintiff, having given the notice, cannot, I think, insist that the partnership continues. I am of opinion, therefore, that the partnership must be considered to have been dissolved as on the 14th of May 1849, although not with the consequences attaching to a dissolution under the 15th clause.

It then remains to be considered what is to be done as to the offices. By the 5th clause of the articles the defendant Philip Mules was forthwith to use his best endeavours to procure the appointments to be made and given to the partnership firm, and they were, as between the partners, to be considered as partnership offices. The defendant Horace Mules was to receive the salaries attached to them as his share of the profits of the business so long as the defendant Philip Mules continued in it ; and on his retirement or death the emoluments of the offices were to be divisible in the same manner as the other profits of the business. If the appointments to the offices had been procured for the partnership firm according to the covenant, the plaintiff would, upon the dissolution, either have had a share of the profits of the offices or a chance of competing for them ; but so far from the defendant Philip Mules having observed the covenant entered into by him, he has acted in direct breach of it ; and the defendants are now holding these offices for their exclusive benefit under this breach of the covenant and in fraud of the contract into which one of them had entered and to which the other defendant was a party. I am much disposed to think that the 6th clause of the articles, applying as it does to the offices and not merely to the profits of the offices, is of itself sufficient to constitute them partnership assets as well after the dissolution as during the continuance of the partnership ; but whether this be so or not, I think that, under the circumstances to which I have referred, the defendants cannot be permitted to hold these offices for their exclusive benefit. The right of the defendant Horace Mules to receive the emoluments of them ceased with the partnership. The plaintiff not having succeeded in effecting a dissolution under the 16th clause, is not exclusively entitled to them; and I think, therefore, the proper relief as to these offices is, to charge the defendants with the value of them in the partnership accounts. From the nature of them they cannot be sold, nor can any manager or receiver be appointed to carry them on. I shall, therefore, in the decree, give directions for that purpose as to the three offices mentioned in the 5th clause; but I cannot give such directions as to the other offices, for I do not think they are reached by the 6th clause; and there being no retirement or death or dissolution for misconduct, I do not think the 15th and 16th clauses can be held to apply to them.

The defendant Horace Mules has set up the case of his being a sub-partner, merely relying upon the 13th clause of the articles; but this point was not insisted upon at the bar, and I do not think it can be maintained. The clause in question, as I construe it, applies only to any share which might be assigned to this defendant by the defendant Philip Mules.

Decree accordingly (1).

Ex parte WRYGHT, in re
THE GREAT WESTERN EXTENSION ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Company—Winding-up Acts—Liability of individual Contributors—Jurisdiction of Master.

Directors of one railway company passed a resolution to lend money to the directors of another company on their personal responsibility, and the money was so lent, and some of the directors signed a guarantee for repayment. Under an order for winding up the company, the directors of which borrowed the money, a claim was carried in on behalf of the lending company, but it was disallowed; and on appeal, it was held,—affirming the decision of the Master,—that where a company or association is ordered to be wound up, the Master has no jurisdiction under the order to take cognizance of a claim not alleged to be due from the company, but only from individual members of it, and that it made no difference that the money was applied for the purposes of the company.

This was an appeal, presented to Vice Chancellor Parker (1), against a decision of the Master, charged with the winding up the affairs of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, refusing to admit a claim brought in by Mr. Wryght, the official manager of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Railway Company. The question arose thus: on the 23rd of October 1845, at a meeting of the directors of the Tring Company, a resolution was passed that 2,000*l.* should be lent and advanced to the directors of the Atmospheric Company, upon their personal responsibility, for a time not exceeding three months, at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum; and the solicitor of the company was authorized to carry into effect an arrangement for completing the loan. On the following day, 2,000*l.* was advanced out of the assets of the Tring Company; and the following memorandum, signed by twelve of the twenty-one directors of the Atmospheric Company, was delivered to G. P. Hill, Esq., the solicitor of the Tring Company, by way of security.

October 27, 1845.

“To G. P. Hill, Esq.—In consideration of your lending and advancing to us, the undersigned, the sum of 2,000*l.*, we hereby, jointly and severally, guarantee to you the repayment of the same, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, within three months from the date hereof.”

On the 28th of November 1845, the directors of the Tring Company passed the following resolution: “Resolved, that the sum of 500*l.* be lent to the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, on the guarantee given to Mr. Hill, on behalf of the company, the solicitor undertaking to produce the 500*l.*, whenever wanted for the purposes of this company, at a week's notice." On the same day, 500*l.*, part of the assets of the Tring Company, was lent to the Atmospheric Company; and the following memorandum, signed by ten out of the twenty-one directors of the Atmospheric Company, was delivered to Mr. Hill, as solicitor of the Tring Company, by way of security.

(1) The decree was subsequently varied by the Lords Justices, on appeal, by adding a direction to include the two offices subsequently acquired by the defendants.

(1) This case was heard, among others forming a list of motions from the courts of the several Vice Chancellors, their Lordships having consented to dispose of them, in order to clear off the business before the long vacation.

"Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company.

"To Mr. G. P. Hill.—In consideration of your advancing and lending to us 500*l.*, we hereby jointly and severally promise and undertake to repay to you that sum, with 5*l.* per cent. interest, on the 1st day of February next. Dated the 28th of November 1845."

The 2,500*l.* thus lent was applied, as one side asserted, and, as to the much greater part, as the other side admitted, to the purposes of the Atmospheric Company.

On the 27th of July 1849, the Atmospheric Company was ordered to be wound up; and on the 23rd of November following, an official manager was appointed, and the Tring Company, having also been ordered to be wound up, Mr. Wryghte, who was chosen official manager, brought into the Master's office an affidavit to prove a debt of 2,500*l.* against the Atmospheric Company, being the sum so advanced under the before-mentioned guaranties, the whole of which then remained due and owing to the Tring Company.

After two appointments for hearing, the claim was, on the 6th of February 1852, disallowed "for want of evidence, and as being barred by the Statute of Limitations." An appeal was presented, and Vice Chancellor Parker sent the case back to the Master, on the question of the Statute of Limitations, to review his decision. On the 6th of June, the case was argued before the Master; and Lloyd's case (2) being cited, leave was given to Mr. Wryghte to carry in an amended claim, giving due notice to the parties intended to be charged. On the 17th of the same month he carried in the following: "The said W. C. Wryghte, as such official manager as aforesaid, claims of the following parties, as contributories in the above-mentioned Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, that is to say, (the nine persons who signed the first guarantie,) being the persons who signed the guarantie of the 27th of October 1845, and who have been settled on the list of contributories of the said company as contributories thereof the sum of 2,000*l.*, with interest thereon from the 27th of October 1845 until payment, for money lent and advanced on the said 27th of October 1845, by the directors of the Tring, Reading, and Basingstoke Railway Company, to and for the use of the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company, of which company the said several persons were then directors." The claim then went on in like manner concerning the 500*l.*, and the directors who signed the guarantie of the 28th of November 1845. Notice having been duly served on all parties proper to be served, the matter came on before the Master, and he disallowed the claim, on the ground that the Winding-up Acts did not give him any jurisdiction in respect of claims against individuals; whereupon the present appeal was presented, and was set down for hearing before Vice Chancellor Parker.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Roxburgh, for the appellant.—This claim was originally made against the company; but, subsequently, it was carried in against the members of the body of directors of the Atmospheric Company, who signed the guarantie; and it was so, on the authority of Lloyd's case, decided by one of your Lordships, when a Vice Chancellor, where it is understood to have been laid down that though a claim cannot be proved against a company, it may be proved against the individuals who have made themselves liable. Here some of the directors have so done by signing the guaranties; and who, with the other nine directors, form the body of contributories on the list, as liable for the debts of the company. The same principle seems to be admitted in Carrick's case (3). Nothing could be more just than that the parties who signed these guaranties should be made liable, and nothing could be more inequitable than to hold that they are not liable in proceedings under the Winding-up Acts, merely on the supposed ground of want of jurisdiction, since it is not disputed that the money was applied and expended in the affairs of the company directed under the order to be wound up. Although strictly it is money due from a certain number of individuals who were directors of the Atmospheric Company, still it was in justice one which should be provided for under the winding-up proceedings against that company.

(3) 1 Sim. N.S. 505.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—It seems admitted that this cannot bind the company. Is there any authority for saying that such a proceeding is within the scope of these acts of parliament? How is it possible to say a man can be admitted as a creditor whose claim is not against the whole company? A claim against a company, for a debt incurred by its agent, with its authority, is a very different thing, and such a claim we should readily attend to.]

It is admitted that the demand is against the directors who signed the guarantie, and not against the association as a body; but still it is no more than just and equitable that, the money having been expended for the whole body of the company, the claim should be admitted under the Winding-up Acts.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—All that I decided in Lloyd's case and Carrick's case was this, that where an attempt is made to prove against the whole body of contributories a debt which has been contracted by some of them, it is necessary, before the debt can be admitted, to shew that it was authorized to be contracted, either expressly or impliedly, by the whole body. I have never decided that, under a winding-up order, a debt or claim can be proved against one out of a body of contributories, unless the debt has been authorized, so as to bind the whole.]

Certainly the interpretation which has been mentioned in argument must have been impressed on the mind of the Master, when he, upon Lloyd's case being cited to him, consented to permit Mr. Wryghte to take in the amended claim.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The company or association in this case directed to be wound up, is the Great Western Extension Atmospheric Railway Company. It seems, the other company now claim, or at one time supposed themselves, to be creditors of the company to be wound up. That may or not have been so; or, being so, the question is not before us. The question raised before us is, whether, under the order directing the winding up of the company, which I have mentioned, the Master could take cognizance of a demand not alleged to be due from the company, but from some, and only some, of the persons members of it. My opinion is, that the Master has no jurisdiction to enter into such a question. It has been said to be convenient and just that it should be so, inasmuch as in this particular instance the money was applied for the purposes of the company. That circumstance can make no difference in the principle, or in the rights of the persons cognizant of the transaction; and concerning a debt of the company, the purpose for which it is applied is absolutely immaterial. If such a demand is to be admitted, the private debts of every individual contributory might be brought in under the order.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I regret if anything which I may have said extra-judicially in Lloyd's case should have led to the construction which has been put upon it. In that case, if I remember rightly, the Master declined to admit a claim as a debt unless it were shewn that the company, or some of the contributories, were liable to it; but he admitted it was a claim. An application was made to me, when Vice Chancellor, to reverse what had been done by the Master, and to adopt the claim as a debt. I refused, and at the same time expressed a doubt whether the Master had not gone too far in admitting it as a claim. I thought that, before admitting either a claim or a debt, it was necessary to shew not only that there was a creditor, but also that there was a debtor; and, what is perhaps more material, to go on and shew that the debtor was a debtor whose debts were to be wound up under the order. The language attributed to me by the report of the case seems to have led to the inference that I also meant to say that the Master might admit a claim against individuals forming part only of the company, if they alone were the parties liable. If the language of the report bears that construction, it is to be regretted that what was meant has been couched in language so inaccurate. All I intended to decide or say was, that the claim should not be admitted as a proof, and that I doubted whether it ought to be admitted as a claim until it had been shewn that the parties sought to be charged were the parties liable to the demand. The order now to be made will be, that the appeal motion be dismissed, with costs, but without prejudice to any application which may be made to the Master to prove the debt against the company or association directed to be wound up.

Lunacy—Taxation of Solicitor's Bill.

Solicitors, who claimed costs for taking out the commission, and for other business in the lunacy, obtained an order for taxation, but did not tax. Five years after the order the lunatic died, leaving real estate, but no personal property. The solicitors sued the committees at law, but they set up the Statute of Limitations, and the action failed. The solicitors now presented a petition, praying an order for taxation, with a view to proceedings to make the real estate liable, and the Court made the order, but without prejudice to any question whether the petitioners had any claim on the lunatic's estate.

This was a petition presented in the lunacy by a firm of solicitors, praying an order for the taxation of their bill of costs.

Mr. Prendergast, in support of the petition, stated that he would admit in the outset, that the petition was presented with the view to some proceedings by bill or claim, or otherwise to enforce the demand of the petitioners against the real estate of the lunatic, he having died without leaving any personalty. The petitioners meant to endeavour, in such way as they might be advised, to establish their claim as a charge on the real estate. The circumstances under which the petition was presented were of a peculiar nature. Before the lunacy, these solicitors were employed by the persons who were afterwards appointed committees to take out and prosecute the commission, and after their appointment the solicitors were still employed by the committees in the matter of the lunacy, and it was in this business before and in the lunacy that the costs now claimed were incurred. In 1842, the petitioners obtained an order to tax their bill of costs, but no taxation actually took place during the life of the lunatic, who did not die until 1847. After that event, the petitioners required payment from the committees, but they declined to accede to the demand on the ground that the lunatic left no personal estate to meet it, whereupon the petitioners brought an action against the committees personally, as the persons who had employed them in the business; but a plea of the Statute of Limitations was put in, and the plaintiffs failed. In this state of circumstances the petitioners submitted to the Court that, as the costs had been incurred for the benefit and protection of the lunatic, and as he left real estate, that estate ought to be rendered in some manner liable to the payment of so just a demand. In Williams v. Wentworth (1) a bill was filed by a party who had petitioned for a commission of lunacy, under which the lunacy was established, and on traverse was confirmed, and an order was made for the taxation of costs, but before taxation the lunatic died. Subsequently, a new order for taxation was made, and the costs were taxed at a stated sum, and an order was made declaring that the costs had been properly incurred for the benefit of the lunatic; the bill was filed by this person, on behalf of himself and all other the creditors of the lunatic, in order to obtain payment out of the real and personal estate. A demurrer to the bill was overruled, the Master of the Rolls deciding that where monies are expended for the necessary protection of the person and estate of a lunatic, the law will raise an implied contract, and give a valid demand or debt against the lunatic or his estate; and it was there further held, that the costs were to be raised out of the real estate if the personal estate should be deficient. The reasons given by his Lordship in his judgment in that case applied equally here. In the case of Taylor v. Taylor (2) the same principle was recognized, although the Lord Chancellor there did not deal with the costs as being in the nature of a lien, but because, there being a cause, and the fund being in that cause, it could not be dealt with or got at without the aid of the Court, and he declared that he saw no reason for not making the order, "the costs being in equity a charge on the estate."

Mr. Grenside, for the committees, the respondents, argued that, as there was already an order for taxation, there was no necessity for the petition. On that ground, therefore, it ought to be dismissed. The Court would not lend facilities to the harassing the committees, who, in the exercise of their duty having pleaded, and successfully, the Statute of Limitations to the action, would be equally certain to succeed in a similar plea to any bill or other proceeding in this court. Whatever object might be in view, and however that object might hereafter be sought to be effected, it was, in truth, an endeavour to do indirectly what could not succeed directly. If the Court were to make any order on the petition, the petitioners would deal with it as a sort of recognition of their right against the real estate of the deceased lunatic.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—If this be an honest demand, and no part of the argument goes the length of impeaching its honesty, it is as hard a case upon the petitioners as I ever heard of. If the action failed by reason of the Statute of Limitations, so any suit here must share the same fate; and although the Court is certainly in favour, if it has a prejudice, of common honesty, it has no jurisdiction to make any declaration of charge, but it can direct the taxation of costs, and order the remainder of the petition to stand over, reserving the consideration of all questions of costs of this matter.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH intimated his concurrence.

The order ultimately made was to direct the taxation of the costs, and that the Master should distinguish those incurred before from those incurred after the death of the lunatic, and that the remainder of the petition should stand over. And, at the suggestion of the counsel for the respondents, the order was to be without prejudice to any question whether the petitioners had any claim against the assets of the lunatic. The Master was also directed to be at liberty to state any special circumstances which might arise on the taxation.

BLANN v. BELL.

Will—Construction—Gift of Dividends—Life Interest—Enjoyment in Specie—Charge of Debts.

A testator gave the residue of his estate to trustees upon trust to pay the dividends of 1,500l. consols to A. for life, and, after his death, to divide the dividends of the said sum equally between his wife E. B. and his niece F. R. and the survivor of them. The testator gave all the residue of his estate to his wife E. B. for life, with remainder to his niece F. R. for life, with remainders over. F. R. died:—Held, that E. B. was entitled only to a life estate in the 1,500l. consols, and was not entitled to the principal.

A testator gave all the residue of his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay certain specified legacies, and then, as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of his freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates, and all other his estate and effects, upon trust to pay the dividends, interest, rents, profits and annual produce to his wife for her life. The testator at his death was possessed of leaseholds, shares in companies and Dutch bonds:—Held, that the widow was entitled to the enjoyment of the leaseholds in specie, but not of the shares or Dutch bonds.

A testator directed his debts to be paid, and then gave all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay certain legacies, and then declared certain trusts of all the rest, residue and remainder of his freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates, and all other his estate and effects:—Held, that the personal estate was the primary fund for the payment of the debts and legacies; and that the real estate was only charged with them as a subsidiary fund.

Thomas Blann, by his will dated the 15th of December 1842, directed all his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid and satisfied; and then appointed certain persons to be his executors; and then gave the specific and pecuniary legacies therein mentioned. The will then proceeded as follows:—"And as to all the residue of my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, whether consisting of freehold, leasehold, or copyhold estates, money in the public stocks or funds, and all other monies or securities for money, I give, devise and bequeath the same to my said wife Edith Blann, and the said J. T. Bell, W. Manses, and J. R. Bell, their heirs, executors, or administrators, and I direct them to stand and be possessed thereof, upon the trusts following, that is to say, upon trust to pay the dividends of 1,500*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities to Mrs. Sarah Twitchin of, &c., for her life; and, at her decease, I direct the dividends arising from the said sum of 1,500*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities, to be equally divided between my said wife Edith Blann, and my niece Frances Rayner, and the survivor of them."—[The will then contained gifts of three other sums of stock for three other persons for their lives, with a direction that at the decease of each annuitant the dividends should be equally divided between his said wife Edith Blann and his said niece Frances Rayner, and the survivor of them.] And upon trust to pay to Frances Rayner, my niece, the dividends of 8,000*l.* 8*l.* per cent. consolidated Bank annuities for her life, and, upon trust, in case of the death of the said Frances Rayner, leaving issue," &c.—[Here followed a trust for the issue of his niece.] "And, as to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates, and all other my estate and effects, subject to such power of appointment as is hereby vested in my said wife, upon trust to pay the dividends, interests, rents, profits, and annual produce thereof to my said wife Edith Blann, or otherwise permit and suffer her to receive, take and enjoy the same for and during the term of her natural life."

The will then proceeded to direct that, after the death of his wife, 1,000*l.* should be made subject to her appointment by will, and that the income of the residue should be paid to his niece Frances Rayner for life, and that the capital should be divided among her children, as therein mentioned, and, in default of children, should go to certain charities.

The testator died in 1846. Part of his personal estate at his death consisted of canal shares, Dutch bonds, shares in assurance companies, and leasehold property. Mrs. Twitchin the annuitant died, and Frances Rayner the testator's niece also died.

The bill was filed by Mrs. Blann for the administration of the estate of the testator.

Three questions were raised in the suit: first, whether, by the gift to Mrs. Blann of the dividends of the 1,500*l.* stock, she was entitled to the stock itself; secondly, whether Mrs. Blann, as tenant for life of the residue, was entitled in specie to the enjoyment of the leaseholds, Dutch bonds and shares; and thirdly, whether the real estate of the testator was to contribute pari passu with the personal estate to the payment of the debts and legacies.

PARKER, V.C.—The first question here is as to the annuities; one of which has fallen in by the death of Sarah Twitchin, the annuitant. The testator gives all his real and personal property to trustees on the trusts following: to pay the dividends of 1,500*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities to Sarah Twitchin for life; and, at her death, he directs the dividends of that sum to be equally divided between his wife Edith Blann and his niece Frances Rayner, or the survivor of them. There are several other gifts in the same words. The question is, whether he gave Edith Blann, who is the survivor, an absolute interest or an interest only for her life. No doubt the general rule is, that an unqualified gift of the income of a fund confers an absolute, and not merely a life, interest in the principal; but it is always a question of construction on a will to discover whether the testator did or not intend to give more than a life interest. Upon this point several authorities have been cited. It is not a very strong rule which gives an absolute interest in such cases. The Court is obliged to find out the intention of the testator from the words in which he has expressed it. Here the words are, "I direct the dividends arising from the said sum of 1,500*l.* 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities to be equally divided between my said wife Edith Blann and my niece Frances Rayner, and the survivor of them." The dividends are, under this direction, to be from time to time divided between these two persons, and the survivor of them. That means that the two were to take together, and that the survivor, after the death of either, was to have the whole. It appears to me that the enjoyment of these dividends in succession was to be to the two for life, and then to the survivor for an interest, which must be the same. To this it is to be added, that the general scheme of the will is to give life interests to these same parties. I think that there can be little doubt that a life interest only in this annuity is taken by the survivor. There must be a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled for her life only to the dividends of 1,500*l.* have 3*l.* per cent. reduced Bank annuities which had been set at liberty by the death of Sarah Twitchin.

The next question is, what should be the course of administration of the real and personal estate in this case. First, as to the real estate. It has been contended that the testator has shewn an intention that the real and personal estate should be liable pari passu to the pecuniary charges in the will. I do not think that there is any ground for that argument. The testator begins by directing his debts to be paid. He then gives specific and pecuniary legacies, and then gives all his estate (enumerating it) to trustees, upon trust to pay the dividends of certain portions, (which are general and not specific bequests); and then as to the rest, residue, and remainder "of my freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates, and all other my estate and effects," subject to such power of appointment as therein mentioned, he gives the same upon certain trusts, which he proceeds to point out. It appears to me that the ordinary rule as to the administration of real and personal estate must apply here. The personal estate is the primary fund for the payment of debts and legacies, and the real estate is charged as a subsidiary fund, which must mean with what remains due after the application of the personal property in a due course of administration. Roberts v. Walker was referred to on this point. It was the first authority of the kind, and perhaps it is not altogether to be reconciled with other cases. The will there contained a direction to sell the real estate. Here there is no direction to sell, but the testator seems to assume that, after his estate is administered to the point of paying his debts and legacies, the real estate will be remaining. Then Young v. Hassard was cited. That case appears not to be applicable to this subject at all. The property in this case appears to me to be subject to the ordinary rule of administration. The additional authority of Boughton v. James (1) seems to me to relieve the question from all doubt. The real estate is not to be applied until the personal estate is found to be deficient.

The next question is, what should be the course of administration of the personal estate. Upon this, two points arise for consideration. The first is, as to the interest of the tenant for life in the leaseholds, which are a wearing-out property; and the second, as to that part of the personal estate, which, though not a wearing-out fund, is not invested upon such security as this Court would approve, and yet may yield to the tenant for life a larger income than the ordinary investment would produce. Whether the tenant for life is to have more than this is settled to be a question of intention to be ascertained from the whole will. The general rule is, that an even hand is to be held between the tenant for life and those in remainder. Everything should be turned into a general fund, and the whole should be preserved for those entitled in remainder. The result of the authorities is, that the applicability of the rule in a particular case is to be ascertained by construing the whole will according to the directions given by the testator. No direction is to be found in this will that all the property is to be converted. It appears to me that with respect to the leaseholds, this Court must consider that there is no doubt. The testator assumed that there would be freeholds, copyholds, and leaseholds, not required for the purposes of administration, and he directed the payment of "the dividends, interests, rents, profits, and annual produce thereof," to be made to his wife. I do not see how the testator could, in clearer terms, have said that his wife was to have a life interest in the leasehold property, and that it was not to be converted. It is a different question as to the insurance and canal shares and Dutch funds. No direction is given that property of that kind should remain in specie. I think that they must be made subject to the general rule and converted, and that the produce must be invested in the funds of which the Court approves for that purpose. I do not know whether the question of contribution of the leaseholds to the payment of debts and legacies arises, but it may be reserved.

Will—Construction—Monies.

*A testator, by his will, appointed A. and B. to be his executors, to take and receive all monies that might be in his possession, or due to him at the time of his death, to be by them placed in the funds or otherwise laid out on security, the interest thereof to be paid to his wife for her life, and directed them, after her death, to divide the monies held in trust by them between his two nieces. The testator had at his death only a small balance at his bankers, and the sum of 1,200*l.* consols:—Held, that the consols were disposed of by the will under the terms of monies.*

Thomas Staning made his will, dated the 19th of August 1844, which was in part as follows:—"I, Thomas Staning, of

(1) 1 Coll. 26.

&c., being at this time of sound mind and good understanding, and desirous of making a settlement of my affairs, do accordingly declare the contents of this paper to be those of my last will, putting aside and totally doing away with any previous will or wills made by me, and therefore appoint William Combes, of &c. and George Clode, of &c. my executors, to take and receive all monies that may be in my possession or due to me at the time of my decease, and to prosecute for the recovery of the same if it be found necessary, to be by them placed in the British funds, or otherwise laid out upon such security as they shall deem sufficient, the interest arising from which to be received and paid by them yearly, or oftener as appears best, unto my dear wife Caroline Staning, at this time living with me, for her sole use and benefit, but that only during her life, she having but a life interest in it, and, at her death, or as soon afterwards as it can be done, it is my wish, for very sufficient reasons, and I, therefore, authorize my executors to divide equally, between my two nieces, daughters of my sister Mrs. Ann Combes, of Dorking, or to their children, or the child or children of either, supposing one of them not to have any family surviving, all such monies held in trust by them, and which my nieces or their surviving children at the death of my dear wife Caroline Staning may become by virtue of this my will entitled to in accordance with the wish already expressed by me."

The testator died in May 1846. At the time of the death of the testator his personal estate consisted only of some furniture of small value, a small balance at his bankers, and 1,200*l.* 3 per cent. consols.

This was a claim filed by the nieces of the testator against his executors. The only question in the case was, whether the 1,200*l.* stock passed by the gift of "all the testator's monies in his possession or due to him at his decease."

PARKER, V.C.—This is a claim in which a question of construction arises upon an exceedingly informal will. It appears that the testator, at the time of his death, had a sum of 1,200*l.* consols standing in his name, a very small sum of money at his bankers, and some furniture of the value of 80*l.*, and that this was the whole of his estate. The question is, whether the consols are or are not disposed of. Upon reading the will, I think that the Court ought to come to the conclusion that the will disposes of the whole. It is obvious that such was the intention of the testator, although the words used point rather to specific portions of the estate than to the whole. The testator commences his will thus:—"I, Thomas Staning, being at this time of sound mind and good understanding, and desirous of making a settlement of my affairs, do accordingly declare the contents of this paper to be those of my last will, and, therefore"—he then appoints Combes and Clode his executors. This is the language of a man who is about to make a complete disposition of the whole of his property, and not of a man who is about to die intestate as to a considerable part of it. There are no words of gift to the executors in this will. After having commenced as I have pointed out, the testator seems to assume that the executors, by their appointment alone, would have the controul of his property. He goes on to say—"I appoint these persons my executors to take and receive all monies that may be in my possession or due to me at the time of my decease, and to prosecute for the recovery of the same, if it be found necessary, to be by them placed in the British funds, or otherwise laid out upon such security as they shall deem sufficient, the interest arising from which to be received and paid by them yearly," and so on, disposing of it. Cases were referred to in the argument on this point, and I add to them the case of Boys v. Morgan (1), an authority to shew how unwilling the Court is to consider any portion of the personal estate undisposed of. The whole will in this case seems to point to a complete disposition; but, if it were not so, I think that the words used are sufficient to pass the consols in question. The executors are "to take and receive all monies that may be in his possession or due to him at the time of his decease, and to prosecute for the recovery of the same, if it be found necessary, to be by them placed in the British funds or otherwise laid out upon such security as they should deem sufficient." Now there is no doubt, upon the authorities, that the word "monies," in a gift of "monies" will pass stock in the funds, it being a question of construction upon the whole will, whether the testator meant to use the word in that sense or not. I cannot doubt that the words "take and receive all monies in my possession or due to me at the time of my decease," looking at the general terms of the will and the authorities on the subject, were sufficient to pass this stock. Then it was said, with some point, that the direction to take and receive all monies in his possession or due to him at the time of his decease, cannot mean to refer to stock, because the testator goes on to direct the executors to prosecute for the recovery of the same, if it be necessary, to be by them placed in the British funds or otherwise laid out upon such security as they should deem sufficient. To consider that this direction destroys the generality of the word "monies" as applicable to the stock, would be to take an advantage of a slip or inaccuracy of the testator in wording his will, when, in fact, the meaning is obvious. If he intended to give power to the executors to invest monies not invested, a fortiori he must have intended monies which he had himself invested to pass by the will. Upon the executors admitting that the debts and funeral expenses of the testator have been paid, declare that the plaintiffs are entitled in equal moieties to the consols.

STEVENS v. THE SOUTH
DEVON RAILWAY COM-PANY.

Railway Company—Agreement or Undertaking in a Cause—Act of Parliament—Jurisdiction.

A railway company, defendants in a cause, entered into an agreement or undertaking with the plaintiff not to do any act contrary to a then pending notice of motion, unless under the authority of parliament, until the hearing of the cause, or the further order of the Court. The company subsequently obtained an act of parliament, which did not by positive enactment, nor, in the opinion of the Court, by necessary conclusion from its provisions, take the case complained of by the plaintiff out of the reach of the undertaking, although it did not prohibit the act, and might have contemplated the act consistently with the provisions of the act of parliament:—Held, on motion by the plaintiff, that the undertaking was binding on the company until the further order of the Court: but that the company, on shewing merits, might have moved to discharge it; and the Court, deeming such merits to have been shewn by the answer, accordingly discharged the undertaking.

This was a motion, by the plaintiff, to restrain the South Devon Railway Company from doing any act contrary to their agreement or undertaking given in the cause, under the circumstances stated in the judgment.

Mr. Stevens appeared for the plaintiff, in support of the motion; which was opposed by Mr. C. Hall, on behalf of the company.

The motion was heard during the Long Vacation in 1851, before the Vice Chancellor, who delivered the following written judgment.

TURNER, V.C.—There are two classes of shares in this company, the original shares and the half shares. The original shares are 50*l.* shares, and represent the original capital of the company, which for the purposes of the present motion may be taken to have been the sum of 1,000,000*l.* It was in fact 1,100,000*l.*, but in consequence of a resolution passed immediately after the constitution of the company, 2,000 of the shares were never issued. The half shares, of 25*l.*, represent the sum of 500,000*l.*, increased capital of the company, authorized to be raised under one of their acts. The half shares were created on the 15th of March 1847, and have a guarantee or privilege attached to them; the resolution of the directors by which they were created, being in the following terms:—That 6*l.* per cent. per annum be guaranteed until the 15th of March 1857 upon all calls duly paid, and upon all sums received in contemplation of calls by authority of the board of directors in respect of such half shares; and that the said guarantee shall not exclude the shareholders from participation in any higher rate of dividend for the time being, payable on the whole share." It appears that no dividend or interest has been paid either on the half shares or on the original shares since the year 1848; and in the year 1850 the company, in addition to a mortgage and bond debt to the amount of 478,166*l.*, created under the powers of its acts, had incurred a floating and unsecured debt, to the amount of 97,000*l.* or thereabouts.

In this state of circumstances, a bill was introduced into parliament in the session of 1850, for enabling the company to raise, by the creation of new shares, a further capital, to be applied in liquidation of the mortgage and bond debt, and of the floating and unsecured debt, and as to 50,000*l.* for general purposes; and by this bill it was proposed that the future income of the company should be applied, first, in payment of the interest of the debts and of the shares to be created for the liquidation of them, and then in payment, not only of the preferential dividend guaranteed upon the half shares, but of the arrears and any future deficiency of such preferential dividend, without reference to the period or half year when deficiency occurred.

The plaintiff is a very large holder of original shares in the company, and upon the above application to parliament being made, he filed his bill in this Court, by which, as first amended, after alleging, amongst other things, that the effect of the resolution by which the half shares were created was, that the clear and divisible profits of each current half year were to be the only fund for the payment of the preferential dividend, and that the profits of one half year were not to be liable or applicable to make good the deficiency of such preferential dividend in any previous half year, that the holders of the half shares were not entitled to the preferential dividend out of any profits derived from increased capital, and that the directors had in hand profits of the past year, which ought to be applied, first, in payment of the floating and unsecured debt, and then in payment of a dividend upon the shares in the company during the period in which such profits were earned, but that the directors intended to apply the same in payment of the arrears of the preferential dividend, and that such payment would be illegal,—he prayed an injunction to restrain the company and its directors from paying any interest or dividends on the half shares in preference to dividends or interest on the original shares, out of any profits derived from any other capital than which at the date of the resolutions creating the half shares had been or could be raised under the provisions of the company's acts, and from paying any preferential interest or dividends on the half shares while any of the floating or unsecured debt was unpaid, except out of the clear and divisible profits of the current half year properly applicable to the payment of a dividend, and so far as such profits might be sufficient for the purpose. The defendants having put in their answer to the original bill, and thereby stated their intention to apply the clear profits in hand in paying to the holders of the half shares the preferential dividend upon such shares for the half year which had elapsed since the shares were created, the plaintiff, on filing the amended bill, gave notice of a motion for the injunction prayed by it. The motion came on upon the 31st of July 1850, and was ordered to stand over till Michaelmas term, the defendants undertaking not to declare or pay any dividend in the mean time; and the motion having again come on in Michaelmas term, was again ordered to stand over till Hilary term, upon an undertaking by the defendants in the terms of the notice of motion.

The defendants then put in answers to the amended bill, by which they stated that, until the arrangement after mentioned was taken into consideration, they had considered that the profits which they had in hand were applicable to the preferential dividends, including the arrears, and that the capital debt ought to be provided for by the creation of new shares, or otherwise, as parliament might sanction, but they never intended to apply them in payment of interest or dividends until such time as the capital debt was so provided for; and that, in fact, nearly all the profits which they had in hand had been applied towards payment of capital debt, such application having been considered as a temporary loan, to be repaid as soon as, under the authority of parliament, monies for that purpose should have been provided. They then referred to a report of the directors, recommending the arrangement with the holders of half shares which has since been adopted, under the provisions of the act of parliament obtained in the last session, and to a resolution of the shareholders approving the report and authorizing the directors to apply to parliament for powers to give effect to the recommendations; and they stated that it was not intended to apply any profits to the payment of dividends so long as any capital debt remained unpaid, unless parliament should have given the company such powers as would justify such application; and in one of the answers there was a passage to the effect, that it was not intended to apply any profits to the payment of the preferential dividend till the capital debt had been fully paid off.

The motion again came on after the filing of these answers; and on the 24th of February 1851 an order was made upon it, by which—the defendants undertaking that the order should be without prejudice to any question between the parties, and also undertaking to do nothing unless under the authority of parliament, contrary to the notice of motion, until the hearing of the cause, or until further order—it was ordered that the plaintiff should be at liberty to amend his bill. In pursuance of the liberty given by this order, the plaintiff re-amended the bill, and thereby prayed an injunction against the payment of the preferential dividend only, whilst the floating or unsecured debt should remain due and unpaid or unprovided for.

The defendants, by their answer to the re-amended bill, stated, that the unsecured debt amounted to upwards of 100,000*l.*, and that the assets available for payment of it were under 20,000*l.*; that it could only be paid off by the creation of new capital, by the authority of parliament, or by applying the profits, after keeping down the interest on the mortgage and bond debt, to that purpose, and that they intended to apply such profits accordingly, unless and until some other provision should be made by parliament for such purpose; and they also stated that the balance of profits remaining in hand, after payment of the interest of the mortgage and bond debt, was 789*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.*, which was meant to be applied in payment of the unsecured debt, subject to any provisions parliament might make for the payment; and, further, that the balance of profits on the next account would be applied as parliament might sanction, and in default of such parliamentary sanction in liquidation of the unsecured debt of the company.

At this point the proceedings in the original suit terminated, but the bill, which was introduced into parliament in the session of 1850 having been rejected, the defendants, in the last session of parliament, applied for and obtained an act, by which, after providing for the creation of shares or stock in place of a like amount of the mortgage or bond debt, it was enacted, that, subject to the rights of the holders of the shares or stock created in place of the mortgage and bond debt, it should be lawful for the company to commute the guarantee and privilege attached to the half shares into any other guarantee or privilege, whether perpetual or terminable, which might be agreed upon in manner after mentioned, as an equivalent for the existing guarantee and privilege, and to attach such new or altered guarantee and privilege to the half shares, or to any stock into which the same might be converted; but it was enacted, that no commutation of half shares should be made under the power of the act until a scheme, setting forth the particulars thereof, and especially the fixed or rateable dividends proposed to be attached to the half shares, or to the stock into which they might be converted in substitution for the 6*l.* per cent. guaranteed, and the privileges, if any, to be secured to the holders thereof, should have been sent to each shareholder, nor without the concurring votes of the holders of, at least, four-fifths of the whole shares, and of the holders of, at least, four-fifths of the half shares, represented at a meeting to be convened by the directors for the purpose of taking the scheme into consideration, with a proviso that such consent, if given, should be binding and conclusive on all the shareholders in the company; and after providing for the cancellation of the 2,000 unissued shares in the original capital, and of certain other shares which had been surrendered and forfeited, it was enacted, that, subject to the provisions of the act, the company might create and issue shares in the stead, and to the nominal amount, of the cancelled shares, and that the monies raised thereby should be applicable to the general purposes of the undertaking authorized by the company's acts, with a proviso that the existing debts of the company, other than the mortgage and bond debt, should be paid thereout. The act contained further provisions as to the shares to be thus created: that the company should not by the creation of them increase the capital of 1,600,000*l.*, which they were authorized to raise; that 20*l.* per cent. should be the greatest amount of any one call, and two months, at least, the interval between successive calls; and that the aggregate amount of calls on any share in any year should not exceed four-fifths of the nominal amount of the share; that the shares should not be created without the consent of, at least, four-fifths of the votes of the shareholders present at a meeting of the company, to be specially convened for the purpose of determining as to such creation, with a proviso that the consent, if given, should be binding on all the shareholders; that the holders of the shares should be entitled in respect thereof to a certain number of votes, but should not in respect thereof have any vote as to the commutation or conversion of the half shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the act, the company might issue the shares, at such times and of such amounts, and in such classes, and bearing such interest or dividend, preferential or otherwise, and with such privileges and on such terms and conditions, and generally in such manner as the company, with the consent of four-fifths of the votes of the shareholders present at a general meeting to be specially convened for the purpose, should determine.

In pursuance of the provisions of this act, the directors of the company prepared and issued a scheme for the commutation of the half shares, by which scheme it was proposed that the existing guarantee or privilege attached to those shares should be commuted as follows: that each half share should bear a fixed dividend in perpetuity at the rate of 10*s.* 9*d.* per annum, payable half-yearly in priority to all other dividends, except on shares or stock created in substitution for the mortgage or bond debt; that the substituted guarantee and privilege should take effect from the 15th of September 1850; that the first payment in respect thereof should be a dividend, at the rate aforesaid, for the half-year ending the 15th of March 1851, and thereafter that the fixed dividend should be paid half-yearly; that the substituted guarantee and privilege should be received as a full satisfaction for all arrears and future payments of interest originally guaranteed on the half shares, and in satisfaction of all further claims thereon to the 15th of March 1857; but that in case the surplus net revenue should permit a dividend to be made in respect of the 50*l.* shares exceeding 6*l.* per cent. per annum, the commutation should not exclude the holders of the half shares from participating in the surplus, rateably with the holders of the 50*l.* shares; and that, after the 15th of March 1857, the holders of the half shares should, in addition to the fixed dividend of 10*s.* 9*d.* per half share, be entitled to the same rate of dividend per cent. as that which might from time to time be declared in respect of the whole shares.

This scheme appears to have been founded on the report of an actuary, that the 10*s.* 9*d.* per half share, in perpetuity, was equal in value to the 6*l.* per cent. originally guaranteed for the period of ten years, during the part of that period for which it had not been paid. Notice having been given of an extraordinary meeting for the purpose of taking this scheme into consideration, the plaintiff filed a supplemental bill, by which, after alleging that the act of the last session does not contain any provision authorizing the profits of the undertaking to be divided among the shareholders by way of dividend, so long as any of the capital or unsecured debt remains unpaid or unprovided for, and that the payment of any dividend out of profits whilst the debt is unpaid will be a breach of duty on the part of the directors, and a violation of the undertaking; and further alleging that it is uncertain whether the new shares will be issued, and, if issued, whether they will be taken, and whether the calls upon them will be paid; and that the profits ought not to be divided until a fund shall have been actually obtained for payment of the unsecured debt; and also alleging that the proposed scheme is not authorized by the provisions of the act, and that it is beyond the authority of the directors to propose, and of the meeting to confirm, he has prayed an injunction to restrain the company and the directors from in any manner acting on or giving effect to the proposed scheme for the commutation of the privilege or guarantee attached to the half shares, and from paying or declaring any commuted or other dividend on any of the original or half shares in the company while any of the unsecured or floating debt remains due and unpaid, and, except out of the clear and divisible profits of the current half-year for the time being, properly applicable to the payment of a dividend; and so far as such profits, after payment of such debts, shall be sufficient for that purpose.

The plaintiff has now moved upon the supplemental bill for the injunction prayed by it. The motion was, in the first instance, made before the scheme for commutation had been submitted to the shareholders, according to the provisions of the act; and it then stood over, in order that the scheme might be laid before the shareholders, and to afford the plaintiff the opportunity of considering its effect, it having been suggested that the adoption of the scheme would enable an immediate dividend to be made on the original as well as on the half shares. The scheme having been submitted to the shareholders and approved by them, but being still objected to by the plaintiff, the motion was again brought on and argued. Upon the argument of the motion, it was agreed that the case should be considered as if a counter-motion, on the part of the defendants, to discharge the undertaking of the 24th of February 1851, had come on with the motion for the injunction.

The case, therefore, has to be considered in three points of view: first, whether the act of last session contains any such authority of parliament as will take the case out of the undertaking; secondly, whether, if the case be within the undertaking, the defendants are entitled to be relieved from it; and, thirdly, whether, if the undertaking be put out of the case, the plaintiff is, upon the merits, entitled to the injunction.

As to the first point, I am of opinion that the act of last session does not contain any such authority as will take the case out of the undertaking. The undertaking must be construed most strongly against the parties by whom it was given, and I think that authority by positive enactment, or by necessary conclusion from the other provisions of the act, was required to take the case out of its reach; and that it is not sufficient for that purpose that parliament has not prohibited the payment of the dividend, or may have contemplated that it might be paid consistently with the provisions of the act. It was argued that parliament must have intended the dividend to be paid, because it has appropriated the capital to be raised by the new shares, which is payable only by instalments, to the payment of the floating or unsecured debt, and has made no provision for re-couping the profits if applied in the payment of it; and again, because the new shares are postponed to the half shares, and if the dividends are not paid upon the half shares no dividends can be paid upon the new shares. But those arguments lead to no certain conclusions. There may be difficulties in carrying out the act which may not have been foreseen, but I cannot impute to parliament the intention to authorize by the act the payment of the dividend out of the profits, as the effect of such a construction would be either to compel the creditors to wait for payment until funds sufficient for the purpose were raised by means of the new shares, or, if they desired more immediate payment, to drive them upon the stock and assets of the company, which it was the manifest object of the act to preserve.

It is necessary, therefore, to consider the case upon the second point, whether the defendants are entitled to be relieved from the undertaking. It was argued, on the part of the plaintiff, that the defendants could not be so entitled unless the Court was of opinion that what they proposed to do was proper to be done. But I do not think this argument can be maintained. It is true that the undertaking having been entered into upon the motion being finally disposed of, and being contained in an order which could only be made by arrangement between the parties, may well be considered as an agreement on the part of the defendants. But it is an agreement only to do nothing contrary to the then pending notice of motion, unless under the authority of parliament, until the hearing of the cause, or until the further order of the Court, terms which do not appear to me to import that nothing contrary to the notice of motion was to be done except under the order of the Court. Had this been the intention of the parties, the order would, I think, have been differently expressed; the more so, as express reference is made to the authority of parliament. I see nothing, therefore, which could have precluded the defendants from asking the opinion of the Court upon the question, whether they ought any longer to be bound by the undertaking, even if the circumstances of the case had remained wholly unaltered. But I think that, at all events, there is enough of alteration in the circumstances of the case to warrant the defendants in calling for the judgment of the Court upon that question, for the receipts in hand are now of much greater amount than they were at the period when the undertaking was given, and the power which has been given by parliament to commute the preferential dividend has afforded the company better prospects than they then had of raising money for the payment of the unsecured or floating debt. In my opinion, therefore, the defendants have the right to move to discharge the undertaking, and the case must be considered exactly as it would have stood if an injunction in the terms of the undertaking had been granted as of course, and without the matter having been mentioned to the Court, and the defendants had moved to dissolve and the plaintiff to extend the injunction.

I proceed, therefore, to consider the question upon the third point, whether, upon the merits of the case, the plaintiff is entitled to the injunction.

The case on his part appears to rest on three grounds; first, that the holders of half shares are not entitled to profits derived from increased capital; secondly, that the holders of half shares are only entitled to dividends out of current profits, and are not entitled to arrears of dividends out of the profits of subsequent years; and, thirdly, that the earnings of the line cannot lawfully be applied to the payment of dividends while the floating or unsecure debt remains unpaid and unprovided for.

As to the first point, it is unnecessary to say more than that the profits now in question are not derived from any increased capital; and as to the second point, I think, that as between the holders of half shares and of the whole shares, the holders of the half shares were, upon the construction of the resolution by which those shares were created, well entitled to the 6l. per cent. guaranteed out of any funds of the company which could be lawfully applied to the payment of it, and therefore, out of future profits, before any dividend could be payable upon the whole shares. This appears to me to be the plain import of the resolution, and the Court would not, I think, be justified in putting a strained construction upon it, on behalf of the holders of the whole shares, at whose instance and for whose benefit the half shares were created. If this part of the case had depended upon the construction of the resolution, there would not, in my opinion, have been sufficient doubt upon it to have justified the Court in interfering by injunction; but, I think, that, independently of the question of construction, the act of last session having authorized the commutation of the guarantee and the commutation having been made with the consent required by the act, the point must be considered to be at rest.

The remaining point to be considered is, the payment of the dividend whilst the floating or unsecured debt is unpaid, and, except by the power to create new shares, is unprovided for, and I am of opinion that the Court ought not, upon this ground, to interfere by injunction. I think, that the clause relating to the dividends which is contained in the company's first act, and which was referred to in this branch of the argument, is to be considered as directory. It does not point out the manner in which the profits are to be ascertained, or in what manner the scheme by which they are to be shewn is to be prepared. If such a clause was inserted in a deed of partnership between a limited number of individuals who had agreed to bring in capital by instalments, I think the majority of the partners could overrule the minority upon the question whether profits should be divided while the debts of the partnership were unprovided for, and the principles which apply to partnerships limited in number apply also to these great companies. I think, also, that the question upon this third point is one of internal management, with which the Court cannot interfere; and that the case of Brown v. the Monmouthshire Railway and Canal Company (1) goes far to govern the present.

It was attempted, in the first instance, to support the plaintiff's case upon the ground that the proposed scheme for commutation was ultra vires, but on my intimating an opinion unfavourable to that view, the point was not further pressed; and I think no weight is due to it. The plaintiff, also, in the argument, relied much upon the statements of the answer as to the intention of the defendants, and upon the state of the company's affairs and the alleged invalidity of a resolution which appears to have been passed for the creation of the new shares; but I think that the defendants have not, by the answer, precluded themselves from disputing the right to the injunction; and, for the reasons above given, I do not think it necessary to enter upon the other points.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the undertaking ought to be discharged, and the injunction refused. It must not, however, be understood that I give any authority for the payment of the dividend. I discharge the undertaking, upon the ground that the defendants are entitled to the opinion of the Court, whether the injunction should be granted; and I refuse the injunction, upon the ground that the plaintiff has not made out a sufficient case for the interference of the Court. The costs of the motion must be costs in the cause.

 1851. ENGLAND BANKING COM-
 Dec. 8, 9, 11. PANY, in re THE NORWICH
 YARN COMPANY.

Company Winding-up Acts—Action.

A joint-stock company overdrew its account with its bankers, and was subsequently ordered to be wound up. The amount of debt was disputed, and the public officer of the bank (also a company) carried in a claim before the Master, who refused to admit it as a claim until the debt was proved at law. The Master of the Rolls on appeal admitted the claim, and directed an action to be brought; but, upon appeal to this Court, it was held, that although the order at the Rolls was correct in admitting the claim, it must be altered by giving the public officer of the bank liberty to bring such action against such person or persons as he should be advised.

This was an appeal from an order of the late Master of the Rolls. The short facts were as follows:—In 1833 the Norwich Yarn Company was established, and a deed of partnership was executed on the 2nd of August 1834. In 1836 the East of England Banking Company became its bankers, and the account was overdrawn, and when the Yarn Company ceased trading in October 1847, the amount was alleged to be 85,755*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* In 1849 an order was made for the winding up the affairs of the Yarn Company, under which the public registered officer of the bank carried in a claim, on behalf of the bank, before the Master, for the above-mentioned sum and interest. The Master declined to admit the demand as a claim, and certified that he had so refused, he having at the hearing of the claim stated that it was his opinion that it ought to be established at law in the first instance. On an appeal to the late Master of the Rolls, Lord Langdale, he ordered the claim to be entered and admitted by the Master, and that the bank, by their public registered officer, should bring such action at law as they might be advised against the official manager of the Yarn Company to establish the demand. The Banking company appealed from this order (1).

(1) The following observations fell from the LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE during the argument:—"Is there any other question substantially before us than this, whether there is a rational legal question to be tried? Is there or can there be anything else? If it is plain to demonstration that the debt is due, it ought to be admitted; but if it is the subject of reasonable question, how can we admit it? This is not analogous to a case of bankruptcy, where the proof must be admitted because all the assets are swept away from the creditor, and a creditor's only resort is under the bankruptcy. Here all the creditor's rights remain as they were, subject only to this condition, that the legislature has imposed upon him the necessity before he sues of going in before the Master for some cause that appeared to the legislature sufficient. Even then the Master may say, as I understand the act of parliament, you may go to law at once, without an allowance or disallowance, otherwise the Master may go on, and allow or disallow. That does not prevent him suing, because after it is disallowed he may sue. The question is this. These acts of parliament are intended for the benefit of the contributories, as I consider, and only secondarily for the benefit of the creditors, whose cases are scarcely interfered with. I repeat, that, as it seems to me, before the debt is admitted on the books of the Master or the Court as one to be paid, it ought to be clear to demonstration that there is not a legal question. * * * Suppose a creditor, or alleged creditor, in order merely to obey the act, goes before the Master and carries in half a sheet of paper, and says, 'I claim such a debt,' and carries in no evidence to support it, and the Master disallows it, then, unless I misconstrue the act of parliament, the creditor is at liberty to proceed at law, and is not affected by anything that takes place in the Master's office."—And upon the same subject LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH said, "What takes place in the Master's office clearly has nothing to do with the action that is pending. When that act of parliament first

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Roundell Palmer, Mr. Cole and Mr. Willes were for the appeal. The following cases were cited.—

Mr. Roupell, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Crompton, and Mr. Busk, for the respondents, were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I am of opinion that the materials before the Court do not enable us to say at present, with any satisfaction to ourselves, or with any reasonable certainty of doing justice, whether this is not, or is, a debt proveable under the order for winding up this company; the consequence is therefore, that we are of opinion that the Master of the Rolls's order, so far as it directs the claim to be entered, and does not direct a proof, is perfectly correct. There remains only for consideration the manner in which the order appears to be expressed with reference to legal proceedings. It directs an action to be brought against the official passed, a great number of applications were made to be at liberty to prove, but the Courts refused to interfere. They said, all you have to do is to go to the Master, and exhibit such proof as you can, or such proof as you please: when you have done that, you have done all that was in the intention of the legislature, in order that the Master should know what are the claims against the company. It is useful that the Master should know the extent of the claims, that he may be regulated in making a call; but it is not intended otherwise to interfere with the creditor. The great object of the act was internal arrangement. Creditors are not put in the same case as where the assets are taken away from the debtor; the assets remain in the hands of the debtor, and creditors may proceed against him to recover the claim."

manager. Subject to hearing what the respondents may say, we are of opinion that that should not be so expressed; but whether there should be liberty to bring any action or actions whatsoever against any person or persons, or whether there should be an issue or issues, or what should be done consistently with what I have stated, is a question for consideration. We neither disturb what has been done at the Rolls as to the admission of the claim, nor as to the reservation of costs.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH. — I entirely concur in that view of the case. If I were to adopt the suggestion at the bar, and say that I must decide the case upon the materials before me, I should say that there is nothing made out to establish any claim whatever. I see enough to lead me to the conclusion, that very likely proof may eventually be able to be made. I think it is quite right to allow the party to make a claim; whether there is such a claim, and to what amount, must be decided by some proceeding at law.

Dec. 12th.—An order was this day made —“That the demand of the East of England Banking Company by their public registered officer, against the Norwich Yarn Company, for the sum of 35,755*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.*, with interest from the 19th day of May 1849, be entered and allowed by the Master as a claim only; that the East of England Banking Company, by their registered officer, or otherwise, be at liberty, on or before the last day of Hilary term next, to bring such action or actions at law against such person or persons as they may be advised;” and then followed special directions as to the time for commencing the action, &c.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. }
Jan. 19. } SEWELL v. MOXSY.

Claim—Voluntary Assignment of a Debt.

The assignee of a debt under a voluntary assignment, filed a claim against the representatives of the deceased debtor and the assignor for payment of the debt or administration of the debtor's estate:—Held, that the plaintiff had no equity, and the claim was dismissed.

This was a claim, filed by the plaintiff Sarah Elizabeth Sewell, against the heir, executors, and devisees of Nathaniel Stallwood, and against Hannah Rebecca Sanders, claiming to be a creditor upon the estate of Nathaniel Stallwood, for a debt of 71*l.* 10*s.* assigned to her under a voluntary deed by H. R. Sanders, and praying that the real and personal estate of N. Stallwood might be administered in this court. The facts, as stated on the claim, were, that a person named Sanders, now deceased, advanced certain monies to N. Stallwood, and paid other monies on his account to the amount of 71*l.* 10*s.*; that N. Stallwood thereby became a debtor to Sanders to that amount; that Stallwood died in February 1851; that Sanders died in March 1851, having appointed, by his will, Mrs. Sanders his executrix, and bequeathed to her all the residue of his estate; that thereby Stallwood became a debtor of 71*l.* 10*s.* to the defendant Mrs. Sanders; that she being the legal personal representative and residuary legatee entitled to this debt, executed a voluntary assignment by deed-poll, dated in November 1851, by which, in consideration of 5*s.*, she purported to assign the debt due to her from Stallwood or his estate to the plaintiff for her own benefit. She also appointed the plaintiff her attorney with power to sue for the debt.

Mr. Pole appeared in support of the claim, and said it was quite clear that this debt was due to Mrs. Sanders upon her becoming the representative of her husband. Mrs. Sanders assigned the debt to the plaintiff, and, therefore, she could not sue, and there was no one but the plaintiff who could sue.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Giffard, for the representatives of Mr. Stallwood, contended that the plaintiff had no power under a voluntary assignment to sue in respect of this debt. The power of attorney did not entitle her to sue in her own name. They cited—

Mr. Buxton, for Mrs. Sanders, submitted to act as the Court should direct.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. —after stating the facts as already set forth, said,—There is nothing in this case to shew the right of the defendant to dispute this debt as one due from Stallwood to Sanders, the testator of Mrs. Sanders. There is nothing to meet the question that such a debt was due, or to lead me to doubt that if Sanders were now living and filed such a claim as this, he would be entitled to the usual administration decree; nor anything to question this, that if Mrs. Sanders, after the death of Stallwood, had filed such a claim she might not have sustained it. Whether, if the whole 71*l.* 10*s.* would appear to be all due, or only a part, there is no doubt a debt was due to Sanders, and that it was, consequently, due after the death of Sanders to Mrs. Sanders. The question is, whether it is now due to Mrs. Sewell, the plaintiff. In order to entitle a plaintiff to sue, he must be a creditor of the testator whose estate is sought to be administered; but the point is, whether Mrs. Sanders has not ceased to be a creditor under the deed of assignment, which was voluntary, and only for a nominal consideration. It is clear that the plaintiff never could have a decree to enforce that voluntary assignment against her, for a voluntary assignment of a chose in action does not operate to convey any legal right, but it operates as a contract in the eye of a court of equity to give to the assignee the benefit of the chose in action, when brought into possession: if it is for a consideration it may be enforced; but if voluntary, the assignee has no equity to enforce it as against the assignor. Here, the assignor is made defendant; the claim does not ask a decree against Mrs. Sanders. She appears by counsel, and says, "I take no part, I leave it to the Court to make its decision." How then can I decide what I must do, not only against the other defendants, but against Mrs. Sanders, that the plaintiff shall have the benefit against the estate of Stallwood, and against Mrs. Sanders of this voluntary assignment? Does the assignment constitute the plaintiff a creditor of Stallwood's estate? No; certainly not, unless the effect is to put Mrs. Sewell in the place of Mr. Sanders. I cannot make such a decree as against Mrs. Sanders on this claim, which is to enforce not a voluntary agreement against Mrs. Sanders, but against the estate of Mr. Stallwood, on the assumption that the plaintiff stands in the place of Mr. Sanders. Without saying whether if Mrs. Sanders and Mrs. Sewell were joined together as plaintiffs there might be a decree which it is unnecessary to decide, it appears to me there is not such a case upon this claim as to entitle the plaintiff to sue for administration of Stallwood's estate. I do not see any reason to dispute the debt being due to Sanders or Mrs. Sanders, and I do not see any reason, from what is stated as to some rent due to the plaintiff, to say that if the plaintiff could stand in the shoes of Mrs. Sanders for the 71*l.* 10*s.*, there would be any reason why the plaintiff should not have the benefit of administration. On these grounds, I must dismiss the claim, with costs.

In re HEWSON.

Lunacy—Allowances out of Estate, in Confirmation of an Agreement before the Lunacy—Allowance to a Relation.

*Where a lady who had separate property married, and an agreement was made that out of her income certain domestic expenses should be defrayed, and the agreement was acted upon until her lunacy, and the husband continued the same expenses out of her property till his death; and where the lady was under a moral obligation to give her nephew 500*l., part of which she gave, and a further part her husband, after her lunacy, paid out of her property; the Court allowed the executors of the husband to de- duct all the money paid for keeping up the establishment, after the lunacy, till his death, and also the money paid by him to the nephew, before paying over the separate income of the wife to her committees.

This was a petition by executors, praying the allowance of certain payments out of the lunatic's estate, and the sanction of the Court to payments in respect of an arrangement which had been acted upon during the lunatic's lifetime. The facts were as follows:—The lunatic, Mrs. Anne Hewson, the widow of Mr. Thomas Ansaldo Hewson, a medical practitioner, was entitled to a large income, settled upon her for her separate use; and from the affidavits it appeared that on her marriage with Mr. Hewson, in 1823, an arrangement was made by which the lady's income was to bear the charges of the household expenses, and other charges of the domestic establishment, and that Mr. Hewson should provide for the expense of horses and carriages. This arrangement was acted upon down to the year 1845, when Mrs. Hewson was found lunatic, and from that time until his death, Mr. Hewson continued the same establishment, and received the whole income of his wife's estate. Mr. Hewson appointed executors of his will, who were called upon by the committees of Mrs. Hewson's estate to repay all the income of her property from the time of the lunacy up to his death, but the executors resisted the demand on the ground of the agreement, so far as that they claimed a set-off of so much as had been expended in the keeping up the establishment. This constituted the first part of the case.

The second part, also supported by affidavits, was this:—A nephew or grand-nephew of Mrs. Hewson had been placed by her at school, the expenses of which she defrayed; and when he left school she paid his fee for apprenticeship, and discharged all the costs of his maintenance, and at times intimated to him her intention to advance him in the world, and in particular promised him, before her lunacy, that she would give him 500*l.*, to set up in business for himself, in reliance on which he quitted a wholesale house of business where he was engaged, and she, on her part, so far redeemed her promise that she gave him 50*l.* After her lunacy, Mr. Hewson gave the nephew a cheque on the bankers, who kept an account of Mrs. Hewson's money, independently of that belonging to Mr. Hewson, for 250*l.*, and the same was duly honoured. The executors of Mr. Hewson now desired to be allowed as a set-off to the demand of the committees of his wife's estate this sum of 250*l.*, which had been paid solely because Mrs. Hewson had promised the nephew the money.

Mr. Malins and Mr. F. Wood supported the petition.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Shapter stated that the facts were wholly undisputed; and they left it to the discretion of the Court to say whether any, or, if any, what allowance should be made and deducted from the money coming from the executors of Mr. Hewson, in respect of the agreement to keep the establishment proved to have existed from the time of the lunacy to the husband's death, and also whether the 250*l.* ought to be also allowed, a question which would depend upon whether there was any moral obligation on Mrs. Hewson herself to have advanced the money, and if there were, then, whether Mr. Hewson could fairly be considered to have given the cheque in redemption of that moral obligation, it being admitted that the cheque being drawn on that particular account kept at the bankers, was favourable to such a view.

Mr. Stuart, Mr. Young, and Mr. Barton appeared for other parties.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Speaking for myself, as there is no evidence to rebut that in support of the petition, I think that the arrangement between the husband and wife regarding the establishment must be taken to be proved; and the question is, what amount should be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I am quite of the same opinion; and as it appears that the expenses were 550*l.*, or thereabouts, I think that sum should be allowed as a set-off, counting from the date of the lunacy to Mr. Hewson's death; and, therefore, that the gross amount of such allowance from that period will be deducted by the executors from the money they have to account for as the separate income of the lunatic.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—We are both of opinion that there was on Mrs. Hewson a moral obligation, under the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, which is not disputed, to fulfil her promise to this gentleman, her nephew. No doubt can be fairly entertained that if she had remained of sound mind she would herself have fulfilled her kind intention on his behalf. Both Lord Cranworth and myself consider it to be a fair discretion to exercise to allow this sum of 250*l.* to the executors of Mr. Hewson in the account. After, therefore, deducting the annual sum of 550*l.* and the sum of 250*l.*, the executors must pay over the balance of the lady's income from the time of the lunacy to the date of Mr. Hewson's death, to the credit of the lunacy.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Expense may be saved if this order is delayed until it can be incorporated with an order which may be made in the suit commenced or contemplated for the administration of the husband's estate. The order will be as we have stated, but it need not be drawn up at present.

Feb. 11. } PEPPERCORN v. WAYMAN.

Sale by acting Executors—Statute 21 Hen. 8. c. 4.—Powers—Disclaimer.

A testator devised his freehold estates to A, B, C. and D, and their heirs, on the usual trusts for sale. He then ordered and directed that A, B, C. and D, the executors of that his will, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, should sell his copyhold estates. He then gave all his personal estate to the same persons, and declared the trusts of all the monies to arise from his real and personal estate. A. died in the lifetime of the testator. The testator died in 1830. B. and C. sold the copyhold estates in 1832. In 1851 D. executed the usual deed of disclaimer. There was no evidence that D.

had refused to accept the executorship before the sale in 1832:—Held, first, that copyholds were within the 21 Hen. 8. c. 4; and, secondly, that, under that act, the sale of the copyholds had been properly made by B. and C.

William Betts, by his will, dated the 4th of January 1822, devised all his freehold estates to H. C. Hoare, L. Waller, H. Waller, and M. Wells, and their heirs, upon the usual trusts for sale, and directed them to stand possessed of the purchase-mones upon the trusts thereafter declared. The will then proceeded as follows:—

“And I do hereby order and direct, that the said H. C. Hoare, L. Waller, H. Waller, and M. Wells, the executors of this my will, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, do and shall, as soon as conveniently may be after my decease, and they shall think fit, in such manner, &c., make sale of all and every my copyhold messuages, cottages, or tenements, farms, lands, and other hereditaments whatsoever, situate and being within and held of the manors of,” &c.—The testator then directed that they should stand possessed of the purchase-mones on the trusts thereafter declared. The testator then directed that the receipts of H. C. Hoare, L. Waller, H. Waller, and M. Wells, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, should be good discharges to the purchasers of his freehold and copyhold estates. The testator then bequeathed all his personal estate to H. C. Hoare, L. Waller, H. Waller, and M. Wells, by name, on the usual trusts for conversion and sale. He then declared the trusts of the monies arising from his real and personal estate. The testator appointed his four trustees to be his executors.

L. Waller, one of the trustees, died in the lifetime of the testator.

The testator died in 1830. The will was proved by H. Waller and M. Wells alone.

In 1832, H. Waller and M. Wells sold the copyhold hereditaments devised by the will to Mr. Peppercorn, the plaintiff.

The plaintiff afterwards entered into a contract with the defendant, Mr. Wayman, for the sale of the above-mentioned copyhold estates.

In April 1851, H. C. Hoare executed a deed of disclaimer, by which, after reciting that he had declined to act, and never had acted, and was desirous to renounce the trusts and executorship of the will, he disclaimed in the usual form.

The question in this suit was, whether the copyhold estates had properly been sold to the plaintiff by H. Waller and M. Wells.

By the statute 21 Hen. 8. c. 4, it is enacted, that, where lands are willed to be sold by executors, and part of them refuse to be executors and to accept the administration of the will, all sales by the executors that accept such administration shall be as valid as if all the executors had joined.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Smythe, for the plaintiff, contended that the title was good, and cited Adams v. Taunton (1).

Mr. Malins and Mr. Hardy, for the defendant, contended that, as the power was given to the three surviving executors, it could not be exercised by two only. It was doubtful whether copyholds were within the act of 21 Hen. 8. c. 4. If they were, the defect was not cured by it, as there was no proof that Mr. Hoare had refused to act.

PARKER, V.C.—I think that there is a good title. There is a devise by the testator, William Betts, to four persons, of freehold estate upon trust to sell, and then, in the ordinary course with respect to copyholds, a power is given to the same four persons (who are named as executors), and the survivors and survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor, to sell the copyholds. Then there is a bequest of personal estate upon trust to sell in exactly the same way; and then a direction that these persons shall apply the whole money, the proceeds of such sales, in a particular manner. One of the four died in the testator's lifetime. The three then became trustees precisely as if three only had been named in the will. As to one of these three there is nothing to shew whether he acted or not. Nineteen or twenty years after the testator's death he executed a deed of disclaimer, reciting that, from the time of the testator's death, he had declined to act and had never acted, and disclaiming all the trusts. The question whether the two trustees could act alone is not the same as to the freeholds and copyholds. Acceptance would have been necessary to have made him trustee of the freeholds, and the deed of disclaimer operates so as to put him in the position of never having been a trustee of them. The legal estate in these freeholds is in the two other trustees only, and they can execute the trusts of the will as to them. The question as to the copyholds is not the same. At common law, the power to sell them is an authority given to the three trustees and executors, which cannot regularly be executed by fewer than the whole number. The statute 21 Hen. 8. c. 4. commences as follows:—"Forasmuch as a bargain and sale of such lands, tenements, or other hereditaments so willed by any person to be sold by his executors after his decease, after the opinion of divers persons, can in nowise be good or effectual in the law, unless the same bargain and sale be made by the whole number of the executors named," &c. Then there comes the provision referred to. It has been considered that this statute is declaratory. It was suggested in the argument that it does not apply to copyholds. I am not aware that there has ever been a doubt on the point. The question as to the copyholds differs from the question as to the freeholds, because there must be an actual refusal of one executor to act in order to enable the others to sell the copyholds without him. Now what have we here? We have a disclaimer which, if it is effectual at all, must be a refusal as to both the freeholds and copyholds, and, prima facie, that must be a refusal to act from the beginning. Is there anything to raise a doubt that this disclaiming executor did refuse from the beginning? If he did not, there would be a great irregularity in the sale by the two other executors without his concurrence. A disclaimer is prima facie evidence of a refusal from the beginning, and I have heard nothing to raise a doubt of the irregularity of this transaction. I have, therefore, no doubt that this title is good. I must give the title the benefit of the costs.

BRIGGS v. THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Tenant for Life without Impeachment of Waste—Power to cut Timber—Perpetuity—Remoteness.

Family estates, which were subject to mortgages, were conveyed to trustees, to raise money for the payment of incumbrances, and subject thereto, for A. B. for life, and then for C. D., his eldest son, for life, without impeachment of waste, but subject to a power to the trustees after contained, with an ultimate remainder to A. B. in fee simple. The power to the trustees was during the life of A. B., and after his death, with the consent of C. D., if he should be the survivor, to fell timber, and apply the proceeds towards paying off incumbrances so long as they should exist:—Held, that the power was paramount any authority in the tenant for life without impeachment of waste, and that it was not an infringement on the law of perpetuity.

This case was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Parker. The questions before the Court arose out of a conveyance of certain estates to trustees, and a declaration of trust of the same. The estates having been conveyed by agreement between the late Earl of Oxford, who was then tenant for life without impeachment of waste, and Lord Harley, his eldest son, who was remainder-man in tail, by an indenture, dated the 20th of March 1832, between Edward, then Earl of Oxford, since deceased, of the first part; Alfred, then Lord Harley, but now Earl of Oxford, of the second part; John Moore, of the third part; and Thomas Briggs, of the fourth part,—it was agreed that certain parts of the premises should be sold or mortgaged, and that a sum not exceeding 50,000*l.* should be raised towards liquidating the debts of the then Earl; and, subject thereto, that an annuity of 600*l.* a year should be raised and payable to Alfred, then Lord Harley; and after his decease, that the same annuity should be payable to Lady Harley; and, subject to the above trusts, the estates were to be held by the trustees during the life of the then Earl upon trust, to pay the rents to him for his life for his own use; and it was declared that in case the said Alfred Lord Harley should survive the said Earl, then that the trustees and trustee should, subject to the above trusts, stand seised or possessed of the said estates, to the use of, or upon trust for, the said Lord Harley and his assigns for his life, without impeachment of waste, but subject to the power thereafter limited to the said trustees or trustee, to fell timber and underwood growing on the said estates: and from and after the death of the said Alfred, then Lord Harley, in case he should survive the then Earl, then upon trust to raise and pay an annuity of 600*l.* to Lady Harley, for her life; and after the decease of the survivor of the said then Earl and Lord Harley, subject as aforesaid, upon trust for the first and other sons of Lord Harley successively in tail male, with an ultimate remainder in default of such issue to the said then Earl of Oxford, his heirs and assigns for ever, and then the following proviso was introduced:—"Provided also, and it is hereby further agreed and declared, that it shall and may be lawful for the said trustees, or the survivor of them, his executors or administrators, at any time or times hereafter, so long as there shall be any mortgage or mortgages, incumbrance or incumbrances, subsisting upon the said hereditaments, or any part or parts thereof (but not, after the said Earl's decease, without the consent of the said Alfred Lord Harley, if living, such consent to be signified in writing), to fell and cut, or cause to be felled and cut, all or any of the timber and other trees and underwood standing, growing, or being upon the said hereditaments, and to sell and dispose thereof, and to pay and apply the money to arise therefrom in or towards the liquidation or discharge of the subsisting mortgages or incumbrances, or of some or one of them." And it was declared that, in order to provide for the due payment of the interest of the several incumbrances which should for the time being be subsisting upon the said estates, and of paying and applying the rents and profits thereof according to the several interests of the parties interested therein for the time being, the then Earl of Oxford, Alfred, then Lord Harley, and John Moore, appointed the plaintiff, Thomas Briggs, generally to superintend the management of the said estates, and to receive the rents and profits in respect of the estates, and all monies arising from the sale of timber and underwood on the said estates, and to give receipts for the same, and to apply the monies so received according to the trusts of the deed, retaining an allowance of 1s. in the pound for his trouble in the management of the estates.

Since the deed, the Earl had died, and Lord Harley (now Earl of Oxford) claimed the right to cut timber, but the Vice Chancellor decided that upon the true construction of the deed, the power of the present Lord Oxford, as tenant for life without impeachment of waste, had no avail while incumbrances existed, but that his power was controuled by that given to the trustees with his consent. From this decision the Earl of Oxford appealed, and the case being before the Court, their Lordships considered that another question ought to be discussed, namely, whether or not the power in the trustees was not void as tending to a perpetuity?

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood), Mr. Bethell and Mr. Toller supported the decree below.

Mr. Malins, Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Cole, for the Earl of Oxford.—That the ordinary power given to a tenant for life to cut timber, was not intended to be restricted is plain from the fact that his consent is necessary to the exercise of the power by the trustees; and if this were not so, if the trustees from caprice or any other cause should think fit not to cut timber for the purposes of the trusts of the deed, no timber whatever could be cut at all. On the question of perpetuities, the case of Ferrand v. Wilson (1), before Sir James Wigram, is a sufficient authority to shew that the power attempted to be given to the trustees is void for remoteness, as plainly infringing the law against perpetuities. In the first place, the property which is settled must be considered as a timber estate, and that the wood and timber are a portion of the profits as much as the rents would be. Then if that be so, and it is plain from the trusts that the settlors so thought it, an attempt is made to deal with the profits in such a way as that the trusts for accumulation are to last so long as there may be incumbrances on the estate, that is, during an indefinite time, which may continue beyond a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. Practically, this trust is the same as if it had been to receive the rents and profits (the timber or its produce being profits), and accumulate them until there was enough for paying the incumbrances, which would clearly have been bad. In Ferrand v. Wilson the devise was made to trustees for twenty-one years, then various tenancies for life were created, and remainders over given, and the trusts declared of the term were to fell timber until the debts were paid, and a power was given to the trustees after the determination of the term until a person entitled in tail or to some greater estate should attain twenty-one, to fell timber, and apply the proceeds in the same way as during the term of twenty-one years, and there the trusts as to the timber were held void for remoteness.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—On the question of construction we have not the least doubt. We are both clearly of opinion that the exemption of the life estate of the present Lord Oxford, from being impeachable of waste, is subject to a power exercisable only by the trustees, though not without his consent. The question being, in substance, whether, according to the true intention of the settlement, the timber growing on the estate is during his Lordship's life to be applicable to his own purposes, or to relieve the inheritance from certain charges, we think that the latter is plainly the true construction. It is not necessary to rely upon the obvious argument, that the contention of Lord Oxford goes to strike the parenthesis (if it is a parenthesis) out of the settlement, or to give it no operation. Independently of that observation, not necessarily conclusive, the intent is plain that the trustees were to have the power of cutting timber for the purpose of relieving the inheritance, not to be exercised without his consent. It has been suggested that Lord Oxford might wish to have timber cut, and that the trustees might maliciously or capriciously refuse to concur. When that case shall arise it will be time enough to consider it. The case probably would be one as to which I (speaking for myself alone) should feel no difficulty. The question as to this part of the argument now stands simply thus: is that life estate which is stated in express terms to be subject to a certain power, to be not subject to the power? We think this point not arguable. But one of us has a doubt upon the question of remoteness, and, therefore, that point must be further discussed.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—My doubt is how this case is to be distinguished from that before Sir James Wigram.

Mr. Bethell.—In that case the money arising from the sale of timber is to be applied, not in relieving the estate from which the timber was cut, as is the case here, but in paying the debts and legacies of the testator, a most material, and indeed vital, distinction; and, moreover, on the point of remoteness, that is met by the very essential fact, that the power may be destroyed by a disentailing deed, and so must be considered as within the rule relating to perpetuities. In the case of Ferrand v. Wilson, Sir James Wigram actually founded his decision on those of Ware v. Polhill and Ibbetson v. Ibbetson; for he said that those two cases, or rather the former, and the principle of the latter, required the decision he made. So far, and so far only, as Ferrand v. Wilson lies within the limits of Ware v. Polhill and Ibbetson v. Ibbetson, it is an authority for that now before the Court; and even if those two cases should be considered as supporting this, which is, at least, doubtful, they do not warrant the doctrine being carried one step further. But, in fact, upon examination, it will be seen that in Ware v. Polhill the estates were leasehold, and the power was held void, the estate vesting absolutely in the tenant for life, while Ibbetson v. Ibbetson was the case of a suspense of vesting of chattels, which the Vice Chancellor said "might have continued for ages," as there might not be a tenant in tail attaining twenty-one, who might become possessed of a particular house. The two cases, namely, Ferrand v. Wilson and the present, are sufficiently distinguished.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The doubt that I had has been removed. It was a doubt created in the course of the argument, by the reasoning of Sir James Wigram in Ferrand v. Wilson. Some of the expressions in the judgment in that case certainly have an aspect favourable to the view taken by the defendant; but I think there is a manifest distinction between the cases. If the law be not that a power is always good so far as perpetuity is concerned, if it is capable of being barred by a common recovery, or by that which is now equivalent to a common recovery, perhaps it is a matter of regret that that is not the state of the law; if there are any exceptions to that rule, I think they have created more embarrassment than is compensated for by any benefit which they have produced. It is not necessary to give any opinion as to whether Ware v. Polhill is right, or whether Ferrand v. Wilson can or not properly come within the same category. For supposing Ware v. Polhill to have been rightly decided, and Ferrand v. Wilson to have correctly followed, still I think that those authorities are not applicable to this case. This is a case in which not only is the power capable of being barred by the act of the first tenant in tail, when he is in a condition which, in point of law, enables him to act at all, by being of the age of twenty-one, but in which the power is one to be exercised solely by virtue of the contract between the parties to the settlement: a contract to this effect, that that which was a debt upon the estate should be liquidated in a particular mode. It appears to me that, to whatever extent of time the operation of that contract extends, it is not a contract within the doctrine of perpetuity. The person who enjoys the estate has only to pay off the incumbrance, and there is an end of it. The present case, therefore, is materially distinguishable from those cited.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — The equity of redemption of a wooded estate is settled, and those concerned in the matter agree that no person having a limited interest shall apply any of the wood to his own use until the corpus of the estate shall have been relieved from certain incumbrance. It seems certainly a very reasonable agreement. It has been said, however, that it is void, as trespassing upon the law of perpetuity. But the circumstance of the power being liable to destruction by the tenant in tail is of itself sufficient to preclude all objection, at least to a power of this description, on that ground. I think the plaintiff right.

May 31, } PACKET COMPANY, ex parte
June 1. } HAMER'S DEVISEES.

Company—Winding-up Acts—Contributory Devisee—3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 104.

A. was the holder of shares in a joint-stock company, the members of which had by covenant, not binding their heirs, engaged that the partnership should continue for ninety-nine years; that there should be no right of survivorship, and that the shares should be deemed personal estate. A. died in 1838, having, by his will, devised his real estate to B, and appointed C. his executrix. At the time of his death the company were solvent, and all the then existing liabilities were afterwards discharged. C, after A.'s death, was treated as the proprietor of the shares; and for five years received dividends upon them as executrix. The company became insolvent; and, it appearing that the testator's personal estate was exhausted, B.'s name was put on the list of contributories, in his character of devisee of the real estate:—Held, reversing the decision of the Court below, that B. was rightly placed on the list of contributories.

The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 104. charges debts of every description on the real estate of the testator; and a future debt, arising out of a previous obligation of the testator, is within the act.

This was an appeal by the official manager, from an order of Knight Bruce, V.C., directing the removal of the names of Mr. and Mrs. Rawdon and Mr. J. Hamer from the list of contributories, on which they had been placed in their character of devisees of certain real estate under the will of J. Hamer deceased. The report of the hearing, before the Vice Chancellor, will be found in 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 207; and it will only be necessary to state, in addition to the facts there set out, that by the deed of settlement of the company, the parties thereto of the first part for themselves and himself, severally and respectively, but not all or any of them jointly, and the several other persons of the other part, whose names and seals were thereunto subscribed and set, for themselves and himself, severally and respectively, but not all or any of them jointly, mutually and reciprocally covenanted, declared and agreed with and to each other (amongst other things) that the company should continue for ninety-nine years, and that there should be no benefit of survivorship, as between the shareholders.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Rolt, and Mr. J. V. Prior, in support of the appeal.—The liabilities of the company, though incurred after the death of the testator, are, by the covenant in the deed, a debt of the testator—Morse v. Tucker (1), Birmingham v. Burke (2), and though the covenant in this case does not bind the heirs, yet by the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 104. debts of every description are charged upon the real estate of the testator.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Malins, and Mr. H. Humphreys, contra.—The devisees have been in the possession of the real estate for twelve years; and during all that time the company have accepted and treated the executrix as owner of the shares. At the time of the death of the testator there were no debts which could affect the real estate. To call a liability under a covenant a debt, would be to confound a contract with its consequences. A debt, within the meaning of the statute, must be such as could be sued for—Wilson v. Knubley (3), Farley v. Briant (4). In Morse v. Tucker, Wigram, V.C. drew the distinction between the statutory liability and the liability under a charge in a will. This liability would not have been proveable as a debt in bankruptcy—The South Staffordshire Railway Company v. Burnside (5). If this case is within the 3 & 4 Will. 4, then the estate is equitable assets, and must be administered in the usual way.

Mr. Bacon, in reply, cited Ex parte Doyle, in re the St. George Steam-Packet Company (6), to shew that the receipt of dividends by the executrix did not constitute her a proprietor of the shares.

June 1.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is a case in which, after several years have elapsed, an attempt is made to charge the real estate of a shareholder, in the hands of devisees, with the liabilities of the company incurred long after the death of the shareholder. The shareholder entered into a deed of covenant for carrying on this company, with others, for ninety-nine years. At the time of his death it was admitted that there were no debts owing, but that debts afterwards accrued. Therefore, at the time the devise (which was not charged with debts) took effect, no debt had in fact accrued. The question is, whether the real estate is now liable, twelve years after the death of the testator. If it is so, it is a very inconvenient disposition of property by the legislature to render real estate liable, after so considerable a distance of time, in respect of transactions over which the devisee had no controul; for, by the deed, the shares belong to the personal representative of the testator. It has been ably argued that, under the deed, the proprietorship of the shares vests in the executrix, who has continued to receive the dividends in that character; but the contrary has been decided (Ex parte Doyle, supra), and I have no intention of interfering with that decision, though I think it a question of considerable nicety. By the deed the parties covenant (and being under seal it is a specialty) that they will carry on trade without benefit of survivorship for ninety-nine years. This covenant, being a specialty, does not bind the heirs, because they are not named; but it does bind the personal estate beyond all question. The devisees who took the real estate, not charged with debts by the will, and who had no controul over the personal estate, might probably have compelled the executrix to have come to some account, which would have put an end to the liability of the real estate. I give no opinion as to how that was to be effected. The devisees, however, took no step, and remained in perfect security as to their real estate; and a hard case it is, if that liability should be established.

Now the deed not creating a specialty debt binding the heir, it is clear that, unless the act of parliament provides for this case, there is no relief to be had against the proprietors of the real estate. The statute 3 Will. & M. c. 14. does not bear upon this case, because the word "debts," in that act, was used in a limited sense; and in Wilson v. Knubley it was held that, where an action of debt would not lie, the act did not operate to bind the devisee; and in

(6) 2 Hall & Tw. 221.

Farley v. Briant that doctrine was carried a little further; but both decisions depended upon that particular act of parliament which contained those words of restriction. The statute 1 Will. 4. c. 47. does not extend to this case, but is confined in its operation to cases where the heirs are bound.

Then the question is, whether this case falls within the 3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 104. That act is rather ambiguously framed; but it recites, that it is expedient that the payment of debts should be secured more effectually; and then it enacts that, "when any person shall die seised of or entitled to any estate or interest which he shall not by his last will have charged with or devised, subject to the payment of his debts, the same shall be assets to be administered in courts of equity for the payment of the just debts of such persons, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty; and that the heir or heirs at law, customary heir or heirs, devisee or devisees of such debtor, shall be liable to all the same suits in equity at the suit of any of the creditors of such debtor, whether creditors by simple contract or by specialty, as the heir or heirs at law, devisee or devisees of any person or persons who died seised of freehold estates was or were before the passing of this act liable to in respect of such freehold estates at the suit of creditors by specialty in which the heirs were bound." Now, stopping there, a difficulty occurs; because, though it first enacts, that where a man shall not by his last will have charged his estates with, or devised them subject to, the payment of debts, the same shall be equitable assets for the payment both of simple contract and specialty debts; yet it afterwards refers to the remedy as it would be against the heir or heirs, or devisee or devisees, as if they had been bound. But I think the true construction of the act is to charge debts of every description upon the real estate of the testator; and the difficulty raised in the argument that this was a debt by specialty, in which the heirs were not bound, is answered by the proviso of the act,— "Provided always, that in the administration of assets by courts of equity, under and by virtue of this act, all creditors by specialty in which the heirs are bound shall be paid the full amount of the debts due to them before any of the creditors by simple contract or by specialty in which the heirs are not bound shall be paid any part of their demands." The act, therefore, provides for the payment of debts by specialty, where the heir is not bound; and this is a case of a specialty debt where the heirs are not bound; and, therefore, I think, upon the true construction, it is included in the act.

There is another way of construing the act, which is to me very satisfactory. The act does not extend to any case where there has been a devise subject to the payment of debts. Now, what was the intention of the act, or what want did it mean to supply? It meant to supply the want of charge of debts, generally, and not in the restricted sense of the term as used in the act of 3 Will. & M. c. 14, or the later acts. When, therefore, it is settled that where there is a general charge of debts by will, that includes not only present debts, but future debts also; and if this act meant, as I think it did, to make a charge here which the testator had neglected to do by his will, then this case falls within the authorities as a future debt arising out of a previous obligation, and is within the provisions of the act. Then prima facie the real estate is liable; and the only point arises upon the subsequent transactions.

Now the deed has provided that the party shall become a proprietor, though, until he has done some act, he shall not have any benefit, such as receiving dividends. Here the party has been permitted to receive dividends; but it has been decided that an executor, by receiving dividends, does not become a proprietor in his own right, but continues entitled as personal representative. In the present case, the executrix never received any payment from the company, except in her character of personal representative; therefore, there is no personal liability. How then can I restrain the company from enforcing the liability of the real estate against the devisees? They have not done any act to prevent their coming against any property which was liable, as between themselves, to the engagements of the company. The obligations of the deed, with the assistance of the act, bind the testator's real and personal estate. This liability would have ceased, if the executrix had sold the shares, and a new member had been introduced. No such transfer, however, was made; and, consequently, the shares remained the property of the testator, and his real and personal property, by force of the deed, aided by the act of parliament, remained liable to these obligations. If, as has been argued, the acts that have taken place would have had the effect of substituting the executrix as proprietor, that would have carried the point to the proper extent; for then the executrix would have become proprietor in her own right, and the estate would have been discharged. But those acts, not having had that operation, the shares still remain the property of the testator, and his real and personal estate is liable. I see nothing in the acquiescence, as it is called, of the company in not having made any motion against the real estate that can affect their title. The cases in bankruptcy have no bearing upon the present case.

Then it is said, you cannot attach the real estate, because you cannot attach the devisee personally. That is not the contention; for the devisee is not sought to be charged personally, but in his character of devisee. But then it is said that these proceedings, being in the place of a suit for administration, you cannot come against the party, except in the course of administration; and, consequently, you must shew that the personal estate is exhausted. That is a question which I have not now to decide. These parties are put upon the list as contributories in respect of the real estate of the testator; as between themselves and the co-partners they will have a right to say, that the personal estate shall be first applied, but they will have no right to say, if the personal estate is exhausted, the real estate in their hands is not liable. Consequently they must remain on the list in respect of the real estate. Those are points which may have to be decided hereafter.

I regret to differ from the learned Judge below, and I cannot differ from him without hesitation. I am of opinion, however, that the liability does remain, and that these parties must be kept on the list as contributories.

Company—Winding-up Act—Breach of Trust—Misapplication of the Funds of a Company by the Committee of Management.

A railway company was formed, and a large number of shares in it was allotted, and a considerable sum paid in respect of deposits on the shares. A managing committee of the company was appointed, and five of its members were appointed a finance committee, with power to draw cheques. By the direction of the managing committee, large sums, part of the company's funds, were employed in purchasing shares in the market. The Master to whom the winding up of the company was referred, charged the members of the finance committee with these sums, on the ground that the managing committee was implicated in the breach of trust. The Master's order was overruled.

The above-mentioned company was formed in 1845, and provisionally registered. A large number of shares in the concern was allotted, and a considerable sum was paid on account of deposits on the shares.

A managing committee of the company was formed, and five persons, Sir J. E. De Beauvoir, R. Carpenter, S. N. Fisher, P. H. Edlin, and F. F. Weiss, members of the managing committee, were appointed a committee of finance, any three of whom were to form a quorum, with power to draw on the company's bank by cheques, to be signed by not less than three, and to be countersigned by the secretary.

The managing body directed that very considerable sums, part of the funds of the company, should be expended in purchasing shares in the market, and cheques were drawn by members of the finance committee on the company's bank for this purpose.

Mr. Carpenter died, having, by his will, appointed executors who proved his will.

The Master, to whom the winding up of the company was referred, charged Mr. Carpenter's executors, and the four surviving members of the finance committee with all the sums expended for the above-mentioned purpose, in respect of which cheques were not produced, and charged all the sums expended for such purpose, in respect of which cheques were produced, on the members of the finance committee who had signed them.

This was a motion to discharge the Master's order.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Hallett, for Mr. Carpenter's executors.

Mr. Daniel and Mr. Southgate, for Mr. Weiss.

PARKER, V.C.—I have come to the conclusion that the Master's order cannot be sustained consistently with the principles and practice of the Court. The circumstances are that five individuals, with several others, were members of the managing body, and that these five were appointed to be a finance committee, with power for any three of them to sign cheques, which were to be countersigned by the secretary. It is admitted on both sides that some, if not all, of the five, acting by the direction of the managing body, employed the funds of the company, to a large amount, in buying up shares in the company. The Master, by his order, has, in fact, charged these persons with the monies which they were instrumental in applying for the purchase of these shares. I should be extremely sorry to say anything intimating any difference of opinion from the conclusion to which the Master has come as to the proceeding in question, which he has rightly characterised as a breach of trust in the application of the funds of the company. It is possible that there may be an explanation given of it, but I have not heard any. I do not in the least differ from the view which the Master has taken. It appears to me to be a misapplication of the funds of the company, tending, as had been put by Mr. Selwyn, in the course of his argument, to destroy the very object for which the money had been put into the hands of the directors. Whatever jurisdiction the Master may or may not have under the act, he certainly has all the jurisdiction necessary for taking the ordinary accounts, and enforcing the ordinary liabilities. In carrying out the act of parliament another class of liabilities, not of the ordinary kind, may arise. It is not necessary to consider this point in the present case. It appears to me that the vice of the Master's order is this, that it assumes that the five individuals, where there was no cheque forthcoming, or three of them, where there were cheques, were the parties who, as between these persons and the company were solely and ultimately chargeable with the monies misapplied. It assumes that complete justice would be done in the case by making these persons, who were the hands of the governing body, solely liable by making an order for the restitution of the funds to be applicable as funds in which the whole of the company had a benefit. When it is considered that these acts were done under the direction of the governing body, and that the object of this proceeding is to wind up the company, and to settle all matters as between all the members of it, it is certain that the object would fail if the Court were to proceed upon the principle of making these persons solely liable, who, no doubt, were implicated in the misapplication of the money, but not more so those other persons who were not charged. If this money be recovered, the very persons who had directed a misapplication of it would have the benefit of the fund being brought back. It seems to me that all persons who were implicated in the transaction are jointly and severally liable, and that there is an obvious distinction between the present case and The Attorney General v. Wilson, and that class of cases, where the application was to have the funds restored on behalf of a company, no members of which were implicated in the misapplication of them.

Being of opinion that there was a misapplication of the funds, it appears to me, with regard to the mode of proceeding, that it is not consistent with the ends of justice that it should be of so simple a kind as the Master has considered. The transaction was much more complicated than to enable him to treat these parties as being merely liable to bring back these funds. I have very little doubt that some other course will be found to enable the Master to investigate what had been done. The Master's order must be discharged, and the costs be reserved, with liberty to apply.

TURNER, V.C. { THE GREAT NORTHERN 1851. { RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE LONG VACATION. { EASTERN COUNTIES RAIL-WAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Agreement—Parliamentary Authority—Jurisdiction—Statute—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act (s. 92.), Construction of.

The Court of Chancery will withhold its interference when called upon by either party to act in aid of an agreement, attempting to carry into effect without the intervention of parliament what cannot be lawfully done except by parliament, in the exercise of its discretion with reference to the interests of the public.

Whether railways are public highways—quære.

This was a motion, on behalf of the Great Northern Railway Company (the plaintiffs), for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the Eastern Counties Railway Company, from obstructing the engines, &c. of the former in passing over the junction of the East Anglian Railway with the Eastern Counties Railway near Wisbeach, and from obstructing the plaintiffs in freely passing between the two last-mentioned railways at Wisbeach.

The bill stated that the plaintiffs, on the 29th of May 1849, made an agreement with the defendants, by which, after reciting the Boston, Stamford and Birmingham Railway Act, 1846 (Stamford and Wisbeach line), an agreement entered into between the Great Northern Railway Company and the Boston, Stamford and Birmingham Railway Company, in February 1847, under the authority of the Great Northern Railway Company's Purchase Act, 1847, and that it had been agreed between the defendants, and the Boston, Stamford and Birmingham Railway Company, and the plaintiffs, that, in order to obviate the necessity of constructing a line from Peterborough to Wisbeach, and in consideration of the abandonment of the same, the defendants granted unto the plaintiffs, their successors and assigns, that thenceforth, and so long as certain lines therein mentioned should not be constructed (and which never had been constructed, and the powers for constructing which had expired), and in case the same should never be constructed, it should be lawful for the plaintiffs, their successors and assigns, to have and exercise full and free right to run their trains with their own engines, to and fro, over those parts of the lines of railway belonging to the defendants which lay between the Great Northern Railway at or near Peterborough and the Eastern Counties Railway station at Wisbeach, proceeding through March; and also to use all the stations, watering-places, sidings, and other conveniences upon or appertaining to the same lines, and free ingress, egress and regress for all agents, servants and workmen, and other authorized officers of the plaintiffs in, to and from such parts of the said railway, stations and appurtenances of the defendants, as might be necessary and convenient for the conduct and management of the trains and traffic of the plaintiffs working on and over the same; and that the times and manner in which the engines and trains of the respective companies should run over the portion of the line thereinbefore authorized to be used by the engines and trains of the Great Northern Railway Company, and the rules and regulations to which the same respectively should be subject, should be settled, in case of difference between them, in the manner thereafter provided; that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendants for the use of the before-mentioned portions of their said railway, and in lieu of all other tolls and charges or sums of money, after the rate of 60*l.* for every 100*l.* which the plaintiffs should actually receive in respect of the traffic passing over such parts of the defendants' railway as might be traversed by the engines and carriages of the plaintiffs, and that the charges for such passage to be made by the plaintiffs should in no case be less than the charges actually for the time being made by the defendants in respect of the traffic upon the same railway for equal distances; and that the defendants should, by their servants and officers, give to the plaintiffs all such and the same facilities and assistance at their several stations, and off the same, along the parts of their line which might be traversed by the trains of the plaintiffs as were usually given, and as should for the time being be actually given to their own traffic of the same class or character.

The bill also stated that by an agreement made, on the 16th of May 1851, between the plaintiffs and the East Anglian Railways Company, it was, amongst other things, agreed that the plaintiffs should, for twenty-one years from the 2nd of June 1851, work over the said East Anglian Railway, and receive the tolls and charges and all the income due in respect of the traffic which would be carried by them on the terms therein mentioned, and that under the said agreement the plaintiffs were entitled to the use of all the railways, works, and conveniences of the East Anglian Railways Company.

In opposition to the motion, the secretary of the defendants stated that, by the last-mentioned arrangement between the East Anglian Railways Company (into which the Lynn and Ely Railway Company and certain other companies have been consolidated), the latter company had, without any parliamentary authority for that purpose, altogether abandoned the working of their lines; and the plaintiffs, without any parliamentary authority for that purpose, had undertaken to work the same; that in the year 1847 an agreement was entered into between the Lynn and Ely, Ely and Huntingdon, and Lynn and Dereham Railway Companies (now the East Anglian Railways Company) and the defendants, whereby the defendants agreed to take a lease of all the lines of railway belonging to the Lynn and Ely, Ely and Huntingdon, and Lynn and Dereham Railway Companies, but that parliament refused to sanction a bill for carrying such agreement into effect; and that the alleged agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants mentioned in the bill was an unauthorized and illegal attempt to obtain for the plaintiffs, without the sanction of parliament, the like benefit as would have been obtained by the defendants by means of the agreement of 1847, if the same had been sanctioned by parliament.

In reply to this affidavit, it was stated, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that there was no arrangement between the East Anglian Railways Company and the plaintiffs other than that contained in the agreement of May 1851; that the East Anglian Railways Company did not thereby abandon the working of their lines; that there was no provision therein purporting to require them so to do, nor to prevent their working the same; and that the plaintiffs, though they had undertaken to work on and over the same, had not, under these thereby acquired or purported to acquire any exclusive right to work over the same.

The motion was heard before the Vice Chancellor during the long vacation 1851.

Mr. Rolé appeared for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion; and

Mr. Bethell, for the defendants, opposed it.

TURNER, V.C. delivered the following written judgment.—This case was argued, before me, on behalf of the plaintiffs upon two grounds: first, that under the provisions of the general railway acts the plaintiffs were entitled, independently of any agreement between them and the defendants, to pass over the Eastern Counties Railway between Peterborough and Wisbeach, and thence on to, and over the East Anglian Railways; and, secondly, that, whether they were so entitled or not independently of their agreement with the defendants, they were so entitled under that agreement. The plaintiffs did not attempt to derive to themselves any rights under their agreement with the East Anglian Railways Company, or to rely upon that agreement further than as evidencing the consent of that company to the use of their lines by the plaintiffs.

The argument, on the part of the plaintiffs, upon the first point was made to rest entirely upon the 92nd section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, which it was said converted all railways into public highways, and was not controuled by the 87th section of the same act, giving powers to companies to enter into agreements as to passing over each other's lines; but whatever may be the right construction of the Consolidation Act in those respects, agreements have in this case, in fact, been entered into with each of the companies over whose lines the plaintiffs claim the right to pass. I think that where such agreements have been entered into, the rights of the parties can no longer be governed by the provisions of the act, but must depend upon the terms of the agreement which has been made. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs cannot maintain their case independently of their agreements with the defendants.

With respect to the second point, which indeed was mainly relied on by the plaintiffs, I think that, upon the true construction of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs are entitled to pass over the Eastern Counties Railway on to the East Anglian Railway and to use the Eastern Counties Railway for that purpose. The recitals of this instrument shew that it was intended to grant some powers and rights beyond the power of using the Eastern Counties Railway from Peterborough to March and Wisbeach, and the grant itself is not merely of the right to pass to and fro over those parts of the lines of railway belonging to the Eastern Counties Railway Company, between the Great Northern Railway at Peterborough and the Eastern Counties Railway Station at Wisbeach (terms which may of themselves well be construed to give the right to pass over any part of the lines), but also of the right to use all stations, watering-places, sidings, and other conveniences, upon or appertaining to the same lines, and of the right of access to such parts of the railway stations and appurtenances of the Eastern Counties Railway Company as may be necessary and convenient for the conduct and management of the trains and traffic of the Great Northern Railway Company working, not merely on, but on and over the same; and this is followed by a covenant on the part of the Eastern Counties Railway Company, to give to the traffic of the Great Northern Railway Company the same facilities and assistance at their several stations, and off the same, along parts of their lines which may be traversed by the trains of the Great Northern Railway Company, as is usually given, and as shall for the time being be actually given, to their own traffic of the same class or character. The construction contended for by the plaintiffs seems to me, therefore, to be supported both by the recital of the instrument and the terms of the covenant, which, I apprehend, must be construed most strongly against the defendants, and I see nothing in the context to alter that construction. It was said, indeed, that the Eastern Counties Railway Company had not the right at the time to the use of the junction, and could not, therefore, intend to grant any such right; but independently of the evidence in the case, which I think proves that the junction was in use, I think that the Eastern Counties Railway Company having granted the use of those lines and of all conveniences upon the lines, cannot object to their grantees using the conveniences granted for any purposes for which they may be able to apply them, although they may not themselves be entitled to use them for such purposes. It was also said that this junction was beyond the limits of deviation of the East Anglian Railway, but I do not think it is competent for the defendants to raise that objection against their own grant.

If, therefore, this case had rested wholly upon the construction of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants, I should have thought it the duty of the Court to interfere to some extent by injunction; but I think there lies at the root of this case a question of public policy which precludes the interference of the Court. It is impossible to read the agreement between the plaintiffs and the East Anglian Railways Company without being satisfied that it amounts to an entire delegation to the plaintiffs of all the powers conferred by parliament upon the East Anglian Railways Company. All the stock of that company is to be taken by the plaintiffs, without any obligation to restore it. The plaintiffs are to manage and regulate the railways of the East Anglian Railways Company for the purposes of the agreement, and although in form it is declared that the instrument shall not operate as a lease or agreement, it amounts in substance either to one or the other. It is framed in total disregard of the obligations and duties which attach to these companies, and is an attempt to carry into effect, without the intervention of parliament, what cannot lawfully be done except by parliament, in the exercise of its discretion with reference to the interest of the public. It is true that the plaintiffs do not found their case upon this agreement, and that whether the injunction be granted or not the agreement remains in force; but it is not less true that the interference of the Court will promote the object of the agreement, and extend and facilitate its operation; and I think it is the duty of this Court to withhold its interference when called upon to act in aid of agreements of such a nature. My opinion, which I have framed upon the case, being thus dependent upon the legality of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the East Anglian Railways Company, I will, if the plaintiffs desire it, send a case for the opinion of a court of law upon that question; but if the plaintiffs do not desire to take the case, my order will be to refuse the motion, and direct the costs of it to be costs in the cause.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } CLOWES v. WATERS.
June 28.

Simple Contract and Specialty Debts—Interest—Bond Creditors.

An assignment of property was executed to trustees for the benefit of creditors, who were to be paid equally, and it was stipulated that any securities held by creditors, might be realized and applied towards payment of their debts, and as to any deficiency such creditors were to stand pari passu with the others, but not to receive more than the principal and interest. A schedule was added containing the debts, calculated with interest up to the date of the deed, but there was no express contract that simple contract debts should carry interest:—Held, upon exceptions to the Master's report, that this deed did not convert the simple contract debts into specialty debts, and no right to interest after the date of the deed was created which did not otherwise exist.

Held, also, that bond creditors were only entitled to prove for the amount of the penalties in their bonds.

This case came on upon exceptions to the Master's report, the question being, what sums of money the creditors of Edmund Waters were entitled to, under a deed of composition.

It appeared that, in the year 1823, Edmund Waters being largely indebted to a number of persons, executed two deeds of transfer and assignment of his property, including the opera-house held under a renewable lease, with all the scenes, furniture, &c. thereto belonging, to H. Winchester, upon the trusts declared by an indenture of even date, to which the creditors were made parties. By the deed of trust it was declared that the said H. Winchester, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns should stand possessed of the money to arise by the sale of the leasehold and other saleable property and effects of the said E. Waters, upon trust, in the first place, to reimburse himself for the necessary expenses incurred in executing the trusts, and then to apply the money to be received by him under the deeds of assignment in payment of the debts owing by the said E. Waters to such of his creditors as should execute the said deed of trust, or to their respective executors, administrators or assigns, rateably and in proportion to the amount of debts owing to them, without any priority or preference of any one or more of them, before any other or others of them, until each of the said creditors, his or her executors, administrators or assigns, should have received the full amount of the debts owing to him, her or them respectively, and to pay the surplus, if any, to the said E. Waters, his executors, administrators or assigns. And the said indenture also contained a proviso that if any creditor having any mortgage security should execute the deed, it should be without prejudice to such security, and that any such creditor should be at liberty, with the consent of the trustee or trustees for the time being, to convert his security into money and receive a dividend rateably with the other creditors or so much of the said debt as should not be satisfied by the proceeds to arise from the sale of such security; and the trustee or trustees for the time being were to make such arrangements as they should think reasonable with any person holding a security upon any of the property comprised in the deeds of assignment for the purpose of releasing such property from the said security, but no consideration or price for or upon any such arrangements should be given by the trustee, beyond the amount or value of the principal money and interest due to the persons respectively holding such securities, and the incidental expenses attending such arrangement and release. It was also provided by the said deed that the said E. Waters should have free liberty and licence to go about and attend to any business without arrest, attachment or imprisonment by the creditor who should execute the deed. A schedule was appended to this deed, which contained the signatures of the creditors to the deed and the amount due to them set opposite to their names.

A reference having been made in this suit for the Master to take an account of the sums due to the different creditors who had executed the deed, and to compute interest on such of the debts as carried interest after the rate of interest respectively carried by such debts under the provisions of the deed, the Master reported what creditors had proved their debts and what amount was due to those who had simple contract debts, allowing interest thereon at 5l. per cent. from the date of the deed of trust.

Exceptions were taken to this report, on the ground that interest ought not to have been allowed by the Master upon the simple contract debts, and that the bond creditors ought not to have been allowed to prove for more than the penalties in their bonds.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Wickens, in support of the exceptions, contended that the simple contract debts were not made specialty debts by the trust deed, and that interest was not payable upon them. There was no indication of a contract to that effect upon the face of the deed, and without such contract the nature of the debt could not be altered. The deed of trust could not be taken in any manner to vary the nature of the debts, or to give interest to creditors who would not otherwise be entitled to it. It was also contended that the bond creditors were entitled to prove for no more than the penalties in their bonds. They would not be able to recover more at law, and no further claim was given them by the trust deed.

Hughes v. Wynne, 1 Myl. & K. 20; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 28.

Tait v. Lord Northwick, 4 Ves. 816.

Lowndes v. Collens, 17 Ves. 27.

Tew v. the Earl of Winterton, 3 Bro. C.C. 489.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Briggs, contra, submitted that the simple contract debts were made specialty debts under this deed, and were entitled to interest. There was a clear intention expressed to that effect, because in the schedule the debts were set down opposite the names of the creditors, and to these debts interest had been added in every case. Interest, therefore, was given up to the date of the deed, and it could not be supposed that it was to cease after the deed was executed. The creditors had been kept out of their money for a long period, during which the property had been accumulated, and it was consistent with every principle of equity that the creditors should receive interest for the time they had been obliged to wait for their debts. This case was analogous to damages at law, and to legacies, upon which interest was always allowed. They cited—

Hyde v. Price, 1 C. P. Cooper, 193.

Craven v. Tickell, 1 Ves. jun. 60.

Brown v. Newall, 2 Myl. & Cr. 558;
s.c. 6 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 348.

KINDERSLEY, V.C., after stating the facts of the case, and the provisions of the deed of trust, said—The first question is, whether a creditor is entitled, under the terms of this deed of trust, to interest in respect of a debt not carrying interest. Now, there is no reference made in any part of the deed to the question whether any of the debts alluded to are specialty or simple contract debts. It refers to debts due, without the slightest mention of the nature of the debts. If all the debts were simple contract debts, not carrying interest, there is nothing there to indicate any intention that such debts are to cease to be simple contract and to become specialty debts, and there is nothing to indicate that any one of the creditors was to receive interest by virtue of the deed to which he would not be otherwise entitled. If the trust deed had contained on the part of Waters an agreement or covenant for payment of the debts, then the creditors would be secured under that deed. But so far from there being any such agreement or covenant, all that the deed purports to shew is, that Waters, not being able to pay his debts, makes provision for their payment by putting his property in the hands of trustees, who were to pay the debts, but in the same manner as he himself would have been bound to pay them. There is a direction as to creditors holding securities upon certain property, concerning which the stipulation is, that any creditor in that condition may, when his security has been realized and applied towards payment of his debts, as to the deficiency stand pari passu with the other creditors, and the trustees are at liberty to pay any creditor holding such security for the benefit of the creditors at large; and it is stipulated that they shall not receive more than the principal and interest. That does not affect the question whether this deed makes all the debts bear interest; and supposing the case—very unlikely, but possible—of a creditor holding a security not carrying interest, then the direction that the payment shall not exceed what is due to him for principal and interest, does not shew that anything is to be paid to him for interest. It certainly cannot be the intention of this deed to create a right to interest which would not otherwise exist; and I do not see why any instrument of this nature, making provision for payment of debts, is to be taken to vary in the slightest degree the nature of the debts, for the payment of which provision is made.

It is said that the creditors give a consideration by agreeing not to sue, except so far as the trustees may give them a right to do so. If it is meant that by reason of this, the debts were for the future to bear interest, surely it would have been necessary to insert a special stipulation in the deed to that effect; nor can I see why, in the absence of any such stipulation, the deed is to have that effect. The schedule contains a statement of certain gross amounts, but it does not shew that these were the sums actually due. The deed provides that the proceeds are to be applied in payment of the debts due by Waters to such creditors as shall execute, not specifying the debts mentioned in the schedule. In the schedule the sums are set opposite the names, but there is nothing to shew that these are sums due or claimed, and if a creditor, with 500*l.* opposite his name, could prove a debt of 1,000*l.*, it appears to me he would be entitled to 1,000*l.*; and if 1,000*l.* was set down when 500*l.* only was due, there would be no obligation to pay him 1,000*l.* It is alleged that the amounts there set down include interest; but I cannot conceive that a blunder in the calculation of previous interest upon debts not carrying interest should alter the construction of the deed. The question really is, what was the contract between the parties? If I should find an implied contract that the debts were to carry interest, I should, of course, give effect to it; but if omission can be considered a ground of implication, I find an implication to the contrary. Then the clause has been referred to, by which it is stipulated that the debts are to be paid without priority or preference, and it is contended that if you paid one creditor interest and another none, you would give some a preference over others; but that is not so, for some were already entitled to interest and others were not. What was meant by this clause was, that one creditor, because he was a specialty or a judgment creditor, should not be paid in priority, but all should stand pari passu. Under these circumstances, I cannot come to the conclusion that there is any contract to pay interest.

Then, as to the question whether a creditor by bond can have more than the penalty of the bond; I think not. The case of Hughes v. Wynne appears to me to be a distinct decision as to this very point. There the Court decided that a creditor could not, under a trust deed, receive more than the amount of his bond, because he could not recover more at law. The exceptions must, therefore, be allowed.

J. H. Green, by his will, gave certain property therein mentioned to trustees upon trust for his wife for life, and, after her decease, for such persons as his wife should, by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, to be by her signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of and attested by two or more witnesses, appoint, &c.

The testator died in 1830.

A part of the property made subject to the power consisted of a sum in consols, certain leasehold ground-rents, and some shares in an insurance company.

Mrs. Green, the widow, made her will, dated after the operation of the new Wills Act, and thereby gave all her real estate and such part of her personal estate as should consist of money or securities for money to the persons therein named, and gave all the rest, residue and remainder of her personal estate to certain other persons therein named.

The questions in this suit were: first, whether Mrs. Green's will was an execution of the power; and secondly, what part of the property, if any, subject to the power passed under the terms "real estate and such part of her personal estate as should consist of money or securities for money," and what part under the term "rest, residue and remainder of her estate."

PARKER, V.C. said that, first, upon the authorities, independently of the Wills Act, the will was a good execution of the power. The next question was, whether the bequests by the will came within the 27th section of the Wills Act. — [His Honour read the section.] — He thought that, in both parts of the will, there was a bequest of property "described in a general manner," and therefore, under one part or another, the legatees under the will were entitled to the whole property, subject to the power. Now, the consols passed under the words "securities for money"; but as to the ground-rents and insurance shares he wished to hear the reply.

Mr. Follett replied.

PARKER, V.C. said, that he thought the shares in the insurance company did not pass under the bequest of money or securities for money; and that the leasehold ground-rents did not pass under the term "real estate." All, therefore, that the legatees of the real estate, money and securities for money would take would be the consols, and the rest would go to the residuary legatees.

M.R. { LONG v. WATKINSON.
Feb. 19, 20. { LONG v. LONG.

Legacy—Lapse—Payment to Executors—Next-of-Kin.

W. L., by his will, directed his executors to pay the residue of his property to M. F., but in case of her death then to pay the same to the executors or executrices which M. F. might appoint. M. F. died before W. L., and by her will gave the residue of her property to I. W., and appointed M. L. her executrix. Upon a bill filed by M. L. against I. W.,—Held, that M. L. did not take the residue of W. L.'s estate beneficially, but that she took it as part of the personal estate of M. F., and that she was to hold it upon the trusts and for the purposes of M. F.'s will.

William Long, by his will, dated the 2nd of November 1848, gave and bequeathed to George Sandeman and his sister, Mary Fowler, and his sister-in-law, the plaintiff, Mary Long, all the property to which he should be entitled at his decease; he then continued: "And my instructions to my executor and two executrices are, that they do pay out of the above my just debts and funeral expenses, the expenses of proving this my will, likewise my servants' wages, also a legacy of 20*l.* to my executor and a legacy of 20*l.* to my executrix, Mrs. Long; and that they then pay over all the residue and remainder of my estate and effects to my sister, Mrs. Mary Fowler, my other executrix; but in case of my said sister's death, my instructions are, then to pay over all the residue and remainder of my estate and effects to the executors or executrices which my said sister, Mrs. Mary Fowler, by her will may appoint."

On the 1st of January 1849 Mary Fowler died, in the lifetime of William Long, leaving a will, dated the 28th of December 1846, by which she gave and bequeathed the residue of her property to the defendant, Isabella Watkinson, and appointed the plaintiff, Mary Long, her sole executrix.

On the 25th of January 1849 William Long died; and George Sandeman having renounced, his will was proved by Mary Long the plaintiff alone.

On the 28th of February 1849 Mary Long proved the will of Mary Fowler.

This bill was filed by Mary Long, the executrix under the will of William Long and of Mary Fowler, against Isabella Watkinson, the residuary legatee under the will of Mary Fowler, to determine who was entitled to the residuary gift in the will of William Long, as his sister, Mary Fowler, died before him.

On the hearing of the cause, a reference was directed to the Master, to ascertain who were the next-of-kin of the testatrix, Mary Fowler, living at her death and at the death of the testator, William Long.

By his report, the Master found that, at the death of Mary Fowler, her brother, William Long, was her sole next-of-kin, and that at his death several parties mentioned in his report were her sole next-of-kin. These parties were brought before the Court by a supplemental bill, and both the causes now came on upon further directions.

The questions were, first, whether Mary Long, as executrix of Mary Fowler, took the residuary estate beneficially; if not, secondly, whether she took it as a trustee for Isabella Watkinson, the residuary legatee of Mary Fowler, or for the next-of-kin of the testatrix.

Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Shebbeare, for Mary Long, insisted that she took the residuary estate beneficially.

Mr. Lloyd, in reply.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—The case of Evans v. Charles has been overruled after being doubted for a considerable time, and I am of opinion that the executrix of the testator does not take beneficially, but merely as a trustee, and as such she must administer according to the will of the testator; and in the absence of any declaration of trust in the will of the testator, she must hold it on the trusts expressed in the second will. Neither the residuary legatee nor the next-of-kin take as personæ designatæ. I think, therefore, that the residuary legatee takes the property as forming part of that belonging to the testatrix. The residuary legatee is not persona designata, but one of the cestuis que trust of the testator's will. There is not a provision in the will by which any person can take it as the property of the testator; but I know of nothing to prevent a party saying it is to go and be administered as a part of the property of another. This claim is embarrassed by its being made as if given to a persona designata. I cannot distinguish it from Palin v. Hills; which, however, I cannot reconcile with Daniel v. Dudley, Allen v. Thorp and The Attorney General v. Malkin. The proper construction of the testator's will, therefore, seems to be that he has directed his property to go to the trustee of his sister's will, to be administered as part of her estate. The fund, therefore, will fall upon her in her character of executrix, and if the debts and legacies are paid, it will be the property of the residuary legatee. The costs of all parties must be paid out of the fund, and those of the plaintiff between solicitor and client.

TRADERS' SHIP, LOAN, AND ASSURANCE ASSO-CIATION, ex parte LORD
TALBOT.

Company — Winding-up Act — Calls — Policies of Assurance.

A. subscribed the deed of settlement of a joint-stock company, instituted for the purpose of granting assurances on ships, for 1,000 shares of 25l. each. By the deed of settlement it was declared that a deposit of 2l. 2s. should be paid on each share, and that a further call of 2l. 2s. might be made by the directors, but that no further call should be made without a previous resolution of the shareholders assembled at a general meeting. The company granted several policies. The company was afterwards made bankrupt, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, and debts were proved against it to the amount of 70,000l., and upwards. It was afterwards ordered to be wound up under the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Act. The Master placed A. on the list of contributories, and made an order that he should pay 25,000l. Motion, that the order as to the call should be discharged was refused.

The above-mentioned company was projected and provisionally registered in 1845, the object being to effect assurances on ships and procure loans.

The deed of settlement of the company was signed by Lord Talbot, in respect of 1,000 shares of 25l. each. Mr. Winthrop also signed the deed of settlement, in respect of the same number of shares. The 127th clause of the deed of settlement is as follows:—

"That the original capital shall be paid up, and contributed in such portions and at such times as the board of directors shall from time to time fix and determine in that behalf, so that every portion of the original capital which shall be required to be paid and contributed shall be set and calculated upon the whole amount of the said original capital, rateably and distributively, whether the whole of such original capital shall have been taken and subscribed for or not; and every such portion shall be taken and divided into aliquot parts or proportions, and apportioned to the shares into which the capital shall be divided; and that every person, who at the time of the making or passing of the order or resolution by which such portion shall be fixed and determined upon, and required to be paid or contributed, shall be an owner or proprietor of, or subscriber for, or shareholder in respect of any share of such capital, and shall, whether registered in the register of shareholders or not, be liable to pay and contribute, for the purposes of the company, and at the time and place which shall be fixed or determined by the said board of directors in that behalf, the aliquot part which shall be apportioned to his share of such capital, and such aliquot parts shall be treated and considered as an instalment of capital due upon or in respect of a share held by him, or a call or instalment within the meaning of the said statute, and may be sued for, and recovered as such, according to the provisions of the said statute, and as herein also provided." The 128th section is as follows: "That a deposit of 2l. 2s. per share shall be payable by every person desirous of being a shareholder, within such period after any shares shall have been allotted to him by the company, subsequent to the same having been so allotted as the directors shall appoint; and that a second call, not exceeding 2l. 2s. per share, may be made by the board of directors, within six months after a resolution shall have been come to by the board of directors, declaring that such first call of 2l. 2s. per share has been made by them; but that no further call or instalment whatsoever shall be payable by any shareholder without a previous resolution of the shareholders of the company assembled at a general meeting, competent under these presents, to make such further call or instalment."

The company proceeded to carry on business, and granted several policies.

On the 8th of May 1848 a fiat of bankruptcy issued against the company, under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, and debts were proved against the company to an amount of upwards of 70,000*l*.

An order was afterwards made for winding up this company, under the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Act.

The Master charged with the winding up of the company placed Lord Talbot on the list of contributories, and made a call on him for 25,000*l*.

This was a motion that the order as to the call might be discharged.

Each of the policies granted by the company contained the following proviso:—"Provided always, and it is hereby expressly declared and agreed, between and by the said company and the assured, that the said policy and anything therein contained shall in no case extend or be deemed or construed to extend to charge or render liable the respective proprietors of the said company, or any of them, or any of their heirs, executors or administrators, to any claim or demand whatsoever in respect of the said policy or of the insurance thereby made, beyond the amount of their, his or her respective individual shares or share in the capital stock of the said company; but that the capital stock and funds of the said company shall alone be charged and liable to answer all claims and demands, by virtue of the said assurance or incident thereto."

In Trinity term 1849 Mr. Halkett, a creditor on a policy, recovered judgment against the company, and obtained a rule calling on Lord Talbot to shew cause why execution should not issue against him. This rule was discharged. This is the case of Halkett v. the Merchant Traders' Ship, Loan and Insurance Association (1). The Court of Exchequer decided in the same way in Hassell v. the Merchant Traders' Ship, Loan and Insurance Association (2).

PARKER, V.C.—I do not consider that the cases which have been decided at law upon the rules to shew cause why execution should not issue against Lord Talbot and Mr. Winthrop govern this motion. These cases only establish that policy holders cannot at law sue any individual shareholder of the company; and they leave untouched the question whether the claims of the policy holders, by virtue of their policies, are in the nature of a charge upon the property or assets of the company, which can only be enforced in this Court by a bill, or under the Winding-up Act, or in the Bankruptcy Court under the bankruptcy. I do not entertain a doubt that the policy holders, by force of their policies as general creditors, or by force of the Bankruptcy Act, or under the Winding-up Acts, must have a claim upon the general funds or assets of the company, whatever they may be. This leads to the question, what does the property or assets of the company consist of? It consists, among other things of the capital subscribed, that is, of the sum which the different shareholders agreed to subscribe towards the funds of the company, amounting in Lord Talbot's case to 25,000*l*. and in Mr. Winthrop's case to the same amount. This prima facie they are liable to pay. If I had found in the deed any express stipulation that these sums should be paid at a fixed period or by yearly instalments, or in any particular way, I should have felt great difficulty in saying that they were to pay it in any other way. But I find no such stipulation in the deed. There is a provision to subscribe a certain amount. The 127th and 128th clauses of the deed provide for the payment of this sum by means of machinery which does not now exist, namely, meetings of the company; but there is no stipulation that the shareholders should have the benefit of deferred payments. It appears to me that it is right to consider Lord Talbot, as the Master had considered him, liable, by force of the provisions of the deed, to contribute the sum of 25,000*l.* Taking this view of the question, I do not think I should in any way contravene the 58th section of the act of 1848, which provides "that nothing therein contained should extend or enlarge, diminish, alter, or affect the rights or remedies of creditors," which could in one way or another be made available for their benefit to the extent of the amount of the subscriptions which the shareholders had thought proper to agree to make.

It has been said that this form of proceeding deprived the different shareholders or contributories of the right they would otherwise have had of disputing each debt. There was a large number of debts found by the Master to an amount exceeding that which was called for. In my opinion, the amount subscribed for by Lord Talbot and Mr. Winthrop is liable to be called for to discharge these debts. There is nothing to prevent any contributory from putting any person, who is upon the list of creditors, to the proof of his debt. I do not think it necessary to entitle a creditor to receive payment that he should previously have established his debt at law. Before the Master, and upon the bankruptcy proceedings, it would appear that he had proved his debt, and that he was primâ facie a creditor. Any contributory might take the necessary steps for questioning the debt and putting it upon a proper footing, if it should turn out not to be an available claim or debt. It, therefore, appears to me that the Master has come to a right conclusion in saying that, having regard to the amount of debts primâ facie proved before him, the contributions which the appellants had agreed to make towards the company should be made, so as to render available the funds or property of the company to meet the demands upon it. As to the question of quantum, the call was for the amount to be subscribed. It was admitted that, if there had been any payment made, the parties were entitled to have the benefit of a set-off as to that. This does not affect the right to make the call. The parties may claim a set-off, if any, of the official manager; and, if he declines to allow it, they may go before the Master or come to the Court to have it allowed, not on the footing of undoing the call that had been made, but of establishing the amount of the call. The official manager must have his costs of this motion out of the estate. I do not think the question has been unnecessarily brought before the Court.

KINDERSLEY, V.C. } ATKINSON v. GYLBY.
April 27.

Insurance Company—Transfer of Policies—Bond.

A sum of money was borrowed from an insurance company, and a bond was given to secure the repayment of the money. The borrower at the same time insured his life as a further security, and the bond extended to the payment of the premiums for keeping up the policy. The insurance company having ceased to carry on business was dissolved, and the affairs being wound up, the company transferred, amongst other things, this bond and policy to another insurance company. No premiums were paid to the second company, and the policy was allowed to drop. The surety in the bond died, and the second insurance company claimed to be creditors against his estate for the amount of premiums unpaid, on the ground that the policies ought to be kept on foot until the money due upon the bond had been paid:—Held, as regarded the premiums, that this was not such a contract as the assignees of the first insurance company could enforce, although they had a good claim against the estate of the surety, quoad the amount secured by the bond.

This suit was instituted by the creditors of a testator, named John Parker Gylby, for the administration of his estate, and a claim had been carried in before the Master by the trustees and directors of a company called the Britannia Life Assurance Company, alleging themselves to be creditors upon the estate under the following circumstances:—From the state of facts taken in before the Master, it appeared that by a policy of assurance, dated the 15th of July 1841, under the hands of three of the directors of the London and Westminster Mutual Life Assurance Society, the sum of 1,000*l.* was assured upon the death of William Edwards to his executors, administrators or assigns, upon payment by him to the directors of the society for the time being, at the office of the said society, of the yearly premium of 39*l.* 5*s.* That by another policy of assurance, dated the 20th of January 1842, also under the hands of three of the directors of the London and Westminster Mutual Life Assurance Society, a further sum of 1,000*l.* was assured upon the death of the said William Edwards to his executors, administrators or assigns, upon payment by him in like manner of the annual premium of 40*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* That by a bond or obligation in writing, under the hands and seals of the said William Edwards and of Frederick Edwards and John Parker Gylby, the testator in this cause, dated the 7th of February 1842, the said W. Edwards as principal, and the said F. Edwards and J. P. Gylby as sureties for W. Edwards, became jointly and severally bound to David Salomons and H. M. Kemshead, two of the directors of the London and Westminster Mutual Life Assurance Society, in the penal sum of 900*l.*, with a condition, whereby, after reciting that W. Edwards having occasion for the sum of 450*l.* had requested the said David Salomons and H. M. Kemshead to lend him the same, which they had agreed to do, upon having repayment of the said sum in manner therein mentioned, and interest thereon secured by this bond, it was declared, that the bond should be void upon payment by the said W. Edwards, his heirs, executors or administrators, unto the said D. Salomons and H. M. Kemshead, their executors, administrators or assigns, of the sum of 450*l.* in the proportions, and at the times therein mentioned, with interest thereon at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, and the following clause was added:—"And also do and shall so long as any money shall remain due on the security of the above-written bond or obligation, well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, the several annual premiums payable in respect of the said two several policies of assurance, and all other payments whatsoever that shall be requisite or necessary for keeping the same on foot: and if the said W. Edwards shall not, during such time as aforesaid, do any act whatsoever, whereby the two several policies may be, or might be, liable to be forfeited, then and in such case the above-written bond or obligation shall be void, or otherwise shall remain in full force and effect." That by another bond, dated the 19th of December 1842, between the same parties and in the same terms as the last, the sum of 500*l.*, also borrowed by W. Edwards from the London and Westminster Assurance Society, was secured, together with the premiums payable upon the policies of assurance. That the monies so paid by the said D. Salomons and H. M. Kemshead were the proper monies of the London and Westminster Assurance Society; and the said two bonds were made to them as trustees for the same society. That J. P. Gylby died on the 27th of June 1843. That in October 1844 the London and Westminster Assurance Society ceased to carry on business as a life assurance society; and thereupon the affairs of the society were wound up, and the society was dissolved, and ceased to exist; and since the month of October 1844 there had been no directors of the society, and no society of that name; nor had the said society, since that time, had any office for the transaction of business; and the capital, stock, funds, and property of the society were shortly afterwards distributed amongst the shareholders and members thereof, according to their shares and interests therein. That by an indenture of assignment, dated the 13th of December 1844, the said D. Salomons and H. M. Kemshead, as the trustees of the London and Westminster Assurance Society, assigned to several persons, therein named as trustees and directors of the Britannia Life Assurance Company, (among other things,) the said two several hereinbefore-stated bonds, and the principal and other sums secured thereby, and all interest due or to become due in respect of the said sums, or any of them, and the said several policies of assurance, subject nevertheless as to such policies of assurance, to such rights of equity of redemption as were then subsisting thereof. That the London and Westminster Society was dissolved, and the affairs wound up, and the aforesaid assignment to the Britannia Company executed without the knowledge or privity either of J. P. Gylby, during his life, or the present defendant, his representative. That the premiums which became due on the said policies, up to January 1845, were duly paid by W. Edwards, but none of the premiums upon either policy had since been paid. That by reason of the non-payment of such premiums, within twenty days after they became due, the two policies had become absolutely void, and the same had never been revived. The claim made by the directors of the Britannia Life Assurance Company against the estate of J. P. Gylby, was for payment of the premiums upon the two policies, on the ground that such policies ought to be kept on foot until the money due upon the bonds should have been paid. They also claimed a liability against the estate of J. P. Gylby, in respect of the two principal sums of money secured by the two bonds. The defendant Cassandra Gylby objected to the claim, as far as regarded the premiums, and charged that there was not now due or owing to the trustees and directors of the Britannia Assurance Company from the estate of J. P. Gylby any sum or sums whatsoever, for or in respect of the annual premiums reserved by the before-stated policies of assurance.

The Master reported in favour of the claim carried in by the trustees and directors of the Britannia Life Assurance Company; and the case now came on upon exceptions to that report, the exceptions extending only to the amount claimed for premiums.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Haldane appeared in support of the exceptions, and said, the question was, whether the directors of the Britannia Life Assurance Company were or were not creditors of the testator, J. P. Gylby, for the amount of premiums upon the two policies which had been allowed to drop upon the transfer by the London and Westminster Assurance Society to the Britannia Company. The rule was, that if any of the terms of a contract were altered, a new contract was substituted, and the surety was no longer bound by it. The surety in this case contracted with the London and Westminster Society and not with the Britannia Company. The transfer was made between the two companies without his knowledge or concurrence. It was evident that Mr. Gylby never intended to be bound to the Britannia Company, and his obligation virtually came to an end. A contract of this nature rested mainly upon the solvency and responsibility of the company, and the surety had no opportunity of obtaining information upon these important points as regarded the Britannia Company.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Cairns, in support of the Master's report, referred to the terms of the bonds. The surety was thereby bound to see that the premiums were regularly paid upon the policies. It was admitted that the Britannia Company had a good claim against the testator's estate in respect of the sums secured by the two bonds. No exceptions were taken to that part of the case. The grounds were the same respecting both liabilities. The premiums were to be paid to the trustees of the London and Westminster Society, their executors, administrators or assigns. Now, they had assigned their interest to the Britannia Company, who must necessarily stand in the same position as the first company. It was not a new contract that was now set up, but the same contract. This claim was simply one by the assignee of a chose in action, which was of every day occurrence. If the arguments on the other side were worth anything, they must apply to the capital and interest secured by the bond as well as to the premiums.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I think in this case that the Master was wrong, and that the exceptions must be allowed so far as regards the premiums. I will go upon the assumption in the first place, that instead of its being a suit to administer the estate of the surety it was to administer the estate of Edwards. The facts are these, —I will state the case as respects one policy and bond, because the same principle applies to the other: — Edwards then, it appears, borrows a sum of 500*l.* from the London and Westminster As-insurance Office; and to secure the repayment of the money with interest, he gives his bond, which is a bond in the usual way, payable to the obligees as trustees of the insurance company, and is assignable in equity, subject to all the equities that would be applicable to an ordinary mortgagee; but, besides borrowing that sum of money, there is another transaction:—the office says to him, “we will not lend the money except you do something more; you must insure your life for 1,000*l.*, and you must pay a yearly premium for the insurance, and you must be compellable to pay the premiums so long as the debt remains due, after which you may leave off such payments.” It is clear that in this transaction the office gains a benefit by having the premiums paid, which is an additional profit to the interest upon the money borrowed, and they also have the money secured by the policy as an additional security for the amount lent; but, on the other hand, there is the benefit to the party insuring, that by paying the premiums there will be payable upon the death of such party the amount insured, that is, 1,000*l.* Then the bond is made to secure the 500*l.* and interest, which is one portion of the transaction, and it is also made to secure the payment of the premiums, which became a charge on the funds of the insurance company, as well as on the individual directors of the company. If the transaction had consisted only in the borrowing a certain sum of money and repayment with interest, it is clear that the benefit of that transaction would be assignable in equity to any individual, and in equity the plaintiff would have the benefit of it.

But let us look to the other portion of the transaction. Leave out of consideration that portion which concerns the borrowing of the money and take an individual who has entered into a policy and bound himself to keep up the premiums. That transaction is entered into upon the faith that the office will continue to be the effective and substantial office it was at the time the policy was effected, and that it will continue to carry on the business of life insuring, and have the means of providing payment when the policy becomes due out of the funds of the company. But when that office, either from insolvency, or not having business enough to make it profitable, or from any other cause, is unable to continue and must give up the carrying on of the concern, and more than that, is actually dissolved by an order of the Court, and the affairs ordered to be wound up, can any one representing that office say, “Although we have ceased to be a working office and are not carrying on business, so that we may not have funds to make the payment, still we will compel you to go on paying the premiums”? Could the official manager appointed in such a case by the Master under a winding-up order maintain an action against those persons who had insured their lives, to make them pay the amount of their premiums? I apprehend not. I think in a court of law it would be an answer to such an action to say, the contract is at an end either by the act of the legislature, or the contracting party who is unable to perform his portion of the contract. I am sure it would be an answer in a court of equity.

In this case the transaction consists of two portions, of the portion which secures the money borrowed, and that relating to the premiums; and if this were a question arising upon the winding up of Edwards's estate and not his surety, though there might be good security for the sum borrowed, there is no longer any liability to the directors of the London and Westminster Assurance Office for the premiums. Now, it is clear that with regard to the transactions which took place between the two offices, the party has a right to say he repudiated the Britannia Company. It is true the money secured by the bond is made payable to the directors, their executors, administrators or assigns, and no doubt a common bond is assignable to any party. It is contended, however, that that alone is sufficient to justify the Master in allowing not only the directors of the first, but also those of the second office to stand as creditors for the money in the bond, and also for the premiums; but it does not follow that the whole of this contract, which is a mutual contract, might be the subject of assignment. If it could be so, and without the consent of the contracting parties, it must equally be the subject of assignment to any individual who might just have come out of the Bankrupt Court, with perhaps a certificate of the third class. It could never be said that the contract, because it was made with the directors or their assigns, might be assigned so as to allow the company standing in the position of assignees of the original company, to compel performance of such a contract. So even if it were a question affecting the estate of Edwards himself, I think the exceptions should be allowed; but the case is much stronger with regard to the surety, because there is a material variation of the contract as to the surety, which puts an end to his liability. When you look at the contract, it was one in which, if the London and Westminster Society continued acting in their business, and were a solvent and substantial company, what would be the position of the surety? If he were called upon to pay any portion of this sum secured by the bond, he might say, "If I pay any monies which Edwards ought to have paid, I shall have a right to have the benefit of such sums secured by the policy, and to claim as against the representatives of Edwards the repayment of that money before they receive any portion of it;" but that is all put an end to, and the surety would have to pay the premiums as well as the debt, without being able to resort to the amount secured on the policy. I admit it does not put an end to Gylby's liability quoad the amount of the bond, but it does so as to the premiums. The exceptions must, therefore, be allowed.

Company—Winding-up Acts—Contribution.

A joint-stock company was completely registered, and a person applied for and accepted shares and paid a deposit on the shares allotted to him. The company's deed required that on its execution the names of the parties executing should be entered on the list of shareholders, and be returned to the Stamp Office, &c., and thenceforth they should have the privileges and be subject to the liabilities of shareholders. In this instance the deed was not executed, but the directors entered and returned, &c. the name:—Held, nevertheless, that the name of this person had been properly placed by the Master, under a winding-up order, on the list of contributors to the debts and liabilities of the company.

This was an appeal from a decision of Vice Chancellor Parker, who had refused to remove the name of Mr. Robert Easton Yelland from the list of contributors of the above-named company, he having been placed thereon by Mr. Tinney as a contributory of the second class in respect of two shares. The facts appearing upon the Master's decision were as follows:—

The Port of London Shipowners' Loan and Assurance Company was provisionally registered on the 24th of February 1847. The capital to consist of 50,000*l.*, in 500 shares of 100*l.* each, and the deed of settlement of the company was dated the 8th of April 1847, the 83rd section of which was as follows:—"That immediately upon the execution of the deed of settlement of the company, or such deed of accession thereto in the manner aforesaid, the person executing the same being a person duly entitled by original subscription, or by transfer, election, nomination, or otherwise, in the manner hereinbefore mentioned, shall be forthwith entered on the register of shareholders, and duly returned to the Joint-Stock Registry Office, under the provisions of the Registration Act, and shall thenceforth, but not before, assume the liabilities and privileges of a shareholder, and if such person be entitled in any of the representative capacities as aforesaid, or as the nominee of any party so entitled, the dividends accruing on the share or shares to which such party, or the nominee of such party, shall have been so entitled after the event on which such title shall have accrued, and before the execution of the deed of settlement, or the deed of accession thereto, shall, unless forfeited, under the 30th clause of these presents, be accumulated for and paid to the person so executing at the time of such execution, whose receipt then given, and no other, shall be a valid and sufficient discharge for the same; but in all cases of transfer the former holder of the share in respect of which such execution is made shall, until such execution and registration as aforesaid, be entitled to the dividends up to or before that time paid on any such share, and to all other the privileges, and be subjected to all the liabilities of a shareholder in respect of the same share." The company was completely registered on the 22nd of April 1847. Mr. Yelland was proved, in a conversation with the managing director, to have consented to take two shares in the company, and the following letter was sent to him ;—

"No. 1,417.

"London, 20, St. Helen's Place, Bishopsgate.
July 20, 1848.

"Sir,—In compliance with your application for shares in the Port of London Shipowners' Loan and Assurance Company, I beg to inform you that two shares have been allotted to you.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"Augustus Collingridge,

"Managing Director.

"N.B.—A certificate will be given in exchange for this letter on executing the deed."

On the 22nd of July 1848, the following letter was forwarded to Mr. Yelland :—

"R. E. Yelland, Esq., Bideford.

"July 22, 1848.

"Dear Sir,—The 31st of this month being the day appointed by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. for the half-yearly return to be made to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, I beg to inform you that you will be furnished immediately after that date with a printed list of upwards of 200 proprietors, who, during the past half-year, have executed the registered deed of settlement of this company. It may be as well to add further, that the aim of the directors having avowedly been directed throughout to the distribution of the shares in the hands of as many parties as possible, the actual number of shareholders at this moment exceeds 900, whose attested signatures will be obtained as early as the different localities in which parties reside will admit of.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

"Aug. Collingridge,

"Registered Officer."

On the 24th of July 1848 Mr. Yelland paid 10*l.*, the deposit on the two shares allotted, and received the following letter from the secretary of the company, acknowledging its receipt,—

"R. E. Yelland, Esq., Bideford.

"July 25, 1848.

"Sir,—We are in receipt of your favour of the 24th instant, with bank order for 10*l.*, in payment of instalment on your allotment of two shares in this company, which is all in order, and duly placed to your credit. Noting the other contents,—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"James Greycy, Assistant Secretary."

On the 3rd of August 1848, the following letter was also sent to Mr. Yelland.—

"R. E. Yelland, Esq.

"August 3, 1848.

"Dear Sir,—Herewith you have a list of shareholders, which would have been printed in the Shipping Gazette, but the price demanded was beyond all reason. The certificate will be ready for delivery either this or the ensuing week, and yours will be duly forwarded to you.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

"Augustus Collingridge,

"Registered Officer."

It was not proved that the certificate was ever, in fact, sent to Mr. Yelland as promised in the letter. Vice Chancellor Parker refused the motion, considering that Mr. Yelland had impliedly authorized the directors to register his name without his having executed the deed.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. Terrell, for the appellant.—Mr. Yelland has never executed the deed of settlement, and that deed, in the 83rd section, makes it a condition precedent to the shareholder being entitled to the benefits or liable to the losses of the company, that he shall execute it. It can, therefore, never be held that this gentleman is a contributory, although he does not deny that he has accepted the shares, and paid the deposit on them. Although there are those two facts, still they did not authorize the directors to place Mr. Yelland's name on the register of shareholders, and this is the more clear from the tenour of the 26th section of the Joint-Stock Companies Registration Act, which directs that until a man, who is a subscriber, has executed a deed of settlement of a company he shall not be entitled to receive any dividends or profits, or be entitled to the remedies and powers given to shareholders. If, then, he be not entitled to benefits, he cannot with propriety be held liable for any costs or losses under these acts, for clearly he could not be sued on any judgment against the company, for in the 66th section of the act last referred to, it is declared that "shareholders" alone are to be so liable. The acts that Mr. Yelland has done do not amount, as the Master has held they do, to any contract in equity to take the shares, or to execute the deed, for, until he did execute the deed, he had a full right to retire from what he had done, and to demand back his deposit—Ex parte Hall (1).

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Roxburgh, who appeared for the official manager, were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I entertain no doubt upon the question, whether Mr. Yelland's name has properly been placed upon the list of contributories. The act of parliament says, that "the word 'contributory' shall include every member of a company, and also every other person liable to contribute to the payment of any of the debts, liabilities, or losses thereof, whether as heir, devisee, executor, or administrator of a deceased member, or as a former member of the same, or as heir, devisee, executor, or administrator of a former member of the same, deceased, or otherwise howsoever." Although the Court is always reluctant in these cases of contributories to hold a man liable here to a debt to which he is not liable at law, yet this is always with the qualification that such person has not, by having contracted to become a member of the company, incurred all the liabilities of an actual member. Now, in the case before the Court, Mr. Yelland has applied for shares, and having received an allotment accordingly, has paid a deposit on such allotment, and had afterwards assented to a communication acknowledging the receipt of such deposit by the company. Under these circumstances, Mr. Yelland must be held to have contracted, and to be clearly bound to become a member of the company. He is, therefore, liable in that character to contribute to the debts and liabilities of the company, and, consequently, his name has been properly placed on the list. The motion must be refused, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE intimated his concurrence in the judgment, and the motion was accordingly refused, with costs.

Joint-Stock Banking Company under 7 Geo. 4. c. 46.—Deceased Partner.

In April 1847, a joint-stock banking company, carrying on business under the provisions of the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. of which A. was a member, became indebted to B. in the sum of 5,000l. A. continued to be a partner until his death, and died in December 1847. In April 1848, B. recovered judgment against the public officer of the company. In December 1848, the usual decree for accounts was made in a suit for the administration of the estate of A. B. presented a petition for liberty to go in before the Master and prove, as a creditor against A.'s estate, for 5,000l. and interest. The petition did not state that the bank had ceased to carry on business, or that any proceedings had been taken to enforce the judgment against the existing partners. The petition was dismissed.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Toller, for the different parties.

The following cases were cited—

Barker v. Buttress, 7 Beav. 134 ; s. c. 13 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 58.
Steward v. Greaves, 10 Mee. & W. 711 ; s. c. 12 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Exch. 109.
Wilkinson v. Henderson, 1 Myl. & K. 582 ; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 190.

PARKER, V.C.—This is an application on the petition of George Wilson, praying that he may be at liberty to go in before the Master, to whom this cause stands referred under a decree in the cause, and to prove as a creditor of the testator, Joseph Elder, for the sum of 5,958*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, the balance now remaining due for principal money on his debt, together with interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, from the 3rd of April 1849. It appears that the testator in his lifetime, and up to the time of his death, was a member of the Newcastle, Shields and Sunderland Union Joint-Stock Banking Company, which was a banking copartnership carrying on business under the provisions of the 7 Geo. 4. c. 46. On the 3rd of April 1847, upon a deposit of money by the petitioner with the bank, which constituted a debt due from the bank to him, the bank gave an accountable receipt carrying interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum to the petitioner. The testator at this time was a partner in the bank, and he continued so up to the time of his death. He died on the 8th of December 1847, and on the 19th of April 1848 the petitioner recovered judgment in an action at law against the public officer of the company for the sum mentioned in the prayer of this petition. On the 22nd of December 1848, a decree was pronounced in the present cause, which is an ordinary administration suit, directing an account to be taken of the testator's personal estate and debts in the usual way.

(1) 1 Hall & Tw. 580 ; s. c. 1 Mac. & G. 307 ; 19 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 69.

Independently of the before-mentioned statute, the case would admit of no doubt. On the death of the testator his liability on the contract would have ceased, but his assets would have continued liable in equity. In this case, however, the liabilities are regulated by the statute. The Courts of law and equity have found a difficulty in acting on that statute, and its enactments are found on judicial authority to be inconsistent with each other, and not entirely intelligible. The first section appears to create a several liability on the part of the several members to pay all bills and notes issued by the company, and all sums borrowed and owed by the company, and it has frequently been noticed that this clause extends the ordinary liability, and includes various classes of members of the company. There is nothing to take away the liability which in equity would attach to the assets of a deceased partner, who is a party to the contract, as the testator is in this case. The 11th section relates to decrees of Courts of equity recovered against the public officer. I notice that, because it is difficult to reconcile the provisions as to decrees in equity with those as to judgments at common law. A decree of this Court may be a simple order to pay money, as simple as a judgment of a Court of law. By the 11th section a decree for payment of money is to be enforced against every or any member of such copartnership in the same manner as if they were parties before the Court.

The very special provisions of the 13th section are not to be found in this 11th section, as applicable to a decree which is to result in the payment of money. The 13th section provides the means of enforcing judgments at law. The 11th section appears to give to a judgment the same effect as a decree in the court of equity against the public officer of the company. The 13th section contains most important provisions applicable to the mode of enforcing execution upon a judgment against the public officer at common law. By that section, execution is first to be issued against any member or members for the time being of the co-partnership, and the Court of Exchequer, in the case of Dodgson v. Scott (1), decided that "the time being" means the time of the execution. Execution must first be issued against the persons who are members of the partnership at the time of the execution, and, in case that should be ineffectual for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction, then execution may be issued against certain persons who have ceased to be members before that time. This section provides only the mode of issuing execution against those persons who are liable at law. If the assets are liable in equity only, this clause contains no means by which that liability may be enforced. It appears to me that it does not follow that there is to be no liability in equity. The state of the law and the previous sections of the act appear to shew that there is to be a liability in equity; and, if that be so, that liability must be enforced according to the ordinary principles of this Court, because there is nothing about it in the clause pointing out how a judgment at common law is to be enforced against the parties legally liable. In asserting an equitable liability against the assets of a deceased partner, however, I think that regard must be had to those provisions of the act which would have been applicable if it had been a legal liability, according to the view taken by Lord Langdale in the case of Barker v. Butress.

One of the most material provisions of the 13th section of the act is, that a creditor of the partnership is in the first instance to issue execution against the members for the time being, and only in case that execution proves insufficient is execution to be issued against other parties. The reason of that is very obvious. The members for the time being are those who have controul over the assets of the partnership, and those who have ceased to be partners have no such controul. The object is to provide a mode of first rendering liable the funds of the partnership, which are primarily liable to pay the debt, by issuing against those who have the controul over these funds in the first instance, and execution is not to go against those who have no controul over the funds until the others have been found not to be available. This is an application to enforce the equitable liabilities of a deceased partner, in the same way as if he had ceased to be a member by a transfer of his interest; and, therefore, it appears to me that the petitioner must first shew that the liability cannot be satisfied by proceedings against those who were members of the partnership at the time. In the present case, no such statement is made; there is no statement that the bank has ceased to carry on business, or that there has been any attempt to enforce judgment against those who are primarily liable, and, therefore, he has not made out his case to reach those who are liable in the second degree. There must be no order, but the statute is so difficult that I think it is not a case for costs.

Petition dismissed, without costs.

ALCOCK v. ALCOCK.

Baron and Feme—Evidence—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99.

A married woman instituted a suit against her husband in respect of property come to his hands, which she claimed as belonging to her, and tendered her evidence in the suit:—Held, that her evidence was not admissible.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Mr. Bacon, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Collins, for Mr. Alcock.

Mr. Russell, Mr. Cole, and Mr. Smythe, for Mrs. Alcock.

Barbat v. Allen, 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Exch. 155.

Stapleton v. Croft, 21 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Q.B. 247.

PARKER, V.C.—In this case of Alcock v. Alcock, in the course of the plaintiff's evidence, the plaintiff tendered her own depositions as evidence in support of her own case. Mr. Bacon objected to the reception of those depositions. The point was argued, and I thought it right to consider whether, in the present state of the law, the plaintiff's evidence was or was not to be received. The plaintiff is a married woman, suing by her next friend. The principal defendant is her husband. She is suing for an account of property of her own, come to the hands of the husband, in respect of which he is accountable under the settlement stated in the bill. She tenders herself as a witness. It is necessary to consider the objections which have been taken to her evidence.

Before the recent act there would have been two objections to her evidence; one, that she was a party to the issue which is being tried, the other that she was giving evidence against her husband; and either of these would have been a good objection to the evidence being received. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85. provided that a witness should no longer be excluded by reason of incacapacity arising from interest; but it contained a provision that the act should not render competent any party to any suit, action, or proceeding, individually named in the record, nor the husband or wife of any such party. Hence, after Lord Denman's Act, the two objections remained as before.

Then came the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99. The 1st section of that act repeals so much of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85. as provided that that statute should not render competent any party to any suit, action, or proceeding, individually named in the record, but there is nothing in it to alter the incapacity of a husband or wife. The second clause provided, in substance, that, upon the trial of any issue, the parties should, except as thereafter excepted, be competent and compellable to give evidence on behalf of either or any of the parties to such suit or proceeding. A question has arisen whether, upon this latter act making the parties competent witnesses, a husband or wife is a competent witness; and it has been decided by very high authority at common law that their incapacity remains, notwithstanding that act (1). It does not appear to me that any case has been decided like this, where the witness herself is a party to the suit, and is examined in that character. The case referred to was one where the witness was not a party, but was examined on behalf of a party. Mrs. Alcock, then, so far as she is a party, is a competent witness; but, so far as she is to be examined against her husband, it appears to me that the incapacity remains. The late act only removes the objection to this evidence, which arises from the fact of the witness being a party, and leaves every other cause of objection unaltered. Many similar cases may be imagined; as, for instance, the case of a solicitor. A client has a right to say that the solicitor shall not be examined as a witness against him to give in evidence confidential communications between them. The solicitor might be suing his client, and might tender himself as a witness against him. I think that this act does not say that the objection to the solicitor's evidence, on the ground that he was the solicitor of the party, is one that can no longer be taken by the defendant, his client. Again, the act says that the parties shall be compellable to give evidence. Suppose a party were required to be a witness to be examined on matters which would expose him to penalties; I think that the act leaves that objection to his being compelled to give evidence untouched. I think that the same principle applies to the case of a wife.

The 4th section provides that nothing in the act contained "shall apply to any action, suit, proceeding, or bill in any court of common law or in any ecclesiastical court, or in either house of parliament, instituted in consequence of adultery, or to any action for breach of promise of marriage." It may be said that that section contemplates a particular class of matrimonial suits, and that the husband and wife, being excluded in such cases, an argument may be drawn from that circumstance that there was no more extensive exclusion intended by the legislature than is provided by that clause. I think that that view cannot be sustained. The section of the act seems to me to refer to the subject-matter of disputes of a certain kind, disputes in which it is thought, for other reasons, not fit that the parties themselves should be examined. That section is open to the same observation that was made on the 3rd section, which says that husband and wife shall not be competent or compellable to give evidence against one another in criminal proceedings; and it has been considered in one case that, in consequence of that section, the former section was to receive a more extended construction, and that it was only in criminal proceedings that they were not to give evidence against each other. The Court of Queen's Bench, however, have taken a different view (2), and have considered that the 3rd section was introduced from excessive caution, and that it does not controul the meaning of the former section. It appears to me, therefore, that there is nothing in these statutes to take away the incapacity of Mrs. Alcock arising from the fact of her being a married woman.

By a deed of transfer, after reciting that B. had required payment of the debt from C, D. and E, which they were unable to pay, and that they had applied to F. to lend them the amount, which he had consented to do, on having the repayment secured as hereinafter expressed, B, at the request of C, D. and E, conveyed the premises to F, subject to a proviso for redemption on payment by C, his heirs, executors and administrators, of 2,000*l.*, and by D. and E, their heirs, executors and administrators, of 1,000*l.*; and C. covenanted to pay 2,000*l.*, and D. and E. covenanted to pay 1,000*l.: — Held, that as between the real and personal representatives of D, he had not taken on himself the payment of his share of the mortgage debt.

By indentures, dated the 4th and 5th of April 1800, Thomas Jefferies mortgaged certain real estate to Mrs. Clarke for 3,000*l.* This mortgage was afterwards assigned to Ward and Merriman.

Under the will of Thomas Jefferies and subsequent conveyances, George Jefferies became entitled to two third parts of the equity of redemption of this estate, and Sarah Jefferies and Jemima Jefferies to the other one third, in equal moieties.

Indentures of lease and release, dated the 24th and 25th of January 1826, were made between Ward and Merriman of the first part; George Jefferies, Sarah Jefferies and Jemima Jefferies of the second part, and T. Neale and P. Neale of the third part. The indenture of release contained the following recital:—"Whereas, in the month of January 1826, the said J. Ward and T. Merriman called in and required payment of the said mortgage debt from the said G. Jefferies, S. Jefferies, and J. Jefferies, according to their respective proportions thereof, and the said G. Jefferies, S. Jefferies, and J. Jefferies, being unable to comply with such request, applied to the said T. Neale and P. Neale to lend and advance to them the said sum of 3,000*l.* to enable them to do so, which they have consented to do in manner hereinafter mentioned, upon having the repayment thereof, with interest, secured to them in such manner as is also hereinafter expressed." It was then witnessed that Ward and Merriman, at the request of G. Jefferies, S. Jefferies and J. Jefferies, assigned the mortgage debt and conveyed the mortgaged premises to T. Neale and P. Neale, subject to the proviso that, if the said G. Jefferies, his heirs, executors or administrators, should pay to T. Neale and P. Neale the sum of 2,000*l.*, with interest, &c., and if S. Jefferies and J. Jefferies, their heirs, executors and administrators, or either of them, should pay the sum of 1,000*l.* in equal moieties, with interest, &c. on the 25th of July 1826, then that T. Neale and P. Neale would reconvey two-thirds of the premises to G. Jefferies, and the other one-third to S. Jefferies and J. Jefferies, in equal moieties. G. Jefferies then covenanted to pay 2,000*l.* and interest, and S. Jefferies and J. Jefferies covenanted to pay 1,000*l.* and interest.

A bond was executed to the same effect as the covenant by G. Jefferies, S. Jefferies and J. Jefferies.

Jemima Jefferies died intestate, leaving Thomas Hedges Jefferies, her heir-at-law. The other shares in the estate also became vested in him.

The question argued in this cause was whether, as between Thomas Hedges Jefferies, the owner of the estate, and the administrator of Jemima Jefferies, the personal estate of Jemima Jefferies was liable to the sum of 500*l.*, her proportion of the mortgage debt, or, in other words, whether Jemima Jefferies had, as between her real and personal representatives, taken on herself the payment of her share of the debt.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Speed, for the plaintiffs, contended that Jemima Jefferies had taken on herself the payment of the mortgage debt as between her real and personal representatives, and cited—

PARKER, V.C.—There is no doubt as to the rule applicable to such cases as the present. We have here a person who is owner of both funds; and the question is, upon her acts or contracts, which fund is the one primarily liable. The rule of law is, that the intention of a person in that position is to govern the liability. The question of the application of that rule depends on the particular circumstances of each case. The cases cited as authorities are no more material in this case than so far as they illustrate the rule. It is the settled law, that a mere transfer of a mortgage by one mortgagee to another, although accompanied by a covenant of the owner of the estate, making his personal estate for the mortgage debt liable to the transferee, will not of itself make his personal estate the primary fund for payment of the mortgage debt. The law is laid down with great precision by Lord Alvanley in Woods v. Huntingford(1). He there says—"If a person succeeding to an estate, subject to a mortgage, has done no act to adopt the debt and make it his personal debt, his personal estate is not liable; but if by his acts he has put himself so far in the place of his ancestor as to make the debt his own, that is understood to be the same as if he was the original mortgagor: but the Court has been extremely anxious not to make that inference, unless where it is perfectly clear and obvious; therefore though, the mortgagee pressing for his money, the heir is obliged to have a transfer of the mortgage, and, as every one knows, no assignee will take it without some personal covenant, upon that transaction he executes a bond to the new mortgagee, if he does it only for that purpose, not meaning to make himself more liable, it has been determined not to make it the personal debt of the party, whose original debt it was not."

What are the circumstances of this case? We find that, in 1826, three persons were owners of the equity of redemption in different shares as tenants in common. The recital in the deed of transfer is, "that the mortgagees had called in and required payment of the mortgage debt from George Jefferies, Sarah Jefferies, and Jemima Jefferies, according to their respective proportions thereof, and that the said G. Jefferies, S. Jefferies, and J. Jefferies, being unable to comply with such request, had applied to the said T. Neale and P. Neale to lend and advance to them the said sum of 3,000*l.* to enable them to do so, which they had consented to do in manner thereafter mentioned, upon having the repayment thereof, with interest, secured to them in such manner as was also thereafter expressed." The only object in that is to effect a transfer of the mortgagee pressing for payment. There is no object whatever apparent on the deed, except merely to transfer the mortgage deed from one person, who is pressing for payment of it, to another who is contented to advance it. So far the case is precisely within the rule stated by Lord Alvanley, and also laid down by Lord Thurlow in Shafto v. Shafto. What does the deed do more than that? There is a proviso for redemption which is in a special form, stipulating what clearly the law would have done if it had not been there stipulated. The shares are according to the interests of the parties in the estate. So far from intending to make themselves personally liable by that, it shews that the liability to pay the debt is to pursue the interest which each had in the estate. There is a covenant which it is admitted on all hands does not change the character of the debt. It appears to me, therefore, that there is nothing in this case except a simple transfer of the mortgage debt from one person to another. In Barham v. the Earl of Thanet, Sir John Leach did not dispute the rule, but came to the conclusion, on the construction of the deed in that case, that there was an intention to change the nature of the debt. I find no such intention apparent in the deed before me. Something has been said about the form of the proviso for redemption; but I think that we should be losing sight of the substance in a mere question of form if anything were made to turn upon that. If the mortgage was transferred, it seems to me that there must be a new proviso for redemption, as the hand to receive and the hand to pay the money would have both been altered, and accordingly that is expressed in the deed.

Trustee Act, 1850—Vesting Order—New Trustees.

In cases where new trustees are appointed under the Trustee Act, 1850, the real estates subject to the trust ought to be conveyed to them by deed, and the vesting order ought only to be resorted to when it is inconvenient to obtain a conveyance.

This was a petition for an order vesting real estate in new trustees under the Trustee Act, 1850.

Mr. Lewis, for the petition.

Mr. Toller, Mr. Spring Rice, Mr. Snape and Mr. Cumming, for other parties.

PARKER, V.C.—I wish it to be understood in this and every other case that, as a general rule, a conveyance ought to be made, and that the vesting order should only be resorted to in the case of its being inconvenient to obtain a conveyance, and I do not regard expense as coming under the term inconvenience. There is this reason: the statements in and the prayer of a petition seeking for a vesting order ought to be framed as carefully as the recitals and the operative part of a deed of conveyance; but petitions are not unfrequently drawn by persons who have not competent skill or time to frame them as they ought to be prepared for this purpose. I think then that, for the security of titles there ought to be conveyances. I have had before me several cases in which I have been applied to to discharge vesting orders,—matters having been discovered subsequently to their being made which have rendered them ineffectual.

LORDS JUSTICES. }
1852. } OWEN v. BRYANT.
August 3, 5.

Will—Construction—An illegitimate Child held entitled to a Share as one of a designated number of "Children."

A testator recited in his will that he had nine children, whom he named and described, and he bequeathed the income of his estate to his wife for life; and, after her death, the capital to be divided among his children by his wife then living, and the issue of them who should be then dead. Various other trusts were declared by the will, and among them that the trustees should pay the interest during the life of such of his "said children" as should be a daughter in a particular manner. One of the daughters was illegitimate:—Held, (Lord Cranworth laying great stress on the latter clause, but the Lord Chief Justice considering the will sufficient without it,) that the intention of the testator was on the will manifest that the illegitimate daughter should take a share with the legitimate children.

There is no inflexible general rule that illegitimate children cannot participate in a gift to children.

Robert Wrightson, by his will, dated the 24th of September 1836, reciting that his two daughters, by his first wife, were amply provided for by him on their respective marriages: and reciting that he, the testator, had nine children then living, by his present wife, namely, Eliza, the wife of R. B. O.; Charlotte, the wife of W. R.; Harriett, the wife of J. E. J.; Mary Ann Wrightson; Maria, the wife of S. P.; Robert Wrightson, his eldest son; George B. Wrightson, his second son; Caroline Wrightson; and Charles Frederick Wrightson, his youngest son: and reciting that, on the respective marriages of his four married daughters, by his present wife, he had advanced to them sums of money, amounting together to 560*l.* each; and that it was his intention to make similar provisions for his two unmarried daughters, bequeathed the sum of 1,120*l.* to trustees, upon trust, to divide the same into two equal shares, one of such shares to be allotted to each of his said two unmarried daughters, and to be held upon the like trusts for the benefit of each daughter, as were declared thereafter concerning the share which should be allotted to them in the proceeds of the sale of his real estate, and in leasehold lands thereafter devised and bequeathed, and the stocks, funds, and securities thereof, in case she were living, on the decease or second marriage of the testator's said wife. The testator, then, after giving legacies to his sons, bequeathed the residue of all his personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever (except leasehold lands and tenements) to his wife absolutely; and then devised and bequeathed all his real estate, and all his leasehold messuages or tenements, lands, and hereditaments, to the trustees before named, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, respectively, upon trust, on the decease of his said wife, or in her lifetime, with her consent in writing, absolutely to sell the whole, or any such real and leasehold estates, and to invest the proceeds of such sale or sales in the parliamentary stocks or public funds of Great Britain, or at interest in government or real securities in England or Wales; and upon further trust to permit and suffer his said wife Charlotte Wrightson to receive the rents and profits, interest and dividends, and annual produce of his said real estate and leasehold lands, and trust monies and securities, during such time as she should continue his widow; but, if she should marry again, then upon trust, after such marriage, and during the remainder of her life, with and out of such rents, issues, and profits, to pay her an annuity of 50*l.* to her separate use, free from anticipation. The testator then declared as follows: "And from and after the decease or marriage of my said wife, but subject and without prejudice to the trusts and purpose aforesaid, the said trustees or trustee for the time being, do and shall divide the principal of the said trust-monies, stocks, funds, and securities between all and every my children by my said present wife, who shall be living at the time of her decease or second marriage, and the issue of such as shall have departed this life, leaving issue then living, such issue taking per stirpes, and not per capita, as tenants in common, and their respective executors, administrators and assigns, subject, nevertheless, as to the shares of daughters, to the directions hereinafter contained. [And I do hereby direct that my said trustees or trustee shall, during the life of each of my said children by my present wife who shall happen to be a daughter, pay the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds of her share of the said stocks, funds, and securities, trust-money, and premises, unto such person or persons, for such purposes, and in such manner only as such daughter, whether covert or sole, shall, from time to time, by any writing signed by her, appoint, but not so as to deprive herself, while under coverture, of the benefit thereof by anticipation; and in default of such appointment, and subject thereto, into the hands of such daughter, for her sole and separate use, exclusively of any husband with whom she may marry, and so that her receipts shall be sufficient discharges for the same,] and from and after the decease of each and every of such daughters, then upon the trusts hereinafter mentioned, for the benefit of the children of such daughter; and in default of issue of such daughters, then in trust for such person or persons, and for such purposes as such daughters shall by will appoint; and in default of appointment upon the following trusts, viz., upon trust for the brothers and sisters of the whole blood of such daughter then living, equally, and the issue of any brother or sister of the whole blood who may have died, leaving issue then living (such issue taking per stirpes, and not per capita) as tenants in common, and their respective executors, administrators and assigns; and in default of any brother or sister of the whole blood, or the issue of any such brother or sister, then upon trust for such person or persons as, at the time of the decease of such daughter, shall be her next-of-kin, under and according to the statute made for the distribution of intestates' effects."

The testator had by his wife only the nine children enumerated by him, the daughter Eliza, the wife of R. B. O., being, however, illegitimate, having been borne by the testator's wife to him before their marriage. The time for the division of the produce of the sale having arrived, the facts were embodied in a special case; and it was set down before the Vice Chancellor Turner, but was transferred by leave to their Lordships' paper, and now came on to be heard. It appeared that, by some inadvertence, the passage in the will within brackets was omitted in the case, and was only discovered on the production of the probate in court.

Mr. W. R. A. Boyle appeared for the illegitimate daughter.—Admitting the general rule that by "children" only "legitimate children" can be considered as intended, there being persons who can satisfy the term "children," still, where a testator has furnished on the face of his will a means of interpreting his meaning, the Court will so interpret his expressions as to admit an illegitimate child to participate in the benefits of the bequest made to children generally. In the first place, here the testator enumerates his nine children by name, this lady being among them. Again, he speaks of his children by his present wife: that lady was his child by his present wife. Again he refers to his children as his "said" children, and again he refers to his daughters as his "said daughters." He cited the following cases:—

Mr. Waley, for the trustees, submitted the question to the Court to shew that the authorities were not all one way, and drew attention to the cases of—

from which two propositions could be deduced: first, that illegitimate children could only take as personæ designatæ, and not as a class; and, secondly, that illegitimate children could not take as a class along with legitimate children.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This case has been well argued by the learned counsel; but with all respect to them, I think that a very material passage in the will, to which my attention has been called by my learned Brother, has not been touched upon in the argument, nor even set forth in the special case. But for that, I was on the point of differing from my learned Brother as to the construction to be put upon this will. The grounds of the conclusion I had come to I shall state. I reject the notion of there being any rule to the effect that illegitimate children cannot, under any circumstances, participate with legitimate children in the benefit of a gift or bequest to children generally. I think that there is no invariable rule of that sort, but that in each case the question is one which depends upon the circumstances appearing upon the will; and that if, from the whole context of the will, it appears that illegitimate children are to be included with legitimate children in the benefit intended, illegitimate children may take. Prima facie, the word "children" means "legitimate children," and it is to be read as if the word "legitimate" were annexed. Therefore, where a will purports to give a benefit amongst children, it is the same thing as if it had said "amongst legitimate children," unless something is disclosed upon the face of the will which shews that that is not meant.

Now, it was said that in this will that something is disclosed, inasmuch as the testator begins by saying, "Whereas I have nine children, viz., Eliza, wife of R. B. Owen; Charlotte, wife of," &c.; and among the nine children thus enumerated, one is illegitimate, and consequently, that the testator, when he speaks of his children, means to designate his daughter Eliza Owen also, who is not legitimate. The question, however, is, whether this recital must of necessity be coupled with the gift afterwards of the real and leasehold estates ; for the rule is, legitimate children must be taken to be intended by the word "children," unless the context leads necessarily to the inference that something else was meant. Now, the recital here was for a purpose, viz., as an introduction to, and an explanation of, the gift made immediately afterwards in favour of the testator's two unmarried daughters. After enumerating his children, and distinguishing those daughters that were married, the testator goes on to recite his intention to make a provision for each of his two unmarried daughters equal to that which he had previously made upon each married daughter upon her marriage. This provision he then makes, and he then proceeds to give and devise his real estate and leasehold estate in the manner stated in the special case. Now, I must own, that had the will stopped there, I should have thought that legitimate children, and legitimate children only, were intended ; for I cannot see that there would, in that case, have been an absolute necessity to construe the word "children" otherwise than according to its natural import.

In some of the cases cited, it was thought impossible to construe the word according to its natural import, as in the case of Gill v. Shelley, where the gift was to the children of a deceased person, who had died leaving only two children, of whom one was legitimate and the other illegitimate. There it was held, that the illegitimate child was intended to be included, otherwise it was impossible to give a meaning to the word "children," which was in the plural. So, also, where the gift is to the "children" of a deceased person, who at his death left none but illegitimate children, and there the illegitimate children are supposed to be intended, for otherwise there would be nothing for the will to operate upon. The principle upon which Sir John Leach acted in Bagley v. Mollard is, I think, the right one. There the testator bequeathed a leasehold house in trust for Elizabeth Mollard, whom he described as the then only surviving child of his son William Mollard, and concluded his will by a residuary bequest to all and every the children of his sons James Mollard and William Mollard, and of his daughter Mary Bagley. Elizabeth Mollard, the grand-child, being illegitimate, the question was, whether she was entitled to share in the residuary gift. Sir John Leach held she was not, on the principle that whenever it was possible for the general description of children to include legitimate children, it could not also be extended to illegitimate children.

Upon that principle, I should have come to the same conclusion here, but for a passage in the will to which my attention has been called, as I have said, by my learned Brother, namely, the passage in which the testator says, "And I do hereby direct that my said trustees or trustee shall, during the life of each of my said children by my present wife, who shall happen to be a daughter," dispose of the interest of her share, &c., in the way mentioned in the will. Coupling that passage with the passage which precedes it, and in which the testator enumerates by name his children by his present wife, I am of opinion that by the words "children by my present wife" he must be taken to have meant all those whom he had previously enumerated as his children.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The passage upon which so much stress has been laid by my learned Brother is not stated in the abstract of the will as set forth in the special case, but was discovered only on my referring to the probate of the will. It will be necessary, therefore, that the probate should be entered. It is important that it should be so, because Lord Cranworth has laid so much stress upon the passage in question. He is, I need not say, probably right ; but, for myself, I confess, I should have thought the intention of the testator sufficiently apparent without the aid of those words. I think that, consistently with the whole of the authorities cited, except, perhaps, the case of Bagley v. Mollard, this case may be decided according to the plain intention of the testator. The result is, that the illegitimate daughter and her children are entitled to a share in the proceeds of the real estate.

 June 10. } BODENHAM v. HOSKINS.

Receiver—Bankers' Liability—Separate Accounts.

The plaintiff, being owner of an estate, employed an agent and receiver, who paid into the defendants' bank the rents of the estate, to an account headed with the name of the estate, to distinguish it from his private account. The receiver's private account being overdrawn, he transferred the balance of the estate account to make up the deficiency due upon his private account. Upon a bill filed by the plaintiff, against the bankers, to refund this balance so transferred, it was held—that, according to the principles of a court of equity, a person who deals with another knowing him to have in his hands, or under his controul, monies belonging to a third person, must not enter into a transaction with him, the effect of which is that a fraud is committed on the third person; and it appearing upon the evidence that the bankers were aware that the money was the produce of the rents of the plaintiff's estate, a decree was made against the bankers, for repayment of the amount.

The bill stated that the plaintiff was the owner of an estate called "The Rotherwas Estate," in Hereford, producing a rental amounting to between 5,000*l.* and 6,000*l.*; that previously to the year 1846 the plaintiff had employed Mr. Charles Blount, a solicitor, residing in Hereford, as his receiver and agent, to collect the rents of the Rotherwas estate; that in the year 1846 the said Mr. Blount sold his business to Thomas William Parkes, also a solicitor, and the plaintiff, thereupon, appointed him to be the receiver of his said estate, in lieu of Mr. Blount; that the said C. Blount and T. W. Parkes, and afterwards the said T. W. Parkes alone, kept a banking account with the defendants, Messrs. Hoskins, Morgan & Hamp, bankers, of Hereford; that in the month of June 1846, the said T. W. Parkes had an interview with Mr. Hamp, at the bank, and requested liberty to overdraw his account, to the extent of 1,500*l.*, to meet certain liabilities, which was agreed to; but at such interview the said Mr. Hamp inquired of the said T.

W. Parkes whether he was not the agent of the plaintiff for collecting the rents of the Rotherwas estate, and upon being informed that he was, and being told what was the amount of the rents, the said Mr. Hamp requested Parkes to open an account with the bank for the receipt of such rents, saying that if the accommodation required by Parkes was granted, he might, in return, do something for them; that Parkes agreed to open the proposed account, and stated that he believed the average balance in respect of these rents would be about 1,000*l.*; that in pursuance of the liberty granted to Parkes, he drew largely on his private account with the bank, and there was a balance against him of 1,037*l.*, or thereabouts; that in October 1846, the said T. W. Parkes received the sum of 746*l.*, in respect of the half-year's rents arising from the Rotherwas estate, which sum he paid into the defendants' bank, and desired that a separate account might be opened for such rents, to be entitled "The Rotherwas Account;" that the defendants then had notice that the Rotherwas account was opened by Parkes, as the receiver and agent of the plaintiff, and that the money placed to that account was the money of the plaintiff, arising from the rents of the Rotherwas estate, and it was then arranged that the words "Rotherwas account" should be written at the foot of every cheque drawn on such account, as well as at the head of such account in the bank books, for the purpose of distinguishing the said account from any other account kept by Parkes at the said bank; that the said T. W. Parkes, in the month of December 1846, opened with the defendants, the bankers, a third separate account, called "The General Account," for the monies of his clients, other than the money of the plaintiff; that Parkes continued to pay into the bank the rents of the Rotherwas estate, and to draw cheques when required upon the Rotherwas account; that in the month of July 1847 the plaintiff was informed that a cheque drawn by Parkes at the request of the plaintiff for money owing by him to a person named Pritchard, but which was not drawn on the Rotherwas account, but was drawn generally, had been dishonoured at the defendants' bank.

That the plaintiff thereupon went to the defendants' bank, and was for the first time informed that all the balance, amounting to 829*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, which ought to have been then standing to the credit of the Rotherwas account, had been previously passed or transferred from the Rotherwas account to the credit of the private account of the said T. W. Parkes at the said bankers, in part to cover a deficiency then existing in the private account of the said Parkes. That at the time of such transfer the said T. W. Parkes was and still continued to be insolvent, and that the defendants, well knowing that the said Parkes was the receiver and agent of the plaintiff, and that the balance remaining due from them on the said Rotherwas account, was the proper money of the plaintiff, arising from the rents of the said Rotherwas estate, and well knowing or having reason to believe that Parkes was insolvent, or in great pecuniary embarrassment, and that he had no means whereby he could, out of his own monies, discharge the balance due from him to them on his private account, contrived and colluded with Parkes to pass or transfer the said sum of 829*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, remaining due from them, to the credit of the said Rotherwas account, so as in part to liquidate or reduce the balance due from him on such "private account." That the plaintiff, by his solicitors, applied to the defendants, and requested them to account for and pay to the plaintiff the said sum of 829*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, which, but for the collusion and contrivance of the defendants and Parkes, would be now remaining due from them, on the credit of the Rotherwas account; but the defendants refused to comply with the plaintiff's request, on the ground that, at the time when Parkes, as the receiver of the plaintiff, opened with the defendants the Rotherwas account, it was arranged and agreed, between the defendants and Parkes, that the said several accounts kept by him at their bank were to be considered as one account, and that, consequently, the defendants were at liberty to debit either account for sums overdrawn on the other account or accounts.

The bill contained charges, to the effect that the defendants well knew that Parkes was the agent of the plaintiff, and that the money paid in by him to the Rotherwas account, was money belonging to the plaintiff. That the defendants, well knowing that Parkes was in insolvent circumstances, repeatedly urged him to transfer the balance due upon the Rotherwas account to his own private account, in order to reduce the debt due from him to the defendants, and that, in consequence of such applications, Parkes did, on the 7th of July 1847, sign a memorandum, in a minute-book of the defendants, to the following effect:—"The three accounts to be brought into one, and cheques for the transfer of the balance shall be sent forthwith to the bank account; to be overdrawn 1,000*l.* as a maximum debtor balance, and, by the 7th of November, the credit to be reduced 500*l.*, and, on the 31st of December, the account to be cleared; a discount, to the extent of 200*l.* or 300*l.*, to be given if desired. Signed, T. W. Parkes." That, in the same month of July, Parkes drew a cheque for the sum of 829*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* on the Rotherwas account, and which, by agreement with the defendants, he did on the same day pay into the bank, to the credit of his own private account. That the plaintiff, on several occasions being in want of money, and it not being convenient for him, on such occasions, to apply to T. W. Parkes, and in his absence, and without his knowledge or privity, drew and signed, in his own name, cheques for certain sums of money on the "Rotherwas account;" and that, on other occasions, during the temporary absence of Parkes from Hereford, the plaintiff obtained money from the defendants' bank upon cheques drawn at the suggestion of the defendants themselves, by the clerk to Parkes, and indorsed by the plaintiff in his own name, which money was thereupon debited to the Rotherwas account.

The bill prayed that the transfer or paying of the said sum of 829*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* from the Rotherwas account to the private account of Parkes, might, under the circumstances, be declared fraudulent and void, and that the defendants might be directed to pay to the plaintiff the said sum, or such sum as, but for the acts of the defendants, would now be the balance remaining due from the said bankers, at the credit of the said "Rotherwas account."

The answer of the defendants was to the following effect: that the said T. W.

Parkes directed his banking account to be kept with three distinguishing heads, one of which accounts was the Rotherwas account; but that the said Parkes expressly stated that, although kept and distinguished under three heads, yet as to debits and credits arising on them between him and the said bankers they were, in fact, to be regarded by the said bank as one account only; and it was expressly stipulated that the defendants were to be at liberty to consolidate the said three accounts, and that they were not in any manner to be prejudiced by the said accounts being kept separate, or distinguished separately, such distinguishing modes of keeping the accounts being required at the particular request of Parkes, and for his sole accommodation. That during the whole of the time when the stipulations and agreements as to the banking accounts of Parkes were being made, the plaintiff's name was never mentioned or alluded to, nor had they any notice or knowledge that the plaintiff had any controul over either of the accounts, nor were they aware that the money placed in the bank by Parkes to the Rotherwas account was received by him as agent of the plaintiff. That the transfer of the balance due to Parkes on the Rotherwas account to his own private account, was made at the desire of Parkes himself and not at the suggestion of the defendants. The defendants submitted that under the circumstances they were justified in making such transfer, and that it was a good, legal, and equitable transfer, particularly as the said Parkes reserved to himself the right to draw cheques thereon; and he alone paid into the banking house of the defendants all the money which was entered to his credit, and never stated to the defendants that any other person had any right or interest therein, and the name of any other person was never mentioned as connected with the accounts. The defendants alleged that they did not know at the time of the aforesaid transfer of the balance on the Rotherwas account, that Parkes was insolvent; but, on the contrary, they believed he had several thousand pounds coming to him from the partners of his late firm, and they could not state whether he was now insolvent; that the defendants knew

Parkes was the solicitor for the plaintiff, and that knowing the plaintiff to be a person of high respectability and standing in the county of Hereford, they had on several occasions paid cheques indorsed by him upon the defendants' bank in the absence of Parkes, and had at the plaintiff's request debited the amount of such cheques to the Rotherwas account, believing that Parkes would approve of their conduct, as he subsequently did; but these sums of money were paid on the credit of the plaintiff, as a gentleman of wealth and property, and if Parkes had not assented to be debited therewith, they must have looked to the plaintiff alone for payment; and the defendants further stated that they could not set forth whether the plaintiff had drawn any other cheques in his own name upon the Rotherwas account.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Collins, for the plaintiff, regretted that the defendants, the bankers, should have allowed themselves to have been drawn into such a suit as this, when they had no legal defence whatever to the plaintiff's claim. The right of the plaintiff depended upon these two propositions, that the money deposited with the bankers by Mr. Parkes and carried to the credit of the Rotherwas account, was so deposited by Parkes as the agent and receiver of the plaintiff, and that the bankers knew the money to have been placed in the bank by Mr. Parkes to that account as a receivership account, separate from his private account. If these two propositions were made out upon the evidence, to the satisfaction of the Court, the bankers had no defence. In permitting the money to be transferred from the receivership account, the bankers were colluding with the receiver to enable him to defraud his employer, and the employer was at liberty to follow the money into the hands of the bankers, and could maintain against them the same claim which he had against the receiver or agent. The evidence of the plaintiff clearly established both these propositions, and there was nothing in the evidence of the defendants to contradict it. The three accounts kept at the bankers of Parkes were separate accounts, and the bankers perfectly well knew that the money paid in to the Rotherwas account was the money of the plaintiff. The separate heading to the different accounts was used expressly to shew that the money was appropriated to particular purposes and distinct from the private account of the individual. The principle acted upon by this Court was, that if money was deposited with a banker in separate accounts, and the banker knew the money received upon one account was the property of any other person than his customer, he had no right to allow the blending of the two accounts. This principle arose upon the universal maxim of common honesty, that if you know the person with whom you are dealing is applying for your benefit money belonging to another, you are in point of fact auxiliary to that person committing a wrong upon another.

Mr. Stuart and Mr. Wright, for the defendants, contended that there was no fiduciary relation existing between the bankers and the plaintiff, and there was no fiduciary relation between the bankers and their customer. The bankers received the money of Parkes, which he desired should be kept in three separate accounts; but he had full power to controul his own accounts, and if he thought fit to draw the money from one account and place it to another, the bankers had no power to prevent him from doing so. The three accounts were, in fact, treated as one account; and it was not proved that the bankers knew that the money paid in by Parkes to the Rotherwas account was belonging to the plaintiff; but if they did, there was no reason why they should prevent Parkes from drawing it out, and applying it in any manner he chose.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—The doubt that has from time to time crossed my mind in this case was chiefly this, whether the facts were stated in the pleadings with that degree of particularity as that I could say there had been a full opportunity for the defendants to meet those allegations of fact by the evidence which they might be able to adduce. Now that I have become more acquainted with what is contained in the pleadings, I feel myself in a condition, without waiting to look through the pleadings more in detail, to express my opinion in this case. I will first consider the case as between the plaintiff and Parkes; that is, what was the state of things as between the plaintiff and Parkes in the course of these transactions; and then consider what was the relation of the defendants, the bankers, towards Parkes in the matter; and how far the plaintiff, upon that state of things, is entitled to the decree which he asks against those defendants.

Now, as between the plaintiff and Parkes the matter seems to have stood thus:—the plaintiff was the owner of this Rotherwas estate, (a considerable property in the neighbourhood of Hereford,) and it seems that he had employed, as his solicitor and his agent and receiver, a gentleman of the name of Blount. Mr. Blount, being about to give up his employment, sold his business or transferred it to Mr. Parkes, who had been previously a solicitor in London; and it was arranged between Parkes and Blount that, for six months, Parkes should use the name of Blount, and accordingly an account was opened by Parkes, with the concurrence of Blount, with these bankers, in the joint names of Blount and Parkes. It was intended that that should not continue more than six months. When that account ceased, in short, when Parkes was to use his own name exclusively in the matter, or shortly after that period, he was employed by the plaintiff as his solicitor, succeeding Blount in that employment, and shortly after that period again (all within the period of a very few months, or even weeks) Parkes was employed by the plaintiff as his receiver and agent in respect of the Rotherwas estate, apparently in the same manner as Blount had been employed before. Parkes having on the occasion of the ceasing of the account,—the putting an end to the joint account in the names of Blount and Parkes with the bankers,—opened a private account of his own on the 23rd of June 1846. When he came to be appointed the receiver of the rents and profits of the Rotherwas estate by the plaintiff, he very properly, as it appears to me, opened another account with the bankers for the purpose of placing to the credit of that account with the bankers the sums which he might receive in respect of the rents and profits of the Rotherwas estate, and drawing from the account the sums which he might have to pay, on account of the Rotherwas estate, or which he might have to pay to his employer, the plaintiff. I say that that account was very properly kept separate from his own account, and, at all events, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, that account, although unquestionably it was the account of Parkes, and the bankers were to look to Parkes as the only person entitled to draw upon that account, still, I say, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, that account was opened by Parkes for the purpose of keeping in that form an account of the receipts and payments by Parkes, as receiver in respect of the Rotherwas estate, and Parkes very properly intitled the account as "The Rotherwas Account," which distinctly marked it, at all events as between him and the plaintiff, as being the account of the Rotherwas estate: how far it marked it as between Parkes and the bankers I shall have occasion to refer to presently. I am now, as I have said, considering the case as between the plaintiff and Parkes. With regard to the third account which Parkes opened, the plaintiff had nothing to do with that—I mean that account which is called the "General Account." Now, whatever balance might from time to time be standing to the credit of the Rotherwas account, it is quite clear that, as between the plaintiff and Parkes, Parkes would violate his duty if he applied any part of that balance to any purposes of his own; if, for example, he had drawn out that money and applied it to any purpose of his own, the bankers knowing nothing of the matter; still, as between Parkes and the plaintiff, it would be a gross breach of duty,—a breach of that duty which Parkes owed to the plaintiff,—to apply the monies which should arise from the Rotherwas estate to any other purpose than the purpose of the plaintiff. When, therefore, Parkes drew the cheque, on the 9th of July 1847, for the 829*l.* and a fraction, which was then the balance standing to the credit of the Rotherwas account, in order that the amount of that cheque might go towards the liquidation of the separate account of his own, on which he was debtor, without at present saying how far the bankers were affected by that, as between Parkes and the plaintiff, it was a breach of trust committed by Parkes as against the plaintiff; it was a fraud, in fact, committed upon the plaintiff; it was a misappropriation by Parkes of that which was in fact the money belonging to the plaintiff, to purposes of Parkes, and not to the purposes of the plaintiff: that, I conceive, is beyond all question. The condition of things, and the relation as between Parkes and the plaintiff (and I do not understand that there is any controversy raised on that part of the case), is stated on both sides, and it is admitted on both sides, that, whether or not the bankers have made themselves liable, as far as Parkes is concerned there is a great breach of duty, and it was very justly made a matter of observation on the part of the defendants' counsel that Parkes's own representations were such as to shew that he had been guilty of very great misconduct; and from that an argument was drawn, with more or less of weight, that he was not to be believed in the representations of fact which he made; but, at all events, I take it thus far beyond all controversy, that that act of Parkes was a great breach of duty towards the plaintiff, his employer. Now, as the agent or receiver of Mr. Bodenham, the plaintiff, he clearly was, in all senses, a trustee for him; there was a fiduciary character created between the plaintiff and Parkes. I do not know that it is very material whether this be technically called a breach of trust on the part of Parkes; but, at all events, it was a breach of a duty which Parkes owed to the plaintiff, standing towards him in a fiduciary character, in respect to the monies, as receiver of the Rotherwas estate.

Now, then, I approach the question as to the participation of the bankers in this misconduct of Parkes—how far the bankers (the defendants) were in any way participators in this misconduct of Parkes: participators in the act they were, but it does not follow, because they were participators in the act, that therefore they were participators in the fraud of Mr. Parkes. Let us see, therefore, what was the position of the bankers in the matter. I entirely agree with many of the observations that have been made by the counsel for the defendants, that, as between banker and customer, in a naked case of banker and customer, the banker looks only to the customer, in respect of the account opened in that customer's name, and whatever cheques that customer chooses to draw, the banker is to honour. He is not to inquire for what purpose the customer opened the account; he is not to inquire what the monies are that are paid in to that account, and he is not to inquire for what purpose monies are drawn out of that account: that is the plain general rule, as between banker and customer. But now let us see whether that naked state of circumstances existed in the present case. Now the first transaction or circumstance that appears as important to note—first, in point of date—appears to be the interview which, on the 10th of June 1846, took place between Parkes and Mr. Hamp (one of the partners) and Spozzi, a clerk or cashier of the bankers. It appears that at this time there was a considerable balance, I think somewhere about 1,200*l.*, to the credit of the joint account, which I have mentioned, had been opened in the names of Blount and Parkes; but the six months during which Parkes was to keep that account open, that is, to use the name of Blount, were nearly expired, and Parkes represented to the bankers, that is, represented to Mr. Hamp and Mr. Spozzi, the cashier, that he would have occasion to draw largely for purposes of his own, and wished to know whether they would honour his cheques, that is to say, allow him to overdraw the account which he had with them. One can easily conceive there would be some hesitation in acceding to that proposal, and Mr. Hamp, very fairly, I think, said, "Well, if we are to do this for you, you ought to be doing something for us; we should expect some sort of return of obligation;" and, whether suggested originally by the bankers or offered by Parkes, this at last took place, that Parkes told the bankers that he would introduce to them the Rotherwas account. Now, referring to the statement in the evidence of Parkes upon this part of the case, I find that he represents it thus: after stating what I have already adverted to, which is not precisely material to the present case, the particulars of that account opened in the names of Blount and Parkes, he states this, that when that joint account was closed, the balance standing to the credit of that account was transferred to the credit of his own account which he opened, and which, I should observe, was not opened until some days after this interview. It was on the 26th of June 1846 that the private account was opened, and the interview I have adverted to was on the 10th, just before the opening of the private account. He speaks of the separate account, and then goes on thus:—"The book now produced, and shewn to me at this the time of my examination, marked with the letters A. B., is the pass-book, wherein such private or office account was kept by the said defendants, the bankers." Then he goes on thus:—"Before the said joint account was closed, and on or about the 10th of June 1846, while there was a balance to the credit of the said joint account of 1,337*l.*, or thereabouts, I had an interview at the defendants' banking-house, with the defendant, Francis Hamp, and Mr. Spozzi, the cashier of the bank, touching certain pecuniary engagements to persons in London, which I was about to be called upon to meet. The six months during which I was entitled to use the name of the said Charles Blount had then nearly elapsed, and it was consequently in contemplation to close the said joint account and open a separate account. The object of that interview was to obtain leave from the defendants, the bankers, to overdraw my account from them, from time to time, as might be necessary, to the extent of about 1,500*l.*, for the purpose chiefly of making certain payments in London, and also, temporarily, the expenses of my business in Hereford. On my making the application in question, the said Francis Hamp, in the presence of Mr. Spozzi, said, that he and the said Nathaniel Morgan," the two partners, "would assent to it, and that they would communicate with the said K. Hoskins, who would, no doubt, also concur in it;"

those are the three partners. "In the course of the interview, the said Francis Hamp said to me, 'I understand, from Mr. Spozzi, that you intend to introduce the Rotherwas account; you ought to do something for us if we help you.'" I confess, it does appear to me, that the use of the word "introduce" there, which occurs more than once, is important. It is evidently not the splitting of a pre-existing account for the mere convenience of the individual keeping the account. It was a holding out to the bankers, or a conception on the part of the bankers that there was held out to them, the introduction to them, that is, the opening with them, of some account which would be for their benefit.

Now, whether the benefit they were to derive from that was a benefit merely of having an additional customer, at least an additional account on which there would generally be some balance (which is always to the advantage of the banker), or whether they contemplated something beyond that, namely, that, allowing Parkes to overdraw his own account, they might appropriate the balance which might be to the credit of the Rotherwas account, to protect themselves against the loss of such balance: whatever was the view which they had, this, at all events, appears to me to be clear in this transaction, that the question of the opening of this Rotherwas account was mooted on this 10th of June, as the introduction to them of some account, which was to be doing something for the bankers, as the bankers were doing something for Parkes: that is, for the benefit of the bankers. Well, the witness goes on in this way: "I said that I did intend to introduce that account when I became the plaintiff's receiver; and the said Francis Hamp then asked me two or three questions as to the rental of the Rotherwas estate and the balance that would probably be kept on the account. I told him the rental was about 6,000*l.* a year, and the balance I would keep as large as I could: that it would probably average about 1,000*l.* He then said that he was satisfied. The arrangements then entered into between the said Francis Hamp on behalf of the defendants, the bankers, and myself, was undoubtedly that I should be allowed to overdraw my said separate account when the same was opened, if I would introduce to the bank, the account of the rents of the said Rotherwas estate so soon as, under my arrangements with the said Charles Blount, I became the receiver thereof. I did certainly promise the said Francis Hamp, or lead him to understand, that on my becoming such receiver I would open the last-mentioned account at the banking house of the defendants."

Now, when the evidence was read I had not heard the pleadings; and I confess I was in some doubt, especially when I came to the evidence of the defendants and found there was no evidence given on the subject of the interview in any way contradicting this, whether the matter had been so alleged in the pleadings, as to give the defendants an opportunity of meeting it, in which case I certainly should not have come to a decision without further inquiry, either by means of an issue or referring it to the Master on the facts. But I find in substance — perhaps a little more strongly put — the same statement is contained in the bill, as to what took place on the 10th of June; and when I come to the evidence given by Spozzi, who is here alleged to have been present during this interview, I do not find that Mr. Spozzi makes any attempt, or that any question is put, with a view to his making an attempt, to say that Mr. Parkes is not to be believed on his oath; he is a man who by his own shewing has been guilty of misconduct; but I see no reason, I confess, for disbelieving Parkes. I accede to the suggestion that Parkes is to be looked at with great jealousy; and if I found that Parkes positively swore one way and Spozzi positively swore the contrary, I confess I should be much more disposed to put confidence in what Mr. Spozzi stated than what Parkes stated, for the very reason that has been stated, that Parkes has been guilty of misconduct in the matter. But when I find, of the two persons present during that transaction, when both sides have the opportunity of examining each other, or of each examining both, or cross-examining if they please; when I find that one is called upon to state what took place according to his view, and the other is not called upon to state it, and when the interrogatories abstain from giving him the opportunity of stating it, I do consider myself bound to believe the witness on his oath, and I see no reason for disbelieving him.

Now it does not stand only on the evidence of Parkes; for, although Parkes and Spozzi were the only persons present at that interview, except Hamp (who could not of course be examined as a witness), we find this corroboration, not of all the details of what is stated to have passed at this interview, but this corroboration of the substance of it, which goes to shew that the bankers knew that this was a receivership account, in respect of the rents and profits; we find on the 26th of October 1846, when the Rotherwas account was actually opened, another person intervenes, who is examined as a witness, for the previous act of opening the account was not by Parkes himself going to the bankers, but by sending Mr. Ward, his clerk. Now let us see what Mr. Ward states to have passed between him and the bankers on that occasion. Mr. Ward states—and I have not heard a word of suggestion that Mr. Ward is not to be believed—in answer to the twentieth interrogatory, after stating that he was in the employ of Parkes as his clerk and book-keeper, he says, “I was directed by Mr. Parkes, in the month of October 1846, to open an account with the house of Messrs. Hoskins & Co., of Hereford, bankers, which was then composed of Kedgewin Hoskins, Nathaniel Morgan, Francis Hamp (since deceased), and Joseph Morgan (who are named as defendants in the title to these interrogatories), for him, Mr. Parkes, in the name of the Rotherwas Estate Account. I accordingly attended at the bank of Messrs. Hoskins & Co., in Hereford, on the 26th of October 1846, and opened the said account, and paid to the credit of it, the sum of 700*l*. I saw Mr. Spozzi, the then manager of the bank, on that occasion, and addressed myself to him; but, to the best of my recollection, the defendant, Joseph Morgan, was in the bank and near enough to hear what passed between Mr. Spozzi and me. I stated to Mr. Spozzi on the last-mentioned occasion, by Mr. Parkes's directions, that the said account was to be opened under the title of the Rotherwas Estate Account, and that the cheques which he, Parkes, would draw upon it would be so indorsed, as the money which would be paid in to the said account belonged to Mr. Bodenham (meaning Charles Thomas Bodenham, the plaintiff in this suit), and that he, Mr. Parkes, wished it to be kept separate from the other account which he had with the bank. The sum of 700*l*. which I paid in to the credit of the said account consisted of rents arising from the Rotherwas estate, which had been just received by Mr. Parkes and belonged to the plaintiff, and was to the best of my recollection chiefly composed of country bank notes.” Mr. Parkes had at that time another account with the bank, entitled “Office Account,” and which related to his business as a solicitor, and in the ensuing month of December he opened a third account, which is not material to the present case. Nothing can be more precise and clear than this, that Parkes, having sworn that on the 10th of June he had promised to introduce the Rotherwas account to these bankers as soon as he was appointed receiver, according to his arrangement with Blount, his predecessor, whatever doubt might exist as to whether Parkes accurately stated the truth when he stated that he then represented to the bankers that this was a receivership account, for the purpose of keeping the account of the Rotherwas rents, and so forth,—whatever doubt, I say, might exist on Parkes's evidence, as to whether the bankers knew the nature of the account, and that in point of fact it was Bodenham's account, not his account, in the sense that Bodenham was to draw on it, but that the monies belonged to the estate of Bodenham, and that it was the account of Bodenham's receiver,—whatever doubt might exist on Parkes's evidence, here is Mr. Ward's evidence, shewing, that when the account was opened, at the moment when the very first sum was paid in to the credit of that account, the bankers were distinctly informed of the reason why it was kept as a separate account, why the cheques were to be entitled with the words, “The Rotherwas Account.” The reason was, because the monies which had been paid in to that account, belonged to Mr. Bodenham, the plaintiff. It appears to me beyond all question, therefore, that from the very commencement of that account, the bankers knew that the money paid in to that account were the monies of Mr. Bodenham, arising from the rents and profits of his Rotherwas estate, and that the account was kept by Parkes, not as an account of his own, in relation to his own monies which belonged to himself, but in his character of receiver to Mr. Bodenham's Rotherwas estate.

Now, whether the bankers in their own minds, or even in their own books, if the fact had been so, treated the Rotherwas account as if it had been the private account of Mr. Parkes, the question is, whether they had a right to do so; whether they had a right to say,—knowing from the facts that the money placed to that account was Mr. Bodenham's money, and that any balance standing to the credit of that account at any time was Mr. Bodenham's balance,—that they could make such an arrangement with Mr. Parkes, as that at any time they should be at liberty to appropriate the balance to the credit of that account, towards the liquidation of the balance standing to the debit of the private account of Mr. Parkes. It appears to me that, on every principle of equity, they had no right to do so; it appears to me that it is not a question whether simply, at the time when the cheque was drawn for the 829*l.*, they had a right then to allow that cheque to be placed to the credit of the other account; but whether they had a right ever to make an arrangement with Parkes to that effect; whether they had a right to say that the receiver should so deal with them as to make his principal's money at any time liable to be appropriated to discharge the private debts of the receiver to the bankers. I am quite satisfied that upon all principles of equity that could never be done; and this case illustrates what has often struck me as a very remarkable view of the principles of equity, that almost all the principles which are acted upon by a court of equity, in point of fact, are pervaded by a higher, and purer, and more exalted tone of morality than that which prevails among mankind, even among the moral portion of mankind; and I wish it to be understood that I do not think there is to be imputed to these gentlemen any design of doing that which in their minds was dishonest or improper. I believe they had no such intention. All, I think, that I can impute to them is, that they were not aware that, according to the principles—the moral principles—of a court of equity, and acted upon daily by a court of equity, a person who deals with another, which other he knows to have in his hands, or under his controul, monies belonging to a third person, cannot deal with the individual holding those monies for his own private benefit, when the effect of that transaction is, that that person commits a fraud on a third person. That Parkes was committing a fraud in appropriating to his own purpose the money of his employer, is beyond question. The bankers did not seem to feel or be aware that they had no right, and that Parkes had no right, to enter into any arrangement, the effect of which was to make the money (although Parkes was the only person who could draw on that particular account) liable to any defalcation, any deficiency that might exist upon the private account of Mr. Parkes with the bankers.

Now, I do not know that in the view which I take of this case, it is necessary to consider what the bankers, from time to time in the course of the transaction, considered to be the state of circumstances. The two witnesses, Messrs. Spozzi & Fryer, labour very much, or rather the interrogatories have laboured, to bring them over and over again to repeat this, particularly the deposition which is in answer to the twenty-sixth interrogatory, that Bodenham, the plaintiff, never told them that these were his monies; that Bodenham, the plaintiff, never told them that this was his account; that Bodenham, the plaintiff, never claimed to have any controul over that account, and so on: that is not the question. Again, it appears to me immaterial to consider whether their suggestion is well founded, that the bankers, at the time the account was settled, treated the three accounts as the accounts of one single customer. If it were necessary to consider what is meant by that deposition, I confess I am at a loss to know what was in the mind of the witnesses, when they so deposed; for the deposition amounts to this, that when the account was settled the bankers treated and acted upon the three accounts, as the accounts of one single customer. Now, that led me to suppose that, when I came to look at the books, I should find that when the accounts were settled (which appears to have been done half-yearly or yearly), there was an amalgamation of the balances of these three accounts, to see what the result of the three would be. But so far from that, there is never anything of the kind in the books. If, by the term "the time of settling the accounts," they mean the 9th of July 1847, when two of the accounts were closed, even then the accounts are never treated as one and the same account, or the account of one customer, any further than this, that by arrangement between them and Parkes, the balance appearing to the credit of each of the two accounts, was carried to the credit of the other account (the private account), on which there was a debit; but in no other sense, at the time of settling the account, did the bankers treat and act upon the three accounts, as the account of one and the same customer. If it be meant that the accounts were kept in the name of the same individual, then it is perfectly true; but it is a strange mode of putting the proposition, namely, for the purpose of alleging that the accounts were headed in the name of Parkes, to put it in this shape, to say that the bankers, at the time of settling the accounts, treated and acted on the three accounts as one. It appears to me to be really immaterial what view the bankers took of it, between the time when the Rotherwas account was opened and the 9th of July 1847, when the balance of that account was transferred to the credit of the private account; because I find at the very opening of the account, nay, some months, three months at least, before the opening of that account, the bankers were well aware that that account was the account of Mr. Parkes, as receiver of the Rotherwas estate; and that the monies which were to be paid in to the credit of the account, were the monies of Mr. Bodenham, and that it was for these very reasons that that account was to be kept as a separate account, and so headed.

I am constrained to arrive at the conclusion that the bankers, although I must exonerate them from any deliberate intention to commit a robbery or commit a fraud, still were not only parties to the simple fact of the transfer, but were parties to the fraud in question, in this sense, that they were aware of the circumstances which made it a fraud in Parkes, to make the transfer to his private account, and being cognizant of that, and having been cognizant of it before the time when the account was opened under the name of "The Rotherwas Account," and being cognizant of it throughout, they concur in a transaction, the effect of which is, that for their own pecuniary benefit an act is done by Parkes which is a fraud upon the plaintiff. Now, according to the plain principles of a court of equity, such an act never can be sustained; a party cannot retain the benefit which he has obtained from being a party to such an act, with such knowledge of the nature of the act.

I am, therefore, under the necessity of decreeing the repayment of the 829*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* by the defendants, the bankers, to the plaintiff. With respect to the question of interest, it appears to me that I cannot give any higher interest than the interest which the bankers allowed upon the account. If there had been no interest allowed, I do not think I could give any interest at all; but considering that this was transferring, to the detriment of Mr. Bodenham, from an account which was yielding interest, a sum of money which if it had still stood there would be bearing interest, I think it ought to be with interest, at the same rate at which the interest was allowed by the bankers.

Deed—Marriage Settlement—Omission—Life Interest implied.

A marriage settlement omitted, in an event which happened, to declare a life interest in the settled fund for the intended wife. The Court being of opinion that the settlor did not intend to reserve any portion of the fund for himself, declared the wife to be entitled by implication to a life interest in the settled property.

This was a claim by the assignees in insolvency of Clara Crawshay, widow, for the payment to them of the dividends in certain stock, settled by the father of the insolvent on her marriage with her late husband, deceased. The trusts of the settlement were declared to be to pay the dividends of 1,900*l.*, 3½*l.* per cent. annuities during the joint lives of the husband and wife, to the wife for her separate use, and if she died in the lifetime of her husband to transfer the stock to him absolutely; but if the husband should die in the lifetime of the wife, then to transfer the same to such persons as the wife should by will appoint, and in default of appointment to her next-of-kin, according to the Statute of Distributions. The question was, whether the widow took a life interest by implication in the dividends of the settled stock.

Mr. Renshaw appeared for the plaintiffs, and

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Rogers, for the trustees.

TURNER, V.C., after referring to Tunstall v. Trappes (1), said, that as he did not think the settlor intended to reserve to himself any portion of the trust fund, he was of opinion that the widow took a life interest in it by implication. His Honour, however, declined to make a decree in the absence of the settlor's personal representatives; but they having subsequently appeared and declined to contest the question, a decree was made, declaring the widow to be entitled to a life interest in the dividends of the trust fund, and directing the fund to be brought into court, and the dividends paid accordingly to the plaintiffs.

to certain parishes, ought to be brought before the Court by information and not by petition, under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act (52 Geo. 3. c. 101).

This was a petition of the churchwardens of St. Clement's and All Saints', in Hastings, stating that certain lands had become vested in the mayor, jurats, and commonalty of Hastings, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; that there was not any deed or instrument declaring uses of the lands; that the proceeds had been distributed yearly at Easter and Christmas for 240 years, by the petitioners' predecessors in office, amongst the poor of their respective parishes; that new trustees had been appointed in 1836, under the Municipal Corporations Act: and that by an order of the Court, made in January last, on the petition of certain parishioners of other parishes within the liberties, but not within the town and port of Hastings, and which petition had been served upon and was not opposed by the trustees of the charity property, but had not been served on the present petitioners, it was referred to the Master to inquire what parishes were within the town and port of Hastings, how the income had been applied, and to settle a scheme. The petition prayed that the above order should be discharged.

It appeared that a memorial had been made by the corporation of Hastings, in 1812, under the 52 Geo. 3. c. 102, stating that the poor of the town and port of Hastings were entitled to the charity property.

Sir W. P. Wood and Mr. Pitman appeared for the present petitioners.

Mr. Baily, for the former petitioners.

Mr. Welch, for the trustees of the charity; and Mr. W. M. James, for the Attorney General.

TURNER, V.C.—I think that after the funds of the charity have been distributed, for so long a period, among the poor of two parishes, if a claim is set up by the poor of other parishes, the case is not one to be decided under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, and that in the case of an adverse claim, the Attorney General must be a party to the proceedings. The only evidence that the corporation were trustees for the poor of the town and port of Hastings appears to be the memorial made in 1812, and that document may admit of explanation if the case be brought before the Court upon an information, stating that the corporation had distributed the funds among the two parishes only, and contending upon that memorial that the two parishes within the town and port of Hastings are not entitled to the fund exclusive of the other parishes within the liberties. The order made on the former petition must be discharged, as it has been made adversely to the petitioners without their having been served with the petition. If the parties think that nothing can be added to the facts before me, I have no objection to state my opinion, that on the evidence which has been produced, the property has been applied for so long a period to the poor of the two parishes mentioned in the petition, they alone are entitled to it.

Trustee Act—Trustee out of the Jurisdiction.

The Court will not, under the Trustee Act, order the removal of a trustee merely on the ground of his having gone out of the jurisdiction.

This was a petition, under the 22nd and 23rd sections of the Trustee Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, for the appointment of a new trustee in the place of a trustee who was stated to be residing in Jamaica, out of the jurisdiction of this Court. The petition also prayed that the new trustee and the continuing trustee of the fund, which amounted to 1,035*l.*, might be appointed guardians of the four infants who were entitled to the money; and that a sum of 263*l.* might be sold out and applied for the past and future maintenance of the infants.

Mr. E. Collins appeared in support of the petition.

The VICE CHANCELLOR reserved his judgment, in order to confer with the other Judges.

June 30.—KINDERSLEY, V.C.—It does not appear to me that I am authorized under the Trustee Act to remove a trustee merely because he is out of the jurisdiction. It might be that he is only absent for a limited time. The words of the act are certainly very general; but it never could have been the intention of the legislature that a trustee should be removed without some further reason than his being out of the jurisdiction; there being no evidence to shew that he does not intend to return to this country. I think, however, that there is no objection to the appointment of the two gentlemen proposed to act as guardians; and it seems quite right to order the sum stated in the petition to be paid for the past and future maintenance of the infants.

Sir George Bangley, by his will, gave and bequeathed a sum of 6,000*l.* (3*l.* per cent. Life Annuities) to trustees, upon trust, to pay the interest and dividends thereof to Isabella Emblen (afterwards married to William King), for her separate use; and after her decease he directed the said sum of stock to be held in trust for the children of the said Isabella King in manner therein mentioned. But in case she should die without children, then he directed the said sum of stock to be divided equally between three different charities specified. The trustees paid the money into court under the Trustees Relief Act, and Mrs. King, who had no children, presented a petition for payment of the dividends to her for life; and the petition prayed that the costs of the application might be paid out of the corpus of the fund in court.

Mr. Goren appeared in support of the petition, and submitted that the costs ought to be paid out of the corpus. A similar case had been decided by Lord Cranworth, in Re Ross's Trust (1). This case had been recently followed by the Master of the Rolls. The charitable institutions which were entitled in remainder had not been served, in order to save expense; but if the Court thought they should be served, it could be done before the order was made.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—I certainly do not think that the costs of this application ought to come out of the corpus of the fund. It was only a week ago that I consulted with the other Judges upon this very point, and I found that a difference of opinion existed as to what the practice ought to be; but, until the practice has been settled, I must act upon what I consider right. In this case the application is solely for the benefit of the tenant for life, and it would not be fair or just, in my opinion, to make the remainder-man bear the costs. Each party ought to pay the expenses of such proceedings as are necessary for the benefit of each. It is true that if the costs were paid out of the surplus, the tenant for life would lose a portion of income; but to make it fair for both parties, the tenant for life ought then to bear a proportion of costs of the remainder-man. I do not think that there is any analogy to the course pursued in an administration suit; the costs would then be computed up to the time of the fund being ascertained and realized. That would be equivalent to the costs of paying the money into court under the Trustee Act, which, as they affect the corpus, are properly made payable out of the fund; but these cases are more analogous to applications by parties who are entitled to specific funds which have been carried to their separate account. I shall follow the same rule in such cases as these; and direct that the costs be paid by the tenant for life.

Vendor and Purchaser—Specific Performance — Contract — Sub-Purchaser — Agent—Parties.

A. signed the usual agreement for purchase at an auction, and also a memorandum that he had purchased as trustee for B, who was present and paid the deposit. The abstract of title was sent to a solicitor, but whether he acted for A. or B, or both, was disputed, and was afterwards sent by the vendors to B.'s solicitor. On bill filed by the vendors against A. and B. for specific performance, A. stated as above, but B. stated that he had bought the property as sub-purchaser from B:—Held, that the contract having been entered into by the vendors with A, the bill must be dismissed as against B, but that A. was not bound by any communications or proceeding which had taken place as to title or otherwise between the vendors and B.

This was a suit by vendors for specific performance of a contract for sale. The property was sold by auction, at which the defendant Maden was declared the highest bidder, and signed the usual agreement to purchase, and also a memorandum stating that he had purchased as trustee for the co-defendant Lees, who was present at the auction and paid the deposit. The abstract of title was sent to a solicitor, but on whose behalf was in dispute. The abstract was subsequently sent to Mr. Hayworth, the solicitor of the defendant Lees. The bill was filed against Maden and Lees; the former stated that he purchased for Lees, and the latter that he had bought the property as sub-purchaser from Maden at a less sum than it had been sold for at the auction, subject to the title being approved. The other facts and the arguments for the defendants are stated in the judgment.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. W. M. James appeared for the plaintiffs.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Pitman, for the defendant Maden; and Mr. Bacon and Mr. Osborne, for the defendant Lees.

Taylor v. Salmon, 4 Myl. & Cr. 134.

TURNER, V.C.—In this case, each of the defendants has insisted that the bill ought as against him to be dismissed. The defendant Lees contended that it should be dismissed as against him upon the ground that there was no contract between him and the plaintiff, and I think the bill must be dismissed against this defendant upon that ground. This defendant, repudiating any trust in Maden for his benefit, the Court cannot, in this suit, determine the question, whether such a trust exists or not. If Maden be compelled to perform the contract, he must seek his remedy against Lees in another suit, and the dismissal of this suit as against Lees will not affect the remedy; for the question between Maden and Lees will not be whether Maden was bound to perform the agreement, but whether, having been compelled to perform it, he is entitled to be indemnified by Lees; and he (Lees) having insisted on being dismissed from this suit, could not be allowed to set up against Maden that the proceedings were improperly had in his absence. But, although I think the bill must be dismissed against Lees, I think it must be dismissed against him without costs; for the evidence clearly proves that the memorandum signed by Maden was signed in his presence, and there being no proof on his part that he at any time communicated to the plaintiffs the parol contract with Maden which he now sets up, if, in truth, it ever existed, his conduct throughout must have led the plaintiffs to believe that he claimed under the contract; and I am of opinion that if he had claimed under the contract he would have been a proper party to the suit.

The defendant Maden contended that the bill should be dismissed as against him upon three distinct grounds: first, that the case made by the bill was not the case of purchase alone; secondly, that he bought, and was known by the plaintiffs to have bought, merely as the agent of Lees; and thirdly, that if he was ever liable on the contract the plaintiffs have discharged him from the liability by adopting Lees as the purchaser. But I am of opinion that the case of the defendant Maden cannot be maintained upon any of these grounds.

As to the first, the bill distinctly alleges that Maden became the purchaser at the auction and signed the agreement, and that Lees claims an interest in the contract under some agreement entered into with Maden; and it does not appear to me that the next allegation, which was most relied on in the argument on this point, that, in fact, Maden entered into the agreement as well on behalf of Lees as himself, is inconsistent with Maden's being the sole purchaser, as it may well be that he alone purchased from the plaintiffs, though he made the purchase on his own as well as on Lees's behalf; and the succeeding allegation proves that this was intended by the bill, for it is clear that Maden has by writing declared himself to be a trustee for Lees in respect of some interest in the contract, and in addition to this, the bill charges that the plaintiffs have never been parties to any substitution of Lees for Maden.

As to the second ground, it no doubt appears that Maden immediately after the auction represented Lees to be the purchaser, and therefore himself to be an agent merely; but it distinctly appears by the evidence that the plaintiffs' solicitor on being requested to insert the name of Lees in the agreement as the purchaser, declined to do so, and insisted on retaining Maden as the purchaser, and drew up the agreement of purchase in his name accordingly, and that Maden then signed the agreement; and I think that assuming Maden to have been an agent merely, and independently of the fact of his having become the purchaser at the auction, the signature of the agreement was sufficient to subject him to the liability of performing it, it being clear that an agent may become liable upon his own undertaking.

As to the third point insisted upon on Maden's behalf, I think that, in point of fact, the communications upon the title have, at all events since Mr. Hayworth was concerned, been had with him as the solicitor of Lees; but I am of opinion that Maden is not thereby discharged from the contract of purchase. Maden signed the memorandum to which I have referred, at the very time when he signed the agreement, and thereby and otherwise represented to the plaintiffs that Lees was entitled through him to the benefit of the contract, and in this state of circumstances I think the communications had with Lees must be taken to have been had in furtherance of the original contract, and not upon any new or substituted contract. Maden, as between himself and the plaintiffs, had represented himself to be placed in the position of a formal party, and he cannot, I think, claim to be discharged upon the ground that the plaintiffs so treated him. I think, therefore, there must be a decree against Maden for specific performance.

It was argued, on the part of the plaintiffs, that Lees had accepted the title, and that the decree, therefore, ought to proceed upon that footing. But it is one thing to hold that Maden is not discharged by the dealings with Lees, and another that he is bound by all that was done by Lees in the course of those dealings. I think that the communications had with Lees upon the title were had with him in his own right, as claiming through Maden, and not as the agent of Maden, and that Maden, therefore, is not bound by any acceptance of the title by Lees, if he, in fact, accepted it, as to which I entertain some doubt. There must, therefore, be the usual references as to title.

Another point which was raised on the part of the plaintiffs was, as to some machinery which was to be taken by the purchaser at a valuation, to be made by two arbitrators, to be nominated, one by the vendors and the other by the purchaser, or upon the purchaser's default, by the vendors, and in case the arbitrators did not agree, by an umpire to be appointed by them. Notice having been given to Maden to name an arbitrator to value this machinery, he omitted to do so, and therefore the plaintiffs, the vendors, named an arbitrator for him, and the arbitrators having named an umpire, and not having agreed in their valuation, the machinery was valued by the umpire. The question was, whether Maden ought to be held bound by this valuation, and I think that he ought not: it was made at a time when the plaintiffs were in treaty with Lees, and when Maden might well expect that the contract would be performed by him.

1851. COLLETT v. MORRISON.
June 16. }

Insurance Company—Agreement—Policy—Variation.

If the policy varies from the agreement to effect an insurance, a court of equity will interfere and deal with the case of the insured on the footing of the agreement, and not of the policy.

Observations on relief in equity against insurance companies in cases of fraud.

This was a bill by the plaintiff, John Collett, against the defendant, Peter Morrison (the managing director of the Britannia Life Assurance Company), and W. J. Richardson, to recover the amount secured by a policy of assurance effected on the life of the plaintiff's deceased wife, by the defendant Richardson as her trustee. It appeared from the pleadings that the defendant Richardson had insured the life of Mrs. Emma Collett, as her trustee, for 999*l.*, at an annual premium of 34*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*, in the Britannia Life Office. Before paying the first premium, and in consequence, as it was stated, of being informed that the company would not recognize an insurance effected by a trustee without an insurable interest, the defendant signed another printed form of proposal, in which he simply gave his own name and residence and description as those of the party proposing to assure; but it did not appear that this second proposal had been laid before the directors. The policy recited that the defendant Richardson had agreed to effect an assurance with the company for the amount stated, on the life of the wife of the plaintiff, and had delivered a certain declaration as to her health and habits. Upon the policy was an indorsement, to the effect that if, either at or after the issuing of a policy, it should be subject to any trust, the receipt of the trustee for the time being should discharge the company. The policy was sent from the office of the company to Mrs. Collett. On the death of Mrs. Collett the defendant Richardson brought an action against the company on the policy, and claimed it for his own benefit. The company resisted the action on the ground that Richardson had not any interest in Mrs. Collett's life, and also on the grounds of fraud and misrepresentation. Pending the action, the plaintiff Collett filed a bill against Richardson, praying for a declaration that the latter was a trustee for the plaintiff, and for permission to use the defendant's (Richardson's) name in an action against the company, and for an injunction to restrain Richardson's action against the company. The Court directed an issue on the question of Richardson's trusteeship; and the question having been subsequently referred to arbitration, Richardson was declared by the award of the arbitrator to be a trustee for the plaintiff. The plaintiff then filed his present bill, stating as above, and charging, inter alia, Richardson with fraudulent acts towards and collusion with the company, in respect of his claim to the policy, both before and after the award. The bill prayed a declaration that in equity the insurance was effected by the plaintiff's deceased wife, through the defendant Richardson as her trustee, for her separate use for life; that the policy ought to be or considered as effected accordingly, and the amount paid to the plaintiff; that Richardson had committed a fraudulent breach of trust in collusion with the company, and that he and they ought to pay the costs of the suit.

The grounds of defence were that the first proposal had been abandoned, and the second accepted on Richardson's own account; and that the policy was not under seal, and might be sued upon at law in the name of the plaintiff without the aid of a Court of Chancery or the necessity of a suit in equity.

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood) and Mr. W. M. James appeared for the plaintiff;

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Cairns, for the defendant Morrison; and

Mr. J. Baily, for the defendant Richardson.

June 16, 1851.—TURNER, V.C., after stating the facts, said—The question first to be considered is, what is the course of the Court in cases of this nature? and fortunately there is no difficulty upon this point, as there is direct authority upon it. In Motteux v. the London Assurance Company (1) the insurance of a ship was made by the policy to commence from the time of her departure from Fort St. George, instead of commencing from the time she should arrive at Fort St. George, as according to the label of the agreement it ought to have been. Lord Hardwicke there says, "The label is a memorandum of the agreement, in which the material parts of the policies are inserted. In the label the words are at and from; this certainly includes the continuance at Fort St. George; and in the first part of the policy the voyage is described in the same manner; but in the latter, according to the constant form, it points out what shall be called the risque and the adventure; there it is confined to the departure only from Fort St. George. It has been contended, on the part of the plaintiffs, that it ought to be construed equally the same as if the words at and from were actually inserted in this part of the policy. It is pretty difficult to reconcile the first part of the policy and the latter; but the label makes it very clear, for that considers the voyage and the risque as the same, and therefore it was only the mistake of the clerk, which ought to be rectified agreeable to the label." This case appears to me fully to establish that if there be an agreement for a policy in a particular form, and the policy be drawn by the office in a different form varying the right of the party assured, a court of equity will interfere and deal with the case upon the footing of the agreement and not of the policy. Authority, perhaps, was not wanted upon the point, as it is the constant course of the Court to rectify mistakes, and the decisions upon that subject would seem to govern the question; but it is satisfactory to find a case which in principle so nearly resembles the present.

Adopting, then, the principle of the case and decisions to which I have referred, I have next to consider whether there was in this case an agreement to grant the policy to Richardson in trust for Mrs. Collett. It is said on the part of the company that there was no such agreement: first, because the examination of the directors extended only to the age and the health of the party on whose life the insurance was proposed and to the amount of the insurance; and, secondly, because the approval of the directors was subject to its being afterwards found by the officers of the company that the proposal approved could be carried into effect consistently with its rules and regulations. But with reference to the first of these grounds, one of the defendants' own witnesses states, that the directors in considering proposals looked to the names of the proposers; and another of their witnesses states, that it seems impossible to have read the first proposal without seeing the words "Mrs. Emma Collett, by W. J. Richardson, Esq. her trustee." I cannot impute to the directors that they did not in this case look to a matter to which it was their habit to look; or that they overlooked what so clearly appeared on the face of the proposal. With reference to the second ground, which is very loosely if at all alleged by the answer, I do not find that the evidence goes nearly so far or at all shews that it was not the duty of the officers of this company to act upon any proposal approved by the directors, if it could in any way be carried out. Even supposing the officers had a more extended power, and could alter the substance of the agreement, and not merely the form of carrying it out, surely the agreement of the directors remained, if the officers acted upon it, and meant to alter it in form only and not in substance. It is to be seen, therefore, what was the opinion of the officers of the company with reference to the proposal in question in this case. Did they or did they not take the second proposal, and prepare the policy in its present form for the purpose of carrying out the first proposal? The evidence I think leaves no doubt upon this subject. The witnesses on the part of the company do not state that the policy was prepared with any different view; and, indeed, the point raised by the answer is, that there was no original contract, not that there was a substituted one. The original proposal is not cancelled, but it is annexed to the second proposal, and the payment of the premium is indorsed upon it. The second proposal is not even submitted to the directors, by whom, and not by the officers, any contract binding upon the company would have to be made; and the policy when issued is sent to Mrs. Collett. I am of opinion, therefore, that the directors must be held to have accepted the first proposal wholly and not in part only, and that at the time when this policy was issued the agreement made with the directors by the acceptance of the first proposal remained in force: conclusions at which I arrive the more readily from its appearing, by the fourth condition indorsed upon the policy, that it was contemplated that policies might be issued which were subject to trusts at the time of being granted.

It may be said, indeed, that taking the rules and regulations of the company and the provisions of the statute (2) together, the agreement made upon the first proposal could not by any means have been carried out, and that the Court, therefore, ought not now to act upon it; but independently of what I have already observed as to policies in trust being contemplated, I think that the company having had the chance of the agreement turning out in their favour, cannot be permitted to escape from it now that it has turned out against them.

With reference to the questions raised upon the statute, I do not think it necessary to enter into them. If the statute had prohibited any policy being granted to one person in trust for another, where both names appeared upon the face of the policy, or if the effecting such an assurance had in any manner contravened the policy of the statute, I might have felt myself bound to abstain from any interference, but I am of opinion that the statute has no such operation, and is directed to a wholly different object.

It was suggested on the part of the company that the policy, not being under seal, the plaintiff might bring an action upon it in his own name. I much doubt whether, under the circumstances of this case, such an action could be maintained, and at all events I think it would be attended with many difficulties, and the plaintiff having, in my opinion, a sufficient case in equity, I see no ground for exposing him to difficulties at law.

In dealing with this case I have abstained from entering into the question of fraud, as I do not believe that any actual fraud was intended; but in having taken this course I must not be understood to give any countenance to the notion that insurance companies, preparing and issuing policies under such circumstances as occurred in the present case, would not be held liable in equity on the ground of fraud. The case of fraud is more strong for the interference of the Court than the case of mistake. Lord Eldon in Ex parte Wright (3) refers to the distinction in cases where the duty of perfecting an instrument rests on the party who is to become liable under it. The distinction is clearly well founded in principle, and I believe supported by authority. I have abstained also from entering into the case of collusion; but I certainly must not be understood to express any favourable opinion of the conduct which has been pursued in this case, either by the defendants or by their legal advisers. In the result, I am of opinion that an issue or issues must be directed upon the question as to the health of Mrs. Collett at the time when the first proposal was made.

WATERHOUSE v. STANSFIELD.

Conflict of Laws—Colonial Law—Equity—Jurisdiction—Contract—Lex Loci Rei sitæ—Lex Loci Contractûs.

A mortgagor resident in this country mortgaged, by deed executed in England, to mortgagees also resident here, real estate in Demerara, and before the mortgagees completed their title to the mortgaged property according to the laws of Demerara, the mortgagor became bankrupt and his assignees in this country sold the property and received the proceeds. Whether the rights of the contracting parties have ceased to be governed by the law of Demerara, the lex loci rei sitæ, and must be governed by the law of this country, the lex loci contractûs—quære.

This was a claim by the plaintiffs as equitable mortgagees of a real estate in Demerara agreed to be purchased by Shute Barrington Moody (since become bankrupt), against his assignees in bankruptcy.

By indenture of the 10th of October 1846, between S. B. Moody, of Liverpool, of the one part, and the plaintiffs, brokers and co-partners at Liverpool, under the firm of Waterhouse & Sons, of the other part, reciting that Moody had, on the 14th of August 1845, agreed to purchase from William Grant, of Demerara, certain real property there situated, for 4,250*l.*, on the security of which he had borrowed 2,000*l.* from the plaintiffs, it was witnessed that Moody conveyed to the plaintiffs the property agreed to be purchased and the benefit of the agreement, and covenanted to do all necessary acts for conveying and transporting it to the plaintiffs, according to the laws of Demerara, with the power to nominate an attorney to accept the transport, &c., and under which an attorney was duly appointed. The trusts of the conveyance were to secure to the plaintiffs the repayment of the 2,000*l.* and interest. There being at the time of the conveyance the sum of 1,010*l.* due from Moody to W. Grant, on the balance of the purchase-money, secured by the promissory note of the former, and which the plaintiffs, with his concurrence, paid to W. Grant, the latter duly authorized an attorney in Demerara to transport the property to the attorney of the plaintiffs. Previously to the completion of the transport, Moody, by indenture of the 15th of January 1847, mortgaged the property to Thompson, Hankey & Co. subject to the prior mortgage, for 1,000*l.* and interest; on the application of whom, the Supreme Court in Demerara interdicted the completion of the transport to the plaintiffs. Moody became bankrupt in May 1847, and the defendants completed his title to the property in Demerara, conveyed it to a purchaser for value, and received the proceeds of sale. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the defendants were trustees for them of the proceeds to the amount of 3,010*l.* and interest, and that they might be ordered to pay the same, with costs.

The claim was resisted by the defendants, on the ground that, by the law of Demerara, they were entitled to the proceeds of sale. They stated that real estate in that colony was not affected by a mortgage made in England; that a mortgage of such estate must be passed by one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, after notice by advertisement in the official gazette of Demerara on three successive Saturdays; that every creditor had a right by the law of the colony to prevent his debtor, whether solvent or insolvent, from giving a preference to another creditor by mortgage or otherwise; and that the bankruptcy of Moody having been pleaded in bar to the suits of his said mortgagees in Demerara, such suits had been abandoned, and become determined.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Glasse, for the plaintiffs, contended that as the plaintiffs and the bankrupt (the contracting parties), as well as the assignees of the latter, were resident in this country, the property came to the hands of the assignees charged with the plaintiffs' equity, and therefore the defendants were bound to pay the mortgage debt out of the proceeds of the sale; and à fortiori as the plaintiffs had paid part of the purchase-money of the estate to the vendor. They cited Ex parte Pollard, re Courtney (1), and Martin v. Martin (2).

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Lewin, for the defendants, cited—

Voetius De Pignoriibus, &c. lib. 20, tit. 1. ss. 9, 10.

Mr. Bacon replied.

Aug. 20.—TURNER, V.C. delivered the following judgment.—Upon the argument of this claim several points were made on the part of the plaintiffs. First, that the defendants, the assignees, are bound by all the equities by which the bankrupt was bound; and that the Court, finding them in possession of the proceeds of an estate which by contract with the bankrupt was bound in favour of the plaintiffs, will give effect to the contract against those proceeds. Secondly, that it is not clear that the creditors could have stopped the mortgage; and assuming that they could, that they took no steps for the purpose. Thirdly, that at all events the plaintiffs are entitled to a lien upon the proceeds of the sale for the purchase-money, which they paid to W. Grant.

The case of Ex parte Pollard was cited upon the first point; but in that case the law of Scotland presented no impediment to the mortgage being completed; the contract bound the bankrupt, and therefore his assignees, and there was no impediment to its completion. But in this case the contract indeed may bind the bankrupt and the assignees, and yet, by the law of Demerara, may not have been capable of being fulfilled. The two cases, therefore, are widely different; and I cannot hold this case to be governed by Ex parte Pollard.

If it can be decided in favour of the

(1) Mont. & C. 239, and 4 Deac. 27, reversing s. c. 3 Mont. & Ayr. 340; 2 Deac. 367; 6 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Bankr. 95.

plaintiffs without some further inquiry, it must, I think, be upon the more broad and general ground that the property having been sold, and the proceeds of the sale received by the defendants, the assignees, the rights of the parties have ceased to be governed by the law of Demerara, the lex loci rei sitæ, and must be governed by the law of this country, the lex loci contractus. No authority has been cited, nor have I been able to find any which touches this point; but I think it must depend upon the question, how far the lex loci rei sitæ extends. If it regulates not merely the disposition of the estate itself, but also the disposition of the proceeds of the estate, it cannot, I think, be permitted that a different law should intervene and defeat those regulations. The interest in the proceeds is in substance and effect an interest in the estate itself, and no rule is more universal than that the lex loci rei sitæ governs the disposition of the estate. If the lex loci rei sitæ only permits the alienation of the estate upon the terms of the proceeds being applied in a particular manner, this is a restraint upon the alienation; and there is no doubt that the restraints which may be put upon alienation must in all cases be governed by the lex loci rei sitæ. Again, how could a contract to dispose of the proceeds of an estate in a manner contrary to that prescribed by the lex loci rei sitæ be enforced? I cannot, therefore, adopt the broad position contended for on the part of the plaintiffs, but must send the matter to the Master for further inquiry as to the law of Demerara.

The second point is also one upon which further inquiry must, I think, be directed.

Upon the third point it was argued, on the part of the defendants, that the monies paid by the plaintiffs to W. Grant were part of the monies advanced upon the mortgage; and that the plaintiffs, therefore, could claim no lien in respect of such monies: and further, that the plaintiffs have, by the claim, put their case wholly upon the mortgage, and could not, therefore, be permitted to maintain it upon the claim of lien. But the claim states the payment to W. Grant; and I think there is enough upon it to warrant the Court in acting upon the lien, if it in fact exists. Whether it exists or not is a question of Demerara law, and must therefore, I think, also be the subject of inquiry.

Company — Winding-up Acts — Appeal from Order for Winding up and for Calls for Expenses.

Seven persons were elected the managing committee of a company, and performed acts in that character. The scheme proved abortive. Actions were brought against one of the seven, and he obtained an order for winding up the company. Others of the seven had made a similar attempt, but were not in time to do so before the order was actually obtained. An official manager was appointed, and the order was prosecuted with the concurrence of all seven. Four of the seven appealed from the order for winding up, and also from an order for a call to pay the costs and expenses and the debt; but it was held, first, that whether the order for winding up were rightly or wrongly made, the four could not move to discharge it; and, secondly, that the order for the call was properly made on the seven members of the managing committee.

The above-named abortive company was started by persons who denominated themselves "the provisional committee," and they provisionally registered the association, and afterwards called a meeting of the committee, on the 7th of October 1845, at which thirty-one persons attended, and out of them seven, namely, Mr. Woolmer, Mr. Bastard, Major D'Urban, Col. Ellis, Mr. Kingdon, Mr. Salter, and Mr. Tanner, were elected the committee of management. That body opened a banking account, appointed engineers, surveyors, and solicitors; and under their direction the line was surveyed; they published the parliamentary notices, and did other acts. They allotted shares in December, and no deposits being paid, the scheme was abandoned in January following. Several of the creditors of the company brought actions in 1848 against Col. Ellis, and among these actions was one by Mr. Floud, the solicitor of the company, for 1,508*l*. Some of the members of the managing committee intended and (on the evidence) endeavoured to obtain an order for winding up the company, but Col. Ellis anticipated them and obtained such an order on the 8th of June 1849, and the order was served on Mr. Salter, one of the seven. Mr. Sandeman was appointed official manager on the 10th of July, the appointment having been discussed before the Master in the presence of the solicitors for Mr. Woolmer, Mr. Bastard, Mr. Kingdon and Mr. Salter. The claims made against the company exceeded 1,700*l*. For a time the provisional committee-men and the allottees were placed on the list of contributories, but they subsequently were removed on appeals, and the seven were ultimately declared the only contributories, and the proceedings thus taking place were the occasion of a large amount of costs being incurred. The four gentlemen, Mr. Woolmer, Mr. Bastard, Mr. Kingdon and Mr. Salter presented a petition to Vice Chancellor Parker, on the 15th of May 1851, to discharge the winding-up order, but on the 26th of January 1852 it was dismissed, with costs. The Master then made a call of 400*l*. on each of the seven managing committee; but that order, on appeal, was discharged, on the ground that the debts had not been ascertained nor the costs taxed. It then appeared that only 86*l*. 3*s*. of debts were demanded, all other persons having withdrawn their claims, although some actions were pending. The four gentlemen now appealed against the order made by Vice Chancellor Parker, and the same was ordered to stand over until the Master could ascertain the debts and expenses, and make such call as he deemed right. These proceedings were taken, and the debts were found to be only 86*l*. 3*s*., and the costs and expenses 3,019*l*. 4*s*., and the costs had been taxed. On the 3rd of July 1852, the Master made a call on the seven for the full amount in unequal sums, because each of them had paid money, and after deducting such money, these several sums would make up the amount in equal sevenths.

The four gentlemen now appealed from the order of the Vice Chancellor, and against the order for the call.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Terrell, for the appellants.

Sir W. P. Wood and Mr. Roxburgh, for the official manager.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Daniel, for Col. Ellis.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This case comes before us upon two proceedings: first, upon a petition by four out of seven gentlemen, who constitute the list of contributories, as ultimately established in the Master's office, to discharge the winding-up order; and, secondly, upon a motion by those same gentlemen, to discharge an order made for a call to raise a sum of 3,019*l*. 4*s*. We have already intimated in the progress of the argument, that when the affidavits came to be fully stated before us, the first application—the application by the petition to discharge the winding-up order which Vice Chancellor Parker had refused to discharge—was entirely without foundation. We not only intimated that, but we intimated pretty clearly the ground on which we came to the conclusion, that the winding-up order, whether rightly or wrongly obtained, was an order obtained practically as much by the present petitioners as by Col. Ellis. They were both proposing to obtain what they thought, and perhaps rightly thought, was a fit and expedient course to take. They were both proceeding in that course; and Col. Ellis got the order first. It was prosecuted by him, but evidently with the sanction and concurrence of the other parties, who took as much part in the proceeding as he took. We are clearly of opinion that they could not say that Col. Ellis had done wrong in obtaining the order from the commencement. If he had not done it—if he had been a fortnight later, or a week later, they would have got it themselves. Both parties were proceeding to obtain the order. Col. Ellis obtains it, and the other party cannot now say that the order was wrongly obtained. We think the Vice Chancellor was right in refusing the present petition to discharge that order; and, consequently, that the appeal from him must be dismissed, with costs.

Now, how is the matter with regard to the motion to discharge the order for the call? When it comes to be sifted, the way the matter stands is this, the great object of the parties obtaining the order—I say the parties, because I consider Mr. Woolmer and Mr. Kingdon, and other gentlemen who are trying to discharge the order, were just as much applicants for the order as Col. Ellis himself—was to fix the liability to the expenses of this company, not upon the managing committee only, the seven who were eventually constituted the only contributories, but to throw that liability over a much wider surface, to include among the contributories either the whole body of the provisional committee-men, or certain of the provisional committee-men who were supposed to have rendered themselves more liable than the general body, and, in short, to disperse among thirty or forty the liabilities which have been eventually thrown upon the seven, and for that purpose they endeavoured to place upon the list of contributories a great number of other persons. They succeeded in doing so, as far as the Master's office was concerned; but those parties, from time to time, appealed against the decision of the Master, and, it turned out, successfully appealed; so successfully, that instead of the number, thirty or forty, that was originally put on the list as being contributories, by successful appeals made by those parties so placed, their names were removed, and the number reduced to the present seven that constituted the managing committee. The result of all these appeals was, that very heavy costs were incurred: costs that practically amount to the whole of the sum now sought to be recovered; because, although there is one creditor of 83*l.* he may be put out of the case; and, therefore, it turns out that the attempt to wind up the affairs of the company, and to diffuse the liability among other persons besides the seven eventually found to be liable, has occasioned the sum, which the Master estimates at 3,019*l.* 4*s.* I say estimates, for I will assume, for the purpose of the present argument, that the exact amount has never been conclusively established, but this estimate is made, not on any loose grounds, for, even if Mr. Bacon is right in saying that there has never been any taxation, properly so called, at which the parties interested in cutting down the amount of the bill have been heard as against the party setting up the bill, yet the bill has been in a sense taxed. The Master has had it laid before a party competent to exercise a judgment upon it, and that party, one of the taxing Masters, has reduced it to an amount that leaves it at 3,019*l.* 4*s.* for the whole demand. The Master thinks it reasonable that that amount should be raised, and we both concur in thinking that was a very reasonable conclusion. It is true that this is a sum for which the parties that will be liable to pay it have, in one sense, had no value, that is, they get nothing; but I think the observation is very truly made on that remark, that that may be said of any person who having resisted a demand has to pay large costs. It is true that in one sense he gets nothing, because he was wrong, yet he got a locum standi to contest the point, whether he was right or wrong. If his views of the law had been right, he would have got a great benefit; it turns out that he was wrong, consequently he is like any other parties, litigants in a court of justice, who have bond fide endeavoured to resist a demand, thinking they have a legitimate defence, and it turns out that they have no such defence. Who is to pay? Why, the parties who have caused this expense. They have been endeavouring to satisfy the Court that they were not the only contributories, but that others were liable with them, and they endeavoured to reduce the sum to a very small amount. They failed in doing so, and for their attempt they must pay. Now, we are desired to make a final end here. Probably it may be exceedingly reasonable that these parties should acquiesce in the taxation, on the arrangement which the Master has made about the amount that is to be raised. But we do not think that by our decision we necessarily conclude the parties, if they mean to say that this sum when raised is not to be applied in the manner proposed, because some of it will be unnecessary. That is open to them, if they should be so advised.

It would be a very unwise thing so to act, but that is a matter in which they must exercise their own judgment. All that we can say is, that the Master exercised a sound judgment in directing that this amount, which has been ascertained as nearly as it can be, must be raised for the purpose of paying these costs.

Then, that being so, the only question is, has he assessed it in a reasonable and proper manner? Here, again, not meaning to say a case might not be made hereafter to shew that some of this must be returned to the parties, yet, prima facie, we think the Master has taken the most convenient and only practical course that could be taken; he has found seven people who are among themselves liable to pay this sum of money. In what proportion have they hitherto paid? He has taken the payments de facto made, and all made bond fide. It may be that what the present petitioners say is right, that Col. Ellis was less justified in incurring his costs in resisting the creditors than they were in resisting their creditors, because their liability was more clear at the time Col. Ellis resisted than at their time; but these are niceties which, in the present state of our information, we cannot possibly inquire into. It appears to us, not only that the Master has done right in saying that this sum must be raised, but that he has taken the only legitimate mode of ascertaining the proportion in which each party is to contribute. He has taken the proportion arising from what each party has contributed: then, finding that what he contributed shews what he is to pay on the shares, he makes a ratio of equality among them. I do not know that it is an absolute equality, but they have all the same amount of shares. It seems to us that this is a reasonable and proper course to be taken, and, consequently, that this application ought not to have been made; and, therefore, this motion must be refused, with costs, in the same way as the petition of appeal.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE expressed himself to be of the same opinion.

{ THE WARDEN AND ASSISTANTS OF THE HARBOUR OF DOVER v. THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway Company—Railway Act—Construction—Buildings connected with Railway.

A local railway act enacted that the whole of certain ground in a seaport town, conveyed to the company, should be used solely for the purposes of the railway and the buildings connected therewith, except for coke ovens or any purposes (other than the necessary purposes of the railway), which might cause nuisance or damage to the vendors' other property:—Held, not to restrain the company from allowing part of the building to be used as the Custom-house, for passing the luggage of passengers and travellers and other Custom-house duties.

Whether part of the buildings could be used as sleeping rooms in connexion with an hotel built by the company on the adjoining ground—quære.

This was a motion, by the plaintiffs, for an injunction to restrain the South-Eastern Railway Company, their servants and agents, from using or allowing a certain building erected by the company, or any part of such building, to be used for any other than the purposes of their railway; and in particular from the same being used for the examination of luggage or other purposes as a Custom-house; or as lodging or sleeping rooms for travellers or passengers, or for the business of an inn or hotel. And that the company might be restrained from permitting the building to remain in its present or any form, the elevation of which was unapproved of by the surveyor of the plaintiffs; and from using, or permitting to be used, any part of the building for any purposes whatever until the elevation had been approved by the said surveyor.

The bill stated that by the 8th and 15th sections of an act of parliament (6 & 7 Vict. c. li.), intituled "An Act to enable the South-Eastern Railway Company to extend the line of their railway into the town of Dover," it was enacted to the following effect, viz. by the 8th section, "that no erection or building should be made without the consent of the plaintiffs or their surveyor, on certain land conveyed by them to the company, exceeding the respective heights therein specified;" and by the 15th section, "that the whole of the land to be sold by the plaintiffs to the company should be appropriated to, and used solely for, the purposes of the railway and the buildings connected therewith, except such part as might be required by the Board of Ordnance, or might be necessary to be left open for the increased width of the streets, in order to form the necessary approaches to the railway station: provided always, that the said ground should not be used or employed for building or erecting thereon any coke ovens or for any other purposes (the necessary railway purposes only excepted), by which any nuisance might be created or the other property of the plaintiffs in any way damaged." The plaintiffs also stated that a plan had been approved by their surveyor in 1843 of buildings then proposed to be erected by the company, but which were not completed, and that in 1851 the company erected the present building, and contrary to the approved plan, and that part of it was now used as Her Majesty's Custom-house for examining the luggage of passengers and travellers, collecting duties, granting certificates to aliens, &c. And further that the upper floors of the building were laid out and intended to be used as bed-rooms in connexion with an hotel erected by the company on the ground held by them on lease from their chairman, and which if so used would be to the injury of the plaintiffs' property, consisting of several large inns and hotels in Dover, and to prevent which injury, the stipulation in the above act had been inserted to restrain the use of the plaintiffs' ground conveyed to the company from being used for buildings otherwise than for railway purposes.

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Renshaw, for the motion.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Simpson, against it.

The VICE CHANCELLOR disposed during the argument of that part of the injunction which sought to restrain the keeping and using of the building at its present elevation; upon which point the following authorities were cited—

Lane v. Newdigate, 10 Ves. 192.

Blakemore v. the Glamorganshire Canal Company, 1 Myl. & K. 154; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 95.

Greatrex v. Greatrex, 1 De Gex & S. 692.

The London and Brighton Railway Company v. Cooper, 2 Rail. Cas. 312.

Lord Petre v. the Eastern Counties Railway Company, 3 Rail. Cas. 367.

Mr. Rolt replied.

TURNER, V.C.—After the consideration which I have had the opportunity of giving to this case, I do not think that any further time I might take would enable me to arrive at a conclusion more satisfactory to me than that which I am now prepared to state; and, therefore, I do not think it right to delay my judgment. With reference to the question which has been raised upon the subject of elevation, I wish to add to what I said yesterday that I by no means intend to lay down, that if a building should be erected contrary to a contract between the parties, it would not be within the power of this Court to restrain the use of that building. I think that Lord Petre's case would go to that extent. What I meant to say on the question whether a building of the height of forty feet, or of forty-six feet, is to be allowed to be used, there being no doubt that the building might be erected of the height of forty feet, although it could not be erected of the height of forty-six feet, is, that such is not a case in which the Court would interfere by injunction, unless some irreparable injury was shewn to be likely to arise in the mean time. The question remaining to be considered is on the subject of the use of the building for the purposes of the Custom-house, and in connexion with the bed-rooms; and the argument has been properly dealt with in the reply, and considered as confined merely to the 15th section of the act. In truth, it is on the

The first consideration which arises is, what are the purpose and object of the 15th section? I think the primary object of that clause is the laying out of the land purchased by the railway company from the warden and assistants, and I think so for this reason: the words of the clause are not that the whole of the land or ground to be sold by the warden and assistants to the company and the buildings thereon shall be appropriated to and used solely for the purposes of the railway, but that the land or ground to be sold shall be appropriated solely to and for the purposes of the railway, and the buildings connected therewith. It is, therefore, the use of the land and ground at which the clause properly looks; and, on the second branch of the clause, I think the same view arises. It is "except such part or portion thereof as may be required by the Board of Ordnance, or may be necessary to be left open for the increased width of streets, in order to form the necessary approaches to the station:" still looking not to the use of the buildings to be erected on the land or ground, but to the mode in which the land or ground is to be laid out or applied. The proviso seems to bear the same construction: "provided that the said ground shall not be used or employed for building or erecting thereon any coke ovens, or for any other purposes (the necessary railway purposes only excepted) by which any nuisance may be created or the other property of the said warden and assistants in any way damaged." Looking at this clause with that view, as directed to the use to be made of the land or ground, and not specifically to the use of the buildings on it, I think that this question really depends upon the narrow words which are contained in the clause "and the buildings connected therewith." The contract is, that the whole of the land or ground shall be appropriated to and solely for the purposes of the railway and the buildings connected therewith; and the first question to be considered is, what is the principle to be applied to the construction of this clause? This is a purchase, in effect a deed of conveyance, a parliamentary conveyance under a parliamentary power to sell to a party, as owner in fee; and I think, therefore, that every sound construction requires that the restriction which is imposed upon the owner in fee, who becomes the purchaser under that clause, shall not be enlarged or extended beyond its necessary limits. Let us then consider what is the meaning of the words "buildings connected therewith."

I quite agree with the construction that "connected therewith" means connected with the railway; and I think there are three meanings which may be attached to those words. They may mean locally connected with the railway, or connected with the railway in the sense in which other buildings are connected with other railways, or connected with the railway as buildings applicable to that particular railway. I concur with Mr. Rolt's argument upon that point, that they do not mean locally connected with the railway. I think that the mere fact of the buildings being locally connected with the railway could not be meant by the expression "buildings connected therewith," as used in this act. Do they then mean buildings connected with this railway, in the same sense as other buildings connected with other railways? I do not think that that limited construction can be put on them, for the words are "solely for the purposes of the said railway, and the buildings connected therewith." I think this must be read "for the purposes of the said railway and the buildings connected with such particular railway." The construction of this clause, therefore, cannot be governed by considerations of what would or would not be connected with other and different railways. Taking the clause, then, as applying to buildings connected with this particular railway, it follows to be considered what is, within the language of this clause, properly a building connected with the particular railway. I really do not know what construction can be put upon, or what meaning can be attached to, the words "buildings connected with the railway," unless it be buildings which are used in some portion, or in some sense for the purposes of the railway. How, then, does the case stand with reference to these buildings being or not being used for the purposes of the railway? Why the fact, so far as it relates to one portion of the case, as to the Custom-house, is, that one of the rooms in this building is exclusively appropriated for the use of the Custom-house; and I think I may take this to be so. But by the side of that room there is another room, in which the passengers wait whilst their luggage is being examined by the Custom-house officers; and on the other side, there is another room into which the luggage, after it has been examined, is passed from the centre room, and then the luggage is separated and packed up again by the town porters (whose business seems to be, according to the evidence, to manage and carry the luggage in Dover), and then it is handed over a rail, or partition, to porters who carry it either to the railway or to any other place where it may be required.

Now is or is not that building so used connected with the railway? It is a building which, to some extent, at least, is used for the purposes of the railway. Can I then say that a building which is, to a certain extent, used for the purposes of the railway is not to be considered as a building connected with the railway, because other purposes are added to the use of it, and because in that building are examined not merely the luggage of passengers who pass along the railway, but the luggage of other persons who may not leave Dover, or who may go to hotels in the town? I do not think it is a fair and reasonable construction of this act of parliament to hold that because a building is used, and, I think, according to the evidence in this case, principally used for the purpose of examining the luggage of passengers coming from abroad and passing along the railway (one of the affidavits states that there are very few other purposes for which it is used), it, therefore, follows that it is not a building used for purposes connected with the railway. I think, that being the primary purpose, I should not be justified in holding this use of the building to be such as the act of parliament does not authorize.

The last branch of the clause in the act itself seems to me to throw some light upon the construction on this point. The first branch of the proviso is a restrictive clause, and the second branch contemplates that the restriction imposed by the first would not be sufficient, and, therefore, extends it. It is by the first branch of the clause that the company are enabled to appropriate and use the building for the purposes of the railway; but still they might appropriate and use it for purposes that are a nuisance to the adjoining property, and the proviso is that they shall not use it even for those purposes if they produce any nuisance to the adjoining property. I think this shews that it was in the contemplation of the parties and the legislature, that the property might be used for other purposes of the railway, provided no nuisance was created by such use; otherwise I do not understand what is the meaning of that clause "or for any other purposes (the necessary purposes of the railway excepted) by which a nuisance might be created." It seems to contemplate that it might be used for other purposes than the necessary purposes of the railway, and that these other purposes might be a nuisance; and, therefore, it provides that it shall not be used for a nuisance.

Upon the whole construction, therefore, of this clause, I am of opinion that I cannot grant this injunction with reference to the Custom-house. As to the bed-rooms I think the same argument that applies to the one applies also to the other. I am not prepared to say that there may not hereafter be such a use of these bed-rooms as would induce this Court to interfere; but as the case at present stands, I think there is no evidence before me that there is any intention to use them for any such purposes as would warrant me in holding that the building is not bond fide intended to be used, and to be considered as a building connected with the railway. Upon the whole I must refuse this motion, but I shall certainly refuse it without costs.

Motion refused, without costs.

TURNER, V.C. }
Jan. 22. } CROSSE v. LAWRENCE.

Vendor and Purchaser—Specific Performance—Contract—Construction—Freeholds and Copyholds intermixed—Timber.

Where there is one entire contract for the sale of intermixed freehold and copyhold lands, and of the timber on both lands, and the vendor stipulates against distinguishing the freeholds from the copyholds, the title to the timber follows the land, and the purchaser cannot insist upon having the timber growing on the copyholds distinguished from that growing on the freeholds, although the price for the timber is in addition to that for the land.

This was a claim by the vendor against the purchaser for the specific performance of an agreement to purchase, by private contract, according to particulars and conditions which had been prepared for an intended sale by auction, a certain farm for 3,000*l.*, and the timber, &c. (at a valuation) for 263*l.* 1*s.*, total 3,263*l.*; upon which the purchaser had paid a deposit, leaving a balance of 2,237*l.* 1*s.* still due. The particulars stated that the property consisted partly of freehold and partly of copyhold lands, and that the copyhold parts could not be distinguished from the freehold; that the timber was to be paid for by the purchaser, in addition to the purchase-money for the lots, and had been carefully valued for the purposes of the sale; and that the purchaser would also be required to take and pay for the crops, dressings, &c. to the out-going tenant. By the conditions of sale it was stipulated—

Condition 3. That each purchaser should pay a deposit of 20*l.* per cent. in part of the purchase-money (including the value of the timber).

4. That if the purchase was not duly completed, the purchaser should pay interest upon the purchase and timber money remaining unpaid until the actual completion.

7. That as to such of the lots as were described to be partly freehold and partly copyhold, the purchasers should not be entitled to have it shewn how much of such lots respectively were freehold and how much copyhold, nor have the freehold and copyhold parts respectively identified and distinguished, or the boundaries thereof respectively ascertained, nor to make any inquiry into or concerning the same.

9. That upon payment of the remainder of the purchase-money and of the amount of the valuation according to the particulars of sale, the vendors would, subject to the conditions, execute and perfect proper assurances to the purchasers.

The defendant objected to pay for such of the timber as could not be shewn to be growing on the freehold part of the farm, and he stated that he had bought the property for building purposes.

Mr. James Russell and Mr. W. D. Lewis, for the vendor, submitted that the contract for the purchase of the land and timber was one entire contract, and not divisible into two contracts for the separate purchases of the land and timber, and, consequently, that the purchaser was restricted by the conditions of sale from requiring the copyhold timber to be distinguished by the vendor from the freehold portion of it. They cited the following cases on the right of a tenant in respect of copyhold timber, minerals, &c.—

Ashmead v. Ranger, 1 Ld. Raym. 551.

Whitechurch v. Holworthy, 4 M. & S. 340.

Lewis v. Branthwaite, 2 B. & Ad. 437; s. c. 9 Law J. Rep. K.B. 263.

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood) and Mr. W. M. James, for the defendant, argued that the restriction as to inquiries concerning the freehold and copyhold parts of the property was limited to the land, and did not extend to the timber. A copyhold tenant could not cut timber without the sanction of, or grant from, the lord. No grant could be presumed in this case, because the manor (Leswery) of which the copyholds were part, was vested in the Crown, against whom no grant could be presumed. It would, therefore, be as unjust to require the purchaser to pay for timber which he could not fell, as it would be to require him to pay to the out-going tenant the value of the crops to which a stranger might have a title.

Mr. J. Russell replied.

TURNER, V.C.—The question in this case appears to me, principally, if not wholly, to depend upon the point of whether the contract for the purchase of the timber and the purchase of the land are to be considered as separate and distinct contracts, or as constituting together one contract; for, undoubtedly, if the contract for the purchase of the timber is to be considered as a separate and distinct contract, it would be incumbent upon the vendor to prove either that there was a custom of the manor entitling the vendor to cut timber, or that it was a case in which a grant of right to cut timber might be presumed in favour of the tenant.

It was argued, on behalf of the purchaser, that the contract for the timber and the contract for the land are to be considered as separate and distinct contracts. This argument was founded on the terms of the stipulation with regard to the timber, and the words "in addition to the purchase-money for the lots," contained in this stipulation, were adduced as constituting a separate and distinct contract for the purchase of the timber. But it is to be observed, that that stipulation speaks of the valuation of the timber having been made "for the purposes of this sale." Now the purposes of the sale were clearly not for the sale of the timber, but for the sale of the estate; and, therefore that stipulation itself connects the sale of the timber with the sale of estate. But further than this, the third condition of sale seems to incorporate the value of the timber with the purchase-money for the estate, for it provides for the payment of the deposit and of the remainder of the purchase-money, including the value of the timber. The fourth condition also incorporates the purchase of the estate and the timber together, by stipulating that the interest shall be paid on the purchase and timber money remaining unpaid. The ninth condition is to the same effect, for it makes no distinction between the assurances of the timber and the assurances of the estate, but deals with them as one complete and entire subject of one entire contract; and there are, moreover, no stipulations whatever on the face of the conditions of sale as to any title whatever being shewn to the timber. I cannot, therefore, consider upon the result of the particulars and conditions of sale, taken as a whole, that this can be considered as a separate and distinct contract for the purchase of the timber. If the contract for the timber is not to be considered as distinct, this is in truth a contract for the purchase of the land with the timber upon it, and the title to the land is the title to the timber, and so considering it, we must see what are the other conditions of sale with reference to the land.

Now, with reference to the land, there is a distinct stipulation by the seventh condition, that the purchasers thereof shall not be entitled to have it shewn how much of the lots referred to (of which this is one) is freehold, and how much copyhold; nor to have the freehold and copyhold parts respectively identified and distinguished, or the boundaries thereof ascertained, nor to make any inquiry concerning them; and in the description of the lot itself, it is stated that the vendors had not distinguished the copyhold part from the freehold. Now, considering the timber as part of the land which is contracted to be sold, this is in truth a stipulation that the purchaser shall not inquire into the title of the timber—that he shall require no separate title to the timber. I think, therefore, that this is to be considered as one entire contract, and that the title to the timber depends on the title to the land. I will put this case as if it were the case of a valuation. Suppose that, appended to the ninth condition of sale, you had found a stipulation that the timber should be taken at a valuation, how would that have to be valued? Undoubtedly, not according to the value of the copyhold interest, for the vendor says, "I am not bound to distinguish, and will not be bound to distinguish what is freehold and what is copyhold." You cannot attribute any other meaning to the stipulation that the timber is to be paid for at a valuation, than that it should be valued as timber, and not according to the interest that was incident to the tenure of the land. But suppose again that all this land turned out to be copyhold, it could not be an answer to the claim on the part of the vendor (taking it as one entire contract, and the price to be paid as one entire amount), that the value which was agreed to be paid for the timber was the value of timber on freehold land, and not of timber on copyhold land. It is quite consistent with these conditions of sale, that the whole of the land might have been copyhold; and if the purchaser could not excuse himself in that case, I do not think he can excuse himself in a case where part of the land only upon which the timber is standing may be copyhold. Again, in cases of this description, where a purchaser buys on such conditions, he must be considered as estimating, in the price he pays for the land, the price he pays for the timber. He knows that part of the land which he buys is or may turn out to be copyhold; that, if it be copyhold he can only have a certain interest in the timber. He agrees to pay a certain price for the timber; and I think he must be considered as calculating in his own mind, at the time he makes the purchase, that he agrees to give a certain sum for the timber, of which he may not be entitled to have that full ownership that he would if the timber stood upon freehold land; and that, therefore, he makes a deduction from the purchase-money which would compensate him for what he might not get. A case was very ingeniously put as to fixtures, which I do not think is applicable in the way it was used on behalf of the purchaser. I take this case as to fixtures to be much more resembling the present case than that suggested. Suppose a man to say, "I agree to sell you the house with the fixtures in it. I cannot tell you what fixtures belong to the landlord, and what to the tenant; but you shall give me a certain sum for the fixtures." I think this Court would have no hesitation in saying, in a case of that description; it would enforce a contract against the purchaser who had entered into such a stipulation. And so it is here, where the vendor says, "I cannot tell which is copyhold;" he sells the timber as incident to the land: he says, "I cannot tell you what your interest in the timber will be; but I stipulate that you shall pay a certain sum for the value of that timber."

I think, therefore, on all these grounds, the purchaser must complete the present contract according to the conditions of sale, and pay the purchase-money, and the interest at 5*l.* per cent. and the costs.

TURNER, V.C. }
Jan. 22. } CROSSE v. KEENE.

Vendor and Purchaser—Specific Performance—Copyhold Timber—Contract—Construction.

Under a contract to sell a copyhold estate and the timber upon it, at a certain price for the estate, and an additional price for the timber, according to the amount at which the timber had been previously valued for the purpose of the sale, the vendor is not bound to shew any licence, custom, or grant to sell or cut the timber.

This was a claim by the plaintiff in Crosse v. Lawrence, ante, against a purchaser under a similar contract to that in the last-mentioned case. The only difference between the two cases was, that in the present case the property contracted to be purchased consisted entirely of copyhold land.

Mr. James Russell and Mr. W. D. Lewis appeared for the plaintiff; and

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood) and Mr. W. M. James, for the defendant.

The argument for the defendant was, that the purchaser was entitled to evidence that the vendor could by licence, custom, grant, or otherwise shew a right to sell the timber to the purchaser; but

TURNER, V.C., said, that he could not in principle distinguish this case from that of Crosse v. Lawrence; and that it appeared to him, though the conditions of sale did not specifically apply to the present case, that they applied to the question for the purpose of considering whether there was one contract or two. With respect to a case which had been suggested in argument, of selling the crop of corn, his Honour thought the distinction between that and the present case was, that the crop of corn was not capable of continuous enjoyment with the estate, but that the timber was. This, equally with others, appeared to be an agreement for the purchase of the estate with timber, to be enjoyed upon it, at a value derived from that consideration. A decree must therefore be made similar to the decree in Crosse v. Lawrence.

LORDS JUSTICES.
1852. }
April 26, 27, 28, 29. } MONEY v. JORDEN (1).

Injunction—Debt—Promise to forego—Irrevocable Engagements contracted.

The Court below having held that a party who, by representations, had induced another to enter into irrevocable engagements, must be restrained from taking proceedings to enforce obligations and promises, the abandonment of all intention to enforce which was the subject of those representations, the decree granting a perpetual injunction to restrain such proceedings was on appeal confirmed; Lord Justice Lord Cranworth dissenting: first, because this case was not within the principle of the cases on which the decree below was professed to be grounded, those cases depending on misrepresentation of fact, while here there was no misrepresentation of fact; and, secondly, because the promise alleged by the plaintiff was supported by the evidence of one witness only (who had since died), and which was not, in his Lordship's opinion, supported by the surrounding circumstances, and was positively denied by the answer.

This case was heard, before the Master of the Rolls, in January 1852, and he made a decree in the plaintiff's favour. The facts are stated in the judgment of his Honour, ante, pp. 531—536, and are somewhat fully entered into below, in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. It will, therefore, be necessary merely to state that Mrs. Jorden, when Miss Louisa Marnell, became owner of a bond and warrant of attorney, upon which judgment had been entered up, and which Mr. J. W. B. Money had given to secure payment of 1,200*l.* This security she promised not to enforce; and, on the strength of that promise, Mr. J. W. B. Money married, the promise having been given in consideration of the father of Mr. J. W. B. Money abstaining from making a settlement on his marriage of real property, which he had conveyed to Miss Marnell, without consideration. The defendant Mrs. Jorden having issued execution on the judgment, and taken the plaintiff in execution, the bill was filed for a perpetual injunction, which was granted by the Master of the Rolls; and from that decree the defendants appealed.

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Bates were for the respondent, the plaintiff, in support of the decree of the Court below, and cited, in addition to the cases relied on by the plaintiff below, the following:

Gale v. Lindo, 1 Vern. 475.

Scott v. Scott, 1 Cox, 366.

Podmore v. Gunning, 5 Sim. 485.

Mr. Willcock and Mr. F. T. White, for the appellants, cited the following additional cases:—

Montefiori v. Montefiori, 1 W. Black. 363.

Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Term Rep. 51.

Ames v. Milward, 8 Taunt. 637.

Maunsell v. White, 1 Jo. & Lat. 539, 557.

April 29. — LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—In this case, which is before us on an appeal presented by Mr. and Mrs. Jorden, two of the defendants, against a decree made in the plaintiff's favour at the Rolls, in February last, the object of the suit was to be relieved against a debt, or an alleged debt, claimed to be due from him to the defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Jorden, or to them and the defendant Mr. Money, as a trustee in effect for Mr. and Mrs. Jorden, upon a bond and a judgment, or upon the latter, under which Mr. and Mrs. Jorden, in the names, I believe, of themselves and the other defendant, issued execution against the plaintiff's person, after the common injunction obtained in this cause in the year 1850, had been by an order of the 5th of August in that year dissolved, or as to Mr. and Mrs. Jorden dissolved absolutely (whether regularly or otherwise) upon the case stated in the answers of Mr. and Mrs. Jorden, or in the earlier of them. From the caption, however, the plaintiff was speedily released by means of another order in this cause, dated the 12th of December 1850.—[This order was an order under which the money due on the bond was paid into court by the plaintiff. The Lord Chief Justice then entered into the history of the speculations which Miss Marnell's brother had suggested, and in which Mr. Money, jun. engaged : and proceeded]—Miss Marnell, who had been known for years to the plaintiff's family, was under obligations to his father, and appears to have regarded the plaintiff not merely with friendship but with affection,—that affection, I mean, which a kind aunt or an elder sister feels for a favourite nephew or a much younger brother. Miss Marnell, I say, thus circumstanced, not only did not regard her brother's conduct in this affair with approbation (it would, indeed, have been very odd if she had), but openly and repeatedly condemned it in very plain and strong terms, and after she had become his representative declared often to the plaintiff and to various persons, in effect that she would never claim the debt of the plaintiff, but would abandon, and indeed had abandoned it. * * * The plaintiff became engaged in 1844 to marry the lady whom in the following year he married. The engagement was, of course, communicated to his almost maternal friend, and if anything could have diminished her proneness to converse upon the debt and all its history, this, at least, seems not to have been so. She, or a solicitor for her, had retained the bond on which Mr. Hooper was, as one of the obligors, considered to be liable, if his certificate under the bankruptcy could be avoided, of the probability of which there seems to have been some belief, though whether he would, under any circumstances, have paid, may be questionable ; but she appears to have thought this chance worth something, and on that ground—and perhaps, also, from other easily conjecturable feelings—to have made a point of not parting with the instrument, though perpetually declaring in substance that the plaintiff should never be troubled about it. Endeavours, however, after the announcement of the plaintiff's intended marriage, were renewed or made to obtain her consent to the destruction or delivery up of the document, which every one seems to have considered as in force, notwithstanding the judgment, and as representing the debt. But the bond was too favourite a possession as well as too favourite a topic to be parted with, and was still kept by herself, or for her by a solicitor, who was not desirous that it should be given up.—[His Lordship then entered into a detail of the early history of the acquaintance between the parties in India, the acquisition of the Midnapore property, and stated his opinion to be that it was plainly impossible upon the evidence to conclude that there was any valuable consideration for the conveyance, and then proceeded to read the answer of Mr. George Money, to the ninth and tenth interrogatories, as follows :]—

(1) This case is reported on a point of practice, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 174; and on the main question, ante, p. 531.

"I say that shortly before the marriage of the said plaintiff, I had a conversation with the said defendant Louisa Jorden respecting the then intended marriage of the said plaintiff, and that on that occasion I said to the said defendant, Louisa Jorden, that I had given up the property at Midnapore to her without any consideration or sum of money for it, and that as the plaintiff was about to be married I should settle that property at Midnapore on the said plaintiff, unless the said defendant Louisa Jorden wholly relinquished all claim on the said plaintiff for or in respect of the said Charles Brown Marnell, and that the said Louisa Jorden, in reply, said, 'No, don't do that, I will never make any claim on your son William for or in respect of that debt, if you will let me remain in possession and enjoyment of the Midnapore property.' And I say that it was on the occasion of that interview, agreed by and between the said defendant, Louisa Jorden, and myself, that in consideration of my permitting her to continue in the possession and enjoyment of that property, she should, and did, wholly abandon the said debt. And I say that such conversation had reference to the marriage of the said plaintiff ; and I say that at that time, or soon afterwards, I had a conversation with the said defendant, Louisa Jorden, respecting any marriage which she might contract. To the tenth interrogatory I say, that she on that occasion repeated her desire to have the matter so settled that any husband she might marry should have no claim on the said plaintiff; and that she then repeated to me that in consideration of my having allowed her to continue in the enjoyment of the Midnapore property, she had wholly abandoned the said debt, and that she would never make any claim in respect of it against the said plaintiff. And I say that I then informed the said plaintiff the particulars of the said agreement with the said defendant, Louisa Jorden, and told him that he might safely marry, and that the said alleged debt due to the said defendant, Louisa Jorden, as an executrix of the will of the said Charles Brown Marnell, was wholly abandoned; and I say, that in consequence of such agreement with the said Louisa Jorden, I omitted to make and did not make any settlement of the said property at Midnapore upon the said plaintiff on the occasion of his said marriage." That is the whole of that witness's testimony. Now, in what Mr. Money has deposed, especially upon the ninth and tenth interrogatories, is he a witness of truth and accuracy? [His Lordship then stated his reasons at length for giving credence to Mr. Money, who, since his depositions, had died, and then, after stating that Mrs. Jorden's account of the interview was different, proceeded to read her answer and that of her husband.]—"They say the defendant Louisa, speaking positively, and the defendant William Pru Jorden, speaking from the information of the defendant Louisa, that prior to the said marriage of the said plaintiff, George Money had a conversation with the defendant, Louisa Jorden, with reference to a marriage then contemplated between the defendant and a Mr. Newman, in the said bill called Newenham, but in no manner relating to the marriage, or intended marriage, of the plaintiff, and that the said George Money told the defendant, Louisa Jorden, that the plaintiff threatened to annoy the defendant, Louisa, about the Midnapore property, but did not tell the defendant, Louisa Jorden, that the said conveyance of the said property at Midnapore (as a voluntary gift) was void if he, the said George Money, chose to settle the same on the plaintiff on the occasion of his marriage, or sold it to any purchaser for a valuable consideration, and that his sons had discovered, and were then aware that such would be the case, and that they had requested him to make such settlement, and that he intended to do so as a security against the possible revival of any claim against the plaintiff by virtue of the said bond or warrant of attorney on the said judgment, by any person or persons into whose power the said documents might at any time come, and who might be ignorant of the total abandonment by the defendant, Louisa, of the share of the plaintiff in the said debt, or to such or the like effect, and the defendant, Louisa, in reply to the statement which the said George Money did make, indignantly asked what he, the said plaintiff, could do? To which the said George Money replied, 'Nothing; but he might annoy you,' and he asked the defendant Louisa if she meant to give up the bond, to which she replied that she would not; that Mr. Newman might give it up if he thought proper, but she would not. On which the said George Money observed, 'why put William,' meaning the plaintiff, 'under an obligation to a perfect stranger?' Whereupon the conversation ended."

[After enlarging on the discrepancies of these two accounts, his Lordship pronounced that of Mrs. Jorden's to be erroneous, inaccurate, incredible; and then referred to a large body of evidence of Mr. Money and other witnesses, and after commenting on the truth of Mr. Money's testimony, notwithstanding the precise and technical nature of the language, and referring to the alleged, and, as his Lordship believed, proved declarations of Mrs. Jorden, proceeded thus:—]I am convinced, as I have said, of the truth of the assertion, that she had on many occasions before the interview declared, after she had become the personal representative of Charles Brown Marnell, that she would not claim the debt in question from the plaintiff, but meant to abandon, and had abandoned it. I believe, moreover, that these declarations were sincere, and considered by the Money family to be sincere, but Mr. Money's acquaintance with legal subjects must have made him doubt, at least, whether any court of justice would, or could, treat them as binding on her. He must have known how liable to change are the intentions even of ladies ; that this lady was likely to marry ; that she might allow herself, or be allowed by others, to do so without a settlement, and that her husband might be a person of views and feelings very different from hers, and having no sympathy with her recollections. As the plaintiff was about to marry, therefore, nothing can consistently with the undisputed facts be more likely than that Mr. Money should have sought and had an interview with Miss Marnell for the purpose which he states, and that the conversation at it should have been of the direct, practical and technical kind which he mentions. He had been for years at the bar ; he must have wished to have the abandonment of the debt placed on a basis firmer than it was. * * *

Considering as I do that the marriage was had with such and only such a settlement as was, in fact, made upon it in the belief created or sanctioned by Miss Marnell, in the faith induced by her language and conduct, that the debt in question never would be in the whole or in part demanded, and so thinking, independently of Mr. Money's evidence, I should possibly have held the decree before us to be altogether correct, if he had not been examined : but his testimony forms part of the case. I believe him to be substantially accurate as a witness ; and so believing, I find that he proves an agreement with Miss Marnell for valuable consideration, by which she was, in my opinion, at and before the time of her own marriage, bound—bound, I think, upon equitable as well as legal principles ; not the more, though certainly not the less, for the high authority of Haigh v. Brooks (2). It was a breach of that agreement to seek to enforce the bond or the judgment obtained by Mr. Marnell (and under whatsoever circumstances of credit or discredit to his memory) against the plaintiff ; a breach in respect of which, if not the only proper person, he was at least a proper person to sue, for he was told of the agreement before his marriage, and told that he might safely marry ; safely, meaning freedom from the debt. That communication to him must be taken to have been authorized by Miss Marnell, and he must be taken to have married on the faith of it. I hold, therefore, with the decree, a decree possibly not unfitting the original merits, but certainly in my judgment forming a fit and just conclusion to the later history of this much-celebrated bond.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Not being able to concur in the result at which both the Master of the Rolls and my learned Brother have arrived, I feel bound shortly to state the view which I take of the case, though it is hardly necessary to say that I feel great distrust of the accuracy of that view, differing, as it does, from such authorities. The plaintiff rests his title to relief on one of two grounds : either, first, that the marriage having taken place on the repeated assurances of Mrs. Jorden that she never would enforce payment of the debt secured by the bond and judgment, it would now be a fraud on her part to act in violation of those assurances ; or, secondly, that a valid and binding contract was entered into between the plaintiff's father and Mrs. Jorden, before the plaintiff's marriage, whereby she stipulated for a valuable consideration, the benefit of which she has had, that she would never enforce payment against the plaintiff of the money so secured.

The Master of the Rolls decided in favour of the plaintiff on the first ground. His Honour thought the case was brought within the authorities which established this principle ; namely, that where a person represented a particular state of circumstances as existing with a view to induce another to act, or under circumstances when it must have been obvious that another would probably act on the faith of such representation being true, and such person has so acted, there it shall not afterwards be permitted to him who has made such a representation to enforce against the person whom he has misled, any rights to which he may be entitled by reason of the facts not having been such as he represented. His Honour referred especially to the cases of Gale v. Lindo, Montefiori v. Montefiori, and Neville v. Wilkinson (3). With the most sincere respect for the judgment of Sir John Romilly, I do not think that the doctrine on which he relies is applicable to the case now before us. In all the cases referred to, there had been the misrepresentation of a fact material in influencing the conduct of the person to whom it was made, and what the Court has done has been to hold the party making the representation bound by what he has stated. It has considered that it would be to permit a fraud, if it were to allow any one first to gain an object by representing a particular fact to exist, and then, when the purpose has been accomplished, to turn round and say, "I shall now act on the very truth, which is not such as I represented it." In all such cases the Court acts merely on the principle of preventing fraud, not at all on contract. But here there was no misrepresentation of any fact whatever. Mr. C. B. Marnell died in 1843; on that event Mrs. Jorden, then Miss Marnell, as his executrix and residuary legatee, became entitled to the money secured by the bond and judgment. That she did between that time and the plaintiff's marriage in June 1845 repeatedly state her positive determination never to enforce payment of that money is a point on which I have no doubt. The evidence abundantly establishes that to have been the case. I think, further, she must be taken to have made such statements, though not to Lady Poore, the mother of the plaintiff's intended wife, yet under circumstances which she could not but know that what she said would probably be communicated to her, and might very likely influence her in the arrangements to be made on the occasion of her daughter's marriage. Still there was no fact misrepresented. Mrs. Jorden never concealed the existence of the bond or judgment. If she had with a view to the arrangements to be made on the plaintiff's marriage, said that she had no legal demand on the plaintiff, that the defendant had been released or paid, or that for any reason the bond and judgment were legally invalid, or had made what amounted to such a representation, then indeed the cases referred to would be strictly applicable. It would then be a fraud in her now to attempt to enforce a security which she had so represented as having no valid existence. But no such statement ever was made; Mrs. Jorden always stated that she had the bond, and in effect that it gave her a legal right against the plaintiff, though at the same time she stated that she had abandoned all intention of enforcing it. After such a statement the parties contracting marriage cannot justly say that they were deceived as to the facts; they knew the facts as well as Mrs. Jorden herself knew them; that is, that Mrs. Jorden had a legal demand on the plaintiff, but which, from what had passed, they were fully persuaded she would never enforce. This is a state of things which does not, as I think, entitle the plaintiff to any relief in this court, on the ground of its being a fraud in Mrs. Jorden now to enforce her securities.

But though the plaintiff may not be entitled to relief on the head of fraud, yet if Mrs. Jorden did before and in consideration of the marriage, bind herself not to enforce the bond or judgment, the plaintiff might be entitled to relief on the head of contract, which leads me to consider whether, on a fair view of the evidence, she ever did so contract.—[His Lordship then entered into a minute examination of the evidence, and proceeded]:—Now as we intimated more than once during the argument, if we can act on that as testimony to which we are judicially warranted in giving credit, the plaintiff has no doubt established a title to relief. Mrs. Jorden, according to this evidence, certainly bound herself, for a valuable consideration, never to enforce the bond against the plaintiff. It was, at least, doubtful whether Mr. Money, the father, had not the power of defeating Mrs. Jorden's title to the Midnapore property. The evidence to which I have referred goes to shew that he agreed with Mrs. Jorden shortly before the marriage, and with a view to his son's interests on that event, that her title to the Midnapore property should never be disturbed, in consideration of an agreement at the same time entered into by her, that she would never enforce the bond. This would be a valid contract, whether in truth Mrs. Jorden's title to the Midnapore property could or could not be questioned. The doubt existing on the subject was a sufficient consideration, as was established by the case of Haigh v. Brooks, referred to by my learned Brother in the course of the argument. If, therefore, it is made out by evidence on which this Court can safely and properly act, that this agreement was in fact come to, then undoubtedly the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he asks. But I feel great difficulty in saying that this is evidence on which, according to the doctrine of this Court, it is open to us to act. The evidence of contract rests on the testimony of Mr. Money alone, not confirmed, in my opinion, by surrounding circumstances, and positively denied by the answer, and cannot be relied upon consistently with the rules of this court. The rule of the court acted upon from the earliest times on this subject is clear. It is stated by Lord Eldon, in Evans v. Bicknell (4). "A defendant," Lord Eldon says, "in this court has the protection arising from his own conscience in a degree in which the law does not affect to give him protection. If he positively, plainly, and precisely denies the assertion, and one witness only proves it as positively, clearly, and precisely as it is denied, a court of equity will not act upon the testimony of that witness." The alleged agreement, then, being as positively denied by Mrs. Jorden, as it is affirmed by Mr. Money, is there anything in the testimony or in the surrounding circumstances enabling the Court to say it will disregard the answer, and act on the evidence of a single witness? I confess I think not.

Having thus stated my reasons I have only to add that I can feel no regret in knowing that my doubts will not influence the decision, as my learned Brother, being of opinion that the decree of the Master of the Rolls is right, it will remain unaltered.

May 22, 26. } LUMLEY v. WAGNER.

Injunction—Negative Covenant.

Mdlle. J. W. agreed in writing with L. that, for certain considerations therein expressed, she would sing and perform at his theatre for a specified period; and that, during her engagement with L, she would not sing elsewhere without his licence in writing. Afterwards, J. W. contracted with G. to sing and perform at his theatre during the period specified in her engagement with L. Upon bill by L. praying simply that J. W. might be restrained from singing and performing elsewhere than at his theatre during the period specified, the Court granted an injunction accordingly.

Where a contract contains covenants to do certain acts, and also to abstain from doing certain other acts, the Court has jurisdiction to restrain the breach of the negative covenants, though there may be no jurisdiction to specifically perform the affirmative covenants. —Kemble v. Kean (1) and Kimberley v. Jennings (2) disapproved of.

But in such cases the Court will decline to interfere where the jurisdiction cannot be beneficially exercised, as in Collins v. Plumb (3), or where its exercise would work injustice, as in a case where the consideration for the negative covenant of the one party is the affirmative covenant of the other party, which latter the Court cannot specifically perform —Hills v. Croll (4).

In November 1851, Joanna Wagner and Albert Wagner her father, by Dr. Joseph Bacher as their agent, entered into an agreement in writing with B. Lumley, the plaintiff, in the French language, which, as translated, was as follows:—

"The undersigned, Mr. B. Lumley, possessor of Her Majesty's Theatre in London, and of the Italienne at Paris, of the one part, and Mdlle. Joanna Wagner, cantatrice of the Court of His Majesty the King of Prussia, with the consent of her father, Mr. Albert Wagner, residing at Berlin, of the other part, have concerted and concluded the following contract:—First, Mdle. J. Wagner binds herself to sing three months at the theatre of Mr. Lumley, Her Majesty's at London, to date from the 1st of April 1852 (the time necessary for the journey comprised therein) and to give the parts following—1. Romeo, 'Montecchi'; 2. Fides, 'Prophète'; 3. Valentine, 'Huguenots'; 4. Anna, 'Don Juan'; 5. Alice, 'Robert le Diable'; 6. An opera chosen by common accord. Second, the three first parts must necessarily be—1. Romeo; 2. Fides; 3. Valentine, &c. &c. Third, these six parts belong exclusively to Mdle. Wagner, and any other cantatrice shall not presume to sing them during the three months of her engagement. If Mr. Lumley happens to be prevented by any cause whatever from giving these operas, he is nevertheless held to pay to Mdle. J. Wagner the salary stipulated lower down for the number of her parts, as if she had sung them. Fourth, in the case where Mdle. J. Wagner should be prevented by reason of illness in singing in the course of a month as often as it has been stipulated, Mr. Lumley is bound to pay the salary only for the parts sung. Fifth, Mdle. J. Wagner binds herself to sing twice a week during the run of the three months; however, if she herself was hindered from singing twice in any week whatever, she will have a right to give at a later period the omitted representation. Sixth, if Mdle. J. Wagner, fulfilling the wishes of the direction, consent to sing more than twice a week in the course of three months, this last will give to Mdle. J. Wagner 50*l.* sterling for each representation extra. Seventh, Mr. Lumley engages to pay Mdle. Wagner a salary of 400*l.* sterling per month, and payment will take place in such manner that she will receive 100*l.* sterling each week. Eighth, Mr. Lumley will pay by letters of exchange to Mdle. Wagner at Berlin, on the 15th of March 1852, the sum of 300*l.* sterling, a sum which will be deducted from her engagement, in his retaining 100*l.* each month. Ninth, in all cases, except that where a verified illness would place upon her a hindrance, if Mdle. J. Wagner shall not arrive in London eight days after that from whence dates her engagement, Mr. Lumley will have a right to regard the non-appearance as a rupture of the contract, and will be able to demand an indemnification. Tenth, in the case where Mr. Lumley should cede his enterprise to another, he has the right to transfer this contract to his successor, and, in that case, Mdle. Wagner has the same obligations and the same rights towards the last as towards Mr. Lumley.

"(Signed) Joanna Wagner.
Albert Wagner."

"Berlin, Nov. 9, 1851."

Shortly after the execution of the above contract Dr. Bacher produced the same to Mr. Lumley in Paris, whereupon the latter objected that it did not contain the usual clauses prohibiting Mdle. Wagner from singing or performing, during her engagement with Mr. Lumley, in any other place in England without his consent, whereupon Dr. Bacher, on the 15th of November, as agent of the Wagners, added thereto a clause to the following effect:—

"Mdle. Wagner engages herself not to use her talents at any other theatre, nor in any concert or reunion, public or private, without the written authorization of Mr. Lumley.—(Signed) Dr. Joseph Bacher, for Mdle. Joanna Wagner, and authorized by her."

Early in March the Wagners wrote to Mr. Lumley, requesting an enlargement of the time for the lady's appearance in London, which was consented to. Subsequently, on the 5th or 6th of April, Mdle. Wagner and her father entered into an agreement with the defendant Gye, whereby it was agreed that they should abandon the contract with Mr. Lumley, and that the defendant, Mdle. Wagner should sing at the "Royal Italian Opera," Covent Garden, instead of "Her Majesty's Theatre." The bill was filed on the 22nd of April 1852, by Mr. Lumley, against Mdle. Wagner, Albert Wagner, and F. Gye, praying that the defendant Joanna Wagner might be restrained by injunction from singing and performing, or singing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, or at any other theatre or place, without the sanction or permission in writing of the plaintiff during the existence of the agreement with the plaintiff mentioned in the bill. The Vice Chancellor Parker, on the 9th of May, granted the injunction in the terms of the prayer; and the defendants now moved to dissolve it.

Swallow v. Wallingford, 12 Jur. 403.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—This case arises out of a very simple contract. Without considering for a moment the difficulties which have been raised by the conduct of the parties, and independently of the question of law, the contract simply is, that this young lady should sing at the Queen's Theatre, for a certain number of nights, and that she should not sing elsewhere during (for that is the true construction of it) that period. Nothing can be more simple than the case on which I have to decide the points of law that have now been so elaborately and so well argued. As I can understand the objection, it is this: that there is no case in which this Court can—that is, in which this Court ought to—grant an injunction, unless in cases that are connected with specific performance, or cases where, if the injunction is to compel a party to forbear from doing an act, or to compel a party not to perform an act, the injunction will execute the whole of the agreement or the whole of that which remains to be performed. Without going into other cases of injunction, I understand that to be the precise case that is now presented before the Court. The point, therefore, first is, how that stands upon principle; and, in the next place, how it stands upon authority. Before I consider it upon principle, I will refer to two or three of the cases that have been cited by the defendants, the appellants, in support of the argument.

The first case was that of Martin v. Nutkin, where an injunction was granted to prevent the ringing of a bell. That was a case in which the Court did issue an injunction restraining an act from being done, which can in no respect be considered as a case in which the Court could have granted a specific performance; but that case falls within the second of the class of cases which the defendants admit are proper cases for the interference of the Court, because there the ringing of the bell had been agreed to be suspended by the churchwardens, who represented the parish, in consideration of money paid by Martin and his wife in the erection of a cupola and clock and so on, the price in fact stipulated for by the parish in consequence of their relinquishing the great enjoyment of constantly hearing the church bell ringing at five o'clock every morning at certain periods of the year. In that case, the parish accepted the benefit, but refused the compensation. Lord Macclesfield granted an injunction, and the Lords Commissioners, on the hearing of the cause, continued the injunction during the lives of Martin and his wife. That is a case in which the Court did grant an injunction to prohibit a party from doing an act, in which this Court could never have interfered by way of directing a specific performance. The next case referred to is Barret v. Blagrove, which came before Lord Rosslyn. There a lease had been granted by the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens, with a negative stipulation that the tenant of the house was to do no act to damage the custom or business of Vauxhall itself. After some time the proprietor of Vauxhall filed a bill for an injunction against the then tenant of the house for breaking that stipulation, and Lord Rosslyn granted an injunction; but Mr. Bethell observes, how remarkable are the words which Lord Rosslyn made use of; for he said it was a case of specific performance. Next, a case is referred to that came before Lord Eldon, where he dissolved the injunction; there being so much acquiescence, he said that the Court could not interfere, but he also treated it as a case of specific performance.

So far as the words go, the decisions of those eminent men would seem to justify the argument addressed to me. But what is the fact with respect to the case decided by Lord Rosslyn? The granting of the injunction was, in that case, a specific performance; because the prohibition, preventing the man from doing the act, does as effectually make him perform his agreement, as if the Court compelled him to do the act by compelling the direct performance of it. The Court said, you shall not open your house as a house of entertainment. That was the performance of the agreement in substance, because the man could not then do the act complained of. Therefore, the term "specific performance" was aptly applied to such a case; but not in the sense addressed to me under the first general head. It is no objection to this jurisdiction to say, that the remedy is at law; the decision in Robinson v. Lord Byron is a clear illustration of that. There the remedy was at law; but this Court felt no difficulty in restraining Lord Byron from abusing the right of the head of the water which he had. There are cases, such as that cited for the appellants, Collins v. Plumb, in which the power was not exercised; but it was there admitted that the Court had the power of preventing the act from being done; though the power will not be exercised, because it cannot be exercised properly or beneficially. The negative covenant not to sell water was not enforced by Lord Eldon, not because he had any doubt of the jurisdiction, but because it was impossible to measure the damage sustained by the different parties, and from the nature of it the Court could not interfere. The learned Judge did not mean to break in on the general rule, whatever it may be; but refused to exercise the jurisdiction on very sufficient grounds.

I took the liberty of calling counsel's attention to those familiar cases of attorneys' clerks and surgeons' or apothecaries' apprentices and the like, that are frequently arising in this court. On what principle are they decided? I am told that they are decided upon this principle: that they arise out of benefits received and out of concluded contracts, and that, therefore the prohibition finishes everything and brings it within the second category. I do not apprehend the jurisdiction of the Court depends upon that. Take the case of landlord and tenant. When that relation is fixed and consummated by the contract and by the lease executed, what is there to make that case differ from any other? No doubt, in a contract to grant a lease, there might be a specific performance; but the lease being executed with a negative covenant not to do a particular act, the moment you are called upon to perform that covenant by inhibition, you have to deal upon that covenant alone. And scarcely, I think, a case has occurred in this court in that relation, in which there were not many stipulations affirmative remaining to be performed in the very contract from which the Court picks out this particular negative covenant for the purpose of enforcing it by prohibition. In leases there are often twenty affirmative covenants, and, perhaps, but one negative covenant, that the tenant, for example, is not to cut timber trees, or lop them, or do any similar act. The Court does not ask what remains to be performed under the contract; but the Court gives effect to the negative contract, and specifically executes it by prohibition. All these cases are in direct contradiction of the rules that have been so elaborately pressed upon me.

This is a mixed case: but of this nature; it consists not of two acts to be done by each of the parties;—not that Mr. Lumley is to do one act, and the young lady is to do another, but the acts are to be done by the young lady alone. The one is ancillary to the other; they are co-equal and co-existent, and operate together, and not in opposition. She says, "I will sing for three months at your theatre, and during that time I will not sing for any one else." In fact, it is one contract, and according to all sound and judicious construction, and according to the true spirit and essence of men's acts, an agreement to perform for three months at one theatre must necessarily exclude the right to perform at the same time at another. It appears that according to the lady's capacity and physical powers, she was by the exertion of her abilities to aid the theatre to which she attached herself; and if there was no such stipulation not to perform at another theatre, she would have broken the spirit and true meaning of the contract by entering into this other contract. Let us see for a moment what is the principle of the jurisdiction of the Court. That principle is to bind men's consciences to a fair and liberal performance of their agreements. I have always thought you may attribute a great deal of the right feeling and fair dealing that exists between Englishmen to the exercise of this jurisdiction. Men are not suffered by the law of this country to depart from their contracts at their pleasure. It does not leave the party with whom the contract has been broken to the mere chance of what a jury may give in the shape of damages, but it enforces, where it can, the literal performance of the contract; and this I believe has mainly tended to produce the good faith that exists to a greater extent in this country than in many others. Although the jurisdiction of the Court is not to be extended, a Judge would desert his duty if he did not act up to the rule which his predecessors have laid down as the proper exercise of a most valuable and wholesome jurisdiction. Where is the mischief in this case of exercising that jurisdiction? It is objected that if I refuse this application, I exclude this lady from performing at Covent Garden, when I cannot compel her to perform at the Queen's Theatre. I cannot compel her to perform, of course; that is a jurisdiction that the Court does not possess, and it is very proper that it should not possess that jurisdiction; but what cause of complaint is it that I should prevent her from doing an act which may compel her to do what she ought to do?—though that is not the object the Court has in view; for the Court cannot indirectly do a thing, and I disclaim doing a thing indirectly which I cannot do directly. In my opinion this is a proper case for interference, and, though I cannot compel the execution of the whole of the contract, I leave nothing unaccomplished by my order which I hold it is in the power of the Court to accomplish. She will be committed to prison by this Court if she does any act in breach of this injunction; and it will have this effect: by preventing her from doing the act, there will be no case, in an action by Mr. Lumley against her, for such an amount of vindictive damages as a jury might probably be disposed to give, if she exercised her talents in the rival theatre. It appears to me that, in granting the injunction, I shall do nothing contrary to the settled rule of the Court, but merely carry out, as far as I can, the whole power of the Court on one subject, which fortunately has a bearing upon another subject which I cannot directly touch.

This case has been elaborately argued upon the authorities. I bow to the authorities. I mean to execute the authorities; I am giving no authoritative decision from myself; I mean to follow the current of authority of my predecessors; to weigh their opinions where there is a difference of opinion between the Judges, that have preceded me, calmly and patiently to consider them, and to arrive at the best conclusion I can as to the meaning to be drawn from the various expressions which I find in those decisions. With respect to the case of Morris v. Colman, it was said that Lord Eldon had decided that case as a case of partnership, but he did not exclusively decide it as a case of partnership; and I have come to a clear conclusion that Lord Eldon would have granted the injunction in that case, though it had not been a case of quasi-partnership. The case of Clark v. Price does not apply, for there was no negative stipulation, and therefore Lord Eldon very properly refused an injunction.

As to the case of Kemble v. Kean, decided by Sir L. Shadwell (of whom I wish it to be understood that I speak with the highest respect), I should have come to a different conclusion; for there was in that case a negative covenant. My apprehension is that the case of Kemble v. Kean was wrongly decided, and could not be maintained. That learned Judge followed that decision up in Kimberley v. Jennings; but with great submission, it appears to me that the whole of the authority of Vice Chancellor Shadwell is removed by himself, and I think the case of Rolfe v. Rolfe displaces the entire of his authority upon this question. In the case which has been referred to, Hooper v. Brodrick, though the Court would not enforce the affirmative covenant, yet it would have restrained the defendant from breach of the negative covenant. This case is directly against the appellants. In Smith v. Fromont, there was no negative covenant, and consequently it does not bear upon this question. An observation has been made upon an opinion of my own in Ireland, Gervais v. Edwards, and I abide by that opinion. There the whole case was properly a case of specific performance; but, from the nature of the contract itself, there was a portion that could not be executed. It is said that in Hills v. Croll, Lord Lyndhurst refused to enforce by injunction a negative contract. But I find in that case, that while A. was to supply B. with certain acids, and B. was not to get the acids anywhere else, there was no power to compel A. to supply B. with the acids; and therefore B.'s manufacture might be paralyzed, and he might be ruined if A. did not supply him; therefore Lord Lyndhurst said, I cannot interfere. It is supposed that Lord Lyndhurst improperly applied there the rule that was properly applied in Gervais v. Edwards; but he did not improperly apply it; as he could not enforce an affirmative covenant with respect to one part, he would not enforce a negative covenant as to the other, for by doing so he might ruin the man. With respect to the case of Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, I wholly deny that it was a case of partnership; it was strictly a case of principal and agent, and it was only because there was that negative contract that the Court gave effect to it.

The clear result from all those cases in my mind is, that the point of law has been properly decided in the court below, and that I must, as regards that point, affirm the decision. As there has been so much controversy about the case, I am not sorry that it has been brought here for further consideration. Whether my opinion is enough to settle the point is another question; but I entertain no doubt whatever upon it. It was thought necessary, also, to go into the merits, and it was insisted that if, upon the merits, I ought not to give relief to Mr. Lumley, I should not interfere, even if the point of law was in his favour. The merits rest upon two points: first of all, that there was an abuse of confidence on the part of Dr. Bacher, who was constantly represented to be the paid agent of Mr. Lumley, of which there is no evidence; though the fair inference is, that Dr. Bacher is not a gentleman so very fond of music as to be travelling over the Continent with two terms in his pocket without getting some payment for his trouble. It is always desirable to avoid harsh representations, and there has been a wilful charge of misrepresentation against Dr. Bacher by this young lady and her father. I never saw a case in which there was less foundation for that charge. The young lady got introduced to Dr. Bacher, and she was so anxious that he should ascertain her musical talents that, as he had no opportunity of seeing her in public, she sang to him in private, that he might represent her vocal abilities to the proprietors of theatres; and Dr. Bacher, approving of Mdlle. Wagner's abilities, put himself in communication with Mr. Lumley and with the director at that time of the French Opera House in Paris, to procure her engagements. This case admits of no doubt as regards this transaction. Mr. Lumley had a printed form of agreement, containing many onerous penalties, no doubt, and containing the precise provision on the introduction of which into the agreement the charge of misconduct is founded. That printed form was signed by Mr. Lumley and sent to the Wagners. The provision was not introduced to deceive the young lady, because it was contained in the general form of agreement entered into by Mr. Lumley; and when the young lady and her father received the document, with which they were dissatisfied, they must have known that it was the common and usual form of agreement used by him. The father appears to be as capable of drawing an agreement as Mr. Lumley. He repudiated Mr. Lumley's agreement, and drew the agreement now before me, and excellently well drawn it is; and I never knew a man so unlikely to be deceived by the introduction of a term of which he did not approve. Dr. Bacher took back the agreement drawn up by the lady's father to Mr. Lumley, and the provision being omitted he added it, stating that he was authorized by Mdlle. Wagner to do so. The Wagners do not tell us when they received that; but it is perfectly clear that they received it before the several letters now before the Court; and in no one of those letters do they reject the term that has been introduced. Mdlle. Wagner and her father grumble about its introduction; but the fact of finding fault with it without saying they will not be bound by it, is an acquiescence. They had full opportunity to reject the contract; but instead of rejecting it, they accepted it. It is much too late now to raise any objection on that ground, and therefore I overrule that objection.

The remaining objection is a very simple one. It appears that a sum of 300*l.* was to be paid to this young lady on a day named; and I am told by the decision of the Court below that that was not a reciprocal obligation, that that was an independent contract; in which I cannot agree; and certainly so far I shall come to a different conclusion. Mr. Lumley could never have come here unless he set himself right by tendering the 300*l.* which he had agreed to pay within a reasonable time. I am certainly of opinion that Mr. Lumley was bound to pay the 300*l.* before he could enforce the contract; and the question is, when he was bound to pay it. By the original contract he was to pay it by a given day in March; but before that day arrived the young lady and her father applied to Mr. Lumley to enlarge the terms of the contract. He accedes to that, and the father writes to him, saying where he is to send the money. In the mean time a letter was written by Dr. Bacher, on the 9th of March, to the Wagners, saying he had the 300*l.* to pay Mdlle. Wagner, and asking her how and when he should send it. He swears particularly to the contents of that letter, and he swears he received no answer to that letter. Now, what is the allegation of the other side? They say they remember that they received the letter, but contradict in the flattest terms Dr. Bacher's statement with regard to the contents of that letter. One naturally then calls for the production of that letter, and I am not satisfied with the grounds that have been given for the non-production of that letter. I need not repeat my reasons. I have stated them in the course of the argument; but then it is said that Dr. Bacher might make this statement, and declare, if the letter was produced, that he had forgotten the contents. Now, can there be any stronger proof of the truth of what he says than this, that he made that statement when he had reason to expect that the letter would be produced? He did not know, at the time he swore, but that it was in existence, and might be produced the next moment to contradict him. If a party at his peril makes that statement, when the other party merely says in reply, "The contents are not true, the letter is in my depository at Berlin; but though I have written for it, and other letters have been sent to me, that letter has not been sent, and I have no doubt but it is destroyed," nothing can be more unsatisfactory than that answer. On the 18th of March Mr. Lumley wrote to them, stating that Dr. Bacher had undertaken to pay to them a bill of exchange for 300*l.*, and by that time he had no doubt but all was in order. What was done by M. Wagner and his daughter? They never say a single word or make the slightest complaint. They make no communication to Mr. Lumley or Dr. Bacher, but quietly remain satisfied, the money being, as I suppose, in Dr. Bacher's hands. When the necessity for producing the money arose, the sum was forthcoming. It is quite clear to me that whatever difficulty there might be in raising the money, it would have been sent as a matter of course, if the lady had insisted upon it. I consider, when she was obtaining a favour from Mr. Lumley by re-opening the contract, which could only be done by the compliance of Mr. Lumley, she was not at liberty to lull his prudence to sleep or leave him under the impression that the bill for payment to her had been appropriated, as he believed it was. Observe what happens besides. Very violent affections are suddenly raised up between persons abroad on a very short acquaintance. This young lady suddenly becomes attached to Dr. Bacher, she calls herself his child, she says no person had ever such a chargé d'affaires, and asks him to go to Hamburg, to accompany her to London to fulfil her engagement,—though he is afterwards represented as a false friend. He writes to her to say that he will do so; but not a word is said by her about the non-payment of the money, and then the money would have been perfectly in time to answer the very object for which it was agreed to be paid. Under these circumstances, this gentleman comes to Hamburg to accompany the young lady to London; but instead of going to London for that purpose, she enters into an agreement with Mr. Gye on the 5th of April, and on the 6th she goes before a notary, and makes an absurd declaration that she is released from her previous contract. But this Court says she is not released from her contract; the order of this Court is greater than the release of the notary, and she must obey the order of this Court. She has nothing to complain of; it is entirely her own fault; she wished to prevent the money being paid that she might escape the liability to perform the contract that was entered into with good faith on the other side; and, therefore, though finding no fault that the point of law was raised, I must refuse this motion, with costs.

 July 24, 27. } DYKE v. RENDALL.

Dower—Equitable Bar.

In the deed of settlement, made on the marriage of E. S., an adult female, it was recited, that "for providing a competent jointure and provision of maintenance for the lady in case she should survive her husband," the father of T. D., the intended husband, had paid to T. D. 3,000l., and the father of the lady had paid to T. D. 851l. and had covenanted to pay him a further sum of 500l.; and that it had been agreed that T. D. should give a bond to the trustees of the settlement, conditioned for the payment of 2,000l. within six months after the marriage; and it was declared that the trustees should hold the 2,000l. upon trusts for the benefit of the husband and wife for their respective lives in succession, &c. T. D. gave the bond accordingly, and died, leaving E. S. surviving him, having paid 500l. only in discharge of the bond. After the marriage, T. D. acquired real estate which he sold during the coverture. Upon bill by the wife against the purchaser, claiming dower:—Held, upon appeal, that the settlement, being expressed to be "for providing a competent jointure," must be understood to be in bar of dower; and, reversing the decision below, that the partial non-payment of the money secured by the bond, did not entitle the widow to claim against the purchaser of the husband's real estates her dower pro tanto.

Equitable bar of dower depends altogether upon contract; and has no analogy to legal bar of dower under the Statute of Uses.

The observations of Sir A. Hart, in Power v. Sheil (1) disapproved of.

By a deed of settlement, dated the 20th of June 1810, and made between W. Dyke of the first part, T. W. Dyke, the son of the said W. Dyke of the second part; Elizabeth Dyke, the plaintiff, then Elizabeth Skinner, of the third part; John Skinner, the father of the said Elizabeth Skinner, of the fourth part, and certain trustees of the fifth part, reciting an intended marriage between Elizabeth Skinner and T. W. Dyke, and that "in consideration of the said intended marriage, and for providing a competent jointure and provision of maintenance for the said Elizabeth Skinner in case she should, after the said intended marriage, survive the said T. W. Dyke, and for securing a provision for their issue," the said W. Dyke had paid to the said T. W. Dyke the sum of 3,000l.; and that John Skinner had paid to the said T. W. Dyke the sum of 851l. 10s., and had covenanted that his executors should pay to the said T. W. Dyke the further sum of 500*l.*, which two sums were the marriage portion of the said Elizabeth Skinner; and that it had been agreed that the said T. W. Dyke should give his bond to the said trustees in the penal sum of 4,000*l.*, conditioned for the payment of 2,000*l.* with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum, within six months from the solemnization of the said intended marriage, upon the trusts thereafter mentioned; it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the said sum of 2,000*l.* upon trust for T. W. Dyke for life, and, after his decease, upon trust for the said Elizabeth Skinner for life; and, after the decease of the survivor of them, upon trust for the issue of the said intended marriage.

At the date of the settlement, Elizabeth Skinner was of full age. T. W. Dyke gave his bond to the trustees, of even date with the settlement, conditioned for the payment of 2,000*l.*, and died in December 1846, leaving the plaintiff (his widow) surviving him; and at the time of his death there had been paid, in respect of the said bond, the sum of 484*l.* 18*s.* and no more. During the existence of the coverture, T. W. Dyke became seised in fee simple in possession of certain real estate called the Bulford estate, containing seventy-two acres and upwards, which in 1831 he sold and conveyed to Richard Cox. In 1847, the devisees in trust of R. Cox sold and conveyed this estate to the defendant Rendall. The plaintiff then filed her bill, praying that it might be declared that she was entitled to dower out of the Bulford estate, and that it might be assigned to her accordingly. The defendant, by his answer, insisted that she was barred by the settlement executed previously to her marriage. The cause coming on for hearing before Wigram, V.C., a reference was directed to the Master to inquire and state what settlement was made on the marriage, and whether such settlement was productive of any, and what benefits to or in trust for the plaintiff, &c. The Master found that the only sum paid in respect of T. W. Dyke's bond for 2,000*l.* was the sum of 484*l.* 18*s.*, leaving the residue of 1,515*l.* 2*s.* unpaid. The cause coming on for further directions, before Knight Bruce, V.C., his Honour considered that he was bound by the authorities to hold that the effect of the words in the settlement, "for providing a competent jointure and provision of maintenance for the said E. Skinner," was to shew a contract between the lady and her intended husband, that in consideration of the provisions made for her by the settlement, she would waive her right to dower: but that, the consideration being unpaid, the plaintiff had a lien upon her dower to the amount unpaid, analogous to a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money; and he declared that the plaintiff was entitled in respect of her dower, to one-third of the rents of the Bulford estate, not exceeding 60*l.* 12*s.* per annum; being the interest, at 4*l.* per cent. per annum on the sum of 1,515*l.* 2*s.*, the principal remaining due upon the bond. The defendant appealed from this decree.

Mr. Greene and Mr. Vance, for the plaintiff, in support of the decree.—Two questions arise: first, whether there was any bar of dower by the settlement; and, secondly, whether the provisions of the settlement must not be productive to the full extent intended, in order to make a complete bar of dower. On the first point, the Vice-Chancellor considered himself bound by the case of Walker v. Walker (2), that the provision was to be taken in bar of dower. But that case did not raise the question; the provision there made being expressed to be in full bar of dower. As to the second point; to make a provision an equitable bar of dower, you must follow, in all respects, the rules as to a legal bar; and, therefore, if the widow be evicted of her jointure, she is restored to her rights of dower. The bar will not take effect unless the substituted provision be made good; Power v. Sheil. This is no case for election; for the widow has sold her dower, and has a lien upon it, as in the case of a vendor for unpaid purchase-money.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Bird, for the appellant.—If the argument for the plaintiff is sound, a purchaser would be bound to investigate, not only whether a provision was made for the wife, but also as to the solvency of the husband; whether the jointure fund is in a state of security, &c. In fact a purchaser would not be safe even after the wife was in possession; for she might still be evicted. But the law is not so—Vizard v. Longdale, cited in Tinney v. Tinney (3), Simpson v. Gutteridge (4). The case of Power v. Sheil may be explained by the fact that the dowress there was a defendant; and the Court refused to interfere against her by injunction, as the jointure had failed.

Mr. Greene replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I shall not dispose of this case without further consideration. The real question here is, what has the lady contracted for? I am much inclined to think that the real consideration for the bar was the payment of the 3,000*l.* by W. Dyke to the husband. I do not understand Sir A. Hart's observations in Power v. Sheil; for I think a woman may do a very wise thing in enabling her husband to deal with his estates. My impression in this case is, that the lady has chosen her security, and upon that she must rely. I will, however, look through the authorities again, and give my judgment on Tuesday morning.

July 27.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the Vice Chancellor decided that the settlement was to be taken in bar of dower, and so far the decree is right. But there is another question of a very different nature, namely, whether the plaintiff is entitled to a lien upon the estate, in respect of the consideration agreed to be given for the bar of dower; and to come to a proper decision upon that question it will be necessary to consider the difference between a legal and an equitable bar of dower. Vernon's case (5) explains how it was that the Statute of Uses provided for dower. At the time of passing that statute, a great portion of the lands in this kingdom was dedicated to uses; and consequently the wife was not entitled to dower out of such lands. When the statute passed which converted the use into the legal estate, the wife would immediately have become entitled to dower. But as it had constantly happened that in settlements made upon marriages, upon the ground that the husband's estates had been vested in trustees to uses, the husband had been required to take a conveyance to the use of himself and his wife, or otherwise, so as to make a competent provision for the wife, the statute provided that, where an estate had been conveyed for the maintenance of the wife if she survived, there the wife should not be entitled to dower out of the residue of the husband's lands. But the act went further, and said that, if the widow should be evicted from her legal jointure, there she should be remitted to her right of dower in proportion. That was reasonable enough; so that when the eviction operated, it operated upon the legal jointure made a bar by the statute; that is, the statute created the bar, with an exception in the case of eviction; so that, as it seems to me, the clause of eviction never could operate, except where the bar had been created by the statute. But how does this apply to an equitable bar of dower? For it was soon settled that, though there was no legal bar of dower, there might be an equitable bar under the rules of this court. It is perfectly clear to me that the true ground of equitable bar is contract, and, that independently of the statute. If this Court acted by analogy to the statute, the rule would only operate in cases where there would be a bar at law, supposing the provision made to be clothed with the legal estate; but this Court, disregarding altogether the provisions of the Statute of Uses, not only did not require any real estate to be settled, but also did not require any certain provision to be made for the wife. In Caruthers v. Caruthers (6), Lord Alvanley says, and he was only stating the well known rule of the Court, that an adult female might have even taken a chance in satisfaction of her dower, though under the Statute of Uses that would be good for nothing. But when this Court began to give effect to equitable bars of dower, it not only disregarded the nature of the property, or the quantum, but it did not consider it necessary that it should be sure.

(4) 1 Madd. 609.

(5) 4 Rep. 1.

(6) 4 Bro. C.C. 500.

An equitable bar, therefore, has none of those qualities which are absolutely essential to a bar under the statute. Analogy has nothing to do with the question; the contract is everything; and you may deal with your rights in this Court for any possible contingent advantage, provided the contract is fairly entered into. This observation applies to Birmingham v. Kirwan (7). As regards the authorities, they are very few. In Simpson v. Gutteridge, Sir Thomas Plumer decided that a purchaser had no right to call for the title of the jointure rent-charge. But it is said that it was the practice of conveyancers to call for such title. I never did it in a single instance, nor do I believe that it was the practice of conveyancers to do so: and that practice has considerable influence on a question of this kind. If, indeed, the jointure purported to be a legal bar within the statute, the wife might stand upon her legal rights, if evicted; but in this Court she will stand simply upon contract; and if a woman, being of age, contracts to accept any given thing as satisfaction of her dower, that she must take with all its defects: she must look to her contract alone; and by no analogy to legal jointure, or the Statute of Uses can she, in case of eviction, come against any person in possession of her husband's lands. This has nothing to do with the performance of the covenant by the husband to give the bond; he, of course, must do that act if he wishes to keep his estate free from dower.

The question, therefore, is, did this lady, or did she not, consent to accept this settlement, such as it is, in bar of dower?

My opinion is, that she did accept the payment of those sums to her husband, and his bond in lieu of her dower; and though in the event the bond has not been paid, she has no right to come against the lands of her husband, acquired after the marriage, and sold during the marriage, against a purchaser who bought on the faith that the settlement was a bar. I wholly dissent from the observations of Sir A. Hart in Power v. Sheil; but as that case may have misled the plaintiff, I shall dismiss the bill, without costs.

Factors' Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39.—
Validity of Pledges.

The plaintiff consigned pearls to a Liverpool merchant for sale, and drew bills upon him to an amount greater than the value of the pearls, which bills he accepted. The Liverpool merchant then handed the pearls to his London agent to be sold, and drew bills upon him, as an advance, upon account of the pearls. The London agent accepted the bills, having notice that the pearls had been consigned by the plaintiff for sale. The Liverpool merchant became insolvent, and the bills drawn upon him by the plaintiff were not paid. The London agent sold the goods to recoup himself the bills drawn upon him by the Liverpool merchant. Upon bill by the consignor alleging fraud and collusion, and praying that the London agent might be decreed to pay him the amount produced by the sale of the pearls—Held, affirming the decree of the Court below, that the pledge was valid within the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39. as made bonâ fide and in the ordinary course of business.

Notice to the pledgee of the fact that the goods were transmitted to the consignee, with directions to sell simply, will not vitiate the pledge; secus, if the pledgee had notice that the consignee was prohibited from pledging.

This was an appeal, by the plaintiff, from a decision of the Vice Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, dismissing the bill. The case is reported, ante, p. 57, where the facts are fully stated.

Jan. 24.—THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—
This is a case of very much importance to the mercantile world, and depends upon the construction of certain acts of parliament. The general question is as to the right of the plaintiff to recover back certain pearls which he consigned to this country for sale, and which were pledged by his consignee to his agents, and were afterwards sold by his pledgee under circumstances which I shall presently state. The first point to ascertain is, what is the law as regards the right of the factor to pledge goods which are intrusted to him for sale?

The common law was upon the subject very strict; for not only could not the factor pledge the goods, however necessary it might be to raise money for the purposes of the principal, so as to give the pledgee the right to retain the produce of them if he sold them, but not even to pay bills drawn upon the original agent, and paid by the pledgee to the credit of the original holder; so that, in point of fact, by the common law there could be no dealing by way of pledge in this country with goods which had been remitted to an agent without an express authority to pledge. To meet that inconvenience, several acts of parliament were successively passed. The first of them was the act of 4 Geo. 4. c. 83. That statute merely gave to the person who took the pledge, the right of the person who pledged; so that, if the agent had a right as against his principal, that right was communicated to the pledgee and nothing further. Then came the 6 Geo. 4. c. 94, which, by section 2, provided that persons in possession of any bill of lading and so on, should be deemed the true owners of them, so far as to give validity to any contract or agreement to be made by such person or persons intrusted and in possession, with any person or persons for the sale or disposition of those goods, or for the deposit or pledge thereof, provided such person or persons should not have notice by such documents, or either of them or otherwise, that such person or persons so intrusted as aforesaid, were not actually owners of the goods. So that the statute enabled the agent, as regarded third persons, to sell or to pledge, provided the persons with whom he pledged did not know that he (the person that pledged) was not the actual and bond fide owner of the property. That section was to operate in the case of a person who was dealing with an agent, not knowing him to be such, apparently as the owner. Then section 4. provided that any person might contract with any agent entrusted with any goods, &c., or to whom the same might be consigned; (not saying for what purpose, but generally with any agent entrusted with the goods or to whom the same might have been consigned), for the purchase of any such goods, and to receive the same and pay for them; and such contract should be binding upon the owner, provided such contract and payment be made in the usual and ordinary course of business, and that such person should not, when such contract was entered into or payment made, have notice that such agent was not authorized to sell the goods or receive the purchase-money. Here, although you are dealing with an agent, if you do not know that he has not authority to sell, you are perfectly safe in buying the goods.

As the law, therefore, stands, any one may safely buy of an agent if he does not know, and it is absolutely necessary that he should not, that the agent is not authorized to sell; and if the person selling is known to be an agent, then the law gives to persons accepting goods in pledge from known agents the interests of the person who makes the pledge. There is also a provision making the act of the agent, where he acts contrary to his authority, a misdemeanour; so that, whilst the legislature gives to an agent and the persons dealing with him every possible security, it does not give impunity to an agent who does a wrongful act in making a pledge or a sale, for which he had not, as between him and his principal, any authority. Here, then, there was this difficulty. The 2nd section related only to purchases and pledges from agents who were not known to be such, and the 4th section to sales by agents who had not authority to sell. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39. was then passed, which, after reciting that, under the said acts and the present state of the law advances could not safely be made upon goods or documents intrusted to persons known to have possession thereof as agents only ; and that advances on the security of goods and merchandise had become a usual and ordinary course of business, and it was expedient and necessary that reasonable and safe facilities should be afforded thereto, and that the same protection and validity should be extended to bond fide advances upon goods and merchandise as by the said recited act was given to sales, and that owners intrusting agents with the possession of goods and merchandise, or of documents of title thereto, should in all cases where such owners by the said recited act or otherwise would be bound by a contract or agreement of sale be in like manner bound by any contract or agreement of pledge or lien for any advances bond fide made on the security thereof, declared, "that any agent who should thereafter be intrusted with the possession of goods, or of the documents of title to goods, should be deemed and taken to be owner of such goods and documents, so far as to give validity to any contract or agreement by way of pledge, lien, or security bond fide made by any person with such agent, as well for any original loan, advance, or payment made upon the security of such goods or documents, as also for any further or continuing advance in respect thereof, and such contract or agreement should be binding upon and good against the owner of such goods and all other persons interested therein, notwithstanding the person claiming such pledge or lien might have had notice that the person with whom such contract or agreement was made was only an agent." Under the 6 Geo. 4. c. 94. you might purchase from a known agent, provided "it was in the usual course of business," and that you did not know that the agent had not authority. Those two things only were necessary to give validity to a sale by even a known agent ; and the late act intended to put pledges upon exactly the same footing as purchases. There is this difference between the two acts : the one says you are safe if, buying of a known agent in the ordinary course of business, you are not aware that he had not authority to sell ; but the other merely recites that the pledge is in the ordinary course of business. It no longer makes it a condition that the pledge should be, but it assumes that it is, in the ordinary course of business ; and for the purpose of giving title to the pledge it treats the agent as the owner.

The act says that, in dealing with any agent in the pledge of property, you may safely consider him as owner if you are acting bond fide, though you know he is the agent ; and you are not bound to ask for his authority. It is the usual course of business to take for granted that he has authority, and if you do not know he has not authority you are perfectly safe ; he shall be deemed the owner of the property and you may deal with him as such, provided you are acting bond fide : though you know he is the agent you may deal with him as the owner. Then comes this proviso in section 3, upon which everything turns : " Provided always, and be it enacted, that this act, and every matter and thing herein contained, shall be deemed and construed to give validity to such contracts and agreements only, and to protect only such loans, advances, and exchanges, as shall be made bond fide, and without notice that the agent making such contracts or agreements as aforesaid has not authority to make the same, or is acting malá fide in respect thereof against the owner of such goods and merchandise ; and nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to or protect any lien or pledge for or in respect of any antecedent debt, owing from any agent to any person with or to whom such lien or pledge shall be given, nor to authorize any agent intrusted as aforesaid in deviating from any express orders or authority received from the owner ; but that, for the purpose and to the intent of protecting all such bond fide loans, advances, and exchanges as aforesaid, (though made with notice of such agent not being the owner, but without any notice of the agent's acting without authority), and to no further or other intent or purpose, such contract or agreement as aforesaid shall be binding on the owner and all other persons interested in such goods."

You may therefore, by this act, treat any agent, whom you know to be so, as owner, in accepting any pledge of goods from him which you know to have been deposited with or transmitted to him as agent, if you are acting bond fide and have not notice that he is making the contract either mala fide or beyond his authority. It is assumed it will be in the ordinary course of business.

There is a different provision as regards the misdemeanour; the misdemeanour still continues, but with a very important alteration, to which I shall presently refer.

Nothing then can be plainer than the act of parliament; but the question which must arise is, what is the notice which is to bind the person accepting the pledge? Lord Tenterden, in Evans v. Trueman (1), referring to the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 94. lays it down very generally. He says: "The expression of the statute is, that a party to be entitled to its protection, if 'he shall' not have notice, by the documents or otherwise, that the pledger was not the actual and bond fide owner of the goods pledged. A person may have knowledge of a fact either by direct communication, or by being aware of circumstances which must lead a reasonable man, applying his mind to them, and judging from them, to the conclusion that the fact is so. Knowledge, acquired in either of these ways, is enough, I think, to exclude a party from the benefit of the provisions of this statute: slight suspicion, I think, will not." Now, that is laid down, I confess, a little too much at large; because slight suspicion is out of the question in this act. I do not say that some circumstances may not be equivalent to an actual notice; because some may be stronger than any words can express. Lord Tenterden says, "slight suspicion will not affect it." I should say that no suspicion will affect it. This was an act intended to enable general dealings between man and man in the city of London; and it would never do to say, you may deal with a man who is an agent and who, as regards you, is considered the owner, provided you will not notice he goes beyond his authority and is acting bond fide; if there is not any mala fides there is an end of the case. It is impossible to say that a mere suspicion, or slight suspicion, of notice can take from you the protection with which you are surrounded by this act. I think, therefore, that that is not put so strongly as it should be in favour of the pledgee.

(1) 1 Mco. & Rob. 10.

In this case, the goods were sent by the plaintiff to Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. for sale; and it was well argued, and properly argued, that by the common law, the power of transmission for sale would not authorize a pledge. This was the very thing intended to be struck at by the act. Unless you can bring it within the proviso, it was the very thing intended to be remedied. The plaintiff almost immediately drew bills upon Messrs. Brownrigg & Co. as against his consignment, for the sum exceeding by 400*l.* what the pearls were really worth. There is no doubt that the act under the old law would have given the pledgee no right, even if he had paid the bills, to have retained the goods; yet under the clause to which I have just referred, it is impossible not to see that the very act of drawing rendered a pledge almost necessary, unless you are to suppose that the Liverpool house could do without it. You have no right to look at the insolvency—that must be considered as a matter of accident or misfortune; it bears very hard on Mr. Navulshaw, but it has nothing to do with the law of the case. In drawing, therefore, for that great amount he did give a colour to the very right to pledge in order to meet those very bills; and he drove the house, no doubt, to the necessity of pledging in order to obtain funds to meet them. If you are dealing with an agent you must take for granted that he has a power to sell in every case. The act says it has become a usual course of business to pledge, not that it was legal; on the contrary, it says that it was not legal, but it had become the usual course of business, and it meant to give legal effect to that course of business. When, therefore, you are dealing for a pledge with an agent who has a consignment, the knowledge that he has the power to sell appears to me to amount to nothing, for every agent must be supposed to have a power to sell who has the disposition of goods. What were these pearls sent over to Brownrigg & Co. for? That they might dispose of them. They have, then, the power of sale; and having such a power this act meant to give them the power of pledging in the clearest and strongest terms.

Assuming, then, that Collett & Co. knew expressly, before they accepted the bills and took the pledge, that Brown-rigg & Co. had a power of sale only, even that would not alter the right ; because if they had not been informed of it, they would have been considered to have known it, inasmuch as they were dealing with an agent in the possession of goods. But it wants something more than merely the right positively to sell ; it wants a prohibition from the owner not to pledge. If when the plaintiff sent over the goods he had said, " I send these goods for sale, but I direct you not to pledge them," and that had been communicated to Collett & Co., I am perfectly clear that, in such a case, they could not safely have advanced their money by way of pledge ; because though they might have known that Brownrigg & Co. were agents, they would have had notice that the contract was one from which they were expressly prohibited. In any other view, I do not see where the safety of the act lies. Now, if we are to speak of probabilities in dealing in a great city like this, where there are ten thousand such transactions occurring constantly, what presumption can be more reasonable than this ? If a man is in possession of goods like these, and is known to possess them as agent, that he should come to your house, and say, " We have received these pearls from India (and I will suppose that he has received them for sale), and we desire you to have them valued with a view to sale." The actual deposit, it will be observed, was in clear furtherance of the directions of the plaintiff himself ; for it must be presumed that the pearls were intended to be sold in London. They were accordingly valued at 2,050*l.* Brownrigg & Co. then go to Collett & Co., who had been in possession of the goods for nearly a month, and ask for an advance of 2,000*l.* The case was that these goods, being fancy articles, would not then meet with a ready or good sale. Now the circumstances attending that application constituted as good a security as a man could have, under this act, of the transaction being bond fide. It was in the ordinary course of business, and there was nothing to lead to suspicion. And, though Collett & Co. did not know this fact, Brownrigg & Co. had already accepted bills to the amount of 2,400*l.* in favour of the plaintiff, for which, of course, they would have been entitled to hold the pearls as security.

The application for the loan, therefore, was, as I think, an assurance on the part of Brownrigg & Co. that they had the right to pledge ; and in that view Collett & Co. had a right to deal with them as the owners of the property, dealing as they did with perfect bona fides.

Again, what was there to have prevented the plaintiff, when he was drawing these bills for 2,400*l.* (which sum must have been a large proportion of the value) from saying, " I shall not object to your pledging them for that sum in case you find it inconvenient to make the advance " ? The plaintiff did not desire the goods to be sold at once, so much as to have a beneficial sale. Supposing, therefore, a full knowledge in Collett & Co. that the goods were transmitted for sale, there is nothing to lead them to the conclusion that there might not have been a subsequent authority to pledge.

In regard to the advances and the renewal of the bills, both acts provide that an agent exceeding his authority by pledging shall be guilty of a misdemeanour ; and in the 6 Geo. 4. c. 94, it is provided expressly " that the acceptance of bills of exchange by such person or persons drawn by or on account of such principal or principals, shall not be considered as constituting any part of such debt so due and owing from such principal or principals within the meaning of the act, so as to excuse the consequence of such a deposit or pledge, unless such bills shall be paid, when the same shall respectively become due." If an agent had accepted bills in favour of the owner, he could not have escaped the penalty of the misdemeanour unless he paid them. But the later act took a very different form ; for it says expressly " that no such agent shall be liable to any prosecution for depositing goods," and so on, " in case the same shall not be made a security for, or subject to the payment of any greater sum of money than the amount which at the time of such consignment, deposit, transfer, or delivery was justly due and owing to such agent from his principal, together with the amount of any bills of exchange drawn by or on account of such principal and accepted by such agent." So that this later act allows the party to bring into account, in order to save him from punishment, any bills of exchange drawn by or on account of such principal, and accepted by an agent, and does not clog it with the condition that the bills shall be actually paid by the agent; so that the drawing of the bills by Brownrigg & Co., though to an amount greater than the value of the goods, would not subject them to a misdemeanour. That, I think, puts an end to the case, as regards the renewal of the bill. I am clear that the second bill was, in substance, a continuance merely of the original transaction, and there was nothing to alter the original advance. I see no necessity for this bill; this is no doubt a single transaction, and the plaintiff had his remedy by action without coming here. The foundation of the bill is the allegation of fraud, contrivance, &c., and that having entirely failed, I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Legacies—Fund for Payment—Personality—Exemption.

*A testatrix by will gave real and personal estate to trustees to pay debts and legacies; by a codicil she devised the said estate to her sister for life, and directed it, at her death, to be sold for payment of legacies; she then gave various legacies, amounting to 50,000*l.—Held, upon the personal estate proving insufficient to pay the legacies, that the said estate was not made the primary fund for payment of legacies, and that, subject to the life estate of the sister, the said estate was an auxiliary fund.

Elizabeth Bree, by her will, dated the 7th of May 1840, gave, devised, appointed, and bequeathed all her freehold, copyhold, and other real property, and all her personal estate of every kind and description, and whether in possession, remainder, or expectancy, unto and to the use of George Whieldon, Robert Gordon, and William Harrison, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust thereout, in the first place, to pay and discharge all her just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses. In the next place, to pay all and every the legacies which she might bequeath by any codicil, &c., "and as to all the residue and remainder of my said real and personal estate and property, I appoint, give, devise, and bequeath the same unto and to the use of G. Whieldon, Robert Gordon and William Harrison, in equal shares as tenants in common, and to their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for their absolute benefit." The testatrix made two codicils to her will, both dated the 31st of August 1841; by the first she devised "to my dear sister, Mary Birch, the Tradeswill estate, for her life, at her death to be sold for the payment of legacies." The testatrix then gave legacies to various parties, amounting to above 50,000*l.* By the same codicil the testatrix devised the Ash estate to the two sons of George Whieldon.

The second codicil was executed to confirm her will, under the 7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 26.

This suit having been instituted for the administration of the estate of the testatrix, a decree was made, referring it to the Master to take the usual accounts; and he, by his report, found that the value of the testatrix's personal estate was about 48,000*l.*; that the real estate to which she was entitled consisted of the Tradeswill estate, which was specifically devised to Mary Birch for life, and was valued at 43,000*l.*, the Ash estate was valued at 88,000*l.*, and the Stoke estate was valued at 11,000*l.*

The personal estate of the testatrix proved insufficient to pay the debts and legacies; and, on the 25th of March 1850, a decree was made, directing the Stoke estate to be sold, the produce of which was to be paid into court.

At this time Mary Birch was living. William Harrison, one of the residuary devisees, died in the lifetime of the testatrix, and a question was now raised between the heir-at-law and the next-of-kin of the testatrix, whether the Tradeswill estate had or not been made the primary fund for payment of legacies, in exoneration of the personal estate.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Evans, for the plaintiffs, the executors.

Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Lean, for Josiah Spode, the heir-at-law.—The real estate is not made a primary fund for the payment of debts or legacies. It is not denied that it is secondarily liable; but before the next-of-kin can succeed, they must shew a clear intention on the part of the testatrix, either to exempt the personal estate, or to postpone it to the real estate, and such intention must be collected from the will, and not from anything extraneous. The plaintiffs are the executors and devisees of the testatrix, and that alone affords an argument against the exoneration of the personal estate—Bootle v. Blundell (1). In this will, there is no apparent intention to exempt the personal estate; and when the real and personal estates are placed upon an equal footing, the rule of law making the personalty the primary fund must be regarded. The direction in the codicil to sell the Tradeswill estate is no exoneration of the personalty; it is a mere repetition of the purpose of her will, and there is no intention even to create a mixed fund.

Walker v. Hardwick, 1 Myl. & K. 396; s. c. 2 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 104.

Mr. R. Palmer and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the next-of-kin.—It is not upon the will that the question arises; but by the codicil the Tradeswill estate is taken out of the general charge, and, after the death of Mary Birch, is made the primary fund for the payment of the legacies, which the codicil gives and postpones until after the death of the tenant for life.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I cannot consider the personal estate exonerated from the payment of legacies; to effect that, a clear intention must be apparent on the will. In this case all the property, real and personal, is given to the executors, subject only to the payment of the debts and the legacies to be given by codicil. The legacies given by the codicil amount to 52,000*l.*, while the personal estate amounts only to 48,000*l.*; the testatrix, therefore, must have been aware of the insufficiency of her personal estate, and have contemplated a contribution from her real estate. The purpose apparent on the codicil seems to have been to exempt the life estate given to Mary Birch from the payment of legacies; after which she again says it is to be sold. It would be strange to say that the legacies were postponed until the death of Mary Birch; in that case some of them might be defeated, though the legatee survived the testatrix. It would seem, therefore, that the codicil merely exempted the life estate of Mary Birch from the payment of legacies; but that it was the intention of the testatrix to make all the real and personal estate an auxiliary fund for the payment of debts and legacies.

Decree Absolute—Bill pro Confesso.

An order of Court duly served on a defendant is a sufficient notice under the 86th and 87th Orders of May 1845, to enable the Court to make a decree absolute on a bill taken pro confesso.

In this case the defendant was out of the jurisdiction, and a decree had been taken on the bill pro confesso. Under the 87th Order of May 1845 (1), an order had been obtained which limited the time for the defendant to apply to the Court to set aside this decree: this was served upon the defendant together with a copy of the decree; but no other notice was served upon the defendant, as directed by the 86th and 87th Orders of May 1845. The time limited by the order for setting aside the decree expired.

It was suggested that the service of the order of the Court limiting the time for applying to set aside the decree was not a sufficient notice within the meaning of the 86th and 87th Orders of May 1845.

Mr. Batten now moved under the 90th Order of May 1845, to make the decree absolute.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I consider the order made by the Court and the service of it a sufficient notice to the defendant, and I shall accordingly make the order asked.

Will—Construction—Repairs—Tenant for Life and Remainder-Man—Conversion.

A testator gave all his real and personal estate whatsoever to his wife and son, whom he appointed executrix and executor, upon trust, to permit his wife during her life to receive the clear rents, issues and profits, interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, subject to all out-goings; and upon the death of his wife, then, as to all his said devised and bequeathed freehold and residuary real and personal estate, with their appurtenances, and of which his wife was to have the clear yearly income for her life, upon trust for his son absolutely:—Held, that certain leaseholds belonging to the testator were to be held by his widow in specie, no intention of conversion being expressed.

Shortly after the testator's death his widow was called upon to make good the dilapidations to the leaseholds, under a covenant in the lease:—Held, that these expenses, which the widow had paid out of her income, were properly chargeable upon the corpus of the estate.

William Poyner, by his will, dated the 10th of November 1834, gave to his wife, Sarah Poyner, all his household goods and furniture, plate, china, books, pictures, prints, glass, and all other his household effects, and likewise all his wines, liquors and household stores, severally, for her absolute use. And the testator gave to his son, William Stapleton Poyner, during the life of his (the said testator's) wife, one annuity or clear yearly sum of 100*l.*, which he directed to be paid out of the yearly income of his thereafter devised and bequeathed freehold and residuary real and personal estate and effects; and he subjected and charged all such estate and effects with the payment of the said annuity. And the said testator gave, devised and bequeathed his freehold messuage in Buckingham Street in the Strand, and all his real estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and all stocks in the public funds, mortgages and security for money, and all other his personal estate and effects not thereinbefore disposed of, and every part thereof, and all his estate, term and interest therein, with their respective appurtenances, unto and to the use of his said wife, and the said William Stapleton Poyner, his executrix and executor thereinafter named, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, according to the respective natures, tenures and qualities thereof, upon trust, during the life of his said wife and her remaining his widow, to pay to or permit and suffer her to receive and take the net or clear rents and profits, interest, dividends, and annual proceeds and income of all his said devised freehold and residuary real and personal estate as aforesaid, after paying all out-goings and expenses and the annuity of 100*l.* thereinbefore bequeathed, for her absolute use ; and in case his said wife should marry again, then, upon trust, during the remainder of her life, to receive and pay the said net or clear rents, profits, interests, dividends and annual proceeds and income of all his said freehold and residuary real and personal estate, after discharging all out-goings and expenses, and the aforesaid annuity, into the hands of his said wife, for her separate use ; and after her decease, then, as to all his devised and bequeathed freehold and residuary real and personal estate, with their appurtenances, of which his said wife was to have the clear yearly income, for her life (subject as aforesaid), upon trust for, and he gave, devised and bequeathed the same and every part thereof, and all his estate, term and interest therein, with their appurtenances, unto and to the use of his said son, W. S. Poyner, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for his and their own absolute use and benefit for ever ; and he directed that the same should be conveyed as aforesaid and paid to him and them accordingly ; and the said testator appointed his wife and his son, the said W. S. Poyner, executrix and executor of his said will.

The testator died on the 10th of April 1843, leaving his widow, Sarah Poyner, and his son, W. S. Poyner, him surviving, who duly proved his will on the 9th of June following. The widow possessed herself of the household goods, furniture, and effects, and paid the annuity of 100*l.* to W. S. Poyner, up to the 24th of June 1848, on which day he died, having made his will, and thereby devised and bequeathed all his property, estate, and effects whatsoever, both real and personal, to his wife, the plaintiff, afterwards Mrs. Harris, absolutely ; and upon her marriage with the defendant Charles Harris, such property, in expectancy upon the decease of Sarah Poyner, was made the subject of settlement. The testator was possessed of several leasehold houses ; but the only real estate consisted of the before-mentioned freehold house in Buckingham Street in the Strand. The leaseholds at the testator's death, were in very bad repair, and it was computed that 900*l.* would be necessary to make them tenantable. In consequence of this fact, the superior landlord gave notice to repair under the usual covenant contained in the lease, and threatened an action of ejectment ; the son, W. S. Poyner, who had managed the affairs with the advice of his mother, employed a surveyor, and contracted with a builder to execute the necessary repairs. The expense thus incurred amounted to double the net income, and it was ultimately agreed that the executors should defray these expenses by monthly payments of 20*l.* each, and in fact the whole sum was paid out of the mother's life income, she agreeing to do so to avoid the necessity of a sale. This suit was then instituted by the plaintiff, the widow of W. S. Poyner, for the administration of his estate, and the main question raised was, out of what estate the sum expended for repairs of the leasehold premises should come ? The other question was, whether the testator had directed his leasehold estate to be converted ?

Mr. Baily and Mr. Rawlinson, for the plaintiff, contended upon the principal question, as to repairs, that they were out-goings and expenses to be paid out of the income under the directions of the will. This was a claim by the landlord under a covenant to repair, and the tenant for life being in possession was the person legally liable to repair. The reversioner was entitled to have the estate free from all charges incurred during the tenancy for life, for the covenants ran with the land. In this case the tenant for life had enjoyed the estate for a considerable period, and it was for her own benefit that the repairs were executed—Hickling v. Boyer (1), Hibbert v. Cooke (2), Talbot v. the Earl of Radnor (3) and Bostock v. Blakeney (4). It was also contended that the testator intended the leaseholds to be converted and invested in property of a permanent character.

Mr. Walford appeared for other parties in the same interest, and cited Caldecott v. Brown (5).

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Baggallay, for the widow of the testator, contended that the expense of making good the dilapidations, ought to be paid out of the corpus of the property, and not out of the rents, and that the testator intended this for the following reasons: that had it been otherwise, the widow would for several years have had no income and the son no annuity, since the net income of the property did not then exceed 400*l.* per annum. The dilapidations took place in the testator's lifetime; they were an immediate burthen, which the landlord could have enforced by action, and to meet which, there were no assets whatever, except the premises themselves. The sale was avoided at the desire of the son, who was co-executor with his mother, and who being entitled to the reversion, would have been prejudiced by a sale. Under these circumstances, the defendant was entitled to claim credit for the dilapidations as for any other debt which she might have paid out of the income. It was also submitted that there was no intention that the leaseholds should be converted. The rents and profits were directed to be paid to her, which was sufficient to shew that she was to enjoy the estate as it was and unconverted—Pickering v. Pickering (6).

Mr. Baily was heard in reply.

KINDERSLEY, V.C.—One question in this case is, whether that portion of the estate which consists of leaseholds ought, as between the tenant for life and the reversioner, to be converted and invested in property of a permanent character; that is a question of construction. After giving specific chattels to his wife and two legatees, and an annuity of 100*l.* a year to his only son during his wife's life, the testator proceeds thus:—"As to all that my freehold messuage or tenement, with the appurtenances, in Buckingham Street in the Strand, and all my real estate whatsoever and wheresoever, my stock in the public funds of this country, mortgages and securities for money, and all other my personal estate and effects not hereinbefore by me disposed of, or wherein the absolute interest has not been given, I give the same, and all my estate, term and interest therein, with the appurtenances, unto and to the use of my dear wife Sarah Poyner, and my said only son (the executrix and executor), their heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, according to the respective nature, tenures, and qualities thereof, on the trusts following." So far there is a gift of all the testator's real estate, and all his residuary personal estate to his wife and son upon certain trusts. He specifies a particular freehold estate, stock in the public funds, mortgages, and securities for money, but does not specify any other portion which would describe the leaseholds, according to the respective natures and qualities thereof; and the question therefore is, what are the trusts, and what property they relate to?

The trustees are, during the life of the wife, or her remaining a widow, to permit and suffer her to receive the net clear rents, interests, and dividends of all and every his devised freehold and residuary personal estate as aforesaid. So far, although it is not conclusive, there is no indication of an intention to convert. The testator meant that his wife was to have the income of the real and personal estate which he had thus given, and after paying the annuity, such rent and personal estate during the life of the wife or annuitant, for the wife's absolute use and benefit. Though the mention of the word "rents," I agree, as it was argued, might apply to real estate not leasehold, still, although I do not think it conclusive, yet I think the indication of intention was not to convert. "And in case my wife shall marry again, then upon trust during the remainder of her natural life, to receive and pay the net or clear rents, profits, interests, dividends, and annual proceeds and income of all my said freehold and residuary real and personal estate" (using the same set of words) to the wife, for her separate use, and with the usual direction that her receipt should be a good discharge; the same life interest being, in effect, given, but for her separate use. Then comes this limitation, "from and after the decease of my said wife, then as to all my said devised and bequeathed freehold and residuary real and personal estate, with their appurtenances, of which my wife is to have the clear yearly income for her life, upon trust for, and I do give, devise and bequeath the same and every part thereof, and all my estate, term and interest therein, with their appurtenances, unto and to the use of my only son, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for his and their own use and benefit for ever; and I direct the same to be conveyed as aforesaid, and paid to him and them accordingly." Now it appears to me clear that what the testator considered he was giving to his son on his wife's death was the same property which he had bequeathed to trustees upon trust. He uses the expression, "term and interest." It was, therefore, the same estate, term and interest, he meant the remainder-man to take; the same, was that of which the income was to be enjoyed by the widow for life. It appears to me clear that the testator intended there should be no conversion. It is true that the son would have less in value because a part was wearing out, but that does not alter the case. I am of opinion, therefore, that there was no intention to convert, but the property was to be enjoyed in specie.

With respect to the other question, the testator when he died had been in possession of the leaseholds, and had suffered that property to become dilapidated, and in consequence, a sum of 900*l.* was estimated as the amount of dilapidations at his death. I must assume that the testator would have been liable under his covenant to repair, for this sum. Shortly after his death, the landlord seems to have called upon the parties to make good the dilapidations; he seems to have given some formal notice; the widow and son consider the matter, and the widow appears to have made various payments towards the amount of the dilapidations, so as to satisfy the landlord. Then comes the question, is the widow to bear that out of her own pocket; or is it to come out of the residuary estate? The question is, the testator having incurred dilapidations, whether, as between the tenant for life and a specific legatee, you can say, pay it out of the general personalty. A number of authorities were cited, but they do not govern this case; there, the questions were between a specific legatee and a residuary legatee of general personalty; but here it is as between the tenant for life and the remainder-man, of an aggregate mass, all residuary, composed of realty and personalty, of which the leaseholds in question form only a component part. It appears to me in this case, without pretending to infringe upon Lord Truro's authority, which, indeed, I should be bound to follow, were it in point; it appears to me that this is a case so entirely different,—where there is a tenant for life and reversioner, under the same will, of property subject at the testator's death to 900*l.* then incurred,—that upon general principle the tenant for life ought not to bear the charge. In fact, if the landlord had thought fit, he might have entered for a breach of the conditions; these parties being also executor and executrix, and having arranged that payment should be made, the result was, that the property was preserved for the benefit of the tenant for life and remainder-man. If any stock ought to be applied in payment of the 900*l.*, it is the residue.

Petition for Adjudication of Bankruptcy.

II.—Every petition for adjudication of bankruptcy shall be fairly written or printed on parchment in the form given in the Schedule M. or O. of "The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849," (as the case may be), and no alterations, interlineations or erasures shall be permitted without leave of the Court; except so far as the same may be necessary, in order to adapt the printed form to the circumstances of the particular case.

III.—All petitions for adjudication and the affidavits in support of the same shall be carefully examined by the Chief Registrar in London, or by one of the Registrars in the country districts, before they are filed, and any petition or affidavit not being in conformity with the provisions of "The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849," and these Orders, shall be rejected, subject however to an appeal to the Commissioner of the day in London; or to the Commissioner in attendance in the country.

IV.—The Chief Registrar shall carefully search whether any fiat in bankruptcy or petition for adjudication of bankruptcy has been issued or filed against or by the same person or persons, alone or jointly with any other person or persons, and shall indorse the result of such search on the petition previous to transmitting the same to the Registrar of the day. Similar searches and indorsements shall be made by the Registrar in attendance in the country.

V.—That in case two or more persons shall apply at the same time to present petitions to the Court in London or to a district court for adjudication of bankruptcy against the same person, and shall both be prepared to prosecute the same immediately, it shall be determined by lot which petition shall first be received and filed, but if one of such persons only is prepared to prosecute his petition immediately, such person shall be preferred; and in case one of such petitions shall be by the debtor or debtors, then the other petition, (or one of the other petitions, to be ascertained as above,) shall be preferred; and no subsequent petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against the same trader, either alone or jointly with any other person or persons, shall be proceeded with further than receiving and filing the same, until after the dismissal of the first, or other petition, or the expiration of the time allowed for prosecuting the same.

VI.—That if any creditor shall petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, and shall neglect to prosecute his petition within the time limited for that purpose, no subsequent petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against the same trader or traders, or any of them, either alone or jointly with any other person or persons, shall be presented by the same creditor without the special leave of the Court to which the previous petition was addressed.

VII.—That every petition for adjudication of Bankruptcy in London, whether presented by a creditor or by the trader himself, shall forthwith after the filing thereof in the office of the Chief Registrar, be allotted by ballot by the Registrar of the day, in the presence of a Commissioner, and in the presence of the solicitor acting in the matter of such petition to one of the Commissioners of the Court, and such allotment shall be entered in a locked book to be kept for that purpose, to which book each Registrar and Commissioner shall have a key; and every such petition in any district Court where there is more than one Commissioner shall when filed be allotted in like manner by ballot, and entered in a locked book, to be kept as aforesaid.

VIII.—In case of the absence of any Commissioner the Registrar alone, and in case of the absence of any Registrar, the Commissioner alone, may, but in either case, in presence of the solicitor, proceed to ballot any petition, indorsing on such petition the reason for his so proceeding.

IX.—That where a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy filed, either by a creditor or a trader, shall have been dismissed, or shall not have been prosecuted within the time limited, every second or subsequent petition presented to the same Court for adjudication of bankruptcy against the same person or persons, or any of them, and either alone or jointly with any other person or persons, shall be allotted to and prosecuted before the Commissioner who shall have acted in the matter of the first petition, or to whom the same shall have been allotted.

X.—Whenever any doubt shall arise as to the allotment of any petition in London, the same shall be determined by the senior Commissioner, or in his absence by the Commissioner of the day; and in the country by the Commissioner in attendance.

XI.—The petitioning creditor's debt shall be carefully investigated previous to the adjudication, and all securities held by him shall at the same time be exhibited to the Commissioner, together with a debtor and creditor account between the petitioning creditor and the intended bankrupt, which shall be filed with the proceedings, unless otherwise directed by the Court.

XII.—The personal attendance of the petitioning creditor, and of the witness or witnesses to prove the trading and act of bankruptcy, upon the opening of the petition for adjudication, may be dispensed with, on special cause proved to the satisfaction of the Court.

XIII.—Except in case of emergency, all applications for adjudication in London shall be made to the Commissioner of the day in his private room previous to the public sitting of the Court.

Disputing Adjudication of Bankruptcy.—Section 104.

XIV.—That if any person adjudged bankrupt intend to shew cause against the validity of such adjudication, he shall cause notice in writing of such his intention to be served upon the petitioning creditor, or his solicitor, and upon the Registrar, two clear days at least before the day appointed by the Court for shewing cause against such adjudication, and in such notice shall state which of the following matters, namely, the petitioning creditor's debt or debts, the trading, or act, or acts of bankruptcy he intends to dispute.

XV.—That after serving such notice of his intention, he shall on application be forthwith furnished with the names of the witness or witnesses deposing to the matter in dispute, and shall, on payment for the same, have a copy of the deposition or depositions, or any of them, as the Court in its discretion may think fit.

XVI.—That on the appearance to shew cause against the validity of the adjudication, the petitioning creditor's debt, trading, and act of bankruptcy, or such of those matters as the person adjudged bankrupt shall have given notice that he intends to dispute, shall again be proved videlicet, unless otherwise directed by the Court, and if any new evidence of those matters or any of them shall be given, or any witness or witnesses to such matter shall not be present for cross-examination, and further time shall be desired to shew cause, the Court shall, if it think the application reasonable, grant such further time as it may think fit.

Jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy, under Sec. 12.—Motions and Petitions, and Practice thereon.

XVII.—That (unless the Court shall in any particular case otherwise direct) all applications to the Court in the exercise of its primary jurisdiction by virtue of "The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849," shall be by way of motion, supported by affidavit, upon hearing which, the Court shall make such order therein as shall be just; but in cases in which any other party or parties than the applicant are to be affected by such order, no such order shall be made unless upon the consent of such person or persons, duly shewn to the Court; or upon proof that notice of the intended motion and copy of the affidavit in support thereof has been served upon the party or parties to be affected thereby, four clear days at least before the day named in such notice as the day when the motion is to be made: Provided, however, that the Court may, if it shall think fit, in any case where the party or parties to be affected by the order, or any of them, shall not have been duly served with a notice of the motion for such order, make an order calling upon the party or parties to be affected thereby to shew cause, at a day to be named by the Court in such order, why such order should not be made.

XVIII.—That every order to shew cause shall be served upon the party or parties to be affected thereby, four clear days at the least before the day appointed for shewing cause.

XIX.—No warrant for the commitment of any person, pursuant to section 266. of "The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849," for disobeying any rule or order of the Court, shall be issued, unless notice of the intended motion for such warrant shall have been served personally upon the person to be committed two clear days at the least before the day of hearing such motion; or unless an order to shew cause why such warrant should not be issued shall have been personally served upon such person, four clear days at the least before the day named in such order for shewing cause: Provided, however, that in cases in which it shall be made to appear to the Court, that the person intended to be committed is keeping out of the way and cannot be personally served with the notice of motion, or of the order to shew cause, it shall be lawful for the Court to make an order directing substituted service of the notice, or order to shew cause, as may be best suited to the circumstances of the case; and service of such notice, or order to shew cause, according to the directions of such order, shall be deemed to be as effectual as if such service had been made personally.

XX.—In cases in which personal service of any notice of motion, or of any rule or order of the Court, is required, the same shall be effected, in the case of a notice of motion, by delivering to the party or parties to be served, and each of them, a duplicate of the notice of motion; and in the case of a rule or order, by delivering to the party or parties to be served, and each of them, a true copy of the order or rule, at the same time shewing to him or them the original order or rule of the Court.

XXI.—That, except where otherwise provided or required by the statute, or by these Rules, every petition presented to the Court of Bankruptcy in London or in the country, shall be signed by the petitioner or petitioners; provided always, that in the case of partnership or absence of any petitioner or petitioners from the United Kingdom, the signature of one of the partners, or of the party presenting the same on behalf of the person so absent, shall be sufficient, and the signature of each person signing the same shall be attested by the solicitor actually presenting the petition, or by some other solicitor, who shall state himself in his attestation to be the solicitor or agent of the solicitor of the party signing in the matter of the petition.

XXII.—That every such petition presented to the Court shall be entered with the Registrar of the Court to which the same is presented, and the order directing the attendance thereon shall be signed by the Registrar, and under the seal of the Court; and the original petition, when served, shall be returned to the Registrar on or before the hearing, and filed of record. And it shall not be necessary to recite such petition at length, but only the prayer thereof, in any order pronounced by the Court thereon.

XXIII.—That every affidavit to be used in obtaining, supporting, or opposing any petition, or motion, or order for shewing cause for or against any order or rule of Court, shall be filed with the Registrar of the Court having the custody of the proceedings to which the same relates, two clear days at the least before the day appointed for the hearing; and no affidavit in reply or in rejoinder is to be used except by leave of the Court.

XXIV.—That the Registrar, upon any affidavit being left with him to be filed, do indorse the same with the day of the month and year when the same was so left, and do forthwith file the same, with the proceedings to which the same relates.

XXV.—That no affidavit be filed, unless the same is properly intitled in the Court and matter in which the same is to be used, and that after any affidavit is left with a Registrar to be filed, the same is on no account to be delivered to any person whatever, except by order of the Court.

XXVI.—Except in cases of emergency, all motions shall be made, and all petitions heard, before the Commissioner acting in the particular bankruptcy to which the matter relates, or the Commissioner acting for him in his absence, and in London, on the day on which he sits as Commissioner of the day, and at the sitting of the Court, and in the order set down in the Registrar's Diary, unless the Commissioner shall otherwise direct.

XXVII.—Motions made by the Bar shall be heard according to the right of precedence, and motions made by attorneys in the order in which they have been set down in the Registrar's Diary previous to the public sitting of the Court.

XXVIII.—A short note of every motion shall be delivered to the Registrar previous to the public sitting of the Court, specifying the bankruptcy or other matter to which the same relates, the name of the party on whose behalf the same is made, the name and residence of the attorney of such party (and of the counsel, if the same be made by counsel), the name of any party, and the name and residence of his attorney, on whom any notice of such motion has been served.

Deposit of Costs on Appeal.—Section 12.

XXIX.—That at or before the time of entering an appeal against a decision or order of the Court of Bankruptcy, the party intending to appeal shall (in any case not otherwise specially provided for) deposit with the Chief Registrar, such sum, not being less than 10*l.* and not exceeding 40*l.*, as the Commissioner, whose order or decision is appealed from, or some other Commissioner of the same Court, shall direct, to satisfy, so far as the same may extend, any costs that the appellant may be ordered to pay, and in the absence of any directions of a Commissioner as to the amount of deposit, the sum of 20*l.* shall be so deposited. If it shall appear that there are several respondents in separate interests, the Commissioner, if he shall think fit, may order a separate deposit as to every such respondent.

Allowance of Amendments.

XXX.—That in any proceeding before the Court, the Court, if it think fit so to do, may allow amendment in any particular or particulars, in the judgment of the Court not material to the merits of the case, to be forthwith made on such terms as to re-swearing (in case of affidavits when necessary) and as to payment of costs, or both payment of costs and postponement, or otherwise, as the Court shall think reasonable.

Removal of Commissions and Fiats issued on or before the 11th November 1842.—Section 22.

XXXI.—That every commission and fiat directed to any Commissioners in the country, and opened or purporting by the proceedings to have been opened at any place situated within any one of the several districts appointed for holding courts of bankruptcy in the country, and not heretofore brought into court, shall be, and the same is hereby transferred and removed into the district Court of Bankruptcy within the district in which such place shall be situate, and every commission and fiat directed to any Commissioners in the country, and opened or purporting by the proceedings to have been opened in the country elsewhere than at any place situated within any one of the said several districts, and not heretofore brought into court, shall be and the same is hereby transferred and removed into the Court of Bankruptcy in London, and all further proceedings in every commission and fiat so transferred and removed as aforesaid, shall be thenceforth prosecuted and carried on in the court to which the same is hereby ordered to be transferred.

XXXII.—That all commissions and fiats directed to any Commissioners in the country, and opened or purporting by the proceedings to have been opened in any of the counties or divisions or parts of the counties named in the Schedule hereunder written, and transferred into the Court of Bankruptcy in London by the preceding Order, be further prosecuted in such court before the Commissioner of the said Court named in such Schedule, in conjunction with such county or counties, or divisions, or parts respectively.

XLI.—All proceedings in the Court shall be written or printed on parchment or paper of one uniform size, that is to say, on sheets of sixteen inches in length and ten inches in breadth, without unnecessary alterations or interlineations; and no erasures shall be permitted; except by leave of the Court, on special cause shewn; in which case any proceedings, though on paper or parchment not of the said size, may be received and filed.

XLII.—All proceedings shall remain of record in the court, and shall not be removed, for any purpose whatever, except by special direction thereof, or of the Lord Chancellor.

XLIII.—A Registrar shall attend in each court, at such times as the Commissioner shall direct, to take and draw up minutes of all proceedings, and such Registrar shall have the charge of all such proceedings, under the superintendence of the Chief Registrar.

XLIV.—Except in cases of emergency, the nature whereof shall be entered on the proceedings, no Registrar shall sit or act for any Commissioner, under section 27, without the express request, in writing, of such or some other Commissioner.

XLV.—In lieu of attaching a copy of the Gazette to the proceedings in each bankruptcy or other matter, the Registrar shall make a memorandum of the advertisement in the Gazette, and of the date thereof, with proper reference to the file to facilitate search; and one copy of every Gazette shall be kept in the office of the Chief Registrar.

Office Copies of Proceedings under Sections 53. and 232.

XLVI.—That all office copies of flats, petitions, or other proceedings, books, papers and writings, or any parts thereof provided for any bankrupt or arranging debtor, or for any creditor of a bankrupt or arranging debtor, or attorney of any such bankrupt, debtor, or creditor, shall be charged and paid for at the rate directed by the 53rd section of "The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849," with respect to the office copies therein mentioned.

XLVII.—That all office copies shall be made by the Chief Registrar or Registrar, or by the messenger or usher of the court, as the Court shall appoint, and shall, except as to figures, be fairly written at length, and shall be sealed with the seal of the Court, and delivered out by the person appointed, without any unnecessary delay, and in the order in which they shall have been bespoken.

Duties of the Master.

XLVIII.—That the bills to be taxed by the Master, shall be all bills of costs, charges, fees and disbursements in matters of Bankruptcy, before the Lord Chancellor, the Lords Justices acting in Bankruptcy (as are now taxed by the said Master), and the Court of Bankruptcy in London, and all other taxable bills in other matters in which the Court of Bankruptcy in London may exercise jurisdiction, and such taxable bills as may be specially referred to him for taxation by any district court of bankruptcy, subject to the revision of the Court.

XLIX.—That the office of the Master shall be at the Court of Bankruptcy in Basinghall Street, and shall be open for the transaction of business daily, from ten o'clock in the forenoon until four o'clock in the afternoon, except on such days and during such periods as the office of the Accountant in Bankruptcy shall be closed by any order of the Lord Chancellor, or by any general rule or order of the Court.

L.—That the business of the Master shall be transacted by him in person.

LI.—That all copies of bills of costs lodged in the Master's office shall be made, examined and delivered out by the clerk who has heretofore made, examined and delivered out the same.

LII.—That in the country districts all bills of costs, charges, fees and disbursements (except such as may be specially referred to the Master) shall be taxed by one of the Registrars.

Proof of Debts.

LIII.—That every sitting held for making a dividend of a bankrupt's estate, shall be a sitting for proof of debts, and the notice of such sitting in the London Gazette shall express that debts may be proved at such sitting.

LIV.—That any separate creditor of any bankrupt shall be at liberty to prove his debt under any adjudication of bankruptcy made against such bankrupt jointly with any other person or persons. And under every such adjudication distinct accounts shall be kept of the joint estate and also of the separate estate or estates of each bankrupt, and the separate estate shall be applied in the first place in satisfaction of the debts of the separate creditors. And in case there shall be an overplus of the separate estate, such overplus shall be carried to the account of the joint estate. And in case there shall be an overplus of the joint estate, such overplus shall be carried to the account of the separate estates of each bankrupt in proportion to the right and interest of each bankrupt in the joint estate. And that the cost of taking such accounts be paid out of the joint and separate estates respectively as the Court shall direct.

Taking Accounts of Property mortgaged or pledged, and of the Sale thereof.

LV.—That upon application (which shall be in manner prescribed by Rule XVII.) by any person claiming to be a mortgagee of, or to have security over any part of the bankrupt's estate or effects, real or personal, and whether such mortgage or security shall be by deed or otherwise, and whether the same shall be of a legal or equitable nature, the Court will proceed to inquire whether such person is such mortgagee, or is entitled to such security, and for what consideration and under what circumstances, and if it shall be found that such person is such mortgagee, or is entitled to such security, and no sufficient objection shall appear to the title of such person to the sum claimed by him, under such mortgage or security, the Court will then proceed to take an account of the principal, interest and costs, due upon such mortgage or security, and of the rents and profits, or dividends, interest or other proceeds received by such person, or by any other person by his order or for his use, in case he shall have been in possession of the property over which the mortgage or security shall extend, or any part thereof, and the Court will then cause notice to be given in the London Gazette, and in such other of the public papers as it shall think fit, when and where and by whom, and in what way the said premises or property, or the interest therein so mortgaged, or over which the security shall so extend, are to be sold, and that such sale be made accordingly, and that the assignees (unless it be otherwise ordered) shall have the conduct of such sale; but it shall not be imperative on any such mortgagee to make such application.

LVI.—That all proper parties shall join in the conveyance to the purchaser (where necessary) as the Court shall direct.

LVII.—That the monies to arise from such sale be applied in the first place in payment of the costs, charges and expenses of the assignees, of and occasioned by the application to the Court, and of and attending such sale, and then in payment and satisfaction of what shall be found due to such mortgagee, or person so having security, for principal, interest and costs, and that the surplus of the said monies (if any) be paid to the assignees. But in case the monies to arise from such sale shall be insufficient to pay and satisfy what shall be so found due to such mortgagee or person so having security, then he shall be admitted a creditor for such deficiency, and receive dividends thereon rateably with the other creditors, but so as not to disturb any dividend or dividends then already made.

LVIII.—That for the better making such inquiry and taking such account, and making a title to the purchaser, all parties be examined by the Court upon interrogatories or otherwise as it shall think fit, and produce before the Court upon oath all deeds, papers and writings in their respective custody or power relating to the estate or effects of the bankrupt as the Court shall direct.

Bankrupt's Balance Sheet.

LIX.—The bankrupt's balance sheet must be filed in duplicate with the Registrar of the Court ten days at least before the day appointed for the last examination of the bankrupt, or the adjournment day thereof for that purpose (one copy for the official assignee, and the other for the proceedings); and the last examination of the bankrupt shall in no case be passed by the Court unless his balance sheet shall have been duly filed as aforesaid; office copies of the balance sheet, or such part thereof as shall be required, shall be provided by the proper officer.

Advertisement of Certificate and Transmission to Chief Registrar, and Appeal against Allowance thereof.

LX.—That the notice of the allowance of a certificate of conformity shall be advertised by the messenger of the court in the London Gazette ten days or more before the expiration of the time allowed by the statute for entering an appeal against the allowance, and such notice shall specify the class of the certificate and the time of suspension (if any) and the conditions (if any) annexed to the allowance: and no certificate of conformity shall be delivered to the bankrupt, except on production of the Gazette containing such advertisement.

LXI.—That after the expiration of the time allowed for entering an appeal against the allowance of a certificate, and on being satisfied that no appeal has been entered, the Registrar of the Court shall deliver such certificate to the bankrupt, and shall certify the allowance to the Chief Registrar.

LXII.—That before any application for a recall of a certificate, and before or at the time of entering any appeal against the judgment of the Court of Bankruptcy for the allowance of a certificate, or for the refusal, the withholding, or the class of a certificate, or otherwise with respect to a certificate, the creditor or assignee or bankrupt intending to appeal shall deposit with the Chief Registrar such sum, not being less than 10*l.* and not exceeding 40*l.*, as the Commissioner whose judgment is appealed from, or some other Commissioner of the same court acting for him, shall direct, in order to satisfy (so far as the same may extend) any costs that the appellant may be ordered to pay, and in the absence of any direction of a Commissioner as to the amount of deposit, the sum of 20*l.* shall be so deposited.

LXIII.—That at the time of entering an appeal against the judgment of the Court for the allowance of a certificate, or for the refusal, the withholding, or the class of a certificate, notice thereof shall be given to the Court by leaving the same in writing with the Chief Registrar who shall forthwith enter in the Certificate Book the time and nature of every such appeal, and shall afterwards enter in the said book the date and substance of any order made in the said appeal that may be produced before him.

LXIV.—That all affidavits to be made in support of petitions of appeal against the allowance, refusal, or withholding of any bankrupt's certificate or the class thereof shall be filed at the time of the filing of such petition of appeal.

Audits.

LXV.—Every bill of fees and disbursements, and charges of any solicitor or attorney, or messenger, under any commission, fiat, or petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, incurred prior to any sitting for an audit, shall be delivered to the Registrar for taxation, five days, at least, before the day appointed for such sitting; and, in default thereof, if such sitting shall be adjourned by reason of such default, such solicitor, or attorney, or messenger, shall pay the costs occasioned by the adjournment, and the amount thereof shall be deducted from the amount of such bill; and no money shall be paid to any solicitor, or attorney, or messenger, on account of any fees or disbursements or charges of any bill, until such bill shall have been taxed.

LXVI.—The audit account of the official assignee, or of any creditors' assignee or assignees, shall be made out in the ordinary form of a debtor and creditor account, each item thereof being entered according to its date, and a name, date, and proper explanation given to such item; and a duplicate of such account shall be sent by the official assignee to the solicitor two days at least prior to the day appointed for the auditing of such account, subject to the power of the Commissioner to require an account, digested under proper heads, to be annexed to the audit account, if he shall think proper.

LXVII.—At every audit the Debtor and Property Book exhibited to the Court by the official assignee, shall be carefully examined and compared with the debts and property collected, as stated in the audit paper, and the cause of any monies remaining uncollected shall be ascertained, and a minute thereof made, and filed with the proceedings; and all persons appearing to be indebted to the bankrupt's estate shall be forthwith summoned and examined in that behalf upon oath, and the examination so taken shall be filed with the proceedings; and such directions shall be given by the Court as to any further proceedings thereupon as to the Court shall seem fit.

Summoning of Trader.—Sections 78. to 86.

LXVIII.—That the particulars of demand and notice under "The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849," and specified in Schedule G, to the said Act annexed, shall, where the debt is claimed to be due to a person or persons not in partnership, be signed by or in the christian name and surname of every such person, adding after his signature, his description, residence or place of business, and shall, where the debt is claimed to be due to a partnership firm, be signed by or in the name of one of the partners on behalf of himself and partner or partners, adding after such signature the style or firm of partnership and place of business as follows; (that is to say) John Thompson for self and partners, trading under the style or firm of at _____ in the county of _____.

LXIX.—Such particulars of demand and notice shall be directed to the party or parties intended to be summoned by the christian and surname of each of them, (or where the christian name is not known, by the surname only, or when the christian name is indicated only by any initial or contraction, then by such initial letter or letters, or contraction of the supposed christian name and by the surname), and also by the place of residence or business, and shall also contain in the body thereof a statement of the name or names with such initial or initials or contraction as above mentioned, if the name is not known, of all the persons from whom the debt is claimed to be due, whether the whole of them shall be summoned or not, or (in case of partners) the style or firm of partnership and place of business, in the same form as above mentioned.

LXX.—The account in such particulars of demand shall be expressed with reasonable and convenient certainty as to dates and all other matters, and where credit is given in such account to the debtor, the notice shall require payment of the difference or balance only which appears to be due in such account.

LXXI.—If the affidavit of debt under the said Act shall not be filed within one calendar month after service of the particulars of demand and notice, the plaintiff (or creditor) shall not afterwards be at liberty to proceed without serving new particulars of demand and notice.

LXXII.—Every affidavit for summoning a debtor under the said Act shall state the nature of the debt with the same degree of certainty and precision as is now or shall hereafter be required in an affidavit to hold to bail by order of a Judge in the superior courts at Westminster.

LXXIII.—Every summons of a debtor under the said Act shall describe the parties in the same manner as they were described in the particulars of demand and notice.

LXXIV.—Every such summons shall be indorsed with a notice as follows:—

If you shall fail to appear to this summons at the time and place within specified, having no lawful impediment made known to and proved to the satisfaction of the said Court and allowed, and if you also fail within seven days after personal service of this summons, or within such enlarged time as the said Court may grant, to pay, secure or compound for the demand within mentioned to the satisfaction of the summoning creditor, or enter into a bond, in such sum, and with two sufficient sureties as the Court shall approve of, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in any action which shall have been brought, or shall thereafter be brought for recovery of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action, you will be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the eighth day after the service of this summons, provided a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy shall be filed against you within two calendar months from the filing of the above-mentioned affidavit.

If you shall appear, and on appearance, or at any enlargement or adjournment of the summons shall refuse to sign an admission of the said demand in the form required by the said Act, and shall not make a deposition on your oath in the form required by the said Act, that you believe you have a good defence upon the merits to such demand or some part thereof, and shall not (if required by the Court so to do) enter into a bond according to the form contained in Schedule K. to the said Act annexed, in such sum and with such two sufficient sureties as the Court shall approve of, to pay such sum or sums as shall be recovered, together with such costs as shall be given in any action which shall have been or shall be brought for the recovery of such demand or of any part thereof in respect of which such deposition shall be made, and shall also fail within seven days after personal service of this summons, or within such enlarged time as aforesaid, to pay, secure or compound as above mentioned, or to enter into such bond as first above mentioned, the same consequence will follow as in the case first supposed, subject to the same proviso as regards the filing a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy.

If you shall appear, and on appearance shall sign and file an admission of the said demand, and shall not within seven days next after the filing of such admission pay or tender and offer to pay to the said creditor the amount of such demand, or secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor, you will be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the eighth day after the filing of such admission, subject to the same proviso as before mentioned with regard to the filing a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy.

If you shall appear, and on appearance shall sign an admission for part of the said demand, and shall not make a deposition upon oath in the form required by the said Act, that you believe you have a good defence upon the merits to the residue, and shall not (if required by the Court so to do) enter into such bond as aforesaid, to pay such sum or sums as shall be recovered in any action which shall have been brought or shall thereafter be brought for the recovery of such residue, together with such costs as shall be given in such action, then if, as to the sum so admitted you shall not within seven days next after the filing of such admission, pay, or tender and offer to pay to the said creditor the sum so admitted, or secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor, and as to the residue of such demand, shall not within seven days from the service of the summons, or such enlarged time as may be granted by the said Court in that behalf, pay, secure or compound for the same to the satisfaction of such creditor, or enter into a bond in such sum, and with such two sufficient sureties as the Court shall approve of, to pay such sum as shall be recovered in any action which shall have been brought, or shall thereafter be brought for recovery of the same, together with such costs as shall be given in such action, you will be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy on the eighth day after the service of this summons, subject to the same proviso as before mentioned with regard to the filing a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy.

If you shall appear, and on appearance shall, as to the whole of the said demand or part of it, make a deposition on your oath (in the form required by the said Act) that you believe you have a good defence upon the merits to the same, and (if required by the Court so to do) enter into such bond according to the form contained in Schedule K. in such sum and with such sureties as aforesaid, you will be entitled to a discharge from the summons.

You are moreover to observe, that an admission made by you after the service of this summons, though signed elsewhere than before the Court, may afterwards be filed in court, and will be as effectual as if you had appeared and signed it in court, provided such admission be made in the form contained in Schedule L. to the said Act annexed, and there be present at the time of the signature an attorney of one of Her Majesty's superior courts of law on your behalf, expressly named by you and attending at your request, to inform you of the effect of such admission before it is signed by you, and provided also that such attorney do subscribe his name to the admission as a witness to the due execution thereof, and in such attestation declare himself to be attorney for you, and state therein that he subscribes as such attorney."

LXXXV.—Every summons of a debtor under the said Act shall be indorsed with the name and place of business of the attorney actually suing out the same, but in case no attorney shall be employed for the purpose, then with a memorandum expressing that the same has been sued out by the summoning creditor "in person."

LXXXVI.—Every such summons shall be served four days at least before the time for appearance therein mentioned.

LXXXVII.—Every such summons shall be served between the hours of nine o'clock in the forenoon and nine o'clock in the afternoon.

LXXXVIII.—If the plaintiff (or summoning creditor) shall make default in appearance by himself or his attorney at the time appointed in that behalf, the defendant (debtor) shall be entitled to his discharge from the summons, and a memorandum of such discharge shall be indorsed on the summons.

LXXXIX.—If the defendant or party summoned shall appear at the time appointed in that behalf, or at any enlargement or adjournment thereof, and shall refuse to admit such demand, but shall, as to the whole of the said demand, or part of it, make a deposition as required by the said Act, that he believes he has a good defence on the merits to the same or some part thereof, and if ordered by the Court so to do, but not otherwise, enter into such bond according to the form contained in Schedule K. in such sum and with such two sufficient sureties, and within such time as the Court shall approve of and direct, the defendant shall be entitled to his discharge from the summons, and a memorandum of such discharge shall be indorsed on the summons.

LXXX.—Any want of compliance on the part of the plaintiff with these Rules and Orders in the particulars of demand and notice, and in the affidavit for summoning the defendant, and in the summons and service thereof, or in any or either of such matters, may be waived by the defendant, or allowed to be rectified by the Court, when it shall not in the opinion of the Court be matter of substance, or shall have arisen from a mere slip; but unless waived by the defendant, or rectified with the consent of the Court, if the same shall be made known to and proved to the satisfaction of the Court, at the time required by the summons for the appearance of the defendant, it shall be deemed and taken to be a good objection to requiring the defendant to state whether or not he admits the demand sworn to by the plaintiff or any part thereof; and in such case the defendant shall be entitled to his discharge from the summons with costs, and a memorandum of such discharge shall be indorsed on the summons.

LXXXI.—Every application to enlarge the time for calling on the defendant to state whether or not he admits the demand or any part thereof, or for entering into a bond with sureties, shall be supported by affidavit.

LXXXII.—Before any defendant shall be allowed to enter into a bond with sureties, according to the provisions of the said Act, he shall give to the plaintiff or his attorney two clear days' notice in writing, signed by the defendant or his attorney, of the defendant's intention so to proceed.

CXXXVI.—That as soon as conveniently may be after every such payment, the Accountant in Bankruptcy shall certify in writing to the proper official assignee that such payment has been made, and the name of the bankrupt or bankrupts to the credit of whose estate the money has been placed in the books kept in the office of the Accountant in Bankruptcy.

CXXXVII.—That all moneys without exception received by the official assignee, and not paid by him forthwith into the Bank of England to the credit of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, shall be paid by the official assignee, as soon as they shall amount to 100*l.*, into the hands of a banker, with whom such official assignee shall keep an account as such official assignee, such account to be entitled as official assignee, and in which account, no moneys shall be entered, except such as are received by the official assignee in his official capacity.

CXXXVIII.—That all moneys paid into the Bank of England to the credit of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, for the estate of any person adjudged bankrupt, or in matters of bankruptcy, shall be subject to the order of a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy, in writing under his hand, and testified by a Registrar, as to the application thereof; provided that every such order shall specify the amount of any payment to be made by such order, the purpose to which it is to be applied, and the name of the official assignee or other person to whom the same is to be made for such purpose; and in cases where the sum to be paid exceeds 500*l.*, the name of the person beneficially entitled (to whom only in such case the payment shall be made), and the Accountant in Bankruptcy shall and may, pursuant to such order pay the sum of money specified therein, out of such bankrupt's estate by a draught, subscribed to, and on the same paper with the said order; such order and draught to be in the form specified in the Schedule hereunto annexed (No. 5).

CXXXIX.—That all orders by the Commissioner for payment of money, or for the transfer and sale (as hereinafter provided) of any stock or securities, being part of a bankrupt's estate, be signed in triplicate, and that one copy of any such order be filed with the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that one copy be left with the Bank of England, and that one copy be left with the Accountant in Bankruptcy.

CXL.—That the official assignee shall, before any audit, enter in a book the names of all the debtors to the bankrupt's estate, as returned in his balance sheet, and shall state the reasons why debts are not paid on the opposite page; such book shall be produced to the Court at every audit.

NEW SERIES, XXI.—BANKR.

CXLI.—That each official assignee shall deposit in the Bank of England, to the credit of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, all bills, notes and other negotiable instruments, except unaccepted bills of exchange, as soon as he shall receive the same; and shall deposit in like manner all unaccepted bills of exchange as soon as the same shall have been accepted or refused acceptance; and shall at the time of such deposit leave a statement in writing with the cashier of the Bank of England specifying the date and contents of the instruments so deposited, the name of the official assignee making such deposit, the name and description of the bankrupt or bankrupts, and the particular estate to which the same respectively belong, and that such instruments respectively are to be deposited to the credit of the said Accountant in Bankruptcy; and shall also take a receipt for the same from the cashier of the Bank, and carry or transmit it to the office of the said Accountant in Bankruptcy, who will give a proper voucher, to be produced when called for by the Court.

CXLII.—That when and as soon as any bill, note, or other negotiable instrument, deposited as aforesaid in the Bank of England in the name of the said accountant shall become due, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England shall, without any direction from the said accountant, deliver such bill, note, or other negotiable instrument to one of the cashiers of the Bank, who is to present the same for payment, and receive the sum of money due thereon, and forthwith to pay the sum so received, if any, into the Bank of England, to be there placed to the credit of the said accountant.

CXLIII.—That in case any such bill, note, or other negotiable instrument, shall not be paid, the said Governor and Company of the Bank of England shall cause such bill, note, or other negotiable instrument as is by law required to be noted and protested to be delivered to a notary for that purpose, and to be noted and protested accordingly, and shall, after the same shall have been so noted and protested, as the case may be, again deposit the same in the Bank of England, to the credit of the said accountant.

CXLIV.—And that the said Governor and Company of the Bank of England forthwith, after every such receipt of money or deposit of any note, bill, or other negotiable instrument, shall certify to the said accountant the sum of money received, if any, on each such bill, note, or negotiable instrument, and placed to the credit of the said accountant, or that such bill, note, or negotiable instrument, has been dishonoured; and such dishonoured bill, note, or other negotiable instrument shall be forthwith delivered by the Bank to the proper official assignee.

CXLV.—And that as often as any bill, note, or other negotiable instrument that shall have come to the hands of any official assignee shall have been or shall be dishonoured, such official assignee shall forthwith give such notice thereof as is by law required from the holder of such bill, note, or other negotiable instrument respectively.

CXLVI.—That any one of the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy acting in the prosecution of any bankruptcy may from time to time make order relative to the delivery out to any official assignee of any bill of exchange or promissory note which may stand in the Bank of England to the credit of the Accountant in Bankruptcy for the estate under such bankruptcy; provided that the purpose of such delivery be stated in the order, and such order be attested by a Registrar.

CXLVII.—That any one of the Commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy acting in the prosecution of any commission, fiat, or petition for adjudication of bankruptcy may, as often as it shall appear to him expedient, by order under his hand in the forms specified in the Schedule hereunto annexed (Nos. 6, 7, and 8), direct any money, which may have been paid into the Bank of England on account of the estate of the bankrupt named in such commission, fiat, or petition, to be invested in the purchase of Exchequer bills, to be lodged in the Bank of England, and may in like manner direct the sale or exchange of such Exchequer bills, and also the exchange, sale, or transfer of any stock in the public funds, or in any public company, or of any Exchequer bills, India bonds, or other public securities which shall have been transferred, delivered, or paid into the Bank of England on account of such bankrupt's estate, and may direct the proceeds thereof to be laid out in the purchase of Exchequer bills, and that such Exchequer bills, when so purchased, be deposited in the Bank of England, to the credit of the said accountant for such particular estate; and the said accountant shall and may, pursuant to such order, make such sale, purchase, or transfer, without any further order or direction; and the expenses thereof may be charged to the account of the estate for the benefit of which the same shall have been respectively made.

Provided always, that the signature of the Commissioner be attested by a Registrar, and that the order of the Accountant in Bankruptcy be subscribed to the order of the Commissioner, and on the same paper with the said order.

Provided further, that no stock or public fund be transferred upon any sale, and that no Exchequer bill, India bond, or public security be delivered for the purpose of sale, except to a cashier of the Bank of England, until the price or value thereof be paid into the Bank of England to the credit of the Accountant in Bankruptcy for the particular estate to which it belongs, and that no sum be paid for the purchase of any Exchequer bill, India bond, or other public security, until such Exchequer bill, India bond, or public security be deposited in the Bank of England to the credit of the said Accountant in Bankruptcy, and for such particular estate.

CXLVIII.—That the official assignee shall forthwith after the declaration of a dividend, give notice by advertisement in the London Gazette, and to each creditor by a printed circular letter in the form specified in the Schedule hereunto annexed (No. 9), to be sent through the Post Office at the cost of the bankrupt's estate, to be settled by the Commissioner, of the time and place of the delivery of the dividend warrants, as hereinafter provided; and that at such time the official assignee will require the production of such securities, if any, as the creditor exhibited at the time of his proof; and that no dividend warrant will be delivered to the creditor holding any security for his debt until such security shall be produced, without the special directions of a Commissioner in that behalf.

CXLIX.—That when a dividend has been or may be declared, the solicitor to the estate shall forthwith make out three lists of the creditors in alphabetical order, and shall state, in separate columns, after the name of each creditor, the amount of his debt and the dividend to which he is entitled, and in two of such lists the securities exhibited at the time of proof, and shall to each name prefix a number in regular series, together with the date of the order of dividend, according to the form in the Schedule hereunto annexed (Nos. 10 and 11), and shall sign such several lists, and deliver the same within four days after the declaration of such dividend to the official assignee, who shall cause one of the lists which specifies such securities to be filed with the proceedings, and shall examine and sign the several lists, if correct, and shall prepare books at the expense of the estate, containing as many blank warrants as may be necessary, according to the form in the Schedule hereunto annexed (No. 12) for London, and (No. 13) for the country, and shall number and fill up a warrant for each dividend, and insert in each warrant the name of the creditor to which the number of such warrant is prefixed in the list, and the dividend payable to him, and shall keep one of the lists specifying the securities in his custody, and shall take or send the books containing such warrants, together with the list not specifying the securities to the Accountant in Bankruptcy, who shall ascertain that the amount of such warrants does not exceed the sum standing in his name to the credit of the bankrupt's estate, and shall compare the warrants with the lists, and if correct shall certify the same, by affixing the seal of his office, to be provided for that purpose, in the margin of the warrants; and he shall keep in his custody the list of creditors, and return the warrants to the official assignee, for delivery to the creditors as hereinafter mentioned.

CL.—That when a creditor, or any person duly authorized under his hand to receive his dividend warrant, shall apply for the same, the official assignee shall require the production of such securities (if any) as the creditor exhibited at the time of his proof, and if satisfied that the amount of the said dividend still remains due, shall fill up the date in the warrant and receipt, and upon the creditor or such other person authorized as aforesaid signing the receipt, the official assignee shall mark the securities (if any) with the amount of that dividend, and shall sign and deliver the warrant for the same; provided that no dividend warrant shall be delivered to any creditor holding any security for his debt until such security shall be produced; provided that upon the statement of a creditor that he is unable to produce his security, and that the same has not been parted with for any valuable consideration, nor assigned to any person, he shall be examined on oath before a Commissioner as to the cause of such inability, and his examination shall be filed with the proceedings, and the Commissioner shall adjudge whether in his opinion the creditor is or is not able to produce the security; and if the Commissioner is of opinion that the security cannot for a sufficient cause be produced, the creditor shall give a sufficient indemnity to the official assignee, to be approved by the Commissioner, and upon such indemnity being given the official assignee shall deliver the dividend warrant to the creditor.

CLI.—That the payment of the dividend warrant may be obtained by the creditor, or any person duly authorized by him under his hand to receive his dividend, or by the executor or administrator of any such creditor, upon production of the dividend warrant at the office of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, or in a country bankruptcy, at any branch of the Bank of England, or such other bank as shall be named by the Bank of England in that behalf.

CLII.—That if any other person than the creditor or person duly authorized by him, or the executor or administrator of any such creditor, claim to receive the dividend, the person so claiming the same must obtain an order for payment thereof indorsed upon the warrant by a Commissioner under his hand; and if any dividend warrant be above twelve months' date, a like order for payment thereof by a Commissioner shall be required; provided always, that in no case shall any dividend warrant be paid to an official assignee unless such official assignee be the payee, or the executor or administrator of the payee, or the assignee of any bankrupt payee.

CLIII.—That when a dividend has been or may be declared under any commission, fiat, or petition for adjudication, the Commissioner acting in the prosecution of such bankruptcy may, by order under his hand, attested by a Registrar, in the form specified in the Schedule hereunto annexed (No. 14), direct the sum ordered to be divided, or such part thereof as may be required, to be carried from the general account of such estate to an account to be kept in the books of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, entitled "The Dividend Account," and to the particular estate; provided that when it shall appear that any part of the money directed to be applied in payment of any dividend is not called for to make such payment, the Commissioner may, by order under his hand, testified as aforesaid, and in the forms specified in the Schedule hereunto annexed (Nos. 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, as the case may be), direct such sum to be carried back to the original account of the estate to which it belonged.

CLIV.—That all dividend warrants under any bankrupt's estate, which shall have been delivered to any official assignee by the Accountant in Bankruptcy for more than twelve calendar months, the same having been previously stamped by such accountant, but which shall not have been delivered to any creditor of such estate, shall forthwith, after the expiration of such twelve months, be brought or sent by such official assignee, together with two lists thereof, under each bankrupt's estate, to the said accountant, who shall thereupon compare the warrants with such lists, and cancel such warrants; and one of such lists shall be certified by the said accountant, and returned to the official assignee, who shall file such list with the proceedings of the respective bankruptcies; and the other of such lists to be retained by the said accountant.

CLV.—That the official assignee shall once in every quarter of a year deliver to the Court to which he shall be attached, an account made up to the last day of the preceding month, together with his cash-book and banker's pass-book duly balanced, and any other books that the Commissioner may require; and such account shall show the balances placed to the credit of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, and of every estate under the charge of such official assignee in the books kept in the office of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, such balances to be certified by the said accountant; and such account shall also shew the balances of every bankrupt's estate then in the hands or under the power or controul of the official assignee.

CLVI.—That such quarterly account shall be kept by the Registrar of the Court to which such official assignee shall be attached, and shall be open to the inspection of creditors; and that notice shall be given in each court of such account having been delivered, and that any creditor applying to the Court may inspect the same without fee, at such convenient time as may be appointed by the Court.

CLVII.—That all monies, bills of exchange, notes, and other negotiable instruments hereinbefore directed to be paid or delivered to or by the Bank of England, may be paid or delivered to or by the Bank of England by or through any of the branch banks thereof, or any other bank that may be named by the Governor and Company of the Bank of England for that purpose; and all business arising in the country with the Bank of England may, where necessary or convenient, be transacted with the Bank of England by or through any of such branch banks, or other bank so named.

CLVIII.—That the several forms specified in the Schedule hereunto annexed for the several purposes therein stated, and not hereinbefore referred to, be followed in all cases where the same may be applicable.

CLIX.—That if the official assignee shall without good and sufficient cause, to be allowed by the Court, keep under his controul more than 100*l.* of money belonging to any one estate or more than 1,000*l.* in the aggregate of monies belonging to bankrupts' estates, for more than one week, he shall be charged in his accounts by the Commissioner with such sum as shall be equal to interest at the rate of 20*l.* per cent. per annum, on the excess of the said sum of 100*l.* or 1000*l.*, as the case may be, for such time as such money shall be under his controul beyond the said week; and, unless the money has been kept for good and sufficient cause, allowed by the Court, the official assignee shall be dismissed from his office, upon the report of the Commissioner, or upon petition to the Lord Chancellor by the creditors' assignee or assignees, or by any creditor, and be liable to the costs and expenses, and have no claim to remuneration.

CLX.—That all forms relating to the payment or delivery into or out of the Bank of England of any money, bills, notes, or other securities under bankruptcies, prosecuted in the country, be printed in red ink.

CLXI.—That the orders hereby made as to official assignees of the estate of bankrupts, and their duties and conduct, shall so far as the same are applicable, apply to, and be observed by official assignees, appointed under petitions presented by debtors desirous of effecting arrangements with their creditors, under the superintendence and controul of the Court.

CLXII.—That printed copies of these Rules and Orders shall be supplied by the Chief Registrar, to the several Courts of Bankruptcy in London, and in the country districts; and also to the Accountant in Bankruptcy, the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, the Master in Bankruptcy, and each official assignee; and that one such copy be posted up in some conspicuous place in every such court; and in the respective offices of the Chief Registrar, the Accountant in Bankruptcy, the Master in Bankruptcy, and official assignees.

CLXIII.—That these Rules and Orders shall take effect from and after the 11th day of January 1853, from which time all Rules and Orders made previous to the passing of "The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849," and the Order made on the 12th of October, 1849, shall be and are hereby rescinded.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—Certificate—Appeal—Notice of Opposition.

A bankrupt was refused his certificate by the Commissioner for an offence not enumerated in the 256th section of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, namely, for systematically buying goods at a small price and short credit and immediately selling the same at still lower prices. He was also refused any protection, except pending an appeal. On an appeal, the Court refused to grant any certificate, but made an order, by consent of the assignees, giving protection for the person of the bankrupt, but leaving his property liable.

A creditor who had not given three days' notice of opposition under the 198th section, and who was, therefore, refused a hearing, was not allowed to appear before the appeal Court to discharge the above order of the Commissioner.

The petition in this case was presented by the bankrupt, praying the grant of his certificate. The facts were not disputed, and were these:—The debts amounted to

10,000*l.*, the property sold by auction realized 1,357*l.* On the application, by the bankrupt, for his certificate, he was opposed by the assignees, on the ground that he had systematically bought goods at low prices and on short credit, and immediately sold them at still lower prices. The fact of such a course of proceeding the bankrupt did not deny, and it was stated in his own petition. Mr. Commissioner Fane refused to grant any certificate or protection whatever, excepting during the appeal, and from this decision the bankrupt appealed.

Mr. Cooke appeared in support of the petition, and stated that the bankrupt had been in business fifty years and was seventy years of age; that Mr. Commissioner Fane, when deciding on the application, expressly stated that his judgment was not founded on the 256th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, for that the conduct pursued by the bankrupt did not bring it within any one of the offences there enumerated. On that occasion the assignees had argued that the offence was within the third there enumerated for a fraudulent contracting of debt; but Mr. Fane refused to accede to such an argument, saying that the fraud there meant related to a fraud as against the party who sold the goods or gave the credit. The assignees then contended that the second case in the 256th section met the offence, for that with intent to conceal the state of his affairs he had falsified his books; but that was equally unsuccessful, for Mr. Fane said that the grossness of the bankrupt was made manifest by his having actually kept a full account of his improper dealings, and had he committed the second offence enumerated in the section, the assignees would not have, by such means as they had, discovered his transactions. The words of that section were imperative, for it said, if it shall appear that the bankrupt has committed any of the offences "the Court shall refuse to grant such certificate." This Court would hardly import into the section any offence which did not come within its words (and the Commissioner himself had said that the bankrupt had not committed any one of them), and say that he should be punished in the same way as if he had committed one of such offences. The Commissioner had acted as if he was bound to refuse the certificate, in which he had acted erroneously. The 198th section gave the Commissioner power either to suspend or refuse the certificate if the conduct of the bankrupt as a trader (1) were unsatisfactory, but that conduct must be considered with reference to the offences enumerated in the act. The legislature never contemplated this offence, grievous as that offence was, and therefore did not provide against it; and the term "conduct as a trader" was not governed by any rule of law, nor by any principle legal, equitable, social, or commercial.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Cracknall, who appeared for the assignees, stated, in answer to a question from the Court, that there was no wish to interfere with the personal liberty of the bankrupt, all that was required being to prevent him ever again pursuing such a course as he had followed, a result which could only be arrived at by leaving his property always liable for his present debts.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I see

(1) See the remarks of Knight Bruce, V.C. on the construction of this section in the case of Ex parte Dornford, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 7.

no reason for any further interference. An order may be arranged by which, with the consent of the assignees, the personal liberty of the bankrupt may not be interfered with.

Mr. Cooke.—The bankrupt has had protection pending this appeal, and no protection can be given him if his certificate is refused. The words of the 256th section are equally plain and peremptory as to that, for it says, "and shall in like manner refuse to grant the bankrupt any further protection."

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Oh yes! The Court may grant protection for a short time, and why not for a long time?

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The offence of the bankrupt comes as near obtaining money or goods under false pretences as can well be imagined. I do not say whether or not he could be indicted for that offence, nor whether, if indicted, he could be convicted. Of that I give no opinion; but systematically buying at one price and selling at a lower would lead to the inference of such an intention. A more gross case against a bankrupt I cannot well conceive than is here proved, and indeed admitted by him, and I see no reason whatever for saying that he ought to have his certificate.

An order was then arranged as suggested by the Court; the assignees giving their consent.

Nov. 10.—Mr. Rolt, on behalf of a creditor to a large amount, obtained leave to give notice of motion to discharge the order, and on the 12th, with Mr. Bagley, made the same; but it appearing that this creditor was not permitted to be heard before the Commissioner, on the ground that he had not given three days' notice of opposition pursuant to the 198th section, the Court decided that he could not be heard on the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—It appears to me to be perfectly plain that, as the act of parliament requires three days' notice of opposition to be given, and as it is admitted that no such notice was given, we have no authority to hear this particular creditor. The legislature having said that no creditor shall be heard before the Commissioner to oppose without giving three days' notice, à multo fortiori a creditor who has not given such notice cannot be heard here.

The motion was, after a discussion on the question of costs, refused, with costs.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—Jurisdiction—Payment of Money out of Court.

The primary jurisdiction in Bankruptcy being, by the 12th section of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, transferred to the Commissioners, and the jurisdiction of the Vice Chancellor under that act having been exclusively appellate and transferred to the Court of Appeal by the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, the Court of Appeal cannot order the payment of money out of the Bankruptcy Court, unless the application be made by way of appeal from a Commissioner.

Mr. Elmsley appeared in support of a petition for the payment of a sum of 66*l.* and a few shillings out of the Court of Bankruptcy. The original fund belonged to four persons, infants, of whom the petitioner was one, and two of them having attained the age of twenty-one, they presented their petitions for payment out of court of their respective shares, and the same was ordered accordingly by the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. The petitioner now having attained his age of twenty-one, asked for his share.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I made those orders as Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, before the new Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act came into operation. By that statute all the primary jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy is transferred to the Commissioners; while by the statute constituting this Court the jurisdiction of the Vice Chancellor sitting in Bankruptcy, that jurisdiction being appellate only, is transferred to the Lords Justices. I consider, therefore, that on this petition we have no jurisdiction to make the order; but if the Commissioner shall on application find any difficulty and decline to make it, then I think we can exercise our authority by way of appeal.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH concurred.

—Advertisement of Adjudication.

Four partners were adjudicated bankrupts. Two resided abroad. The adjudication was made on the 8th of November. On the 13th notice was given of an application, on behalf of the partners abroad, to suspend the advertisement. On the 17th the meeting was held to shew cause against the issue of the advertisement, and the application was then made. The Commissioner refused to suspend the issue of the advertisement on the ground that, as the application was not made within seven days from the adjudication, he had no authority, under the 104th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, to do so:—Held, upon appeal, that "such extended time" mentioned in the section meant "further or longer time" not exceeding fourteen days; and that the notice having been given within the seven days everything was in fieri, and the Commissioner had authority to grant the application. The matter was, therefore, sent back to the Commissioner.

This was an application, by way of appeal from a decision of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd refusing to stay the issue of the advertisement of adjudication. Four persons, namely, Frank Castelli, Giovanni Baptista Giustiniani, Severio Castelli, and Francisco Franciscowitch Braggiotti, carried on business in partnership in London, and were on the 8th of November 1851 adjudicated bankrupts. Two of the partners resided in Leghorn, the business being carried on in London by the others, the style of the firm being "Castelli, Giustiniani & Company." On the 13th of November a notice was given, on behalf of the two residing at Leghorn, that an application would be made to the Commissioner, at the meeting to be held on the 17th, for the purpose of shewing cause against the issue of the advertisement of adjudication, to postpone the issue of the advertisement, on the ground of the absence of those parties who could, if present, give very material explanations of the accounts, and shew that as against them the adjudication ought not to stand. The meeting was held on the 17th, when application was made to the Commissioner pursuant to the notice, but the application being made two days later than the seven days after the adjudication, he held that he had no authority under the 104th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, (1) to suspend the issue of the advertisement, and extend the time to the fourteen days specified in that section.

Mr. Cairns, in support of the appeal, submitted that as the notice was given within the first seven days of the adjudication, the requirements of the statute were sufficiently complied with, and if the meeting had been held on the 15th instead of the 17th, they would have been so literally. It was not the fault of the parties on whose behalf the application was made, that the meeting was not appointed earlier: that was a matter not resting with them. The view taken by the Commissioner was erroneous, for he had the authority he decided he had not, and could have extended the time to the period authorized by the act, although the application was not made within the first seven days. The Court would also consider the hardship of the case of the appellants, who, residing at Leghorn, had not been served with the notice or duplicate of the adjudication.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I do not see why the learned Commissioner did not extend the time to the period which he is authorized to do by the act.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—It must be shewn to us that it is a rational construction of the act, to refuse what is now asked.

Mr. Chandless contended that the terms of the 104th section were plain and positive as to the time within which the adjudication might be questioned. The expression "such extended time" manifestly was meant to commence from the end of the first seven days, and, therefore, could not be granted unless the application were made within those first seven days. He submitted that the Commissioner had taken a correct view of his authority, under the strict words of this positive enactment. That an act of parliament which lays down rules must be interpreted most strictly was adjudged by Lord Cottenham, in the case of In re The North of England Joint-Stock Banking Company (Hall's case) (2), where he re-

(1) The 104th section is as follows:—"That before notice of any adjudication of bankruptcy shall be given in the London Gazette, and at or before the time of putting in execution any warrant of seizure which shall have been granted upon such adjudication, a duplicate of such adjudication shall be served on the person adjudged a bankrupt, personally, or by leaving the same at the usual or last known place of abode or place of business of such person; and such person shall be allowed seven days, or such extended time, not exceeding fourteen days in the whole, as the Court shall think fit, from the service of such duplicate, to shew cause to the Court against the validity of such adjudication; and if such person shall within such time shew to the satisfaction of the Court that the petitioning creditor's debt, trading, and act of bankruptcy upon which such adjudication has been grounded, or any or either of such matters, are insufficient to support such adjudication, and upon such shewing no other creditor's debt, trading, and act of bankruptcy sufficient to support such adjudication, or such of the said last-mentioned matters as shall be requisite to support such adjudication, in lieu of the petitioning creditor's debt, trading, and act of bankruptcy or any or either of such matters, which shall be deemed insufficient in that behalf, as the case may be, shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Court, the Court shall thereupon order such adjudication to be annulled, and the same shall by such order be annulled accordingly; but if at the expiration of the said time no cause shall have been shewn to the satisfaction of the Court for the annulling of such adjudication, the Court shall, forthwith after the expiration of such time, cause notice of such adjudication to be given in the London Gazette," &c.

(2) 1 Hall & Twells, 580; 1 Mac. & Gor. 307; a. c. 19 Law J. Rep. (n.s.) Chanc. 69.

fused to include any one as a contributory who did not come clearly within the definitions or one of them set forth in the Winding-up Acts. It had been urged that it was a hardship on these parties that they were absent, but the absence of parties in their position was contemplated by the legislature, and their case especially provided for. The words at the early part of section 104. were "shall be served on the person adjudged bankrupt, personally, or by leaving the same at the usual or last known place of abode or place of business of such person." The application ought, therefore, to be refused, with costs.

Mr. Cairns was not called on to reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I am of opinion that the words "or such extended time" mean no more nor less than "further or longer" time, not exceeding fourteen days. I am of opinion that the applicants' notice of the 13th of November, for the motion to be made on the 17th, having been given within the first seven days, was sufficient. The consequence is, that, in my view, the true construction of the act of parliament requires the matter to be proceeded with and gone into by the Commissioner, to see whether the other seven days should be allowed. I think the matter should go back to the Commissioner; and if Lord Cranworth concurs in that opinion, then the case must be brought before the Commissioner within two days from this time, and being commenced within fourteen days, can be heard by adjournment as may be most convenient.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the construction contended for in opposition to this application would be most harsh and unreasonable. The utmost latitude of construction should be put on this act of parliament. Everything before the Commissioner was in fieri when the notice was given, and to hold that he had no jurisdiction to grant the further seven days, because the application to do so was not actually made during the first seven days, would be, one would almost be induced to say, absurd.

in re STANTON.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
— Certificate — Certificate of Penalty — Appeal — Discharge of Prisoner.

The full Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Knight Bruce dubitante), held first, that, under the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, the Commissioner may refuse protection to a bankrupt for other causes than for the commission of any of the offences enumerated in the 256th section; secondly, that the issue of the certificate of penalty, under the 257th section, depends upon the refusal of protection generally, and is not limited to such refusal for either of the offences enumerated in the preceding section; and thirdly, that the discretion vested with the Commissioner by this statute in granting or withholding protection is very large, excepting in the cases enumerated in the 256th section, in which cases his functions are merely ministerial, and he is bound to refuse protection.

This was an appeal from the decision of Mr. Commissioner Evans. The facts were as follows:—William Stanton was declared a bankrupt, on his own petition, in the month of December 1850; having previous to that time carried on the business of a watchmaker, jeweller and stationer, in a small way, at Buckingham. He duly filed his balance sheet, and on his attending to pass his examination on such balance sheet, on the 14th of January 1851, before Mr. Commissioner Evans, his last examination was adjourned until the 20th of February, in consequence of his not having furnished a stock account and cash account to accompany his balance sheet. Stanton stated his inability to comply with the requisition of the Commissioner, as he did not keep either a stock-book or a cash-book; and the Commissioner, on a statement made by the assignees, that they were not satisfied with his explanation, adjourned the bankrupt's last examination sine die, with protection until the 27th of March 1851. Nothing further was done in the matter until the month of October, when the bankrupt was served with a summons or warrant, under the hand of the Commissioner, to appear before him on the 13th of that month, to shew cause why he had not filed a stock and cash account, as required. Upon such hearing, the Commissioner signed a memorandum, to the effect that the bankrupt had not filed a stock and cash account, and that he, therefore, refused further protection; and on the same day the Commissioner signed a certificate, whereby he certified that the bankrupt's assignees were creditors of the bankrupt for the sum of 1,207*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*, in trust for the other creditors, and that he was not protected from process against his person. On the 21st of October 1851 the bankrupt was arrested and committed to Aylesbury gaol, by virtue of a writ of execution issued upon the certificate of the Commissioner, and remained in custody ever since. On the 24th of November a further application was made to Mr. Commissioner Evans, the purport of which was to withdraw or set aside the certificate. His Honour, however, refused further to interfere.

A motion was now made, by leave previously given, on behalf of the bankrupt, that the decision pronounced on the 24th of November by the Commissioner, in which he refused to set aside the certificate signed by him on the 13th of October, under the 256th section of the act, whereby he certified that the assignees of the bankrupt were creditors, as such assignees, for the sum of 1,207*l.* 12*s.* 5*d.*, in trust for the creditors, and that the bankrupt was not protected by the Court from process against his person, and also refusing to discharge the said bankrupt out of the custody of the keeper of the gaol at Aylesbury, might be reversed; and that the said certificate and the execution issued thereon might be set aside and the bankrupt discharged out of custody, on the ground that the said certificate and execution were irregular, invalid, and not warranted by the proceedings in the case or otherwise; and that the assignees might be ordered to pay the costs of the application made to the Commissioner and of the present application.

Mr. Cooper and Mr. Simpson having stated the facts of the case as before detailed, and having addressed the Court in support of the motion,

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE (after conferring with Lord Cranworth) said, that their Lordships were of opinion that a visd voce examination of the bankrupt, if taken down, might throw some further light on his proceedings, and therefore they should direct the motion to stand over until after such an examination should have been made.

Dec. 13.—Mr. Cooper and Mr. Simpson again brought on the motion. They said, the bankrupt had been examined before the Commissioners, as directed by the Court, on the 11th of December, when, having made and signed the declaration required by the Bankrupt Act, he declared he was unable to furnish any other account than he had already done in his balance sheet and accounts filed, and that he never kept any stock-book. Counsel then proceeded to argue that the refusal of protection was wrong, as was the signing of the certificate of penalty, the offence of the bankrupt not falling under any of those enumerated in the statute. The argument was, in substance, the same as that presented before the full Court, as stated below. Es parte Cowgill (1) was cited.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Sturgeon, for the assignees, opposed the motion, principally on the ground that there was evidence before the Commissioner, and which was repeated at the time of the visd voce examination of the bankrupt, that he had been seen by a witness to make an entry of a loan of money, and that therefore the assertion as to a cash-book was untrue.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE, during the argument, observed, that by the words of this statute the Crown did not seem to have reserved to it the right to remit the punishment awarded. The acts enumerated by the statute were constituted offences.

Mr. Sturgeon informed the Court that the point had been considered at the Home Office in cases under the Insolvent Debtors Acts, and it was considered that the Crown had no authority to interfere.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—It is clear that the bankrupt has not committed, nor does the Commissioner say he has committed, any of the offences enumerated in the act. The protection was not refused on any of these grounds. The question is, whether the Commissioner has a general discretion.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE (after again conferring with Lord Cranworth) said, I am sorry to say that although this is a case of the discharge of a prisoner from custody, we are not able to dispose of it at once. Both my learned Brother and myself have all along been disposed and even anxious to come to a conclusion at once upon it, but we have not been able to do so. We will do so, if possible, in a few days; and in the mean time it may be convenient for counsel to know that we may require the whole case to be re-argued. The point, as regarding the liberty of the subject, is one of great importance. At present, we cannot agree as to what order should be made on the motion. It must stand over.

Dec. 17.—Their Lordships this day directed that the motion should be brought before the full Court of Appeal.

Dec. 20.—The motion was this day renewed before the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices, in the Lord Chancellor's Court, Lincoln's Inn (Old) Hall (2).

(2) The sections of the act upon which the case depends are the 256th, 257th, and 259th, and their material parts are as follows. The 256th enacts, "That if at the sitting appointed for the last examination of any bankrupt, or at any adjournment thereof, it shall appear to the Court that the bankrupt has committed any of the offences hereinafter enumerated, the Court shall refuse to grant the bankrupt any further protection from arrest; and if at any sitting or adjourned sitting for the allowance of the certificate of any bankrupt it shall appear that he has committed any of such offences, the Court shall refuse to grant such certificate, or shall suspend the same for such time as it shall think fit, and shall in like manner refuse to grant the bankrupt any further protection." The nine offences may be shortly stated thus:—1. Destruction of books and papers within two months of his bankruptcy, with intent to conceal the state of his affairs; 2. Keeping false

Mr. Cooper and Mr. Simpson.—The clauses of the statute which deal with the subject of arrest and imprisonment, and with protection from arrest, are the 112th, 113th, 162nd, 211th, 256th, 257th, and 259th. It is plain, as was intimated by Lord Cranworth in the argument on the 13th inst., that no offence was committed by the bankrupt coming within the enume-books or wilfully falsifying them; 3. Contracting debts by fraud or false pretences; 4. Making away with his property, or fraudulently, in contemplation of bankruptcy, paying any creditor within two months of his bankruptcy to the exclusion of the other creditors; 5. Concealing any debt due to or from him after the bankruptcy, or concealing or making away with any part of his property; 6. Attempting to account for any of his property by fictitious losses or expenses; 7. Vexatiously bringing or defending any action or suit within six months preceding the adjudication of bankruptcy; 8. Wilfully preventing or withholding the production of any book, paper, &c. relating to his trade; 9. Wilfully omitting to keep proper books of account, or keeping his books imperfectly with intent to conceal the true state of his affairs. The 257th section enacts, "That the assignees for the time being of the estate and effects of any bankrupt, when the accounts relating to his estate shall have become records of the court, shall be deemed judgment creditors of such bankrupt for the total amount of the debts which shall by such accounts appear to be due from him to his creditors; and every creditor of any bankrupt, immediately after the proof of his debt shall have been admitted, shall be deemed a judgment creditor of such bankrupt to the extent of such proof; and the Court, when it shall have refused to grant the bankrupt any further protection, or shall have refused or suspended his certificate, shall, on the application of such assignees or of any such creditor, grant a certificate under the seal of the Court, in the form contained in Schedule B. a. to this act annexed, and every such certificate shall have the effect of a judgment entered up in one of Her Majesty's superior courts of common law at Westminster until the allowance of the certificate of conformity of such bankrupt; and the assignees or the creditor to whom, according to such certificate, the bankrupt shall be indebted as therein mentioned, shall be thereupon entitled to issue and enforce a writ of execution against the body of such bankrupt," &c. The 259th section enacts, "That if any bankrupt shall be taken in execution after the refusal of protection, or after the refusal or suspension of his certificate, he shall not be discharged from such execution until he shall have been in prison for the full period of one year, except by order of the Court: Provided always, that this enactment shall not take effect until after the expiration of six months from the commencement of this act, and then only against such persons as shall have been adjudged bankrupt under this act, and for offences committed after the commencement of this act."

ration of offences in the act. If then no offence was committed, the conduct of the bankrupt can be no foundation for the penal certificate, for the Commissioner has no jurisdiction to grant it until he has adjudicated that one of the specified offences has been committed. With regard to the construction of the act, it is most important to observe that the 259th section provides, that the enactment shall not take effect for six months after the passing of the act, and then only for offences committed after the commencement of the act, and therefore it could only be intended by the legislature by the word "enactment" to refer to the whole group of clauses numbered 39, and beginning with section 251, preceded by the words "be it enacted," and was not intended to be confined to the 259th section where it appears. No ambiguity could have arisen if the words "as aforesaid" had been inserted after the words "shall have refused to grant the bankrupt any further protection" in the 257th section; and it may even be argued that the words "as aforesaid" are needless, since there the enactment in dealing with offences, and enumerating them, uses this precise language, shall refuse to grant the bankrupt any "further protection," which words occur nowhere else in conjunction throughout the whole act of parliament. It is to be observed also, that the 257th section must have been intended as the mode of punishing a bankrupt for previous offences, enumerated, and only those; for otherwise a bankrupt who has committed no offence is placed in no better condition than he who has been guilty of any of those before enumerated. The effect of holding that the Commissioner was right would be that a man might be taken in execution twice for the same debt, considering the extensive words of the 257th section. In the first instance he is made liable to arrest at the suit of the assignees, as trustees for the whole body of creditors, and then he may be taken by each creditor individually, and no delivery can take place until after a year's imprisonment. The words "refuse further protection" do not appear in any part of the act until the 256th section, which enumerates the offences for which protection is to be refused, and these words are repeated in the 257th section under which this penal judgment certificate is issued. In order to arrive at the construction contended for below, and which will, no doubt, be repeated here on behalf of the assignees, violence must be done to the express words of the 259th section, which is to take effect only for offences committed six months after the commencement of the act, while, on the other hand, if the bankrupt's contention be correct, it is necessary only to import the words "as aforesaid" into the 257th section, and so set the matter free from doubt; and there is no violence to the statute, for they ought to be implied, for the language relating to refusal of protection only occurs in the 256th section, and in the enactment of that section relating to the several specified and enumerated offences. At any rate the words "this enactment" in section 259, apply to the whole of the new law introduced by this act, and which has proved so difficult of construction. In such a state of doubt the Court will have reference to the rule that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, and that the liberty of the subject shall not be interfered with but on plain and unambiguous enactments.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE. — May not the words "this enactment" in the 259th section refer to the whole group of clauses? If they do, it may be that the certificate of penalty may be limited to the enumerated offences.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Sturgeon contended that the Commissioner had a general authority and discretion to issue the certificate of penalty in any case where he had refused protection, and such authority and discretion was not limited to the cases of refusal of the Commissioner of any one of the nine enumerated offences. The case of the committal must depend on the 257th section alone, irrespective of any other. By that section, the grant of that certificate was made to depend upon the refusal of protection generally; and not confined, as had been argued, to those offences before specifically enumerated.—They then proceeded to argue upon the conduct of the bankrupt in not keeping proper accounts;

but as the case is only important on the question of the construction of the statute, these arguments are omitted.

Mr. Simpson was heard in reply.

Their Lordships then conferred for a considerable time, after which,—

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, This case is one which fully deserves the consideration of the full Court, as the question raised is one that must be constantly recurring, and upon which the Commissioners may have different opinions. With a view, therefore, of rendering the granting of a certificate of penalty a matter of general application, it was thought desirable that the Court should be constituted as it now is. Here, the bankrupt has been taken in execution on such a certificate, and that certificate has been granted after refusal of protection for offences not enumerated in the act. The real point to be decided is, whether the certificate mentioned in the 257th clause, and upon which the bankrupt has been arrested, can be issued upon the refusal of protection by the Commissioner in every case, or only in cases where such protection has been refused for one of the nine offences specified in the 256th section. Having given the case all the attention it demands, and taking into consideration the liberty of the subject involved in the determination of the question, I must say that I have arrived at the conclusion, that the Commissioner was right in granting the certificate. It is quite manifest that the Commissioner has authority to refuse protection for other causes than those mentioned in the 256th section, and it appears to me that the proper construction of the 257th section makes the certificate of penalty to depend upon the refusal of protection generally, and is not limited to the refusal of protection for either of the nine offences set forth in the 256th section. The discretion vested in the Commissioner by the act, in granting or withholding protection, is very large, except in the particular instances mentioned in the 256th section, when his discretion ceases, and he only acts in a ministerial character, which renders it incumbent upon him to refuse protection.

The 257th section, after the assignees shall have in the events there specified become judgment creditors, says, that every creditor shall be deemed a judgment creditor for the whole amount of his proof, and then goes on, "and the Court, when it shall have refused to grant the bankrupt any further protection, or shall have refused or suspended his certificate, shall, on the application of such assignees or of any such creditor, grant a certificate under the seal of the Court, in the form contained in the schedule;" and then it goes on to say, that such certificate shall have the effect of a judgment entered up; and concludes by saying, "and the assignees or the creditor to whom, according to such certificate, the bankrupt shall be indebted, shall be thereupon entitled to issue and enforce a writ of execution against the body of such bankrupt." This appears to me to be free from any ambiguity or doubt, and does not confine the granting of a certificate of penalty to the particular offences mentioned in the 256th clause, for otherwise a bankrupt might, perhaps, take care to steer clear of them; and although he might have protection refused him for other causes, yet the Commissioner could not visit him with due punishment by issuing a certificate authorizing his arrest. Such an interpretation of the act would virtually deprive the creditors of power to compel a bankrupt to furnish proper accounts, and would take away the penalty attached to the refusal of protection in cases that might be quite as important as any of the nine mentioned in the 256th clause. With respect to the words "this enactment," in the 259th section, it appears to me to be confined to that particular section, and means only "this section," or "this provision," and is not to be referred to the antecedent clauses relating to the issuing of the certificate. The argument that the words "this enactment," are to be taken in conjunction with the 256th and 257th sections, and that they limit the issuing of the certificate of penalty to cases where protection has been refused for offences named in the 256th clause, is of no avail. Being, therefore, of opinion that the Commissioners have full authority to refuse protection for other misconduct than the nine offences set forth in the 256th section, and that the certificate of penalty follows in every case where such protection has been refused, and is not confined to those nine cases, I must hold that the bankrupt is legally in custody under the act, and the application for his discharge must be refused.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I entirely concur with the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, and should not feel it necessary to make any remarks were it not for the importance of the question. The argument that the clauses are to be taken as a group, and so construed, is very plausible, but not in my judgment conclusive. The language of the 257th section is plain and intelligible if allowed to be taken by itself, and only becomes ambiguous when joined with the other sections for the purpose of interpretation,—a mode of attempting to find out the intention of the legislature not to be permitted where the literal meaning of a clause or section is patent. There is nothing in the 257th section to cut down the granting of the certificate to the cases of refusal of protection mentioned in the 256th section. The words amount to a general enactment, that the Commissioner shall issue such certificate in all cases where protection has been refused, and are intended merely to increase the consequence of a refusal of protection. I was much struck by the observation of my learned Brother Lord Justice Knight Bruce, that the words in the 259th section, “this enactment,” may be referable to the whole group of clauses, and would, therefore, limit the granting of a certificate of penalty to the offences mentioned in the 256th section; but to adopt that construction will, in my opinion, be to hold that the legislature intended that a bankrupt might act with impunity for six months after the commencement of the act, inasmuch as the old acts are actually repealed. This view of the matter seems to me unanswerably to prove that the words “this enactment” are confined to the 259th clause, and mean that the particular enactment therein specified shall not take effect for six months. It has also been argued that at any rate “this enactment” is intended to apply to all the new law there introduced, but with this argument I cannot agree, as in one sense the whole of the act must be considered new law, the old acts being repealed. Taking, therefore, the 257th section as a complete enactment of itself, and finding that it does not confine the issuing of the certificate to any particular case where protection has been refused, I entirely concur with the Lord Chancellor in thinking that the application must be refused.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—As a majority of the Court are agreed upon a particular construction of this act, there is no necessity for my judgment to be given. It would not be a matter of wonder, if, considering the inaccuracy and ambiguity of the act, I had dissented from my learned colleagues; but I do not say that I dissent, I only doubt. I doubt, and never shall cease to doubt, nor is it a matter of surprise that any person should doubt, as to what is the correct view of this act of parliament. The main grounds of my doubts are, whether the 256th, 257th, 258th, and 259th clauses do not stand together as wholly new law, preceded and followed by what, with a slight variation, was before law; and, therefore, whether they must not be considered as one single entire proposition, each part being dependent upon the rest, and so construed. The 256th section specifies with particular exactness the various offences that are to be followed by the consequences mentioned in the 257th clause, when the Commissioner “shall grant” the certificate there mentioned. My doubt, therefore, is, whether the compulsory clauses are not to be taken and read together, and if so, the granting of the certificate must be limited to the refusal of protection for offences set forth in the 256th section. Upon this point I always shall have my doubt. I have made these remarks as affording a reason why I entertain such doubts, which to call dissent would be representing them far too high.

The motion was refused.

} Ex parte BOWERS, in re
BOWERS.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—Protection—Arrangement—Summons—Adjudication.

An order obtained by a debtor under the 211th and following sections (of arrangements under the controul of the Court) of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, granting protection until a day certain, exceeding two months from its date, is irregular.

A debtor obtained such an order, and before the two months had expired a creditor proceeded against the debtor under the 78th section, and procured a summons returnable within the original two months, and the debt not being discharged within the time limited the debtor was adjudged a bankrupt. The debtor petitioned for the discharge of the order of adjudication, which was dismissed; and on an appeal from that order of dismissal, the petition of appeal was dismissed, with costs.

The Court declined to give any judicial opinion whether, after an order granting protection under the 211th section, a creditor could proceed under the 78th section.

This was an appeal petition presented by the bankrupt from the decision of Mr. Commissioner Balguy, under the following circumstances.—On the 26th of November 1851, Mr. Bowers, the bankrupt, a grocer and wine-merchant at Worcester, filed a petition under the debtor and creditor arrangement sections (sections 211 to 233) of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, to the Birmingham District Court of Bankruptcy, and obtained from Mr. Commissioner Daniell (the then Commissioner of the district) an order of that date, granting him protection until the 2nd of February 1852. On the 5th of December 1851, a creditor proceeded under the 78th section of the act, and obtained a summons against the bankrupt returnable on the 19th of December. The bankrupt did not personally attend the summons, but a solicitor attended on his behalf, and stated the fact of the grant of the order for protection. The creditor then proceeded, by his petition, to obtain an adjudication in bankruptcy grounded on this non-attendance and non-payment, as an act of bankruptcy.

On the 18th of December the bankrupt presented a counter-petition, praying that the adjudication might not take place, and to have the petition presented for that purpose by the creditor taken off the file. On the 23rd of December, Mr. Commissioner Balguy, the successor of Mr. Daniell, made an order dismissing the bankrupt's petition, and the present petition was one of appeal praying the discharge of the order of dismissal, and that the prayer of that petition might be granted.

Mr. Swanson and Mr. Mottram, for the bankrupt.—It is not competent for a creditor to take proceedings against a debtor to whom protection has been granted under the 211th section. That such was the intention of the legislature is plain from the words of that section, than which nothing can be more positive. If the debtor performs his part of the condition, that is, submits himself and all his property to the jurisdiction of the Court, the Court may grant protection, and may renew such protection from time to time. The renewal can only be supposed to be intended to be made as from a given day, and such renewal would be by an order and would satisfy the words of the section; the protection would be, in fact, until the further order or renewal of protection. The proceeding to compel an act of bankruptcy by means of a debtor trader summons while the trader was protected in person and property was wholly irregular, and cannot stand, and the adjudication, therefore, cannot be sustained.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—It would be a strange thing, when a man's person and property have been protected from all process, to hold that, nevertheless, he may be made a bankrupt.]

In an Anonymous case (1) before Mr. Commissioner Fane, a summons had issued against a party who was a debtor; after the summons had been duly served upon him, he filed a petition under the 211th and subsequent sections, and obtained protection to a day certain, that day being the day appointed for the first meeting. Mr. Commissioner Fane held that the debtor was protected against all process, and directed that the summons of the creditor, although it had been served before the order was obtained on the petition for protection, should not be proceeded with.

The Solicitor General (Sir W. P. Wood), and Mr. Baggallay, for the creditor.—The whole proceeding of the bankrupt is to prevent a second bankruptcy. In September 1849 he was declared a bankrupt, and in February 1851 he received a certificate of the third class. Since that time he contracted the debt on which the creditor obtained the summons in question. The effect of an order to a stated time, being more than two months from its date, can only operate, if it be permitted to stand, to prejudice the rights of creditors, and prevent them from making the debtor a bankrupt. That the legislature never intended the clauses (211. and subsequent) to displace the rights under the 78th section is clear, because the authority to grant protection under section 211. is not an absolute power as to time, but is expressly confined by the previous words relating to the petition. The debtor may petition that "his person and property may be protected from all process until further order," and then the Commissioner has authority to grant "such protection." It is true the prayer of the petition given in the form Schedule A a. is, "that the person and property may be protected from all process," but that can only mean such protection as is mentioned in the act, namely, protection "until further order." The form adopted may save the petition itself from being irregular, but it does not make the order correct; and in making the order Mr. Commissioner Daniell exceeded his authority. The creditors were not intended to be defeated by such a contrivance as was here resorted to, or else the 218th section would not have provided that the estate of the petitioning trader should not vest in the official assignee until after the approval of the resolution therein referred to.

Their Lordships having conferred,

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH said—If we should be of opinion that the view taken by the Solicitor General of this order is right, there will, of course, be nothing to prevent the proceedings which have been taken by the creditor. We think that until we are satisfied whether or not the order is rightly made, it will be a useless consumption of time to enter into any other question. We shall, therefore, be glad to hear what Mr. Swanston has to say on this point.

Mr. Swanston.—There is nothing in the act limiting the form in which the order for protection is to be made. The Commissioner himself would, on a proper application, have been able to discharge his own order, which would thus have no other effect than if made in terms "until further order." The 211th section of the act does not, it is submitted, make it imperative upon the Commissioner in granting an order for protection to adopt the words "until further order;" that section of the statute provides that a debtor unable to meet his engagements "may present a petition to the Court, setting forth the true cause of such inability, and praying that his person and property may be protected from all process until further order; and the Court, on such petition, shall have power to grant such protection, and may renew the same from time to time as it shall think fit." And the 212th section enacts, that every such petition shall be in the form contained in Schedule (A a) to the statute annexed. The form of prayer given to the petition by this schedule is simply for protection "from all process," without any specification as to time. It is submitted that the words "such protection" occurring in the 211th section, have reference to protection of the person and property, rather than to the period to which the protection is to extend, and that the succeeding provision enabling the Commissioner to renew the protection from time to time, is more adapted to the case of a previous order for protection having been made for a definite time, than to that of an order terminable at the will of the Commissioner. It is submitted, that the phraseology of the 211th section and the form of prayer given to the petition in the schedule give a discretion to the Commissioner as to the form of the order to be made, and that they do not so limit him to make an order for protection in terms "until further order" that if he departs from that form the order made will be a nullity. The Commissioner is not limited to an order, the particular terms of which are specified in the act only, but not in the schedule, which gives the model of the petition; but a discretion is given to him to adapt the order to the circumstances of the case, having regard to the state of business in his court. If he has such a discretion, the Court, in the absence of proof to the contrary, will presume that it has been rightly exercised. The order which has been made by the Commissioner is, moreover, practically, to all intents, an order till further order. It is an order which may extend to a certain time, but not beyond, without further order. In the mean time it is always in the power of the Commissioner to discharge his own order. No order of the Commissioner is in its nature irrevocable. Even if it were not competent to the Commissioner to discharge the order, still it is open to him in the case of danger to direct the official assignees to collect and secure the assets. On these various grounds, it is submitted, that the order is not irregular. In the Anonymous case already cited the order for protection was made to a day certain, and no objection was taken to it on the ground of irregularity.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—How this case would have stood if the order of November had granted protection until further order, or until a certain day or further order, it is not necessary to say. In point of fact, the order obtained is an order absolutely and unconditionally granting protection until a certain fixed day, more than two months after the date of the order. Such an order may or may not be a nullity. On that I give no opinion, except saying that if it is a nullity there is an end of all question. Assuming it not to be a nullity, I apprehend it still to be irregular, and I conceive when a person obtains an order ex parte for his own benefit, and behind the back of his creditors, and in a certain sense to the prejudice of his creditors, he is bound to obtain an order strictly correct, and strictly regular, or to abide the consequences. The proceedings which have been taken to make this gentleman a bankrupt may be valid or not—may be regular or not; with them I do not interfere. Lord Eldon, even in cases where a commission of bankruptcy was confessedly invalid, has refused to interfere with it, leaving the parties who thought fit to issue it to make the best they could of it. I am of opinion that the order obtained by this gentleman was irregular, and ought not to be allowed to afford him protection. I adhere to what Mr. Balguy has done.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I entirely concur in that view. If it had not been for the schedule to the act, there could have been no question but that the petition itself would have been irregular; as, however, the petition is in form prescribed by the schedule, it cannot be so treated. The order has been made for protection until a given day, thus tying up the hands of every one in the mean time; it is an order which cannot be supported, and is one from which the debtor can derive no assistance. The application is, therefore, dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Upon the point first argued by Mr. Swanston, it is not our intention to give any opinion, and we give none.

Marriage Settlement—Trader—Right of Proof—Case stated under the 14th section. of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849.

A trader about to be married and being, in fact, insolvent, of which insolvency the intended wife was ignorant, entered into a covenant with trustees to pay them a moderate sum of money, the interest to be paid to the wife's appointment, and, in default, to the intended wife for life for her separate use, then to the husband for life, and the capital to be in trust for the survivor absolutely. Property of the wife was also agreed to be settled upon the same trusts. The husband became bankrupt, and the trustees applied to prove for the amount, which had never been paid, but the Commissioner rejected the proof:—Held, on appeal, that the settlement was good as against the assignnees, and that the trustees were entitled to prove.

This was a special case, stated by the authority of the Commissioner, for the opinion of the Court, he having rejected a proof for 500*l.* on the bankrupt's estate. From the case (which was stated at the instance of the trustees of a settlement, and granted under the authority of the 14th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849), it appeared that the bankrupt, John Mac Birnie, carried on trade in Devonshire, having a shop in Exeter, receiving payment for his goods by weekly instalments. He commenced business as a draper and tea-dealer in May 1850, without any capital, but obtaining credit from the wholesale houses on the guarantie of his former master. Twelve months afterwards he made an offer for a composition, but by an arrangement he was able to go on. In June 1851, being then still in insolvent circumstances, and being about to be married to Maria Harris, he executed a settlement, by which the one-third of the intended wife, in a certain trust sum of 700*l.*, to which she was entitled in possession, was assigned to trustees upon certain trusts after stated, and the said bankrupt, in consideration of the intended marriage, and in pursuance of an intended agreement entered into in contemplation thereof, covenanted with the trustees to pay them on demand the sum of 500*l.*, with interest from the day of the marriage at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum. And it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed as well of the one-third part of the 700*l.* as of the 500*l.* settled by the bankrupt, upon trust, for such persons as Maria Harris should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment, upon trust, during the joint lives of the bankrupt and Maria Harris, to pay the income of the trust funds to her for her separate use; and upon the decease of either the bankrupt or Maria Harris, upon trust, subject to the said power of appointment, to pay the trust funds to the survivor, with power to the trustees to allow the trust funds to remain outstanding until Maria Harris should otherwise direct. By an agreement executed at the same time, the contingent interest of Maria Harris in one-half of another one-third of the said sum of 700*l.* in the event of her brother dying under twenty-one years of age, and also all other property (if any) which might thereafter devolve on her, was agreed to be settled upon the same trusts as the 500*l.* The bankrupt continued in his trade until October 1851, when he stopped payment, indebted, exclusively of the 500*l.* to the trustees of the settlement, in the sum of 1,302*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, of which above 800*l.* was contracted before the settlement. His assets consisted of stock and furniture, valued at 147*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.*; good debts, 630*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*; doubtful, 872*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*; bad, 189*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*; total property and debts, 1,340*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* The case stated that "the probable amount of the assets that will be realized is 365*l.*, in consequence of the peculiar nature of the debts contracted with traders of this class."

Mrs. Mac Birnie was examined, and the following portion of her examination was stated in the case. "I was engaged to my husband about nine months before we were married. About ten days previous to our marriage something was said about my property. I was entitled to one-third of a sum of 700*l.* due on mortgage, which I was to receive on my brother's coming of age. My property was to be settled on myself. I did not know Mac Birnie's circumstances. I wished the settlement to be made to secure my money to myself. I employed Mr. Every to prepare the settlement. He acted for both of us. Mr. Mac Birnie and I went together to Mr. Every's, and instructed him to prepare the settlement. We went to him two or three times about it. No one went with me on my behalf. Mr. Mac Birnie made no statement to me about his affairs or his property. I did not know he was in debt at all. He owed my mother some money. I do not know if it was repaid before we were married. It was my own thought about having my property settled on me. I told Mr. Every to settle it in the usual way. I gave no directions as to the 500*l.* of Mr. Mac Birnie's. He said he would settle it on me. I did not know how it was to be paid." The Commissioner added, "The Court has no reason to doubt the truth of this statement."

The proof by the trustees for the 500*l.* was resisted by the assignees, and finally rejected by the Commissioner, and his reasons were, that at the date of the settlement the bankrupt was embarrassed and had no reasonable expectation of avoiding bankruptcy, and that he entered into the covenant with a view of enabling the trustees to prove against his estate, in fraud of his creditors, and by way of indirectly making a provision out of his own property for himself in case of bankruptcy. The learned Commissioner, in support of his view, cited—

Higginson v. Kelly, 1 Ball & B. 252.

Mr. Shapter, for the appellants, the trustees.—There is no evidence in the present case of any fraudulent design by the bankrupt, as is attributed to him in the judgment of the Commissioner. It is true a presumption would arise of such a fraudulent intention if the settlement, instead of being so small, had been extravagantly large. The cases on which the Commissioner relied are rather in favour of the bankrupt, and are sufficient to support the appeal. No case goes so far as to hold that, a settlement made before and in contemplation of bankruptcy, but in consideration of a settlement of property belonging to the wife, and where the intended wife has no notice of the design, if any existed, of a fraud on the creditors, can be set aside. It has long been settled that marriage is a valuable consideration, and the only section of the Bankrupt Act which relates to the setting aside of instruments on the ground of insolvency is the 126th section, and in that, contracts for valuable consideration are expressly excepted.

Mr. Bacon contended, on behalf of the assignees, that the mere fact of a deed being executed for value was not enough to save it from the consequences of fraud if fraud existed in the transaction, and so it was laid down in Cadogan v. Kennett (1). The doctrine was also recognized in Ex parte Meaghan (2); and Campion v. Cotton (3), strong as that case was, was clearly distinguishable from the present.

No reply was called for.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—What we have to decide is, as to the effect we are to give to a marriage settlement which contains no reference to bankruptcy, but which does contain a simple and immediate covenant on the part of the intended husband to pay this sum of money. How this case would have stood if the intended wife had been implicated in any design to defraud the creditors of the intended husband, either by means of contracting for an extravagant settlement or otherwise, it is unnecessary for me to say. Nor is it necessary for me to say what would have been the result of the bona fides of the wife being impeached in some manner other than by the mere appearance and nature of the settlement, that is, if its terms might have made the wife suspect that its provisions were otherwise than usual or proper, by reason of its being out of proportion to the station and circumstances of the intended husband. The conduct of the wife, however, is not impeached. There appears to be nothing suspicious in this settlement, and it is such an one only as an honest woman well advised might reasonably and properly require. This disposes of the whole case. No fraud is imputed to her; I think sufficient does not appear to exclude a proof, and in that Lord Cranworth seems to concur.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I not only concur in the conclusion to which my learned Brother has come, but I do so substantially also for the reasons he has given. It has been said that this settlement was a fraud on the Bankrupt Law. In this I cannot agree. It has not been shewn, or attempted to be shewn, that the wife was party or privy to any fraud,—was particeps criminis if fraud there were. The transaction does not appear to be otherwise than fair, or not to have been entered into bona fide. I agree that the settlement of all the property to the separate use of the wife might have awakened

(1) 2 Cowp. 432.

(2) 1 Sch. & Lef. 179.

(3) 17 Ves. 263.

suspicion; but it did not do so, and so the Commissioner has, in effect, found. The wife being cognizant of no fraud, the present case is distinguishable from those which were cited during the argument. I, however, guard myself against giving any opinion as to what would be the effect of a settlement shewing in itself something so extraordinary as to make it evident that fraud was intended, as if the settlement had been of 50,000*l.* and not of 500*l.* That would have been too gross not to be seen. There is nothing of that sort here; there was no fraud and nothing to awaken suspicion. The settlement, therefore, is valid, and the proof for the 500*l.* must be allowed. The costs of the petition may come out of the estate.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849—Railway Stock—"Government or other Stock."

*The 201st section of the act enacts, that no bankrupt shall be entitled to his certificate if he shall within one year before his bankruptcy have lost 200*l., by any contract for the sale or purchase of "any Government or other stock:"—Held, on appeal, affirming the decision of the Commissioner, that railway stock is within the meaning of this section.

In this case the certificate was opposed by the assignees before the Commissioner upon several grounds, and Mr. Commissioner Perry refused it on account of reckless trading, of incurring debts without means of payment, of excessive speculations in shares, and also for the following reason stated in a memorandum at the foot of the decision, "And I declare that the bankrupt appears to me also not entitled to his certificate, he having brought himself within the penal provisions of the 201st section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, by a loss of 200*l.*, within one year next preceding the filing of the petition for adjudication in this matter, upon a contract for the purchase of railway stock, called 'Leeds stock;' and by a loss of 200*l.* within the like period, upon another contract for the purchase of 'Edinburgh and Glasgow stock,' being also railway stock; which two several contracts were respectively entered into by the said bankrupt, and were not to be performed within one week after the date of each respective contract" (1). From this decision the bankrupt appealed.

After the case had been stated—

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE said, that his learned Brother and himself thought that the arguments had better be confined in the first instance to the question whether railway stock was included in the act, as a decision on that point might render any discussion on the other parts of the Commissioner's judgment unnecessary.

Mr. Bramwell and Mr. W. M. James, for the petition.—The question here is, whether "other stock" can be said to include railway stock, or must not be construed to mean other stock ejusdem generis as the stock before mentioned in the act, namely "Government stock." It is very material, in the outset, to observe that when this term was originally used in the Bankrupt law of this country, no such thing as railway stock existed, for railways were unknown; yet successive acts of parliament have been passed and still the words remain the same. Such an omission to alter the words is a manifest intention on the part of the legislature to exclude such stock,—the existence at the time of passing later acts, and especially the last act, of such stock being most notorious. Where the legislature did intend to guard against gambling in any stock it took care to use full and extensive words, as in the case of the Bubble Act, 6 Geo. 1. c. 18. The case upon railway stock, however, is not without authority, for in the case of Hewitt v. Price (2), which arose under the 5th section of the Stock Jobbing Act, 7 Geo. 2. c. 8, railway stock was held not to be included in the description of "other public securities," the words before used being "any public or joint stock." The reason given by one of the learned Judges was, that railway stock was not "public stock," nor did it form any part of "public annuities." In that case the observation of Mr. Justice Bosanquet in Wells v. Porter (3) was cited, who said "When we find the expression 'public stocks,' we must intend the public stocks of this country;" and Lord Chief Justice Tindal assented to that proposition. If the view taken by the Commissioner be right, then it is at variance with all the rules laid down by this Court, for certainly no trustee who has power of investing in government or other stock would be permitted to invest the property of his cestui que trust in railway stock, and if he did, this Court would make him responsible for any loss, on the ground that such an investment was a breach of trust.

(1) The 201st section of the act is, so far as relates to this question, this:—"That no bankrupt shall be entitled to a certificate of conformity under this act, and any such certificate, if allowed, shall be void, if such bankrupt shall have lost, by any sort of gaming or wagering in one day 20*l.*, or within one year next preceding the issuing of the fiat or filing of the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy 200*l.*, or if he shall within one year next preceding the issuing of the fiat or the filing of such petition have lost 200*l.* by any contract for the purchase or sale of any government or other stock, where such contract was not to be performed within one week after the contract, or where the stock bought or sold was not actually transferred or delivered in pursuance of such contract."

The proper construction of the words "or other stock" is, that they are ejusdem generis with the former word "Government;" the genus is stock, and stock guaranteed by this or any other government. The income of stock, thus meant, is not variable; but in shares it is: one is not, the other is subject to fluctuation like any other mercantile commodity. At the time of the passing of the Consolidation Act in 1849, it was perfectly well known to the legislature what money was invested in railways, canals, and other public works; and had it been intended to include such monies, the statute would have been clear and explicit in so enacting. Between the time when these words were used in acts of parliament and the passing of the last Bankrupt Act, it was well known that railway stock had been held by the Courts not to be within the words of the Stock Jobbing Acts; and it is quite impossible to suppose that if railway stock were meant, it would not have been either specifically named or that some clear general word to include it would not have been made use of.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Do you contend that, in the case of a will, Bank stock would pass by such words?]

Mr. W. M. James.—Yes.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—And yet Bank stock is fluctuating; it depends upon the profits of the Bank as bankers.]

Mr. Rolt and Mr. Kinglake appeared for the assignees, but were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I am of opinion that the Commissioner's decision is correct. The Bankrupt Act of 1849, singularly enough, considering the general import and object of it, does not continue or contain the provisions found in other and preceding acts of parliament as to construing it favourably to creditors. If the clause to which I allude had been found there, I am inclined to think no question could have arisen; but still it is a rule, and has been a rule from the earliest times, applicable to the construction of all statutes, that you must suppress the mischief, and advance the remedy to which they relate. If this be so, there can be no reasonable doubt that stock of the description referred to is as much within the mischief intended to be prevented,—is as much within the meaning of the 201st section of the act—as ordinary Government stock, and certainly ought to be within the remedy. The words are "Government or other stock," and railway stock is so described by the legislature, in other statutes, in a way to warrant the application of the term "stock" to it. It has, however, been said that the 201st section is a penal section. To this I must not be understood as assenting; but whether it is so or not, I quite agree with the Commissioner in thinking that the stock in question is "other stock" within the meaning of the clause. This, I apprehend, is the construction the words must bear.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think "other stock" means stock transferable in the books of a company, in the same manner as Government stock is transferable in the books of the Bank of England. An argument was attempted to be adduced from earlier statutes, where more words were used. But so also, in other older acts, the different descriptions of wagering are specified, as by tennis, dice, &c. All such enumeration is left out here, because in modern acts the legislature is in the habit of omitting all this enumeration of particulars. Here it was said, that stock of this kind cannot be within the meaning of these words, because they became part of the bankrupt law when shares of this description could not have been in existence. I think it would be unsafe to argue that stock was not intended to be included merely on this ground. With regard to the ingenious argument adduced in this case, that a trustee for investment in Government or other stock would not be justified in investing in this stock, I think that argument is excluded, because a trustee is not justified in investing in foreign stock. My view of the case is even stronger than that of my learned Brother. The petition must be dismissed, and with costs.

(2) 4 Man. & G. 355.

(3) 2 Bing. N.C. 722.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—Removal of Solicitor to the Assignees—Discretion of Commissioner.

Assignees appointed solicitors, who were related by marriage to the bankrupts. The Commissioner, deeming the appointment objectionable, gave the assignees time to decide whether they would discharge the solicitors, or whether they, the assignees, would themselves retire from their office; at the time appointed the assignees refused to do either, whereupon the Commissioner removed the assignees:—Held, upon appeal, that the removal of assignees is in the entire discretion of the Commissioner, and the Court, refusing to interfere, dismissed the appeal, with costs.

The bankrupts in this case were William Williams, William Williams the younger, and Thomas Robert Williams, carrying on business at Newport, in Monmouthshire, as "The Newport Old Bank." The petitioner, Mr. Bates, and another gentleman, were appointed assignees, and at a meeting for the examination of the bankrupts, on the 21st of January 1852, gentlemen from two firms of solicitors, namely, Messrs. Prothero & Fox, and Messrs. Savery, Clark & Co. attended, as representing these firms, as solicitors for the assignees. Mr. Prothero was first cousin of the wife of Mr. W. Williams the elder, and Mr. Savery was uncle to the wife of Mr. T. R. Williams. Mr. Commissioner Stephen objected to the appointment, and it was agreed that the last examination should be adjourned to the 9th of February, in order that the assignees might consider whether they would discharge the solicitors, or whether they would themselves retire from the office of assignees. On the 9th of February the assignees declined to take either course, whereupon the Commissioner delivered the following judgment:—

"The appointment of solicitors made by the assignees in this cause being, in my opinion, objectionable for reasons already stated, and which it is unnecessary to repeat, I think it is also clear that it falls within my province, as the Commissioner before whom the petition is prosecuted, to take the objection. I apprehend this to be incident to the general powers and duty, unquestionably residing in this Court, to superintend the whole course of proceedings in every bankruptcy placed upon its file; and to see that those proceedings are conducted (so far as the Court has the opportunity of becoming officially acquainted with what is done) in the manner best adapted to promote the objects of the bankrupt law. Upon the present specific question, viz., whether the Court has power to interfere with the choice made by the assignees of their solicitors, the only argument against its possessing the power that occurs to my mind, as carrying with it sufficient colour to require notice, is that the right, which the Court does unquestionably possess of rejecting an assignee whom it may deem unfit to be appointed, is given by the express provision of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, section 139; and it may be said, perhaps, that the express insertion of such a power tends to the inference that it would not otherwise have existed, and therefore to the inference that the power now in question does not exist. Neither of these inferences, however, seems to be legitimate. The 139th section containing as it does an express enactment that the appointment of assignees may be made by the major part in value of creditors, it became necessary to add the express proviso (1), in order to obviate the implication that might otherwise have seemed to arise, that this choice was, even in the case of an unfit person, to be absolute and conclusive. But even without the proviso, I conceive that this Court must have possessed (as incident to the general jurisdiction with which this act so largely clothes it, and to an extent so much greater than any preceding act) the power to reject or remove an unfit assignee. And, even supposing the contrary, yet the case of the solicitor is very different from that of the assignee, for the assignee being once appointed, his nomination of a solicitor, unfit for whatever reason to be employed, is a breach of his duty as trustee for the creditors; and on that ground, independently of any other, the interference of the Court, in such a case, seems to be clearly authorized. Besides which, it is to be considered that the Court has a more direct and peculiar interest in the fitness of a solicitor appointed, because that solicitor, when appointed, becomes, as it were, the minister and assistant in effect of the Court itself. For it is laid down on the high authority of Lord Eldon, 6 Ves. 1. (at a time when bankruptcies were under the immediate cognizance of the Court of Chancery) that the solicitor was to be deemed 'a minister of that court'; and if so, it seems to follow,

(1) The 139th section is as follows:—That at the first public sitting, &c. "assignees of the bankrupt's estate and effects shall and may be chosen and appointed, and all creditors who have proved debts to the amount of 10*l.* and upwards shall be entitled to vote in such choice, and also any person authorized" in manner herein mentioned, "and the choice and appointment shall be made by the major part in value of the creditors so entitled to vote; provided that the Court shall have power to reject any person so chosen who shall appear to such Court unfit to be an assignee, or to remove any assignee, and upon such rejection or removal a new choice and appointment of another assignee shall be made in like manner."

on the same principle, that he is now a minister of the court in which the petition is presented. It may be added to these considerations, that if I am right in holding this appointment by the assignees in the present case to be of a nature tending to compromise the interest of the creditors and the claims of public justice, and if it be indeed true (as contended for) that the Court has no power of interference, then it follows that the creditors and the public remain in this respect without protection; for I am aware of no other quarter in which an original jurisdiction on this subject can be supposed to reside. There would be, therefore, a great defect in the law, and, although we know that such defects are occasionally discovered, I need scarcely say that they are never to be presumed, and that in any case of doubt it is to be taken as more probable that the law has intended its existing institutions to comprise some remedy for a given abuse, than that it has left that abuse wholly unprovided for. Under the circumstances, I should have thought it right to make a formal order on the assignees, directing them to change their solicitors; but as they declared to the Court at the last sitting that, in the event of such an order being made, it was their intention not to obey the same, it would seem futile to take that course; and I, therefore, now proceed to order, and do hereby order that the assignees be removed from their office, on the ground of their persisting in the choice of solicitors they have made, and refusing to obey any order that the Court should make for changing their solicitors; and that a sitting be held on the 23rd day of the present month, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon, for the choice of the new assignee or assignees; and that the time of the sale of the bankrupts' property, now advertised for the 2nd of March next, be enlarged until the 16th of March by advertisement, and I do adjourn the last examination of the said bankrupts until the said 23rd day of February."

The assignees presented a petition of appeal against this decision.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Giffard, for the appellants.—The authority of the assignees to appoint their solicitor is, as it has always been, and recognized to be, an absolute right, with which the Commissioners have no authority to interfere; and although the 139th section gives full power to remove the assignees in cases where the Commissioner shall think they are improper persons, nothing is said about the solicitor, and there is no pretence for saying that the assignees are improper persons to be intrusted with the management of this estate. Having no direct authority over the appointment of the solicitor, the Court will not sanction the indirect attempt to controul it.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT-BRUCE.—Do not the words after those to which you allude, "or to remove any assignee," sufficiently shew that the removal is wholly in the discretion of the Commissioner?]

They are so; but still that discretion is one which this Court will feel itself bound to controul where the motive for its exercise is plainly improper. The Commissioner has very clearly shewn that the reason which has actuated him was not any personal incompetency, or other disqualification for the office, but solely as a sort of punishment for not submitting, in the exercise of that authority which the legislature has intrusted to them, to his dictation. If any principle such as this had ever existed in the bankrupt law, some trace of it must be to be found in the books, but no such trace is discoverable.

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Suppose this case: the son a bankrupt, his father a solicitor, and the assignees employing the father to be the solicitor to the estate: surely that circumstance would render him unfit. The assignees making such a choice might well be a very material ingredient in determining in the mind of the Commissioner the fitness of the assignees themselves to continue in the office.]

It does not follow that because there is relationship a solicitor will be induced to act improperly. In truth, the gentleman who acts in the matter of this bankruptcy is the partner who is in nowise connected with the bankrupts. If the solicitor does act improperly, this Court has full power to controul him; and if the assignees should persist in employing him, it would be a breach of duty on their part, and ample ground for their removal. The regulations in bankruptcy in 6 Ves. 1. shew no authority to interfere with the assignees in such a matter.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Roxburgh appeared for the petitioning creditors, in support of the judgment of the Commissioner, but were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I have had some doubt, and still doubt, whether, had I been in the place of the Commissioner, and had to exercise a discretion, I should have so exercised that discretion as the learned Commissioner has. The matter is, however, one of discretion merely. That the Commissioner has a discretion as to the removal of assignees is, I think, clear, and this Court will not interfere with it, unless it is satisfied that such discretion has been improperly exercised. During the argument, I asked what would be the effect of the case where the relationship between the parties was that of a father or very near relation. The reason why I put that case of a father acting as solicitor under his son's bankruptcy was, to shew that relationship might, in an extreme case, be a ground of unfitness for the office. I think the Court cannot weigh, in such a question, the degrees of relationship. Here the Commissioner may have reasons strong, even conclusive, to bring him to the determination, even of the unfitness of these gentlemen; and as he has a discretion, it is not necessary for this Court, without the knowledge of those reasons, to interfere merely because of a doubt crossing the mind of one member of it, whether he would have exercised the discretion otherwise than as the Commissioner has exercised it in regard to the removal of the assignees if the case had originally come before him. The Commissioner in this instance has adopted no general principle: but he merely decides that the appointment of the solicitors is inexpedient. I am of opinion that the petition must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT-BRUCE.—If this had been an order by the Commissioner on the assignees to discharge their solicitor, it is totally unnecessary to say what would have been my opinion, and I therefore abstain from expressing it. What he has done in effect is, I understand, this: he has said to the assignees, "you are respectable men, and have employed respectable solicitors; but, however respectable they are, there are reasons which appear to me, for the due application of the estate, and for the proper administration of justice, to be sufficient to induce me to say that, in my judicial opinion, it is necessary that you should discharge those solicitors and employ others; will you employ other solicitors, or will you yourselves retire from the assigneeship?" To this the assignees in effect say, "We will do neither one nor the other." In such a state of things I can only say I agree entirely with the view taken by my learned Brother; and add that, in my opinion, the petition must be dismissed, with costs, to be paid by the petitioners, and not out of the estate.

Mr. Swanston asked that the costs of the petitioning creditors might be paid by the appellants.

Mr. Bacon.—They were not served with the petition of appeal, and ought not to have appeared. The official assignee was served, and he very properly did not appear.

The petitioning creditors' costs were directed to be paid out of the estate, their solicitor stating that, in fact, the petition of appeal had been served on the Commissioner, who had sent him, the solicitor, a note authorizing him to appear.

Adjudication of Bankruptcy—Petition to annul after Advertisement—Jurisdiction of the Commissioner—Statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. ss. 12, 233.

A petition to annul an adjudication after advertisement in the Gazette, must be presented to the Vice Chancellor sitting in Bankruptcy. After the advertisement, the Commissioner has no jurisdiction to entertain a petition to review his adjudication—stat. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. ss. 12, 104, 233.

This was an appeal from an order of the Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, annulling the adjudication of bankruptcy against the petitioner, with costs.

The principal question raised both upon the hearing before the Vice Chancellor and on the present appeal was whether the Commissioner had jurisdiction to entertain a petition by the bankrupt to annul the adjudication of bankruptcy after the advertisement of the adjudication, under the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106.

The facts of the case appear in the report of the hearing, before the Vice Chancellor, 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 19.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. W. W. Cooper, for the petitioning creditors, appellants.—The petition of the bankrupt to the Commissioner to annul the adjudication was irregular, for the Commissioner had then no jurisdiction to review his own judgment. The bankrupt, having taken advantage of the bankruptcy by obtaining his discharge from arrest thereunder, will not be allowed afterwards to dispute it.

Mr. Daniel, for the bankrupt.—The 104th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act has a distinct and limited object, namely, to enable the bankrupt to avoid the advertisement of the adjudication; but, after the advertisement, the bankrupt has a further time to dispute the adjudication. The only question is, whether the petition to the Commissioner was a proceeding within the act to dispute the adjudication. The authority of the Commissioner to entertain the question depends on the 12th section of the act, which gives the Court, in the exercise of its primary jurisdiction, superintendence and controul in all matters in Bankruptcy, and gives an appeal only to the Vice Chancellor, and no original jurisdiction. If the Commissioner, therefore, has not jurisdiction, no Court exists which can give effect to the provisions of the 233rd section. The petition to annul was not an appeal, but an original proceeding within the meaning of the 233rd section—Ex parte Thorold (1).

Mr. Swanston, in reply, contended that a petition to annul was in the nature of an appeal from the decision of the Commissioner, and therefore ought to have come before the Vice Chancellor; that the petition to the Commissioner was a nullity, and the proceedings before the Vice Chancellor were not had within the time limited by the act.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The sole question is, whether the petition to the Commissioner on the 19th of March was or was not a proceeding within the meaning of the act, taken before a proper tribunal, with a view of proceeding to annul the adjudication. The act is not quite consistent in terms; for, though it is clear that after the passing of this act fiats were at an end, and the only foundation of the prosecution of the bankruptcy was the adjudication, yet mention is made of fiats. Formerly there was a previous proceeding called a docket, upon which a fiat issued under the Great Seal; but now, in analogy to that, a petition is presented to the Commissioner praying the trader may be adjudged a bankrupt. Yet, nevertheless, the language of the act in some parts supposes the fiat to continue. It must be remembered, however, that the adjudication is the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that it is not, as of old, a mere ministerial proceeding, but a judicial act, a conclusion of law from facts which the Commissioner is charged with the duty of inquiring into. The proceeding is ex parte, and it being found that an ex parte proceeding often works injustice if immediately acted upon, therefore a remedy is given by the 104th section, which provides that the trader shall have notice of the adjudication previously pronounced, and shall have a certain time allowed him to dispute its validity, and authority is given to the Commissioner, if he shall be satisfied that the evidence formerly produced before him did not warrant his conclusion, to annul the adjudication, and that would have put an end to the proceedings in Bankruptcy, subject however to appeal, as it was not intended that the decision of the Commissioner should be final. By the 12th section very extensive powers are conferred on the Commissioner, subject in all cases to an appeal to the Vice Chancellor.

Now, there is no doubt that a petition for an adjudication is a matter over which the Commissioner has jurisdiction; and this section, therefore, in defining his jurisdiction in general terms, expresses that which comprises a petition for adjudication, among other matters, but "subject in all cases to appeal." The adjudication, then, is a matter within the jurisdiction of the Commissioner, and an appeal is given in all cases where jurisdiction is given to the Commissioner. That would shew that there is no such evil necessarily arising in the present case as an appeal brought to the Commissioner against his own adjudication, or, if he has no jurisdiction, that there is therefore no remedy; for there is a remedy distinctly pointed out. It has always been a great object with the legislature to limit the time within which the bankrupt may contest his bankruptcy, to the earliest moment; because, by such litigation the efforts of the assignees to realize the estate are impeded, and the ruin of the estate occurs during the contest; or, if the bankruptcy is invalid, the trader himself is ruined. The present statute follows in the same course. The 104th section gives the bankrupt the opportunity of resisting the proceedings before the advertisement. Suppose he does not take advantage of that, what is the next step which the act has provided by which to limit the period within which the bankruptcy shall be doubtful? The 233rd section provides that, unless the bankrupt shall, within twenty-one days after the advertisement, have commenced an action, suit, or other proceeding to dispute or annul the fiat, or the petition for adjudication, and shall have prosecuted the same with due diligence, &c., the Gazette shall be conclusive evidence of the bankruptcy.

Such being the general provisions of the act directed to the object I have before adverted to, let me now consider what the bankrupt has done. He did not contest the adjudication within the time limited by the 104th section, but at a subsequent period he presented a petition to the Commissioner, in which he prayed that the petition for adjudication, and the adjudication, might be annulled. Now, it has been said that the Commissioner possesses original jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the bankruptcy ; and having so adjudicated, his original jurisdiction is exercised, and he has done all that he has power to do ; and that the only mode of impeaching the adjudication is by appeal to the Vice Chancellor ; and that wherever an appeal is given, you must resort to the act itself, to see to what Court it is given ; that there is nothing in this act to point to a second hearing by the Commissioner, but that the Commissioner's decision in adjudication, as in other matters, is open to appeal. The question in this part of the case is, what is the true character of the petition presented on the 19th of March ? Was it an original proceeding on the part of the bankrupt ? It was said, on the other side, that it could not have that character, because, if it was a proceeding finding fault with a judgment previously pronounced, it was in the nature of an appeal, and was an attempt to extend the period beyond the seven days allowed by the 104th section, and even much further ; and that it is an evasion of the act which limits the time. That the bankrupt was intended to have the power of obtaining the judgment of the Commissioner after adjudication is quite clear ; but is it not equally clear that where the bankrupt wishes to avoid an appeal by calling on the Commissioner for a review of his decision, that proceeding must be had within the time limited by the 104th section ? I think the legislature has clearly expressed, that if the bankrupt proposes to do that, he must do it within the time there limited. I think this was, to all intents, a petition of appeal, and that it was not presented before the proper tribunal ; and that it was not competent to the Commissioner to enter into the question a second time after the time limited. Instead of presenting his petition to the Vice Chancellor in the first instance, as he ought to have done, after the expiration of the twenty-one days from the advertisement, he presents a petition against the order of the Commissioner refusing to review his own judgment. If the Commissioner was right in holding that the party was not then entitled to call upon him to review his judgment, the petition complaining of that decision cannot be sustained. Looking at it with much anxiety, it appears to me that the provisions of the act of parliament would be evaded by the extension of the power beyond what the legislature intended, supposing the present order to stand. I think the Commissioner was correct in the view which he took, that he had no power at that time to review his decision, and that, therefore, the appeal against that judgment cannot be sustained, and that the order of the Vice Chancellor now appealed from must be reversed. The appellants to have their costs of this appeal out of the bankrupt's estate.

James Whitaker and Joseph Crowther were adjudicated bankrupts. The certificate of Crowther was suspended for three years, that of Whitaker was refused. Both had protection after three months' imprisonment. The bankrupt Whitaker appealed.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Steere.—Since the hearing before the Commissioner facts have been discovered which lead to a supposition that the Commissioner would not have refused the certificate had the case been so presented to his attention. Instead, therefore, of pressing the appeal, the Court is now asked to refer the matter back to the Commissioner to review his decision.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I doubt whether the 207th section of the act gives the Court jurisdiction to refer back the certificate to the Commissioner to review his decision.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Even if the Court did so, and the Commissioner re-heard the case, and then granted the certificate, the grant would probably be invalid.

The Court then heard the case upon the additional evidence and examined the bankrupt, the appellant, and ultimately varied the order by giving him his certificate after a suspension of three years.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—It must be distinctly understood that in varying this decision we do so only on the additional evidence before us, and not as in the slightest degree intimating that, upon the materials which were before the learned Commissioner, we should not have come to the same conclusion as he did.

—Annuling Adjudication—Time for Appeal.

Where a creditor petitions against an adjudication within the proper time, and the petition is not heard within the twenty-one days from the adjudication, and when heard it is dismissed, and the creditor appeals within twenty-one days after the Commissioner's decision on his petition, his appeal is in time under the 12th section of the statute.

A petition to the Commissioner to annul the adjudication is not an appeal within the meaning of that section.

John Wilkinson was adjudicated bankrupt on the 12th of May 1851. Mr. Samuel Bean, a creditor, presented a petition on the 30th of June to annul, on the ground of there being no act of bankruptcy, and there being no sufficient petitioning creditor's debt. The 11th of July was appointed for the hearing, when Mr. Bean attended the district court; and, after the petitioning creditor's debt had been admitted to proof, the Commissioner ordered Mr. Bean's petition to stand over until the 15th of August. Before that day the assignees petitioned against the admission of proof of the petitioning creditor's debt, and on the 18th of August Mr. Bean's petition was again adjourned till after the hearing of the last-mentioned petition. On the 11th of December 1851 the proof was expunged by the Lords Justices, and Mr. Bean's petition to annul was heard by the Commissioner on the 20th of February 1852, when it was dismissed, with costs, and from that decision Mr. Bean appealed.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Daniel, for the appeal.

Mr. Glasse and Mr. Hardy, for the petitioning creditor.—As this is an appeal from an adjudication it should have been presented within twenty-one days from the date of the adjudication—Ex parte Carter (1).

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Terrell appeared for the assignees.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This petition from adjudication appears, so far as the evidence before us goes, to be unsupported by the legal requisites. The case, therefore, fails at law. That, however, is not decisive; but still, when a bankruptcy is insufficient at law, it lies upon those who attempt to support it to shew equitable grounds for sustaining it. There appear in this case to be no such grounds shewn. With respect to the time of the application, it was made to the Commissioner at the end of seventeen days; and if there was any delay, it arose by reason of the pendency of an application by the bankrupt for the same purpose. It is said that the Commissioner had no jurisdiction to annul the adjudication upon the application of Mr. Bean, because the adjudication took place on the 12th of May, and his petition of appeal to this Court was not presented until the 20th of June, that is, after an interval beyond twenty-one days. We are of opinion that it is not a case of appeal, within the 12th section of the act, from the order of adjudication, but that the appellant's original application to have the adjudication annulled was properly made to the Commissioner under the general jurisdiction conferred on him by the act of parliament, and that it was not until he had adjudicated upon that application of Mr. Bean that a case for appeal arose. So far as Mr. Bean is concerned, from the moment when his application to the Commissioner was rejected, and not before, it became a case for an appeal as regarded him. He has appealed within twenty-one days after the decision: that is the way in which we view the case.

(1) 20 Law J. Rep. (s.a.) Bankr. 19.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH was of the same opinion.

The case was gone into on the other points, and ultimately the adjudication was annulled.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, Section 232—Inspection of Documents, &c.—“Reasonable Request.”

A creditor, who had proved his debt, applied by his attorney, under the 232nd section of the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, for leave to inspect the affidavit of debt, the proof of the act of bankruptcy, and other proofs filed in court, on which the adjudication was founded, with a view to impeach the adjudication. The officer of the district court refused compliance. The creditor appealed, and it was held, that this was not a “reasonable” request, within the meaning of the statute; that the application was properly refused, and that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Quære — Whether the above-mentioned documents and proofs are within the language of the 232nd section.

This was the petition of Mr. Rimell, a creditor, who had proved his debt in the bankruptcy of Mr. Brewer, and who had applied under the 232nd section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (1), by his attorney, to the Registrar of the district court, to permit him to have inspection at all reasonable times, or at such times as the Court should direct, of the affidavit of the petitioning creditor, the proofs of the act of bankruptcy, and the other proofs filed in court, upon which the adjudication in bankruptcy had been made. On the 14th of February 1852 the application came on to be heard, before the Registrar of the district court at Bristol, sitting for the Commissioner in his absence. The Registrar refused to grant the application, unless the object for which it was made were first disclosed. The applicant then stated that he intended to use the evidence he might obtain by means of the inspection for the purpose of impeaching the adjudication, by questioning the petitioning creditor's debt, and the act of bankruptcy. Upon the solicitor to the assignees objecting to any inspection being permitted for such a purpose, the Registrar, in accordance with the decision of the Commissioner (Mr. Hill) upon a similar application previously made, by the same attorney, on behalf of a different creditor, refused the application; proceeding in such refusal on the ground that the application was not a “reasonable request,” within the meaning of the statute. The petition prayed, by way of appeal from the Regis-trary having proved his debt, or of an arranging debtor, when the debt of the arranging creditor has been admitted in the petition or proved, or on the like request of the attorney of any such bankrupt, debtor, or creditor, produce and shew to such bankrupt, debtor, creditor, or attorney, at such times as the Court shall direct, every fiat, petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, adjudication of bankruptcy, and petition for arrangement, against or by such bankrupt, and all orders and proceedings under any such fiat, petition, or adjudication, and the Court shall order the official assignee or officer of the Court, as the case may be, to permit such bankrupt, debtor, creditor, or attorney to have inspection at all reasonable times of all books, papers, and writings relating to the matters of such fiat, petition, or adjudication, and the estate of the bankrupt or debtor in the possession of the assignees, or filed in court in such matter, and permit him to inspect and examine the same; and such official assignee or such officer shall provide for any such bankrupt, debtor, creditor, or attorney requiring the same, an office copy of such fiat, petition, or other proceeding, books, papers, and writings as aforesaid, or of such part thereof as shall be required, receiving such fee or sum or rate of charge as may be authorized in that behalf.”

(1) The 232nd section of the act, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, is as follows:—“That the proper officer of the Court in London and in the several districts in the country shall, on the reasonable request of any bankrupt or arranging debtor, or of any creditor of such banktrar's order of the 14th of February, that such order might be reversed, and that it might be ordered that the petitioner's attorney should be permitted to have inspection of the affidavit and other proofs filed in the said Court of Bankruptcy at all reasonable times.

Mr. W. M. James, for the petition.—The principle upon which the application was made to the Registrar of the district court, and on which the present appeal is founded, is this: inasmuch as a bankrupt has a right to see the evidence upon which his whole property is taken from him, his creditor has an equal right to see the evidence upon which the property of the debtor has been vested in trustees for the alleged benefit of the other creditors as well as of himself. It may be right that all a debtor's estate may be divided among all his creditors; but one creditor may have, by law, a claim to full payment, and he cannot be deprived of that right excepting in a legal manner, and how can he tell whether the adjudication is legal without inspection of the proofs of it? The papers, books, and documents filed in court, under the adjudication, are, in fact, the property of the creditors, for whom the Court or official assignee are merely trustees; and the creditors, as the cestuis que trust of the papers, are at all times entitled to inspection, without any restriction or qualification, except that of applying during the business hours of the office. The words "reasonable request," occurring in the first clause of this section, are not repeated in the second clause, namely, that part which is directory upon the assignee or officer to permit inspection. The two clauses must be read in the disjunctive; the second is not governed by the words "reasonable request" occurring in the first. That being so, the officer at Bristol was bound to produce the documents and proceedings at the request of the creditor, without inquiring into the reasonableness of such request. Should this Court, however, be disposed to hold otherwise, then, on behalf of the present petitioner, it is contended that the words "reasonable request" have reference merely to the time, opportunity, and place, having regard to the convenience and arrangements of the office, and not to the object or purpose of the application. But if the words "reasonable request" shall be held to have reference to the object or purpose of the application, still the object in the present instance is reasonable, being merely to ascertain the evidence upon which the assignees found their title; in order that by means of such evidence the creditor may consider and determine whether he will adopt or resist the adjudication, or, in other words, to enable him to say whether he will receive a dividend in common with other creditors, or take proceedings to insure full payment to himself. The bankrupt himself would clearly be entitled, under this section, to inspect the evidence upon which the proceeding was founded, by which he has been deprived of all his property; and if the bankrupt would be so entitled, the same privilege is extended by the act to the creditor. Courts of equity, in adverse suits, are in the habit of compelling the litigant to produce every scrap of documentary evidence material to the issue in the cause; and it would be strange, therefore, if the Court should itself set the example of defeating justice, by withholding evidence and concealing truth.

Mr. Bacon appeared for the assignees, but was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I think that clause of the section which relates to the production of, and the permission to inspect the documents mentioned must be considered as one sentence. The former part of the section, which speaks of a reasonable request, is applicable to the words "such creditor," and so on in the latter part. The latter part of the clause is tacked on to the former in a way which renders the wording not very artistical, but the whole, I think, must be taken as one sentence. That being so, I am of opinion that the words "reasonable request" apply to the latter member of the clause as well as to the former, and that the official assignee or officer can only permit inspection to any of the parties enumerated in the clause upon such reasonable request. The former part of the sentence speaks of "proceedings," the latter part of "books, papers, and writings," but every part is governed by the words "reasonable request." The only question then is, whether the application we are now considering is a reasonable one within the meaning of the act. I think it is not; and that the application was properly refused by the Registrar. It is hardly necessary to add that, in my opinion, the appeal is equally unreasonable, and ought to be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Under the old practice in Bankruptcy no such liberty as is here asked would have been allowed, nor do I think it is intended to be given now. The reason given for a desire to inspect these particular documents is, to say the least of it, very odd; it is stated to be a desire on the part of the petitioner, a creditor, who has proved his debt, to impeach the validity of the adjudication. I am not perfectly satisfied that the particular papers or documents which this gentleman wishes to see are within the language of the 232nd section of the statute; but I would rather not, without necessity, give any opinion upon that. I will assume, for the purpose of the present question, and for that only, that these documents are within the language of the section; but if they are, still, the rational interpretation of this section requires a discretion to be exercised as to the reasonableness of the application for inspection. What, then, is the application before us? Property has been converted into a fund for the payment of creditors who are interested therein at large. One of the body happens to have a wish or interest adverse to the body at large, and seeks to avail himself of the power which the fact of his being one of the body gives him, in order to affect the interest of the whole body of which he is one. That is the effect of the application, the object being merely to destroy the adjudication, and to take away from his fellows the benefit of the documents and proceedings he comes to inspect, under the guise of being one of them. There never was an application more correctly refused; and I quite agree that this petition must be dismissed, with costs.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849.
—Certificate—Fraudulent Preference.

A bankrupt, having had his certificate refused, was taken in execution, and lodged in gaol. The ground of the refusal of the Commissioner was a fraudulent preference within the 256th section of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106; but the Court of Appeal, being of opinion that such a charge was not sustained, granted a certificate of the third class, and directed the release of the bankrupt from prison on a given day.

The facts of this appeal from the decision of the Commissioner, Mr. Ayrton, refusing the bankrupt any certificate or protection, were as follows:—

Henry Hunt commenced business, as a commission-agent, at Hull, with a capital of 10*l.* only, in December 1849. In March following, he married a widow, who carried on business as a Berlin wool dealer, and was the apparent owner of the stock in trade. This stock in trade was bought with monies belonging to a Mrs. Elizabeth Clark, the mother of the petitioner's wife, who, from time to time, advanced her daughter money, amounting to 400*l.*, to enable her to carry on the business; and the daughter executed to her a bill of sale, dated the 1st of November, 1849, of the stock in trade, as a security for 350*l.*, part of such amount. In January 1851 Mrs. Clark demanded payment of 140*l.*, part of the debt, and the petitioner not being able to pay the amount, a bailiff was put into possession, whereupon Mrs. Hunt, by direction of the bankrupt, addressed a letter to Mrs. Clark, requesting that she would consent to become a guarantee for the payment of a composition of 5*s.* in the pound to the creditors. She refused to become so, unless she were paid 140*l.*, part of the debt, and said, that unless it were paid, she would proceed to a sale under the bill of sale. To this the bankrupt agreed, and, on the 25th of January, remitted to Mrs. Clark 140*l.*, and she thereupon consented to become such guarantee, and to withdraw the bill of sale, provided the creditors would accept the composition. In order to pay this 140*l.*, he borrowed of Messrs. I. & J. Martin, of Liverpool, 220*l.*, on the security of the bill of lading of a cargo of clover-seed, and out of it he paid Mr. Oakes 30*l.*, which had been advanced on the security of goods belonging to the petitioner's brother, and to his solicitor, 25*l.* The petitioner subsequently addressed a circular letter to his creditors, offering them the guaranteed composition; but, in the month of January 1851, before such proposed arrangement could be effected, Messrs. Thomas & Robert Raikes filed a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against him, under which he was declared a bankrupt, owing 1,600*l.*, and not having sufficient assets to pay the expenses of the bankruptcy. From this he appealed to the Vice Chancellor sitting in Bankruptcy, on the ground that the alleged act of bankruptcy was not sufficient to support the adjudication; but further evidence having been adduced, sustaining other acts of bankruptcy, the Vice Chancellor, although doubting whether the act of bankruptcy relied on by the Commissioner was sufficient, thought that the new affidavits furnished evidence of an act of bankruptcy sufficient to support the adjudication, and therefore dismissed the petition, but without costs. Upon an application for a certificate, Mr. Commissioner Ayrton, on the ground that the petitioner had been guilty of a fraudulent preference, under the 256th section, by the payment made to Mrs. Clark and Mr. Oakes, and that his conduct as a trader had been reckless, refused to grant any certificate, and the bankrupt, being taken in execution, was conveyed to Lincoln Castle, where he remained at the date of the hearing of the appeal.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Kinglake, for the petition.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Greene, on behalf of the assignees, opposed.

Mr. Kinglake was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The conduct of the bankrupt in this case is, to say the least of it, most unsatisfactory. It is not strictly correct to say this Court administers punishment under the bankrupt laws; so to consider the act would be a misconstruction. The statute declares, that under certain stated circumstances, the bankrupt shall have a certificate of the first, second, or third class. The only discretion left to the Court is the granting of the certificate, of what class it shall be, and when it shall be granted. If the granting of the certificate is delayed until a future day, its delay is tantamount to a punishment, because the bankrupt, in the mean time, is open to arrest by the creditor. That being so, the Court will direct which certificate shall be granted; or, acting still more severely, can, as the Commissioner has here done, refuse any certificate at all. If the conduct of the bankrupt has been more or less culpable, so the Court will award a higher or lower class of certificate, or refuse it altogether. Speaking for myself alone, in justice to the bankrupt, I must say that there does not appear to have been any fraudulent preference in the bill of sale, which was given to the wife's mother; it was given by the wife before the marriage, and the mother had at one time a bailiff actually in possession of the goods. It was an unfortunate circumstance that the offer of the 5*s.* in the pound was not accepted; it does not appear, nor has it been asserted, that the offer was not made bond fide, and for the purpose of relieving the bankrupt from his difficulties. In some respects the conduct of the bankrupt I consider to be very unsatisfactory. The system of commencing on so small a capital as 10*l.*, and entering into engagements of such a character as here appears, is absurd. When the bankrupt set up in business at Hull, he styled himself a merchant, and might, therefore, have led the public to believe he was a person of substance. The term "merchant" among commercial people would be received in a sense very different from that in which it here ought to be understood. Then, in a little more than a twelvemonth the bankrupt appears, for a person in his circumstances, to have expended in household matters a large sum, even allowing for a little latitude on account of his having married during that time. On the whole, I am of opinion that justice will be done if the bankrupt be allowed a certificate of the third class only; its issue to be suspended until the 31st of the present month.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Whether the view taken by the learned Commissioner can be sustained or not, I give no opinion; neither must I be understood as agreeing with him in the reasons for which he refused the bankrupt his certificate. On the evidence it appears to me, as it does to my learned Brother, that this is not a fit case for the entire refusal of a certificate. I consider that the quantum of imprisonment suffered by the bankrupt will, by the end of the month, be sufficient to satisfy the justice of the case. Viewing the conduct of the bankrupt, as the Court does, it appears to be open to the strongest observation and the gravest censure. Whether there has been a fraudulent preference or not, such conduct as is apparent here ought not to be passed over without censure and punishment. On the 31st of the present month the bankrupt will be set at liberty.

Friendly Society—Treasurer.*

Money which, by the rules of a friendly society, ought to have been deposited with a treasurer appointed by the society, was paid directly to the bankers of the society. The bankers were adjudicated bankrupts, and the society, under the 167th section of the Bankrupt Act, claimed to be paid in full, and in support of the claim filed an affidavit, swearing that the bankers were "employed in the office of treasurer."—Held, that the petitioners were not entitled to payment in full.

This was the petition of the stewards of a friendly society, duly enrolled, praying the reversal of the decision of the Commissioner, who had refused to order the payment in full of the sum of 132*l.* out of the estate of Messrs. Rufford, Rufford & Wragge, bankrupts. The second rule of the society provided for the keeping of the books "by a clerk, to be appointed by a majority of the members;" and the third rule directed that there should be a treasurer or treasurers, appointed in like manner as the clerk, "in whose hands shall be deposited all the cash belonging to this society till the same can be placed out at interest," &c.; and the twenty-first rule provided that "as soon as sufficient money shall be collected, the same shall (after leaving a sufficient sum in the club box to pay the sick and other expenses of the society) be deposited in the hands of the treasurer or treasurers of this society, and that the clerk and two stewards shall take the same to the bank," &c. The bankers were not appointed treasurers. The petition, and affidavit in support of it, stated that the bankrupts "were employed in the office of treasurers of and in the said society, and they had in their hands and possession at the time of the said adjudication, by virtue of their office and employment," (the sum in question), "and the same was in their hands, not as bankers of the society, and in the ordinary way of banking business, but wholly as treasurers of the said society." It was, therefore, prayed that the decision might be reversed, and that payment in full might be ordered out of the estate.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Renshaw contended, that as the 167th section of the New Bankrupt Act gave friendly and other societies the right to payment in full where bankrupts who have been either appointed "or employed" have money in their hands, the petitioners were entitled to that privilege. Had the words of the new statute been confined, as the old Bankrupt Act was confined, namely, to persons "appointed" to an office being bankrupt, the case would have been different, and would have been governed, adversely to the petitioners, by the case of Ex parte Harris (1); they, therefore, submitted that, upon this distinction, and the wider words used in the new statute, the legislature intended persons situated as were the petitioners to have, and the Court would give them, the privilege of full payment.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. J. V. Prior appeared for the assignees, but were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—We are both very clearly of opinion that the bankrupts were not officers within the words of the 167th section, which says, "if any person appointed or employed in any office in any society" established under the Friendly Societies Acts "or having in his hands or possession, by virtue of his office or employment, any monies or effects," and so on, the Court may order full payment of such monies "which the bankrupt received by virtue of his said office or employment;" and we think, therefore, that there is no foundation for the appeal. It must be dismissed, and with costs.

"Conduct as a Trader"—Banker—Certificate.*

Bankers who, upon the evidence before the Court, must be taken to have been, and to have known that they were, deeply insolvent, continued to receive deposits, and to issue notes for a period of eighteen months, during which time their assets would not pay more than 5s. in the pound; on an adjudication of bankruptcy, the Commissioner for this, among other reasons, refused them any certificate or protection. On appeal, the Court affirmed the refusal of certificate on the above stated ground, but, upon the consent of the assignees and of the opposing creditors, granted protection to their persons.

The certificate is a benefit to which a bankrupt may entitle himself by good conduct.

Whether, after a refusal of a certificate, the grant of protection is of any avail against the common-law right of creditors who do not come in under the bankruptcy—quære.

These were the petitions of Mr. Francis Rufford and Mr. Charles John Wragge, praying that the decision of Mr. Commissioner Balguy, of the Bristol District Court, dated the 1st of May 1852, by which he had refused the petitioners their certificates and protection, might be reversed or varied, and that certificates might be granted; or, if the Court should refuse, that then they should have protection granted to them. From the documentary and other evidence, and from the examination of the bankrupts before the Commissioner, the following appear to be the facts:—Before 1840, Mr. Philip Rufford was engaged in partnership with his son Mr. Francis Rufford, in the Bromsgrove Bank, and they, together with Mr. Charles John Wragge, carried on, in partnership, the Stourbridge Bank. Mr. Francis Rufford managed the Bromsgrove Bank, Mr. Wragge managed that at Stourbridge; Mr. Philip Rufford was not actively engaged in either, and the adjudication having been extended to him, he had a third-class certificate granted to him, but it was suspended for twelve months. The two Ruffords commenced business with a nominal capital of 2,500*l.* each, and Mr. Wragge with that sum in cash. Among many speculations in which the bankrupts were engaged, were the British Alkali Company, which was indebted to the Bromsgrove Bank, in 1844, in 67,000*l.*, in full payment of which the bank accepted from Messrs. Fardon & Gossage their shares in that company, in the White Lead Company, and in the Disc Engine Company; and in 1851 53,000*l.* more had been spent by the Bromsgrove Bank in these speculations, besides which, for interest, costs and charges, this bank had a demand, in respect of such property, of 60,000*l.* The shares of the Alkali Company were of no value; and the Disc Engine produced no profits. A colliery proprietorship owed the Stourbridge Bank, in 1841, a large debt, and the colliery called the Churchbridge Colliery was conveyed to their bank in payment, but it was worked at a loss. The same bank advanced 10,000*l.* to the Bloxwich Colliery proprietors, and the debts increased in 1846 to 34,000*l.*, and in 1851 to 43,000*l.* The recklessness of these speculations formed a ground for the Commissioner's judgment. Down to 1843 the bankrupts banked with Messrs. Spooner & Attwood, when their account was closed, the Bromsgrove Bank account being in debt 40,000*l.*, while the Stourbridge Bank account was in credit 7,000*l.* The accounts were transferred to the house of Glyn, Hallifax & Mills, who, in 1847, made complaints of overdrawing, and ultimately, in June 1851, they refused to honour the notes of the banks, and, accordingly, they stopped payment, and the partners were adjudged bankrupts. The books of the banks proved that, in the latter part of 1849, both were very deeply insolvent, and so continued down to June 1851. Between January and June 1851 the Bromsgrove Bank received deposits amounting to 7,000*l.* and the Stourbridge Bank to 8,500*l.* The Messrs. Glyn had a claim for 70,000*l.*, but they held property and securities covering the amount; but for the general body of creditors there was nothing but the balances which were due to the two banks. There had been transfers from time to time from one bank to the other of assets, and in June 1851 the Bromsgrove Bank owed the Stourbridge Bank 120,000*l.*

Sir W. P. Wood, Mr. Atherton, and Mr. Renshaw supported the petitions of appeal, and in their argument distinguished the present case from those of Ex parte Dornford (1), Ex parte Wakefield (2), Ex parte Holthouse (3), and Ex parte Martyn (then recently before the Court) (4). They also cited and commented on—

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Huddleston opposed the appeal, on behalf of the trade and official assignees.

Mr. Bacon appeared for opposing creditors.

Sir W. P. Wood was heard in reply.

Counsel, in answer to a question from the Court, said that the assignees and the opposing creditors had no objection to personal protection being granted.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This is a very distressing case, and if further consideration would have been of any use, we would have taken further time to look at the examinations used in evidence; but the truth is, that the point we have to decide does not depend on a very nice construction of the particular passages to which our attention has been drawn, but depends rather upon those general principles which have been discussed in the able arguments which have been addressed to us. The question is, whether these gentlemen, Mr. Francis Rufford and Mr. Wragge, or either of them, are entitled to a certificate under the 198th section of the Bankrupt Act. The learned Commissioner having heard the case, refused the certificates, and Mr. Francis Rufford and Mr. Wragge have appealed to us; and the question is, whether they have made out such a case as to warrant our saying that the Commissioner is wrong. It is our duty, and it is a very painful one, to say that they have failed in establishing such a case; and we think, therefore, that the Commissioner was right.

It is said that he proceeded on several grounds, one of which was, that the parties had laid out money on improvident investments as bankers; but it is not necessary for us to consider how far the investments were of such a character: for, independently of that, we think that the bankrupts have not so conducted themselves as to warrant the granting of a certificate; that they have misconducted themselves as traders, by going on trading and receiving deposits after they must have known they were utterly and hopelessly insolvent. Sir William Wood said—"This is often the case with men who afterwards retrieve their affairs, and recover themselves;" but I hope this is a somewhat exaggerated representation, caused by the sanguine view which he takes of his clients' case: for I must observe, that although that may be sometimes the case, it would be no justification for such conduct, and least of all in the case of bankers, because every one must know that the misery produced in a neighbourhood by the failure of a bank is so great that one almost shrinks from contemplating it, and it appears to have been the case in the present instance. The question is, did the bankrupts continue to carry on their business as bankers when they must have known that they were hopelessly insolvent, and that misery and ruin must be the consequence of their continuing to do so? I think it is impossible to answer that question otherwise than affirmatively. At the time of the bankruptcy there were assets of the Stourbridge Bank to the amount of 4*s.* in the pound, and of the Bromsgrove Bank to the amount only of 1*s.* in the pound, not taking into consideration the expenses of the bankruptcy. So that, looking at the facts of the case in the most favourable light, they continued as bankers to receive deposits, knowing that if their whole affairs were wound up, there would not be more than 5*s.* in the pound, and that, in my opinion, is conduct utterly unjustifiable. That was the state of the assets when the bankruptcy took place in 1851, and there was no great difference from the state of their assets in 1849 and at the time of the bankruptcy. When had the parties a knowledge of this state of affairs? There is abundant evidence to shew that the truth of the case was perfectly manifest to their minds. In September Mr. Wragge came to London, to Messrs. Glyn & Co. and had an interview with Mr. Glyn and his solicitor, and Mr. Glyn consented to make further advances with great reluctance, because, on the 19th, Mr. Wragge writes to Mr. Francis Rufford that if Mille—(he was the junior partner in the house of Glyn & Co.)—had been there, they would not have got the money. That was the state of things in September. On the 7th of October, Mr. Wragge having returned into the country, and at the instance of the Glyns, investigated the state as well of the Stourbridge as of the other bank, writes a letter to Mr. Francis Rufford, in which he says "I cannot see my way without something important and immediate from the engine." "Engine" means the patent right in the disc engine, the result of which is always doubtful; and to rely upon that, however useful and ingenious the disc engine might be, in order to make up the deficiency, was absurd. An investigation takes place, various letters pass on the occasion, and the Glyns, requiring further information, write into the country; and I was much struck by the letter of the 12th of October, from Mr. Wragge to Mr. Francis Rufford, saying that the "answer to Glyn must be written with great care." To be sure, all letters on business ought to be written with great care; and I cannot help seeing that he meant, "Answer truly, but let it be such an answer as shall lull suspicion." It was an answer written with great care—the whole truth was not discovered. It was not suggestio falsi, but certainly it was suppressio veri. The correspondence goes on with Messrs. Glyn, and more assistance is obtained; but if, at that time, Mr. Wragge had looked into the affairs of the banks, he would have known, and must on the evidence be taken to have known, that the Stourbridge Bank owed 225,000*l.*, and had no more than 4*s.* in the pound, and the Bromsgrove Bank owed 227,000*l.*, and had less than 1*s.* in the pound of assets. Having ascertained that, they continued to receive deposits from rich and poor, but with a perfect knowledge that if all demands were made on them at once there was not the remotest hope of paying them in full. This state of things continued for a year and a half before the bankruptcy; and I must say it is conduct in traders such as clearly disentitles them to the benefit of certificates.

It is said that by refusing the certificates we shall be placing them in the same category as the bankrupt in the case of The St. Alban's Bank, which was clearly a breach of trust,—a misappropriation of a bill; and confounding them with the bankrupt in Holthouse's case, who bought goods on credit and immediately sold them at lower prices,—conduct something analogous to swindling. In one sense this is all true, so far as the refusal is to be regarded as a punishment; but this is a misfortune incident to all laws that partake of a penal character. It is impossible that persons shall not sustain the same amount of punishment, though they may not be precisely equal in guilt. If this were not so, no murderer could be hanged, except for the worst kind of murder. If we are to make nice distinctions, and say that if the moral guilt of one bankrupt be somewhat less than the moral guilt of another, we will not visit both alike, we might as well say, in cases of murder, that if one murder committed is not of equal aggravation with another,—that one has circumstances of extenuation which another has not,—you cannot possibly execute any murderer of the less atrocious dye. I do not agree to that; and to such an extent the principle must be carried, if the appellants' case is to be decided on the evidence adduced. Human laws cannot make such nice distinctions, especially laws relating or analogous to criminal justice. But I do not agree that we have to inflict a punishment: the case is, whether the conduct of the parties as traders is such as entitles them to a benefit in the shape of a certificate, giving them protection from their creditors; it is rather withholding a benefit from them which good conduct might have entitled them to, than awarding to them a punishment. I think, however, with regard to this case, the interests of society require that we should not cast any doubt on the judgment of the learned Commissioner, and that we ought to refuse a certificate to both these gentlemen; for, though distinctions have been attempted to be made between their cases, and stress laid upon the difference of their temperaments, we cannot go into those niceties. I think it utterly impossible to believe that two persons who day by day, and almost hour by hour, were in communication with each other, by letter and personally, could either of them be ignorant of all that was known to the other; both of them must have known that in truth their affairs were desperate; and if they did not, they must have wilfully closed their eyes to the truth: and I am much struck with Mr. Wragge's answers in his examinations; for when he was asked as to the state of their affairs in 1849, he did not venture to say that he believed that the banks had the means of paying their debts; that they were not, in fact, insolvent. There is no objection raised on the part of the assignees to protection being granted to the bankrupts; and I am of opinion we ought only to grant it by consent as far as it can be made available. It is not necessary to discuss the question how far it is available. It is available against creditors coming in under the statute; but whether it may avail against the common law right of any creditor not coming in under the bankruptcy, it is no part of our duty to speculate. Our judgment must simply be to dismiss the appeal, qualifying the order in regard to protection so far as to shew that it is consented to by the assignees and the opposing creditors.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Acceding, entirely, to what has just been said by my learned Brother, I wish to be distinctly understood as not departing from anything said or done by me in the cases of Wakefield, Dornford, Johnson, and Martyn. If I had been persuaded that there had been any error in all, or any, of those cases, on my part, I hope I should have been prompt to have stated it; but having, since the commencement of the argument, considered those four cases, I adhere to them as decided by myself, observing only in passing as to Dornford's case, that my only doubt was, whether he had not been too severely dealt with by the Commissioner. My opinion, ultimately, was, that he was not. The present case is importantly distinguishable from each and every of those cases. The present case is distinguishable not only by the fact that these gentlemen were bankers in a populous neighbourhood, but also on other grounds. The bankruptcy happened in June 1851, and it is not necessary to go further back with the history of these gentlemen, or the banks, than the autumn of 1849, and I do not think that it would be of any advantage to the bankrupts to go further back. Commencing at that period, I have to ask myself these questions. "Is it, or is it not, clearly proved that, in the autumn of 1849 these parties then were, on a just and reasonable view and estimate of their assets and liabilities, deeply insolvent?" On the evidence, that question can only be answered in the affirmative. Again, "Did they, at that time, know the state of their affairs, and that they were insolvent?" It may be a proper question to consider, what was their own estimate of the state of their assets; might they not have supposed the state of their assets more favourable than it was? I cannot answer that question favourably to the petitioners. They knew no other word could represent their affairs than "insolvency." But they might say it was only a temporary insolvency, and that they might reasonably hope for improvement in the state of their assets, and for assistance from their friends, excusing, if not justifying, their continuing to transact business. However, from the statement in the books and other evidence, as rational men they could not, and, in point offact, they did not, consider their situation as one of hope. This, then, was their situation in 1849. They continued, however, to carry on business, to issue notes, and to receive deposits from rich and poor till 1851. Then, it is to be asked, "Did their position in that interval improve?" The answer upon the evidence is, "It did not;" and this includes in it the fact that they were, during the whole of that time, trading while deeply insolvent. Consistently, then, with the gentler estimate of their conduct which any man would wish to take, and attributing it to fear of exposure,—to the dislike which most men have of looking at what is disagreeable,—to the weakening nature of difficulties,—these gentlemen went on. It is not necessary to characterize their conduct by any harsh term, for who in a state of success and prosperity shall venture to say what would be his own conduct under similar circumstances? "Let him who standeth, take heed lest he fall." Still, the interests of society at large preclude the exercise of any private feelings, and require that such conduct should be marked with reprehension; and we have no doubt that we are acting rightly in affirming the decision of the learned Commissioner, of the correctness of whose judgment no doubt ought to be entertained. Let the appeal be dismissed; but, the assignees and opposing creditors consenting, let the bankrupts have protection. My own impression is, that protection will be available for all purposes; although I do not bind myself to that expression of opinion.

Mr. Swanston applied for the costs of the assignees to be paid out of the estate.

Mr. Bacon made a similar application as to the costs of the opposing creditor.

After some discussion on the latter point, an order was made for the payment of the assignees' costs out of the estate, and, the assignees not opposing, for the payment of 50*l.* out of the estate for the opposing creditor's costs.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, s. 198.—Certificate Meeting.

The Commissioner has authority under the 198th section of the act to appoint a sitting for the consideration of the grant of a certificate to a bankrupt, although the bankrupt does not make the application himself.

In this case Mr. Commissioner Stevenson had refused the bankrupt his certificate, and also refused him protection; and the case came before the Court, in the form of an appeal from his decision. The only point, however, worth notice turned on the question, whether the Commissioner had jurisdiction under the statute, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. s. 198, to appoint a meeting for the consideration of the grant of the certificate, without the bankrupt's own application for the same.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Renshaw, for the petition of appeal.—Independently of the merits of this case, the decision of the Commissioner cannot stand, because he had no jurisdiction to call the meeting for the consideration of the question of the grant or refusal of the certificate to this bankrupt. This meeting was held not only without the application of the bankrupt, but was held against the argument and protest of both his attorney and his counsel. The certificate is a privilege, and has been so treated by this Court in some recent cases, and if the bankrupt does not seek to have the benefit of it, or does not esteem it a benefit, the Commissioner possesses no authority to call a meeting in order to thrust that benefit upon him; and if that be so, surely he has no jurisdiction to call a meeting, and thereat refuse the bankrupt what he does not ask. The question turns upon the true construction of the 39th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. and the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, taken together. The latter statute repealed the former act. By the 39th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. s. 39. it is enacted, "That it shall be lawful for the Court authorized to act in the prosecution of any fiat in bankruptcy already issued or hereafter to be issued, on the application of the bankrupt named in such fiat, to appoint a public sitting for the allowance of such certificate, of the purport whereof twenty-one days' notice shall be given in the London Gazette and to the solicitor of the assignees; and at such sitting any of the creditors of such bankrupt may be heard against the allowance of such certificate; but it shall not be requisite for such certificate to be signed by any of the creditors of such bankrupt; and such Court, having regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the laws relating to bankrupts, and to the conduct of the bankrupt as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy, shall judge of any objection against allowing such certificate; and either find the bankrupt entitled thereto, and allow the same, or refuse or suspend the allowance thereof, or annex such conditions thereto as the justice of the case may require: Provided always, that no certificate shall be such discharge unless such Court shall, in writing under hand and seal, certify to the Court of Review that such bankrupt has made a full discovery of his estate and effects, and in all things conformed as aforesaid, and that there does not appear any reason to doubt the truth or fullness of such discovery, and unless the bankrupt make oath in writing that such certificate was obtained fairly and without fraud, and unless the allowance of such certificate shall, after such oath, be confirmed by the Court of Review, against which confirmation any of the creditors of the bankrupt may be heard before such Court." Then, to turn to the 198th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, it will be found as follows, "That forthwith after the bankrupt shall have passed his last examination, the Court shall appoint a public sitting for the allowance of his certificate (whereof and of the purport whereof twenty-one days' notice shall be given in the London Gazette and to the solicitor of the assignees), and at such sitting the assignees or any of the creditors of such bankrupt who shall have given to the Registrar of the court three clear days' notice in writing of his intention to oppose, may be heard against the allowance of such certificate; and the Court, having regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the law of bankruptcy, and to his conduct as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy, and whether the allowance of such certificate be opposed by any creditor or not, shall judge of any objection against allowing such certificate, and either find the bankrupt entitled thereto, and allow the same, or refuse or suspend the allowance thereof, or annex such conditions thereto as the justice of the case may require." Now, although according to the 39th section of the repealed statute, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, it is enacted expressly that the application for the certificate must be made by the bankrupt himself, and there is not the same enactment in the 198th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, still, upon a fair construction of that section, it was evidently contemplated by the legislature that the certificate meeting should be held only on his application. In the last act it is enacted that notice of the sitting on the allowance of the certificate is to be given to the solicitors of the assignees, and the assignees and the creditors are to give to the Registrar three days' notice of their intention to oppose the allowance of the certificate; but nothing is said about notice being given to the bankrupt, the person most interested in the proceeding — an omission which evidently shews that it was considered by the legislature that he was to take the initiative in calling the meeting. Notice to him was unnecessary, and if it were not so it might lead to very great injustice. The certificate is, as already has been said by one of your Lordships, a privilege to be conferred upon bankrupts in certain cases, and it would be no hardship to the creditors that the question of the certificate should not be taken into consideration, because by the bankrupt remaining without his certificate, all his property, and he himself personally, would be liable to their demands. On the other hand, a Commissioner had no authority to call a meeting for the purpose of granting or refusing a certificate, which the bankrupt did not ask, and when, perhaps, actuated by honest notions, he might desire that his liabilities should remain undiminished.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Speed, for the assignees, were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The opinion of both of us, on the true construction of the 198th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, especially when compared with the 39th section of the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122,—and I will say, independently of that statute,—is, that the bankrupt's application is not necessary to give the Commissioner jurisdiction; that is our opinion on the question of the Commissioner's jurisdiction.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—Trading—Scrivener.

A solicitor was adjudicated bankrupt as a scrivener, on evidence clearly establishing the fact; on appeal against the adjudication, he was examined, and the Court being satisfied that, upon the additional evidence, he was not a scrivener within the meaning of the bankrupt law, annulled the adjudication; the Lord Chief Justice expressing his agreement in the decision only on the authority of cases determined by Lord Eldon and Lord Chief Justice Gibbs.

The bankrupt in this case, Mr. Antonine Dufaur, carried on business, in partnership with Mr. Blakeney, down to March 1851, when it was dissolved. On the 22nd of May 1852 a petition was presented by Timothy Fogarty and Julia Regan, for an adjudication against him; and, on the 26th of the same month, he was adjudged a bankrupt. On the 2nd of June the bankrupt, by his solicitor, appeared before Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque, to shew cause against the adjudication, when the cause was disallowed, and the adjudication confirmed. The bankrupt did not submit or tender himself for examination before the Commissioner. The case now came before this Court, on a petition of the bankrupt, alleging that he was not a trader, within the true intent and meaning of the bankrupt laws, and that the decision of the Commissioner was erroneous, for that the adjudication was invalid, on the ground that the proof of the trading was insufficient to support it, and it prayed that the adjudication might be annulled.

The evidence on which the adjudication was made was that of H. Stanley, who had been managing clerk of, and F. W. Dolman, who had been articulated to, the bankrupt. The former deposed that, from 1843 to 1847, Dufaur exercised the trade, business, or profession of a money-scrivener, receiving other men's monies and estate into his trust or custody, and making merchandise thereof; and sought and endeavoured to get his livelihood thereby, as others of the same trade or business usually do; that the business of Dufaur, and of Blakeney, his partner, consisted for the most part of the procurement and advance of monies by way of mortgage and annuity, and occasionally for the discount of bills of exchange, for parties introduced to Dufaur, as requiring advances of monies: that Dufaur so applied monies in his hands, and which were entrusted to him for the purpose of finding securities for the same: that among several of such parties so entrusting their monies, were a Mrs. Browne, and Messrs. Basham & Blakeney, the trustees of Mr. and Mrs. Browne's settlement, a Mr. Cross, and a Mr. Williams, and others. The deponent then proceeded to set out items of a bill of costs, for one particular mortgage transaction, partly as follows: "attending Mr. S. jun., with reference to the trust fund, and raising of 250*l.* thereon," and "upon Mr. G. Hunter, who agreed to advance the same. Drawing memorandums," &c., (this loan went off). "Attending upon Mr. S. sen., who proposed that 530*l.* should be raised by way of mortgage, to pay off, &c., and begged me to write to Mr. S. jun. fully thereon, explanatory of the proposed transaction, and for his assent." "Attendances on Messrs. Basham & Blakeney, proposing security to them for 550*l.*, when they agreed to advance the money, provided the security was unobjectionable." "Attending in the city to sell out stock."

Mr. Dolman deposed at the outset in the same technical manner; and then said, "Dufaur has been in the constant practice of receiving the monies of parties, the same being lodged in his hands by clients and others, for the purpose of being invested in securities, and for the purpose of finding securities for the same, and upon the money being invested he has charged not only for the mortgage deed and conveyancing part of the business, but also certain fees, bonuses, or compensation for such procurement of the said monies; but, in particular, the said Dufaur has invested monies entrusted to him, placed, or left in his hands by Dr. E. Blakeney, and a Mrs. Mary Browne, for the purpose of being invested in securities."

 "That Dufaur, in an affidavit he made in April 1851, swore that he and his partner had been for the last four years concerned for the said Mrs. Browne, in investing her money on mortgages, or other securities; and that, in the course of such employment, they had recommended various investments to her, all of which had been accepted by her, and that she had from time to time left it to Dufaur and his partner to find fresh securities for such sums of money as might be paid off. That in answer to a letter from Dufaur to her, dated the 13th of August 1850, informing her of one sum of money having been paid off, and that another would be so soon, she wrote on the 4th of September, saying, 'I shall feel obliged by your investing the money for me in any way you may think desirable.' That 500*l.*, or thereabouts, was agreed by Dufaur and his partner to be advanced on behalf of Mrs. Browne to Lieut. Newenham." This deposition also referred to various accounts and bills of costs.

In the course of some disputes between Dufaur and Dolman, and of an investigation of the matters relating to Mrs. Browne, it had been asserted that the consent of Mrs. Browne was obtained to the loan of 500*l.* to Lieut. Newenham, and she made an affidavit in the Court of Queen's Bench as follows: "25th of April 1851. She has never been consulted, either by the said Dufaur or Blakeney, on the subject of a proposed advance of any portion of her monies to Lieut. Newenham: no mention has ever been made by either of them of such advances being required or contemplated, nor have the particulars or nature of any interest or property whatever, proposed as a security for the loan of 500*l.* or any other sum of money, by the said Lieut. Newenham, been at any time mentioned to her; and, further, that had any such proposal been made to her she should most distinctly and peremptorily have declined to assent to any such application of her monies." This affidavit was read in evidence by the consent of the petitioner, to save the expense of an oral examination.

The affidavit of Dufaur stated his having been for twenty-one years past in practice as an attorney and solicitor; that he never exercised the trade, &c. (a denial of the technical passages in Stanley's and Dolman's depositions); that his business consisted of the usual business of an attorney and solicitor, namely, that of conducting affairs in common law, chancery, conveyancing, and all other branches of his profession; that some, but not the most part of his business consisted in the preparation of mortgages and annuities granted to clients; that he had not, since 1844, been in the habit of procuring the discount of any bills of exchange or promissory notes for clients or any other persons, but &c. (then followed an admission of two instances); that he had not, since 1844, invested any client's money, or any part thereof, in the discount of any bills of exchange or promissory notes, but, on the contrary, had most studiously avoided doing so; that monies had not been entrusted to him, nor to him and his late partner, for the purpose of finding securities for the same: he had never advanced the monies of Mrs. Browne, (repeating the names,) nor the money of any other client by way of mortgage or annuity, without first communicating to them the nature of the security on which he proposed to advance the same, and procuring their sanction, authority, and consent thereto. The affidavit then entered into a full explanation of several particular matters, and, in each case, stated the assent of the lender to the security, and contained the following passage: "I say that the statement in the examination of F. W. Dolman, sworn in this matter, that I have been in the constant habit of receiving the monies of parties, &c., (following the words of the deposition) is utterly untrue; for I say I have never had money lodged in my hands, by clients or others, for the purpose of finding securities for the same."

In one of the accounts,—No. 6, "capital account," on which reliance was placed as proving that money was placed in Dufaur & Blakeney's hands, for the purpose of investment, at their discretion, were items such as these:—

Mr. Dufaur was examined and cross-examined at great length, and in the course of it he explained this to be that Dufaur & Blakeney had received monies belonging to Mrs. Browne, which had been lent on mortgage, and upon being paid off by Beaver, Stevens and Rymer, the amounts were paid to Dufaur & Blakeney as the solicitors of Mrs. Browne. As to the item 1,202*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* and the 187*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* as drawn out by Mr. Blakeney, Mr. Dufaur accounted for it thus: Mrs. Browne was present when Salamans paid the money, and requested her solicitors to put the money for safe custody into their bankers', which they did, and the 187*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* was drawn out by Mr. Blakeney, the partner, upon some understanding or agreement (unknown to him, Dufaur,) between him and Mrs. Browne, they being brother and sister. The 1,202*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* was never in the hands of the firm for any other purpose than for safe custody, Mrs. Browne not having any banker. He also swore that on every occasion when he advanced money for a client, he had the authority of that client to lend it on a particular security. Mr. Dolman was also examined, and swore that while in Dufaur's office he knew the nature of his business, and that his chief business was to procure money "for money agents," that is, "for persons who are employed to borrow money." In the bills of costs relating to Mrs. Browne's money, it appeared that the only charges made by Mr. Dufaur were the usual solicitor's charges. In one or two particular instances in the bills, charges for commission on the receipt of rents appeared to have been made. The decision of the Court is founded on the case of Mrs. Browne, and therefore the other cases referred to in the evidence are omitted here.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Bagshawe, for the appeal.—In order to support the adjudication of the Commissioner, it must be shewn that the alleged bankrupt was a scrivener when the petitioning creditors' debt was contracted in 1849; and beyond this, it must be shewn that scrivening was a general course of dealing of Mr. Dufaur. Did Mr. Dufaur, according to the definition in the statute 6 Geo. 4. c. 16, and continued by the present bankrupt law, "receive other men's monies or estates into his trust or custody"? Upon the evidence he most unquestionably did not. That he was not a "genuine scrivener" is plain, for we learn from the Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in the case of Adams v. Malkin (1), that the last of that class was one Jack Ellis, a contemporary of Dr. Johnson. Then, was he an attorney employed by his clients not simply in his character of attorney, but as a money agent, to invest their money upon securities at his own discretion? Assuredly not. Mr. Dufaur's evidence disproves this in his explanation of Account No. 6, and the very items relied on in the depositions on which the adjudication was made disprove instead of support it. What Mr. Dufaur was, was an attorney who received money as a channel to convey it from Mrs. Browne and other persons, to lend it to other persons, making his charges as an attorney, and in some instances, charging commission, yet certainly not a scrivener; for, as the Lord Chief Justice said in the before-mentioned case, "this is only having incidentally on particular occasions the money of his clients to lay out for them." In every case it is to be ascertained whether the business transacted was incidental to the character of an attorney, or distinct from it; for to constitute him a scrivener, the attorney must get the money into his hands in a course of trading, and it is impossible to deny that Mr. Dufaur did not receive monies in any such manner as trading, or to deny that he did transact the business in his character of an attorney.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Cooke were for the opposing creditors, and the official and trade assignees.

July 10.—LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Mr. Antonine Dufaur, a solicitor of many years' standing and practice, being adjudicated a bankrupt as a scrivener within the meaning of the bankrupt law, appeals from the decision of Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque, who has, upon the evidence before him, so adjudicated. That evidence was of two clerks who had been in Mr. Dufaur's employ, and who said what, if true, was conclusive, and left the Commissioner no alternative. It is to be remarked that Mr. Dufaur did not tender himself for examination before the Commissioner, and doubtless if he had, that learned person would have taken his examination, and he now demurs to the result of the evidence. The evidence which was before the Court below, as to the practice of scrivening was, as I before observed, the testimony of two clerks who were formerly in the service of Mr. Dufaur, and, if their evidence is to be relied upon, no doubt the practice of scrivening within the meaning of the bankrupt law is made out. The question is, whether the evidence of these two persons is to be relied upon? They say that the general practice of Mr. Dufaur's business was the receipt of monies from clients, and the laying of it out upon securities at his discretion, and from time to time, as he found convenient opportunity. But their evidence is general, not specific, excepting to a certain extent as to the dealings with the monies of Mrs. Browne. This Court is not at liberty to rely upon general allegations, unsupported by specific facts or instances. If such general evidence were to be relied on, no doubt can be entertained that Mr. Dufaur is a scrivener who receives other persons' money into his custody or trust in the manner stated in the bankrupt law. The trade of a scrivener has ceased in this country for two or three centuries, and its business is now divided between bankers and brokers. As bankers are now by statute declared to be within the operation of the bankrupt law, it never matters whether a banker has traded as a scrivener or not; but as attorneys, as such, are unquestionably excluded from the operation of the bankrupt law, it is frequently, as in the present case, very important to see whether an attorney who is sought or seeks to be made a bankrupt can be so made by the fact of his acts of scrivening. In the case of Adams v. Malkin, it was said by Chief Justice Gibbs, "At the present day, the banker occupies one department of the business of the scrivener, by being the depository of the money, and the attorney the other, by drawing the securities. The banker would not be an attorney, though he were occasionally to fill up bonds for his customers; nor does the attorney become a money scrivener, though on particular occasions he incidentally has the money of his clients to lay out for them. In order to make a man a money-scrivener, he must carry on the business of being trusted with other people's monies to lay out for them as occasion offers. It is not being sent with the money of his client, or receiving it from the person with whom his client may have previously contracted, that will make an attorney a money-scrivener. In that part of the transaction, he is no more than a person employed to fetch and carry. Having negotiated the loan, and drawn the deeds, his happening to receive and pay the money is incidental to his business of an attorney. Nor, if on one or two occasions money were deposited with him to lay out, would that constitute him a money-scrivener. He must be carrying on generally the business of a money-scrivener. That must be part of his known occupation." I do not quarrel with the law of that case,—the question is, whether Mr. Dufaur is brought, upon the evidence before us, within it. The evidence shows that from 1847 to 1848 he received monies of Mrs. Browne. Arrangements were made before the money was received. Several cases were relied on, but no evidence on more than one or two, and Mr. Dufaur denies that any other ever existed on which the question could arise. In the absence of any such evidence I think we are bound to believe Mr. Dufaur, and we must rely on Mrs. Browne's case, if any case can be relied on. Even supposing the evidence of the two late clerks of Mr. Dufaur, with relation to Mrs. Browne's case, were to be taken as true, still I am of opinion that it will not be enough, for the case of that lady is most peculiar. In every instance but one of the investment of her property, the security was agreed on beforehand; and if it had not been so, still, if the facts are true of her being the wife of a former partner of Mr. Dufaur, and the sister of a subsequent partner, and that he has been wholly confided in by her as to the disposal of her money, they will account for his dealing with it, and we should not, in any case of such description, hold Mr. Dufaur to be a scrivener. Lord Eldon and Lord Chief Justice Gibbs have both plainly laid down that the fact of scrivening, isolated acts of scrivening, is not sufficient to support a commission against an attorney as a scrivener, but it must be shewn that the general course of his business is of that nature. It is not to be forgotten that in all Mrs. Browne's investments Mr. Dufaur charged his attorney's costs only. Lord Chief Justice Gibbs says, in the case I have before referred to, "Though an attorney may have incidentally acted as a scrivener, that is not sufficient: though money may have been deposited with him, for which he was afterwards to seek a borrower, a few insulated instances of that sort occurring in the course of his business as an attorney, would not bring him within the operation of the bankrupt laws; for that would not be 'using the trade or profession of a scrivener, receiving other men's monies or estates into his trust or custody.'" And Lord Eldon, in Ex parte Paterson, observes, "The next question is, as to the trading as scrivener. That does not depend upon the fact, whether the bankrupt has or has not occasionally done acts which a scrivener peculiarly and properly would have done; not upon what he may have done upon one day, and what upon another, but upon his intention generally to get a living by so doing." Now, this requirement is not proved on the evidence before us to exist in the present case. The few cases of Mrs. Browne, and Dr. Blakeney and others, so far as they go, are exceptional, and there is no evidence of a general intention on the part of Mr. Dufaur to get money by scrivening, and these cases are explained by the particular and intimate connexion existing between the parties. On the whole, I am of opinion that the examination of Mr. Dufaur, whose evidence was not before the Commissioner, has shewn that he is not a scrivener within the meaning of the bankrupt law, and the adjudication must, therefore, be set aside; but I do not consider Mr. Dufaur entitled to any costs, as he did not tender himself for examination before the Commissioner. It is not necessary to decide anything as to any charges made by Mr. Dufaur for commission, for the case does not depend on that. He must undertake not to bring any action.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The only possible objection to the adjudication the Commissioner has made, and which upon the only evidence before him he was bound to make, is, that Mr. Dufaur is not, and has not been, a scrivener, within the meaning of the bankrupt laws. Considering that the petitioner did not offer himself before the Commissioner for examination,—considering how he has conducted himself—considering that he is probably or certainly insolvent, I was at one time disposed to refuse to interfere to assist him against the adjudication, and to require that an action should be brought. Upon the whole evidence now before the Court—evidence not before the Commissioner—I agree with the conclusion of my learned Brother; but I agree because I find the law, as applicable to the facts proved, is in support of that view, and I agree only because of authority by which I do and ought to feel myself bound, and not on my own view of the question. The authority is that of great Judges and eminent men, and is such as I consider myself bound by. I also agree with Lord Cranworth in holding that Mr. Dufaur can have no costs, and that he must undertake not to bring any action.

Ex parte GULL, in re
GULL.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—Certificate.

A, a tallow-broker in business with B, became bankrupt, and on application for his certificate had the same suspended for two years, and then to be of the third class. The case of suspension was supported by the Commissioner on two grounds: first, that the bankrupt had fraudulently induced a creditor to forbear enforcing payment of a certain sum by withholding information known to him and not known to the creditor, and which, if known, would have induced the creditor to enforce payment; the other case was for receiving money for goods alleged by the bankrupt to have been purchased, and then re-transferring the goods to the person of whom he bought them, so that the creditor did not receive the goods, and lost his money. The Lords Justices were of opinion that the withholding of information, or the silence of the bankrupt regarding that information, was not dishonestly intended in the one case, and the act by which the goods were re-transferred and the money lost in the second case was, upon the evidence before the Court, not fraudulent, so far as the petitioner was concerned, and therefore they granted an immediate certificate of the first class.

In this case the bankrupt, Mr. Gull, carried on business in partnership with Mr. Wilson, as Russia brokers in Old Broad Street, and they having been adjudicated bankrupt applied to the Commissioner, Mr. Fonblanque, on the 24th of May last, for their certificates; but by an order, dated the 2nd of June, the certificate of Mr. Gull was suspended for two years, and then was directed to be of the third class, and the bankrupt was to be in the mean time without protection. The present appeal was presented against this decision. The certificate of Mr. Gull was opposed on many grounds, but on the appeal only two were insisted on, and they are distinguished here by Mr. Mollett's case and Mr. Kelly's case.

It appeared (from statements made, at the hearing of this appeal, by the official assignee and by the solicitor for the creditors' assignees) that Mr. Gull, who had been many years in business, failed in 1841, when he paid 4s. in the pound, and his failure was then attributed to the stoppage of large houses with whom he had dealings. He continued in business until Mr. Wilson joined him with 2,000*l.* capital. Mr. Mollett's case was thus stated by the Commissioner in his judgment:—"Mr. Mollett having sold a large quantity of tallow, as to fifty casks of which a specific objection attached, Gull obtained from Mollett's brother, before he had paid for the tallow, a delivery order. Mollett's brother inadvertently gave that order sooner than he ought. Another brother, whose duty it was as bookkeeper to look to these matters, seeing that the proper time of payment had arrived, called upon Gull for such payment, and then he was met by an application for time. Gull then went to the elder Mollett, and not disclosing that he had not only got the delivery order, but that he had sold the tallow, and been paid for it, obtained the forbearance of the payment of 700*l.*, which Mollett most distinctly swore he would not have granted but on the terms of the tallow being deposited as security, and in the belief that the tallow was at that time deposited at the wharf, and, consequently, Mollett retained, probably more as a memorandum than security, the delivery order, which he believed to be the only delivery order. As respected that transaction, the evidence of Mollett himself, of Robert Mollett, and of Isaac Mollett was clear, consistent, and distinct, and in a great measure corroborated by the evidence of Wilson; but Gull, on the contrary, repudiated the transaction. He (the Commissioner) could not say that either in its circumstances, or in the manner, the evidence of Gull was such that he could balance it against the conjoint evidence of the three Molletts, and especially with the evidence of the bankrupt Wilson, who swore distinctly (and he had no reason to doubt the truth of his assertion) that he repeatedly brought to the notice of Gull that he had not paid Mollett for the tallow, but he put him off by saying that Mollett did not want the money. He (the Commissioner) must, therefore, come to the conclusion that the case of having obtained the forbearance of the payment of 700*l.* was under the false pretence that the tallow was still lodged as security; and was a most fraudulent act."

The case of Mr. Mollett was at the present hearing represented to be this: the delivery note for the fifty casks was sent to the bankrupts on the 1st of April, and by them transferred the same day to the persons for whom the tallow had been bought, but no demand for payment was made by Mollett on that day, and no payment was then made. The delivery order for the remaining thirty-two casks was sent to the bankrupts on the 8th of April, and paid for by them on the same day, and on the 15th of April a second delivery order for the fifty casks was sent and returned by the bankrupts to Mollett; and on the 19th, application being made for payment by Mollett's brother, Gull asked that the 700*l.* might remain as a loan, he paying 100*l.* on account, which was agreed to by Mollett, and the 100*l.* was paid. Thus matters stood until November, and although transactions between the parties took place to above 20,000*l.* no notice was taken by any one of the 700*l.* Mollett in his affidavit swore that he had allowed the money so to remain in the belief that the fifty casks had not been delivered, but he did not state that such a representation of his belief had ever been made to the bankrupt. Mr. Gull swore that he never made any false representation, and that he was not aware until after the failure that Mollett was acting under such an impression.

With regard to Mr. Kelly's case, the matter was thus stated in the Commissioner's judgment: "Kelly ordered from Dublin twenty-five casks of tallow. On the 13th of November the bankrupts sent him word that they had purchased the tallow for him, and Kelly thereupon remitted to them 330*l.* which arrived on the Saturday after, and was acknowledged by the bankrupts to have been paid into their hands on the 17th of November. Nothing could be more clear than that the bankrupts, after having written to Kelly to tell him that they had bought twenty-five casks of tallow on his account, and after having received payment, had no right, and could have no right, whatever to dispose of that tallow; it was as much Kelly's as if it had been delivered in Dublin. Nothing until the bankruptcy shewed but that the ostensible ownership was in Gull and Wilson, nor made any alteration in the title to the property, and it was doubtful if even bankruptcy made any alteration in the title to it. Independently of the gross irregularity—to say no more—of this transaction, it took place at a time when the bankrupts, and especially Gull, must have known that they were, if not insolvent, threatened with immediate insolvency. The immediate cause of failure was, that they had very large transactions with some Scotch houses. Now, about that time some of the Scotch houses began to shew symptoms of distress, some as early as August, but several in September, and at the latter end of October the largest had actually failed. The transactions with these houses extended to more than 30,000*l.*, for which accommodation bills were given. It was clear, therefore, that when Gull and Wilson sold Kelly the tallow they had good warning that they were insolvent; and so pressing was that warning that on the 17th of November, the Monday after the Saturday on which they received Kelly's money, the bankrupt Wilson withdrew all the money remaining at the bank, and thereby occasioned an immediate stoppage of the house. He (the Commissioner) must, therefore, conclude that Kelly's case was abundantly proved, and that it was a case of fraudulently appropriating property which did not belong to them." The case as to Mr. Kelly was thus explained by Mr. Gull. The money was remitted on the 15th of November, in the absence of Gull, and was paid into the bankers', and on the 17th Mr. Wilson, for some cause unexplained, drew out all the money from the bankers, and being by this act of Wilson unable to pay for the goods he had purchased for Kelly, he re-transferred them to Palmer & Co., from whom they were bought. Beyond this, from Gull's uncontradicted affidavit, it appeared that before the certificate meeting Kelly called upon him and offered not to oppose if he would make an arrangement for paying him. This Gull refused, and Kelly opposed the grant of his certificate; and, subsequently, after the petition of appeal was presented, Kelly again called and asked what he, Gull, was going to give him not to oppose the appeal. Upon these materials and upon these points, the petition was heard.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Roxburgh supported the petition of appeal.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Cooke, on behalf of the creditors Mollett and Kelly, supported the decision of the Commissioner.

Mr. Graham, the official assignee, and Mr. Murray, the solicitor to the creditors' assignees, were questioned by the Court, and stated that they attributed the failure of Mr. Gull to the losses occasioned by the failure of houses with which the bankrupts were extensively engaged; they believed there had been no intentional irregularity in the matter of Mollett or Kelly; that there had been no extravagant expenditure in the personal outlay of Mr. Gull; that the failure was attributable to misfortune in the proper sense of the term, and that there had been no reckless or imprudent dealing.

Mr. Swanston was not called on to reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This is a petition of appeal from an order of the learned Commissioner in Bankruptcy, Mr. Fonblanque, suspending the certificate of the petitioner for two years without protection, or, at least, without protection for a considerable portion of time; and it comes before the Court under unusual circumstances. The learned Commissioner appears to have proceeded upon five or six distinct grounds, but only as to two of them has any evidence been brought to our attention, or, indeed before us; and the others have in effect been tacitly disclaimed by the opposing creditors, and more than tacitly by the assignees, the latter, most certainly, and the others, as I believe, represented by solicitors of reputation, standing, and experience. It would not be reasonable to suppose or suspect collusion; nor am I inclined to think that merely on the two grounds I have already mentioned as those to which the evidence in the contention before us has been confined, would the learned Commissioner have made the order he has made. We are bound, as we conceive, to confine our attention to those two grounds, one being that the debt of Mr. Thomas Kelly was fraudulently contracted by the bankrupts, and the other, that they, or the petitioner, fraudulently induced another creditor, Mr. John Mollett, to refrain from enforcing or pressing his claim, not, however, by way of contract, or in such a way as to bind Mr. Mollett. They are the two opposing creditors; for the assignees, though watching the case, take no part as assignees against the petitioner, in whose favour, rather than against, the statements made to us in court, by the official assignee, and Mr. Murray, the assignees' solicitor, have been made.

With regard to Mr. Kelly, he has, since the bankruptcy, shewn such a want of the most ordinary attention and propriety with regard to his debt, as almost to raise a case of personal charge against him; but we should be considered as justified in dealing with this case as if he had not acted with the gross incorrectness with which he has acted, and we do so. I think, however, whether assuming or not assuming perfect integrity on his part, that his case fails. A quantity of tallow was bought, or to be bought, on his account, but he had not the tallow, and he charges the bankrupts or the petitioner, one of them, with fraud,—in this respect, I think, on the evidence, without foundation,—for I believe the money was received by them bond fide; at least, bond fide so far as the petitioner was concerned, and that it was not for want of integrity on the petitioner's part that Mr. Kelly had not his tallow. Certainly, the liability of a trader for the acts of his partner is sometimes carried to a great extent, but to apply it to the principles which regulate debt would be rather too strong. I believe the petitioner, when he made his communication, did honestly the act which prevented Mr. Kelly from having his tallow; and whatever ought to be thought of Mr. Wilson's conduct, there can be no charge of fraud towards Mr. Kelly, by Mr. Gull, to deprive him both of money and goods in respect of which the money was sent: all which I might have regretted now, had his subsequent conduct been different. His case, I repeat, fails on every ground, and under whatsoever view.

The case of Mr. Mollett stands thus—he refrained, he says, from enforcing his demand, and from pressure, in consequence of the fact, known, as he asserts, to the petitioner, and unknown to Mr. Mollett, and which, had he known, he would not have acted on. But it is neither proved nor asserted that the petitioner made any false statement or misrepresentation. The complaint is, that he was silent. It is true that instances may well be in which silence may be equivalent to actual falsehood. Is this one? I think not. The question is, whether the facts in evidence ought to lead to the inference that the silence could not have been that of an honest man, or was ill intended, or for an unfair motive. If Mr. Mollett was deceived or misled at all (of which I am not by any means persuaded) he was not so by or through any improper conduct or intention on the part of the petitioner, whose account and explanation of the matter I believe. But I have doubted considerably whether, on the composition made some years ago with the petitioning creditors, that we heard yesterday from Mr. Murray and the official assignee, Mr. Gull's certificate ought to be one of the first or second class; I have come to the conclusion, however, that a case is not made out for depriving him of his certificate of the first class, which may, I think, consistently with the interests of society, with the rules of law, and with the merits of the litigants before us, be at once granted.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I have nothing to add, except to entirely concur in the judgment delivered by my learned Brother. We both arrived at the same conclusion, and there was only one doubt, and that was as to the class of certificate, and I am very happy that any doubts on that subject are removed. I do not mean to throw on him the responsibility of giving the certificate of the first class, for, on considering the matter, we thought that a case had not been made out for depriving the party of the certificate of the first class. The refusal must be reversed, and a first-class certificate immediately granted.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—Certificate.

E. M. and H. M. purchased a business of their brothers, but it was not paid for. E. M. attended to the accounts, so far as they were attended to; and H. M. performed the duties of traveller to the business. E. M. and H. M. on various occasions raised money by deposits of goods and paid 60l. per cent. for discount. H. M. ordered goods one day and pledged them on the next. The brothers, the vendors of the business, sued for the purchase-money and issued execution on a judgment in the action. Both E. M. and H. M. were adjudicated bankrupts, and the Commissioner refused them their certificates or protection, on the ground of not keeping proper books of account (as to E. M., destruction of books), obtaining goods for the purpose of pledging and pledging them, and fraudulent preference to the brothers who sold the business. H. M. appealed, and swore that he pledged the goods to meet a sudden demand for payment of bills falling due; that he believed he was solvent when the goods were bought, and that he had nothing to do with the keeping of the books, and he produced a witness who swore that the goods were ordered because they were wanted in the stock. The Lords Justices were of opinion that there was no wrong intention as to the books or the pawning, and that there was pressure by the vendors, and, acquitting the appellant of fraud, granted him a second-class certificate, to be dated eight months after the adjudication.

The petitioner in this case, Henry Martyn, carried on the business of woollen-draper, in partnership with his brother Edward Martyn, in Aldgate High Street. They took the business in 1839 from their brothers Thomas and Robert Martyn, for which they agreed to pay 300*l.*, and to take upon themselves a debt of 500*l.* At the date of the bankruptcy their debts amounted to 5,578*l.* and they were liable on bills of exchange, accepted by other persons for their accommodation, in 1,845*l.*, making together 7,423*l.* A rough estimate was made of the profits (there not being sufficient books), which were calculated at 3,677*l.* The bought-ledger and the goods account were regularly kept, though the others were defective, and in fact there was no stock-book or cash-book. The property realized only 883*l.*, there being an admitted loss on it of 500*l.*, and the loss by bad or doubtful debts was about 2,000*l.* Both the brothers were adjudicated bankrupts on the 15th of December 1851; and on the 29th of March following Mr. Commissioner Goulburn refused them both their certificates or any protection excepting during the twenty-one days allowed for appeal. The grounds of his refusal were four: not keeping books, destroying books, buying goods for the purpose of pledging and pledging them, and fraudulent preference. As to Henry Martyn, who now appealed from the Commissioner's decision, the second ground did not apply.

The other three points from the evidence before the Commissioner (but which was varied before this Court) appeared to stand thus: Transactions with Mr. Roberts (after mentioned) were not entered in the books of account; nor were the debts due to the bankrupts' brothers for the purchase of the business; nor was a sum of money, said to have been sunk in the business, and derived on the marriage of one of the bankrupts from his wife. No stock-book was kept, at least no proper stock-book, and no cash-book was to be found. The matter of the pledging was this:—when money was wanted, part of the stock was taken to the house of a person named Gregory, who made advances on it at the rate of 60*l.* per cent. In addition to this, the bankrupts received advances of money at the same rate from an attorney named Roberts, on discount of their bills, but no pledges were made to him. The most important instance of pledging was, that on the 5th of August the bankrupt, Henry Martyn, ordered of Mr. Ledgard certain goods, and on the same day he ordered other goods of Mr. Nash, and on the following morning the goods were removed to the house of Mr. Gregory, and pledged to raise money. It did not appear that any representation was made to Mr. Ledgard or Mr. Nash, but the goods were purchased in the ordinary manner as if for sale. The question of fraudulent preference arose out of the debt alleged to be due to the brothers for the purchase of the business, and the Commissioner was of opinion that the transaction was one which was described in the 4th clause of the 256th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, namely, "fraudulently, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and not under pressure from any of the creditors, with intent to diminish the sum to be divided among them." The writ at the suit of the brothers issued on the 22nd of July, and judgment was signed on the 5th of August. One of the brothers required security for the debt, and that was alleged as the pressure by a creditor to justify the execution. It turned out that judgment had been signed too soon, though it was not executed till the 19th of the same month. An attempt was made on behalf of the creditors to persuade the two bankrupts to commit an act of bankruptcy before the sale under the execution could take place, upon which Edward Martyn agreed to execute an assignment, but Henry Martyn refused for a time, and when he consented the sale had already taken place and Robert and Thomas Martyn had obtained the property. The Commissioner held that this was done in order to defeat the claims of the creditors, and was a fraudulent preference.

Henry Martyn, the petitioner, appealed from the decision of the Commissioner, and filed an affidavit in which he swore that when he entered the business he was only twenty years of age; that his partner was eight years older; that his brother kept the books; that he was himself the traveller; that the transactions of the discounts by Roberts and Gregory were duly and regularly entered according to the usual course; that the shopman, Wilson, told him on the 5th of August that two particular sorts of cloth were wanted for the stock, which he, Henry Martyn, accordingly ordered of Mr. Ledgard and

Mr. Nash; that being informed by his brother that on the 6th of August bills to the amount of 80*l.* were falling due, and that there was no money to meet them, he took these two parcels of goods, which were then unpacked, and pledged them with Mr. Gregory; that his reason for pledging these in preference to other goods was that the "tabs" being on them, the length, the quality and the price of them would be at once seen, and being already packed they could be the more easily removed, and that at this time he believed he was solvent, although he had no other means of raising the money to meet the bills. Wilson, the shopman, in his affidavit, stated the same facts as to the sorts of goods wanted for the stock. During the argument, their Lordships offered the assignees an opportunity of having Wilson before the Court and cross-examining him, but the offer was declined.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Roxburgh supported the petition of appeal.

Mr. Rolé and Mr. Bagley, for the assignees, opposed it.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The first question is, whether it has been established against this bankrupt that he has been guilty of fraudulent conduct, or whether his conduct comes within the description of acts of impropriety beyond unskilfulness or imprudence, because, were such a case brought home to him—to any man engaged in trade—the general interests of justice and the safety of mankind would require it to be dealt with severely. Instances have been adduced in which it has been contended by the assignees, with great propriety, that the withholding of entries from the books cannot be attributed to unskilfulness or neglect, but must be attributed to bad and dishonest intentions. Upon this reliance must not be placed, for it is to be remembered that Henry Martyn, the petitioner, was not the keeper of the books, but a traveller, his brother Edward Martyn taking, or professing to take care of the book-keeping. Nor is it to be forgotten that the petitioner was partner with a brother eight years older than himself, and that when the business commenced the petitioner was only a young man of twenty years of age. I do not discover in the books or otherwise any evidence to satisfy me of the fact on which the assignees have relied, namely, fraudulent omission of entries attributable to the petitioner. I do, however, find entries of exorbitant and oppressive interest made in a general way, without day of the month or any other particulars. This, however improper, I cannot attribute to fraud or bad intention in Henry Martyn. I am clearly of opinion, and so, I believe, is my learned Brother, that if fraud or bad intention in such conduct could be shewn, no amount of punishment which this Court has the power of inflicting could be too great to mark its sense of the impropriety of such conduct. Then, again, there is an omission of the entry of the sum they owed when they began business, and it does not appear that they kept a book in which such entry could be made. So, too, the fortune brought by the wife of one of the bankrupts; but, however improper such an omission may be, and few things can be more improper, still I do not find it necessary to attribute it to fraud or bad intention. Then comes the consideration of the conduct of the brothers as to the execution; and upon the evidence before the Court, it appears that the conduct of Robert and Thomas Martyn was rather harsh than collusive, and therefore the conclusion is that the petitioner and the other bankrupt did not permit the execution fraudulently or dishonestly. On these two grounds, therefore, namely, the defective keeping of the books and the fraudulent conduct as alleged in respect of the execution, we are not satisfied that the assignees have substantiated their case against the petitioner, Henry Martyn.

Then there is the third ground alleged against the petitioner,—and if it were established, hardly any amount of severity which the Court could visit upon the bankrupt would be adequate to its gravity,—the offence, namely, of taking up goods from a tradesman apparently in the ordinary course of business, but with the view and intention to pledge them. The time of the pledging of the goods was, undoubtedly, most suspicious; but the affidavit of Wilson, the shopman, is clear and explicit, that he pointed out what goods were wanted and they were accordingly ordered, and although we gave the assignees the opportunity of cross-examining this witness, they did not avail themselves of the offer. From this person's account the goods were wanted, and then it appears that a sudden pressure for money arose, and the goods were pledged to answer immediate necessities. Much stress has been laid on the fact of the goods pledged being the very goods which but the day before had been received by the bankrupts, but the answer given to that was plausible, and the selection of these very goods was also plausible, for the tickets or "tabs" upon them shewed at once the quality, value, and quantity contained in each parcel.

There remains only this point, namely, that the bankrupts had been in very considerable difficulty for a long time; but the petitioner in his affidavit swears that he did not know that the partnership was in a state of insolvency, and as he did not attend to the books I see no reason for disbelieving him. I do not think any stress can be laid on that. Considering, therefore, the age of the petitioner when he began business, and recollecting that his elder brother was his partner, and considering that from the middle of February he was without protection, substantial justice will be done by granting the petitioner a certificate of the second class to be dated eight calendar months from the date of the adjudication.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I only add a few words to express my entire concurrence in what has fallen from my learned Brother. It must not be thought that, because we differ from the conclusion at which the learned Commissioner has arrived in this case, we differ from the principle on which he acted. On the contrary, it must be distinctly understood that when such a course of dealing is established as that of taking up goods with the intention of pledging them, the Court will visit such fraudulent misconduct with the utmost severity. Here we are not forced to believe, and do not believe, that the petitioner had any dishonest intention, and he will, therefore, be entitled to his certificate of the class and dated as my learned Brother has intimated. I may add, that if Wilson's affidavit be true, fraud is disproved, and I think it would be very unsafe to deal with the petitioner on a footing of fraud after such a course of trading as is here proved.

Ex parte GLYN, in re
ASHLIN.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, ss. 44, 54.—Payments to the Chief Registrar's Account—Allowance to Official Assignees.

The 54th section of the statute having enacted that certain amounts, not less nor greater than specified amounts per cent. on the gross produce, from time to time should be paid by official assignees to the "Chief Registrar's Account," the amount to be fixed by the senior Commissioner, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor; and the chief Commissioner having fixed the sums, with such approval, the Court refused to interfere to alter the same; but the Commissioner having made such allowances to the official assignee as, according to the amount of the bankrupt's estate and the nature of the duties performed, were, in his opinion, just and reasonable, the Court differing from the opinion of the Commissioner, and the official assignee not requesting the Court to fix the amount of allowance, the matter was, on this point, sent back to the Commissioner for re-consideration.

This was a petition presented by Messrs. Glyn, Currie & Gurney, the creditors' assignees to the estate of Mr. Spencer Ashlin, the bankrupt, by way of appeal from the order of Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, praying that such order might be discharged or varied, and that the difference between the amount actually paid to the chief Registrar's fund and such sum as the Court might find properly payable, might be refunded to Mr. Pennell, as official assignee, and that the Commissioner might be directed to review and to re-consider the allowance or per-centage allowed to Mr. Pennell, and that the difference between the sums allowed and the amount which the Court should think fit and reasonable might be refunded to the bankrupt's estate. The material facts appearing upon the petition, and which were not disputed, were these:—Mr. Pennell, the official assignee, had received money belonging to the bankrupt's estate to the gross amount of 20,928*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* up to the 24th of January 1852, which sum had been payable to him in the following way:—On the 18th of November Glyn & Co. paid over 15,539*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*; on the 5th of December the sum of 1,037*l.*, the amount of one bill of exchange, and on the 9th of the same month 663*l.*, amounting together to 1,700*l.* were paid to him, and between the 18th of November 1851 and the 24th of January 1852, the day appointed for the audit of the accounts of the official assignee, he received, in twenty-three sums, money amounting to 3,689*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.*, making a gross amount of receipts of 20,928*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*; of these twenty-three sums, fifteen were debts not exceeding 100*l.*, and amounted altogether to 444*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*; four were debts exceeding 100*l.*, but not exceeding 500*l.*, and amounted altogether to 1,257*l.* 5*s.*; two were debts exceeding 500*l.* and not exceeding 1,000*l.*, and amounted to 1,195*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.*; and the remaining two were sums of 43*l.* 2*s.* and 750*l.*, the produce of the sale of furniture and other similar property. The official assignee, in his account, debited the estate with, among others, payments in respect of the 20,928*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, as follows:—"To chief Registrar's fees, 5*l.* per cent. on 500*l.*, 25*l.*; 3*l.* per cent. on 4,500*l.*, 135*l.*; 2*l.* 10*s.* per cent. on 5,000*l.*, 125*l.*; 1*l.* per cent. on 10,000*l.*, 100*l.*; 10*s.* per cent. on 928*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*, 4*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*;" these with other sums paid to the chief Registrar's account, amounted altogether to 419*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* These, then, were the official assignee's charges and per-centage up to and including the first dividend under the estate; there were six sittings only of the Commissioner in the prosecution of the adjudication, for each of which 11*s.* was paid for court charges. The total receipts of the official assignees amounted to 21,584*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.*; the total payments among the creditors were 15,810*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*

The charges of the official assignee in respect of the receipts (including 20*l.* for investigating the accounts) were 197*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.*; and for distributing the 15,810*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.* among thirty-three creditors and claimants, 169*l.* 15*s.* 11*d.*, making, with the sum of 419*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, paid to the chief Registrar's fund, a total out of an estate of 21,584*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.*, of 786*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.*

By the 54th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, it is directed "That the official assignee of each bankrupt's estate, shall pay to the account intitled 'The Chief Registrar's Account,' such sum, not less than one-eighth of a pound, and not exceeding 5*l.* per cent. on the gross produce from time to time of any such estate; such sum within the limit aforesaid, and the time or times for payment thereof, to be fixed by the senior Commissioner, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor; and the senior Commissioner, with the like approval, may from time to time lessen or increase such sum, within the limit aforesaid, as may seem just and reasonable, upon consideration of the amount from time to time standing to the said account, and of the claims from time to time chargeable thereupon." The 44th section enacts, "That the Court may order and allow to be paid out of any bankrupt's estate, to the official assignee thereof, as a remuneration for his services, such sum as shall, upon consideration of the amount of the bankrupt's property, and the nature of the duties performed by such official assignee, appear to be just and reasonable."

Mr. Commissioner Evans, the senior Commissioner, made an order pursuant to the statute, which was approved of by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cottenham), and the scale of payments to the fund was fixed thus:—Upon the first money of such gross produce not exceeding 500*l.*, 5*l.* per cent.; upon all further monies of such gross produce above 500*l.* and not exceeding 5,000*l.*, 3*l.* per cent.; and so on, using similar words up to 30,000*l.* and down to 10*s.* per cent., and ending between 30,000*l.* and not exceeding 100,000*l.*, 5*s.* per cent. The creditors' assignees, alleging that the sum of 786*l.* 17*s.* 11*d.* payable as before mentioned to the fund, and to the official assignee, was too large a deduction to be made out of the bankrupt's estate, and was not justifiable either by the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, or by the order of the senior Commissioner, applied to Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, on the 27th of February last, seeking a deduction of the charges. Two points were raised before him: the first as to the rates of per-centage paid to the fund; the second, as to the sums paid to the official assignee, for his remuneration. As to the first point, his Honour considered that as the charges were made according to the order approved of by the Lord Chancellor, he had no jurisdiction to vary the rate of per-centage; and, by an order made on the same day, he declared that according to the amount of the bankrupt's estate and the nature of the duties performed by the official assignee, the remuneration which he claimed was just and reasonable. From this order the creditors' assignees now appealed. It was admitted that the duties of the official assignee had ceased at the end of January last.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—The question for our consideration is, I suppose, what authority is given by the 54th section of the act?

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Selwyn, for the petition.—Yes, that is the question on one point; on the other point, the question will be, whether the allowance to the official assignee is not extravagantly large. As to the per-centage payable to the fund, the petitioners contend that in the first place the chief Commissioner has exceeded the authority given him by the 54th section in making a scale of charges in the form he has. What the legislature intended was, that within the specified limits of one-eighth of a pound and 5*l.* per cent., there should be one uniform amount per cent. on the whole estate of each bankrupt paid to the chief Registrar's account. Certainly, it never was intended that if the estate received consisted of 1,000*l.*, received in ten different sums, a per-centage should be paid upon each of these ten sums. Therefore, what should have been charged on the estate when the whole was received, should have been that amount per cent. which was warranted by an order properly made according to the act of parliament. The expression "further sums or further monies," in the order of the Commissioner, Mr. Evans, only means "larger estate," and ought to be so construed, supposing it to be capable of a reasonable construction. All that a chief Commissioner was authorized to do was to fix a scale for each estate, and not a scale applicable to separate items of each estate.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Willes, for the official assignee; and Mr. Daniel and Mr. Hopwood, for the accountant in bankruptcy, were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—With all that respect for the two learned counsel who have addressed the Court which they deserve, and which is the highest, I confess myself surprised at the argument they have addressed to us. Assuming that we have jurisdiction to enter into the question of the legality of the order of Mr. Commissioner Evans, and assuming that it is legal, and only so assuming for the purpose of the question before the Court, I am most clearly of opinion that he was correct within the plain meaning of the 54th section of the statute in framing that order as he has done. If that order is found to be inconvenient, the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act has pointed out how it may be altered, namely, by an application to the senior Commissioner, and with the approval of the Lord Chancellor. The next question is, as to the construction of that order; and what the Commissioner has done is on the estate received up to a given amount to allow for the sums collected, 5*l.* per cent., on one sum 3*l.* per cent., on a further sum 2*l.* 10*s.* per cent., and so on; and if that is not a correct interpretation of the order approved of by the Lord Chancellor, I must confess myself not to be acquainted with the meaning of the English language as there used. The costs of the petition as to this question must be paid by those who raised it.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I entirely concur with the view taken by my learned Brother. It is quite notorious that allowances are made to brokers and others, not by reference to the amount of trouble entailed upon them by their services, but by way of per-centage. It is by no means a novelty to pay a public officer by means of a per-centage on the money he collects, for by the statute of 29 Eliz. c. 4, an act passed to prevent extortion in sheriffs and others, it is enacted, that a sheriff shall not have more than a stated amount of poundage on monies received on executions "by reason or colour of his office," and this clearly is independently of his trouble being great or small, or even none.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Selwyn, for the petitioners, then argued the question as to the remuneration allowed to the official assignee.—The allowance made to Mr. Pennell is much too great, for the bulk of the bankrupt's estate was merely handed over by the bankers to him as official assignee, so that he has undergone no labour or trouble in its collection. According to the terms of the 44th section of the Bankrupt Act, the official assignee is only entitled by way of remuneration to such sum as from the amount of the estate and nature of the duties "shall appear to be just and reasonable." If the sum which the Commissioner considered proper remuneration for the official assignee be allowed, counting from the time of the adjudication to the time of the dividend; it will be equal to a payment at the rate of 1,800*l.* a-year. There is still 6,000*l.* of the estate outstanding, for receiving which the official assignee will have still further remuneration, although what he could do for it will be little or nothing beyond the mere receipt of the monies.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Willes, for the official assignee.—The allowance made to the official assignee is not too large. The duties of those officers are of the most onerous and responsible nature, and often are even the cause of involving them in considerable losses. The duties are often rendered much more difficult by reason of the fraud of the parties, and the complicated and confused state of their accounts, of which the present case is one instance, in which to add to the embarrassment of the official assignee the bankrupt has absconded. If according to the general scale or rule adopted by the London Commissioners the official assignee has been highly remunerated for his labours, in other cases he is ill remunerated and sometimes not remunerated at all, and even in some cases he has incurred a direct loss. The objection to a per-centage on the receipt of monies is one which cannot well be raised by persons in the position of the petitioners, a banker and a bill-broker, as it is the daily practice in the City to remunerate functionaries in that way, such as sheriffs, as already instanced by the Court, brokers, receivers and others. The Court will act in the same way as was done in Ex parte Tiplady in re Dickenson (1), where although it was held that the Court of Review had jurisdiction to entertain a petition against the allowance made by the Commissioner to an official assignee, still it declined to interfere with the decision of the Commissioner unless it was shewn that he had, as to the quantum of the allowance, proceeded on an erroneous principle.

Mr. Swanston, in reply.—The ground on which the petition is presented is clearly valid, and may be inferred to be so from the arguments used against it. All that can be urged is, that persons in the position of life of the petitioners ought not to contest the allowance, and that there is a general scale of allowance made by many of the London Commissioners without regard to the amount of the estate or the quantity of labour bestowed, or extent of services rendered by the official assignees. That is the mode of proceeding which is complained of in this petition.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The question reserved by us for our consideration in this case is, as to the amount of remuneration, under the 44th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, which the Commissioner has allowed and directed to be paid to the official assignee. The amount of 367*l.* was, we understand, thus allowed and deducted as remuneration for services and labour done to the 30th of January last, there having been no labour or service since that time, the adjudication having taken place in the November preceding. We understand the sum in question to have been calculated upon the basis of a general rule, or general scale, approved and adopted by some of the London Commissioners (but which general rule, or general scale, has never received the sanction of the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal), and not on the circumstances of this particular case. The probability is, that it would be consistent with a view,—not to save trouble or time,—but, to the general interests of justice, that there should be a general rule, liable in particular cases to variation, in the exercise of careful judicial discretion; and that there should be an attempt to obtain uniformity of practice, so far as due attention to the language of the act of parliament will permit; nor do we doubt that it would be as well were the London Commissioners to apply to the Lord Chancellor under this section. Here we ought not, as we think, to recognize any general rule. Regarding the particular circumstances of this case, although impressed with the belief that official assignees ought not to be remunerated in a niggardly or parsimonious manner, we think, with unfeigned deference to the learned and excellent Commissioner before whom this case was considered, but whose attention seems not to have been directed minutely to this particular circumstance, that the amount of remuneration allowed is too high, considered merely down to the period of last January. We think the case must go back to the learned Commissioner, unless the petitioners and the official assignee join in requesting us to fix what the amount of remuneration ought to be, which, upon being so requested, we are prepared and ready to do.

(1) 3 Dea. & C. 570.

Mr. Swanston, on behalf of the petitioners, requested the judgment of the Court fixing the amount of remuneration.

Mr. Russell, for the official assignee, abstained from any remark.

Their LORDSHIPS thereupon referred the matter back to the Commissioner on this point.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—"Conduct as a Trader."

A bankrupt, who had twice before compounded with his creditors, made false and fraudulent entries in his books, consisting of fictitious accounts in particular names. He stopped payment, being at the time able to pay 12s. in the pound, and soon after offered 11s. in the pound. The Commissioner refused him his certificate and all protection, excepting for the twenty-one days; and on appeal, the Lords Justices, acting under the discretion given by the 198th section of the act—"a discretion to be exercised on judicial grounds with reference to the nature of the case in general, and on its peculiar circumstances"—dismissed the petition of appeal, with costs, affirming the decision of the Commissioner, and refusing any protection whatever, the conduct of the bankrupt being unfair, untradesman-like and disreputable.

A petition of appeal was presented in this matter by the bankrupt, Thomas Stephen Curties, of York Street, Westminster, wholesale cheesemonger, praying the reversal of the decision of Mr. Commissioner Evans, by which any certificate had been refused him, and protection only granted for twenty-one days. The peculiar features of the case will be collected from the narrative judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, and it will only be necessary therefore to state that the grounds of the Commissioner were, first, that the bankrupt had made false and fraudulent entries in his books with intent to defraud his creditors within the meaning of the 201st section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act; secondly, a fraudulent contracting of debts within the meaning of the 256th section of the same statute; and, thirdly, that after adjudication he had withheld the production of books and papers relating to his trade-dealings and estate.

Mr. Swanston and Mr. Roxburgh supported the petition of appeal, and stated to the Court that 10s. in the pound had been paid, besides the costs of the bankruptcy, up to the time of the dividend meeting; and that the official manager had in hand 263*l.* to answer future costs, and to make a further dividend of probably not less than 2s. in the pound.

Mr. Malins and Mr. Bagley opposed the petition on behalf of the trade assignees, and urged upon the Court the necessity of dismissing the petition, with costs.

Mr. Bury appeared for the official assignee, also in opposition to the appeal.

Mr. Swanston was heard in reply.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This is a case of certificate arising necessarily on one or more of the sections of the act consolidating the law of bankruptcy, of which, without entering into the 201st and 256th sections, it will be sufficient to refer to the 198th section, which directs that the Court, "having regard to the conformity of the bankrupt to the law of bankruptcy, and to his conduct as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy, and whether the allowance of such certificate be opposed by any creditor or not, shall judge of any objection against allowing such certificate, and either find the bankrupt entitled thereto, and allow the same, or refuse or suspend the allowance thereof, or annex such conditions thereto as the justice of the case may require." The discretion here reposed in the Court is, as Mr. Swanston truly says, not an unlimited discretion; it is to be discreetly exercised on judicial grounds, with reference to the particular nature of the case in general, and also on its particular circumstances; but, before all, is to have regard, if not to be restricted to the conduct of the bankrupt as a trader, and as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy. The question before us is, whether, having regard to the conduct of the bankrupt as a trader before as well as after his bankruptcy, it is or is not fit that he should receive a passport (so to speak) in the world of commerce to recommence operations as a trader before paying in full the debts now due from him.

The conduct of the bankrupt has been impeached on several grounds: first, that suspending his payments, intending a stoppage and a composition with his creditors on the morning of the 27th of October, he had on the preceding Saturday purchased goods of tradesmen for which he did not pay and has never paid, and it is contended that his purchase of goods on the Saturday, followed by the almost immediate stoppage in the forenoon of the Monday, was conduct unfair, untradesman-like and disreputable. Prima facie it was so; and it lies on the bankrupt to explain such a state of things; and it has been said on his behalf, that it was not unfair, untradesman-like, nor dishonest under the circumstances in which he was placed, to buy goods and within less than twenty-four hours in one sense, and forty-eight hours in every sense, to proceed to effect a composition. He says he intended nothing of the kind attributed to him, that he bought the goods in the ordinary course of business, and that he intended to continue his trade; but that on the Monday morning, so early as nine o'clock, he received an invoice of one parcel of the goods from one of the tradesmen thus used, by the deduction of discount on which it was shewn that he expected immediate payment of the amount. The invoice appears not to have been accompanied by a letter; but the bankrupt inferred, as he says, that no further supplies were to be expected from that quarter without immediate payment. In this instance, there was no demand or pressure either for that or a much larger sum due from him to the same creditor. The amount of this invoice was under 28*l.*, but he says it had such an effect upon him, as shewing an intention of no longer dealing with him on credit, but to make their dealings together ready-money dealings, he being so short of supplies, his trade so much depending on this man, that the receipt of the invoice induced him to determine at once to come to a stoppage. Now, certainly, this is a most extraordinary state of circumstances, and one which, although not absolutely impossible, yet is so improbable that it requires a very great stretch of credulity to believe. It is curious, too, that in his position he should have at all desired to have stopped payment or compounded with his creditors, for it is plain he had the means of paying 12s. in the pound; indeed, he shortly afterwards offered to pay

11s. in the pound. The whole affair, therefore, wears a most mysterious aspect, as to which it is impossible to account to the mind before we resort to the early history of this man.

It appears that in December 1831, being then a linen-draper, or recently an apprentice to a linen-draper at Worthing, and just out of his time, he married a lady of some fortune in his own rank of life. The fortune she had appears to have been short of 1,000*l.*, about 800*l.*—a very good fortune for his rank of life. Of this sum 500*l.* was settled strictly, and is not now in question. There was no other settlement, and the fortune came into the possession of the husband; but he says, though there was a formal deed as to the 500*l.*, there was an understanding (or an agreement of some kind) that he was to be a debtor for the rest of the fortune, and whether that is to be believed depends on the circumstances taken together. He appears on this occasion, with the aid of his wife's fortune, to have changed his line of business, and to have taken to the bacon and cheese trade, in which he was not long outwardly prosperous, for in 1836 he stopped payment, and paid 10*s.* in the pound. That was the conclusion of the first cycle of his business. Afterwards, he went on for some years without entering into any composition. But in 1847 he came to a second composition, and in that he paid 9*s.* in the pound. The ensuing period of trade is not so long, because the time for the third composition appears to have arrived in 1851. Looking back to these circumstances, to which others may be added, some light dawns upon the otherwise mysterious circumstances in which a man, such as he was with regard to property, should desire to stop business and compound with his creditors. I have endeavoured to account satisfactorily to my own mind for his conduct with respect to this third transaction, and I have failed in the attempt; and I regret to say that I am unable to give credit to the reasons he assigns for his stoppage,—for his last act, the attempt at composition. I am unable to assign it to any motive consistent with credit to him.

This is not all. He did not at this stage contemplate bankruptcy, he intended a composition; but against his will, his creditors not wishing to accept 11*s.* in the pound, he was made a bankrupt, and his books and documents have undergone an adverse inspection. From the ledger he seems to have abstracted four pages or two leaves; these, he says, were taken out by himself. The knife, also, has been in use in more than one place in the books, and must be taken to have been so used by himself; but what makes the matter the subject of graver consideration is, that the abstracted leaves and the erasures are all accompanied by suspicious accounts in the same books, and to which I must now refer. The book contains, at least four fictitious accounts, that is, they are accounts ascribed to persons with whom he had no dealing. The allegation, however, on his part is, that the transaction was fair, and this form of account was merely adopted because he did not wish his clerks and servants to know to what they really related. One of the accounts is ascribable to a man of the name of Payne, making Payne a creditor to the extent of 200*l.* That is admitted to be fictitious in every sense, but the bankrupt explains it thus: "I say that previously to the 10th of January 1848, I had saved 200*l.* from the sale of bacon wrappers, empty hogsheads, and preferences on compositions with my creditors, which I had kept apart from my business as a private fund; but then, wanting the amount in my business, I entered the same in my books under the head of John Payne." The phrase "preferences on compositions," is one of which I never before heard. Of the other three accounts, one is a closed account, entered in the name of Maria Curties, the mother of the bankrupt. Of the other two, being open accounts, one is with Mr. Webberley, the brother-in-law of the bankrupt, the other with Mr. Pointon, his cousin; they are all of them fictitious in point of names, but then he says they were honest accounts, merely intended for the purpose of concealment from his clerks; and he says the money all belonged to his wife. There is no pretence for saying that it belonged to his wife for her separate use; but it is said by Mr. Swanston, and said truly, that the bankrupt and his wife might so have treated the money, and this would remove any dishonest intention. I have stated the settlement on the marriage of the 500*l.*; I have stated the closed accounts with Maria Curties. The two accounts with Webberley and Payne amount to 1,100*l.* Now, that certainly is a great amount of accumulation on 300*l.*, the remainder of her fortune not in settlement. This is accounted for by the interest on the 500*l.* and on other money accrued due in her right, and by her saving from the expenses of the household, which appears to have been conducted with economy. It is, however, impossible that all this should be presented to the mind of any reasonable being without exciting an exclamation of surprise. I agree that the improbable is not always the untrue: and I agree that innocent men have been convicted on circumstantial evidence, apparently most satisfactory, but which has afterwards turned out to be untrue. Those, however, who have to determine on questions of doubtful facts must do their best to come to a conclusion, and must not avoid doing so merely on the ground of that liability to error which is incident to all. In viewing the matter in that way, I am obliged to say I cannot come to the conclusion that the history of this account is credible. I do not believe it.

The matter does not rest here, for this tradesman employed an accountant, Mr. Glover. In the course of the communications which passed between Mr. Glover and himself, it appears that these accounts struck Mr. Glover as seeming remarkable, but it does not appear that the bankrupt then explained to him that these accounts, as to Webberley and Payne, were accounts relating to property of his wife; but he led Mr. Glover to believe that they were true and honest accounts with persons described. The matter does not even thus end. There appears in the account under the name of Webberley, on the 27th of October 1851, a cheque debited to Webberley, in part payment of the apparent debt due to him. This struck the accountant as being on the day of the stoppage of payment, and he remonstrated. The bankrupt, however, at first insisted on its propriety, and that it ought to stand, but at last he gave way, and withdrew it. Though there are other circumstances to which I might allude, I lay no stress on them.

I find the facts, already mentioned before me, and I am asked, in the exercise of a judicial discretion, and on a tribunal having, to a certain extent, to arrange the affairs of commerce—I am asked to give the passport of the tribunal to this man to enable him to enter again into trade. I am surprised that such an application should have been made with the sanction of any disinterested adviser. It is a demand without pretext; it is a demand without colour, and I do not recollect a case where a certificate has been asked in which there were such plain, palpable, and irresistible grounds for refusal. For my part, and so far as I am concerned, I dismiss the petition; I refuse the petitioner his certificate, and I also refuse him any protection whatever.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I entirely concur in the conclusion at which my learned Brother has arrived. The case has been by us most fully and carefully considered; and there never was one more fit for refusal. It is a mistake to suppose that the question before the Court is, whether or not sufficient punishment has been inflicted; but the question is, whether, under the circumstances of such dishonesty as are here charged, and where the explanation given is so entirely and utterly incredible, the Court ought to sanction the re-entry of the bankrupt into business, without his having previously paid his debts in full. I think most clearly not; and the petition must be dismissed, and with costs, and all protection be refused.

Ex parte STANER, in re
STANER.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849—"Conduct as a Trader"—Fraud—Falsehood—Certificate.

A trader carried on business as a baker, and, before the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. came into operation, obtained money from J. on pretence that it should be invested on mortgage, which was not done. He also obtained money from F, on a similar pretence, which was not so invested. The trader became bankrupt, and the Commissioner refused him any certificate; and, on appeal, held (dismissing the appeal), that the money of J. and the money of F. were obtained by fraud and falsehood; that on these grounds he was not entitled to his certificate; that before a bankrupt can ask for his certificate he should have conformed to the bankrupt law since his bankruptcy; that if a trader so obtains money, though not in the course of his trade, or in matters connected with his business, it is, on a question of certificate, conduct as a trader, within the meaning of the act; and that if a case comes otherwise within the act, it is not the, less so because the conduct complained of took place before the passing of the act.

This was an appeal by the bankrupt, George Staner, a baker, at Margate, against the decision of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, who refused him either certificate or protection, on the grounds of fraudulent contracting of debts, and of conduct as a trader within the 256th section of the statute, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. From the evidence before the Commissioner, it appeared that the bankrupt, although a baker, was in the habit of borrowing money, and laying it out on mortgage and other securities. His assets amounted to sufficient to pay 10s. in the pound, and his unsecured debts were 7,600*l.*, or thereabouts. At the certificate hearing, before the Commissioner, Mr. Jay and Mrs. Fife severally opposed him, each on the ground that he had obtained money by false and fraudulent pretences. Mr. Jay alleged that the bankrupt obtained 450*l.* from him, on pretence that it was to be laid out on mortgage, while the bankrupt swore that it was lent to him on his own personal security. The matter turned on a correspondence, one of the most material letters of which was, however, alleged to be lost. The particulars of this correspondence are, as to their material points, fully stated in the judgment of Lord Cranworth. At the present hearing, Mr. Jay, the creditor, and the bankrupt were examined vidæ voce, and each adhered to his version of the affair. Mrs. Fife, in her examination before the Commissioner, swore that she and her late husband were acquainted with Staner, and that after her husband's death he asked her how she was left off, and that she told him she had 200*l.*, which was too much to be in the house, whereupon he offered to lay it out on mortgage. The particulars of this evidence, which on the present occasion was repeated, in an affidavit of Mrs. Fife, she being too ill to attend personally, are fully stated in Lord Cranworth's judgment. Miss Fife, the daughter of this creditor, was examined vidæ voce upon the subject of the loan, and so was the bankrupt; and, as in the case of Mr. Jay, the evidence was not only contradictory, but was in every respect diametrically opposed. The bankrupt swore that he did not recollect the transaction as detailed by Miss Fife and as set out in her mother's affidavit; and then he said her story was untrue, and that the money was lent on his promissory note only. Before Mrs. Fife's affidavit was admitted, the Lord Chief Justice stated that in his opinion it was due to the bankrupt that the case should stand over for the personal attendance of that lady, if the bankrupt desired it. The bankrupt, however, did not avail himself of the offer, and the case was heard on the affidavit of Mrs. Fife and on the oral testimony of her daughter, and on the vidæ voce examination of the bankrupt.

Mr. Cooke, in support of the appeal.—This case divides itself into three parts: first, is it or is it not, upon a fair estimate of the evidence before the Court, made out that the bankrupt did, in each of these two cases, as he unquestionably has done for a long time in other matters, receive the monies of these opposing creditors upon his own personal security, and to be laid out by him in such securities as he might from time to time see fit, the creditors relying on his personal security, and not on any investments he might make? Secondly, whether, however the money was obtained, and for whatever purpose lent to him, or intrusted to his care, can it be said that whatever his conduct in the affair might be, it was "conduct as a trader" within the meaning of the bankrupt law, his trade being that of a baker, and the money being in no way whatever placed in his hands in the conduct or for the purposes of his business? And, thirdly, if neither of those points can be answered favourably to the bankrupt, can the Court properly hold the case to come within the new bankrupt law, seeing that the two transactions took place before that law came into operation? Upon the first point, the fair estimate to be derived from the opposing testimony is, that the money was lent to him, and was not intrusted to him for the purpose of being invested on mortgages for the creditors. This, too, was done at periods when the bankrupt believed he was solvent, and when, in fact, he was so, and he would have so remained but for unforeseen and unavoidable mischance. As to the second question, how can it be said to be "conduct as a trader" within the meaning of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act for a baker to obtain money, however fraudulently, if fraud there be, which is not obtained in his character as such trader, and not to be applied or used in his trade? To hold that it were, would be a contradiction. If the legislature meant the words to apply to the general conduct of the bankrupt, the act would have spoken merely of his conduct, but by adding the words "as a trader," the legislature manifestly intended "conduct of the bankrupt in his character of a trader," or "in the conduct and management of his trade." There are two cases, decided by one of your Lordships, on the construction of this expression, and both cases are very distinguishable from this. They are Ex parte Wakefield (1) and Ex parte Dornford (2). In these cases, although the transactions complained of were not strictly in or relating to the business of the parties (and they are not at all so here), yet, in the latter case, the bankrupt obtained the money, though by misrepresentation yet still to the knowledge of the lender, for the purposes of his trade, while in the former the breaches of trust were held not to be committed by the bankrupt as a trader, and he was left open to all the consequences of them in this character of breaches of trust. There is nothing in the judgments to shew that the Court would have come to the conclusion it did if the facts had been there as they are here. Indeed, I infer quite the contrary from those two judgments. Finally, upon the third point, even if the case set up by Mr. Jay and Mrs. Fife be true, or what is the same, if their statements are believed, and the bankrupt be disbelieved; still, what the bankrupt has done was done before the statute came into operation, and, therefore, cannot possibly be said to come within the meaning of the 256th section of that act. For all these reasons, the bankrupt ought not to be deprived of his certificate, and the decision of the learned Commissioner should be reversed.

Mr. Bacon and Mr. Bayley, for the opposing creditors, were not called upon.

Mr. J. T. Wood appeared for both the official and creditors' assignees.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—This is another of those distressing cases with which we have to deal. It is an application by a party against the decision of the Commissioner for a certificate, which he thought it his duty to refuse. It is an extremely painful duty to have to perform, sitting in a civil matter, to adjudicate whether a punishment (for such in effect it is,) is or is not to be inflicted. I confess I think the Commissioner is right in refusing the certificate, on several grounds. In the first place, before the bankrupt can ask for a certificate, he should have conformed to the bankrupt law since his bankruptcy; he should have stated the truth and the whole truth respecting his estate, and I do not shrink from saying that here he has not done so. I do not believe the statements he has made.

There were two transactions relative to loans brought in question. The first was that of Mr. Jay. Now, if the question was, whether Mr. Jay could be considered as in any other light than a simple contract creditor, there might be doubt, because his subsequent conduct led to the conclusion that the 450*l.* advanced by Jay should be in the hands of Staner, to be as well secured as he could, on his (the bankrupt's) houses. That is not now the question; the real point is, what was the original transaction? Mr. Jay says, that he advanced his money to Staner originally on an undertaking that it should be invested on security; he says, that in a letter, which is now lost, Staner told him that it was to be invested on a mortgage of an estate of a Mr. Petley, but after many inquiries made by him, and many excuses made by Staner, the latter called on Mr. Jay, and told him the mortgage was at length completed, but he added that it was taken for 900*l.* or more, and that as he (the bankrupt) had advanced the greater proportion of the money, he would retain the mortgage in his own hands, and give Mr. Jay a security on his own property, and to this Mr. Jay acceded. As I have already stated, it is immaterial to consider whether that did or did not absolve the bankrupt from the former engagement. But the purpose for which I wish to consider it is this: what was the true transaction? If what the bankrupt has stated to be the true transaction is not so, then he has been deliberately stating what he knew to be untrue. Mr. Jay says it was a contract for a mortgage from Mr. Petley. The bankrupt says it was a loan to him on his promissory note. Looking at the documents, which statement do they bear out? The transaction opens by a letter in May, in which Staner tells Jay as to the state of the funds, recommending him to sell out, and adds: "Now, if you get this letter soon enough to have time to answer me to-night, do it in the following way: are you desirous to sell out if I can get you 5*l.* per cent. upon my own security? For what I expect it may be wanted for, is equal to that. Next, the amount: what would be convenient to invest? Your answer will be waited for by me, because if I can do this service I shall be very pleased, and do not always have the opportunity." Can any one understand that, otherwise than that he was proposing some security other than his own? Mr. Jay agrees to sell out, and letters pass as to the mode of transmitting the money by a registered letter, to which Mr. Jay objects, and then the bankrupt writes to him: "I take it for granted you will have the money on Friday. The security, you may rest assured, is of the most desirable character, or you should not have the investment. Leave that to me." Now, these are terms utterly irreconcilable with the notion that he was borrowing money on his own security. I come to the conclusion that Jay is a person to be believed, and that the bankrupt is to be disbelieved. One circumstance is important for the bankrupt, that it does not appear in writing that the name of the mortgagor was mentioned. Jay, however, says, it was mentioned in the lost letter; that was fairly a matter for observation, but I do not attach much importance to it, because what passed between those parties was by word of mouth, and a person desirous of manufacturing a story which is untrue, would more probably have put it on what passed by word of mouth, instead of referring it to a lost letter. I am, therefore, inclined to regard the circumstance as favourable, rather than otherwise, to the truth of the statement made by Jay. If the case relied on the evidence of Jay alone, I should have come to the conclusion that the bankrupt had wilfully intended to deceive his assignees and the parties interested in his estate, and had not conformed to the bankrupt laws.

(1) 17 Law Times, 55.

(2) 20 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 7.

The case does not rest here: there is another transaction; and if anything is to be gained by the maxim "noscitur à sociis," it is by its application to the present case. This transaction, of a similar character to the former, took place between the bankrupt and Mrs. Fife; and in this instance also we have had the advantage of seeing the demeanour and hearing the statement of Miss Fife and the bankrupt, and we have had the affidavit of her mother Mrs. Fife, who cannot be examined here orally, on account of her illness; and the bankrupt, who knows the evidence she gave before the Commissioner, and is probably aware that her cross-examination would not be favourable to him, did not wish that the matter should be delayed on that account. Now, what is the account given by the mother in her affidavit, and in a very straightforward manner by the young woman here to-day? Mrs. Fife lost her husband in 1849, leaving a little money, about 200*l.*, in the house. Staner knew them at Margate, and took, or professed to take, some interest in him and his family, and the widow and the daughter supposed him to be their only friend. He tendered his advice to them, and appointed to meet them at the London terminus of the Blackwall Railway by the hour he said, of ten o'clock on a certain day. The daughter says, and the mother states in her affidavit, that they went, and Staner asked them how they were left off, and was told that she had 200*l.*, and that was more money than she liked to have in the house. He said that it was unlucky he had not known it sooner, as he could have got it invested; that a Mr. Powell, of Quex-park, was just dead, that the Cottons were, therefore, in want of money, and that he could have got 5*l.* per cent. He then asked them how long it would take them to get the money, as perhaps it was not too late. He then promised to wait while they went for the money, and in the mean time to see if he could manage the matter. They went and got the money, and on their returning with it, he said, he had seen the party and was happy to say it was not too late, and that he could put the money to work directly. Then, relying upon him and his friendship, they put their all into his hands; he took it, and went away. The bankrupt denies all this, and that there was to be any security, except his own personal security. It is utterly incredible that the story told by the daughter of Mrs. Fife can be an invention; and it is strangely corroborated by the mode in which the bankrupt himself has answered the questions put to him regarding it. At first, he said, he did not recollect it: why he must have recollected it if it had occurred, and if it had been untrue, he would at once have contradicted it. When pressed with further questions, he seemed to feel his position, and then he denied the story to be true. A man may well say, "I do not recollect whether it rained this day fortnight," but he could not be heard to say, with any hope of belief, that he did not recollect whether a man gave him a blow, or did any other act of violence on that day. So, if he was speaking the truth, he would not in this transaction have said he did not recollect. We have the duty cast upon us, in this case, of saying whether we disbelieve this young woman, supported as she is by the affidavit of her mother (too ill to be examined), or to pay no attention to the oath of the bankrupt. I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, the bankrupt has told a deliberate and intentional falsehood, and that on that ground alone the certificate has been most properly refused him.

Further, I believe his debts to have been contracted by fraud, and in every way by means such as are not proper in the conduct of a trader. I do not think his application for his certificate is to be for one moment listened to, and I am of opinion that his petition must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—The agreement of Lord Cranworth with the decision of the learned Commissioner, would be an affirmation of it, whatever might be my own opinion; therefore, it would be unnecessary in me to state my view of the case, whatever that view may be. I think it right, however, not to abstain from stating what my opinion really is.

First, as to the law. It has been suggested, with great propriety, by Mr. Cooke, the learned and able counsel for the bankrupt, that even if the case set up by the opposing creditors were made out, it does not fall within the 256th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1849, because these particular facts having occurred, these acts having been done by the bankrupt before that statute, they cannot be said to come within its operation. For this no decision was cited; and considering the learning and experience of Mr. Cooke, the learned counsel who supports the bankrupt, I think I may take it that no case exists, and I state my opinion to be, that if this case comes otherwise within the act of parliament, it is not the less so because the conduct complained of took place before the passing of the statute.

Another observation made was, that the debt was not fraudulently contracted by the bankrupt in his trade, and that, therefore, it was not conduct in a trader within the meaning of the Bankrupt Act, and for this my decision in Wakefield's case was referred to and relied upon. My impression is different as to the effect of that case, and I think that such conduct would be conduct of a man in trade shewing him to be unworthy of that degree of estimation which ought to belong to one engaged in the transactions of commerce, or indeed in any other transactions of life. If in Wakefield's case I said anything contrary to this, I was wrong; but I do not think I so said. My impression has always been, and my opinion now is, that if a man in trade deals in the way alluded to, though not in the course of his trade, or in matters connected with his business, it is, for the purpose of such an application as the present, conduct of a man "as a trader" within the act of parliament. So far as to the law in this case.

There are two acts of the bankrupt impeached. How the matter would have stood if Jay's case had been the only one against the bankrupt I will not give any opinion, because it is not necessary; but I am satisfied on the evidence, so far as any one, subject to infirmity in judging, can be satisfied, on the comparison of a conflict of testimony by adverse witnesses, that the money of Mrs. Fife was obtained from her unfairly, improperly, and fraudulently. A state of things was represented to her and her daughter, who has been examined, which did not exist; they were ignorant (I do not use the term in an offensive sense) and helpless women, whom this tradesman, who professed to be their friend, ought to have assisted, advised, and supported, and if he saw they were about to commit an act of imprudence, he ought to have prevented them; at all events, he ought to have told them the exact truth. He allowed them, however, to part with their money in a mistake, which he might have prevented. I come to the conclusion, then, on the evidence, that the bankrupt contracted a debt with Mrs. Fife by fraud and on false pretences.

Considering that I come to that conclusion, and considering the 256th section of the Bankrupt Act, I am to ask myself, whether a man capable of committing this single act as to these women, is worthy to receive what I have called a passport to enter into trade again without paying his debts. I am of opinion that he is not, and on the ground of his conduct to these helpless women alone, I refuse him his certificate. Let the petition be dismissed, and the costs of the assignees and opposing creditor only come out of the estate.

Ex parte BOWER, in re BOWERS.

Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849
—"Trader Debtor"—Summons—Particulars of Demand.

A creditor, a wholesale dealer, issued a summons under the 78th section of the act, demanding payment of money due from a retail dealer in the same line of business, and described the items in the particulars of demand as "goods." Held, that this described with sufficient certainty the wares supplied, so as to prevent the annulling of the adjudication on the ground of uncertainty.

The situation of parties and nature of demand are to be considered in determining what is convenient certainty.

A doubt on the legal validity of an adjudication is not sufficient ground for annulling it.

The contest between John Bowers, of Worcester, grocer, and John Bower, of London, fruit-merchant, is detailed in the case of Ex parte Bowers, ante, p. 18. John Bowers appeared before the district court, at Birmingham, and shewed cause against the adjudication on the ground, among other grounds, that the particulars of demand served by John Bower, his creditor, were insufficient within the 78th section of the Bankrupt Act. After two adjournments, the question was gone into by Mr. Commissioner Balguy on the 2nd of February 1852, when John Bowers attended, and upon examination deposed as follows:—"I purchased the goods of the petitioning creditor at two months' credit, and received an invoice, which had at the top of it the words 'cash in two months'; I gave the petitioning creditor a bill, which I had received from a customer, for 29*l.* 17*s.*, and paid the 7*l.* balance, and the two months' credit had not expired when the notice of demand was made upon me." The Commissioner annulled the adjudication; but in the memorandum made by him, the reason assigned did not in any way relate to the point of the time of credit not having expired, nor to the question, whether the particulars of demand were sufficient. The particulars of demand were as follows:—

 “The Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. Particulars of demand and notice requiring payment. To John Bowers, of the city of Worcester, in the county of Worcestershire, grocer, dealer and chapman. The following are the particulars of the demand of the undersigned, John Bower, of No. 8, Botolph Lane, in the city of London, fruit-merchant, against you, the said John Bowers, amounting to the sum of 66*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*

Take notice that I, the said John Bower, hereby require immediate payment of the said sum of 66*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.* Dated this 2nd day of December, in the year of our Lord 1851. (Signed) John Bower, carrying on business at No. 8, Botolph Lane, in the city of London.”

The petitioning creditor, John Bower, appealed from the decision of the Commissioner annulling the adjudication. The case was argued on several points; but this report is confined to that arising on the sufficiency of the particulars of demand.

Sir W. P. Wood and Mr. Baggallay opened the appeal; but the Court called upon

Mr. Swanston, who appeared for the trader debtor.—The whole of this adjudication is invalid, and, among other reasons, because of the defective condition of the particulars of demand. The rule of the Court is, that the particulars of demand must be reasonably certain in order to enable the debtor, or alleged debtor, to ascertain the nature of the items, and therefore whether he is indebted at all. This was so held in Ex parte Greenstock (1), from which case it is plain that the alleged debtor has a right to have this reasonable certainty in the particulars of demand, so that he may see the nature of the items, and that if any means exist of producing evidence to shew such items, or any of them, to be wrong, the alleged debtor may have an opportunity of producing it.

[LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—I do not hear it said that the bankrupt in this case was misled by the particulars of demand. Does he swear that he was?]

[LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—Particulars of demand in one case, and between one man and another would be good and sufficient, which between one of those men and a third would be otherwise. Suppose the case of a debtor and creditor, one set of particulars would be enough, while between the executors of the debtor and the creditor it would not. Can any general rule be laid down applicable to every case? I think not. Convenient certainty must be construed with reference to the information which the person, to whom the particulars are sent, already has.]

The bankrupt, it must be admitted, has made no such affidavits, nor is it in any manner shewn that he was actually misled, but still it is to be observed, that in the particulars there is no degree of certainty whatever. There is, to be sure, a vague and general description, and under it any demand might be set up against the debtor, and he would have no opportunity of defending himself, while the rules and practice of the Court require a reasonable and convenient certainty as to dates.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—Reference having been made during the argument to the case of Ex parte Greenstock, it may not be out of place to observe, that whether all the reasons given for the judgment in that case are sustainable or not, the conclusion appears to have been correct, namely, that it would have been better that there should not have been an adjudication upon the materials which then existed. The amount of the demand was 132*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* Now, it was requisite, with reference to what had been sworn upon the affidavit, that the whole of this should appear to be for goods sold and delivered. But upon the amount set out in the particulars of demand, as much as 122*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*

(1) 15 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Bankr. 5; s. c. 1 De Gex, 233.

of the total amount was due for bills returned, and interest upon those bills, which (however the truth might have been) were not shewn upon the particulars of demand to have been given for goods sold and delivered. Therefore, out of 132*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* the particulars were, as to so large a portion as 122*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, plainly defective with reference to the affidavit. With regard to the small remaining portion of the debt, being 10*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.* only, it was doubtful whether the dates were sufficiently set forth. I agree that the date 1845 was set at the head of the particulars; but when the separate items were looked at, if all of them belonged to the year 1845, they were not chronologically arranged, and this gave rise to a doubt as to what debts were meant. There were items in September and October, and then one in August. Now, I was not persuaded that it was a necessary inference from an account so prepared, that the month of August 1845, so placed below and separate from September and October, was the month meant. If that were so, the adjudication would on that ground have been insufficiently supported. But if it could have been legally supported, still this jurisdiction is not bound to suffer every adjudication which may be legally valid, to remain; and I am of opinion that the Court there rightly exercised its jurisdiction, in declining to give effect to the proceeding relied upon as the foundation of an act of bankruptcy. All the reasons there assigned for the decision may possibly not be sustainable; upon that point I give no opinion. But I adhere to the conclusion.

In the present case, several objections have been made to the proceedings relied upon as the foundation of an act of bankruptcy. The most serious objection appears to me that founded on the form of the particulars of demand, which is a point on which the decision of the Commissioner did not proceed, or is not expressed to proceed. It appears to me that a set of particulars of demand sent out by a trader to one individual may be sufficient, which would have been insufficient if sent to another, although the demands were the same. The question in each case must be, whether the particulars communicate a reasonably sufficient degree of information to the alleged debtor as to the demand. Now, in Ex parte Greenstock, the information may or may not have been sufficient. But in this case, considering what goods have been furnished,—considering the station in life of the alleged debtor and creditor, and the words of the particulars of demand, my impression is that they were sufficient in the particular circumstances of this case. And I am of opinion that the particulars are not vitiated legally because they contained one claim which is not sustainable, either because the debt claimed is not due at all, or because it is not actually due at the time of the demand, whatever effect such an error ought to have in the exercise of the discretion of the Court upon an application not made ex debito justitiæ. So much for the legal points in the case, on which the inclination of my opinion is against the objection made to the adjudication.

The Commissioner, however, was here executing a jurisdiction given by the 104th section of the recent act of parliament. Now, suppose this case to arise (which occurred frequently in former states of the bankrupt law), that the validity of the bankruptcy being in question before a Court having jurisdiction to annul it, the legal validity being doubtful, in such a case under the former law, the Court having this jurisdiction was more in the habit of annulling,—unless there were some circumstances to induce the Court so to exercise its discretion beyond the legal doubt. If there were no such circumstance, the legal doubt was not sufficient ground for annulling,—for this reason, that the mischief arising from the continuance of the bankruptcy, if unsupported by legal requisites, was remediable, whereas that arising from annulling the proceedings, if it was valid, was irremediable. Now, I consider that the Court is, at least, in the position which I have described, in the present case. There is an arguable objection against the validity of the adjudication in point of law; but I am not only not satisfied that the objection is sustainable, but the inclination of my opinion is against its sufficiency. Therefore, as I apprehend, it is not the duty of this Court to annul the adjudication; but the proper course is to leave the bankrupt to question the adjudication as he may think fit, giving him every facility to proceed at law for that purpose. Here every consideration, as to the consequences of annulling the bankruptcy, seems to be against taking that step. The result is that, in my opinion, so far as this objection is concerned, the adjudication must stand unreversed.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH was of the same opinion, and the appeal was dismissed.

LORDS JUSTICES. { Ex parte NICHOLAS, in re
1852. THE MONMOUTHSHIRE
July 29. AND GLAMORGANSHIRE
BANKING COMPANY.

Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Act, 1849—Proof—Separate Creditors—Official Manager.

A. B. was a shareholder in a joint-stock banking company, which stopped payment. He became bankrupt, and afterwards, before he obtained his certificate, an order for the winding up the affairs of the banking company was obtained, and, subsequently, he obtained his certificate. The Commissioner in Bankruptcy declined to permit the official manager to prove for the amount of calls on the bankrupt's shares; but the Court held that, under the 14th and 30th sections of the Winding-up Act of 1849, the official manager was entitled to go in, and prove for the amount of calls in competition with his separate creditors.

This case came before the Court of Review in a twofold character,—one as being under the bankruptcy; and the other, under the winding-up order, made in the matter of the above-mentioned company. The facts were shortly these; and they were confined to the question under the bankruptcy.

Mr. Jacob Jenkins Nicholas, of Newport, Monmouthshire, was a shareholder in the Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire Bank, in which he was the holder of fifty shares. The bank stopped payment on the 6th of October 1851; and, on the 6th of November, Mr. Nicholas was adjudged a bankrupt, on a petition of adjudication presented against him. On the 12th of January 1852 an order was made under the Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts, for winding up the affairs of the company. On the 7th of February following, the bankrupt obtained his certificate; and, on the same day, a dividend of 10s. 6d. in the pound was declared on his estate. His name was excluded from the list of contributories—on the authority, it was said, of the case of Ex parte Chappell—(1), on the settling of the list; but, subsequently, and on the 27th of April, a call was made of 60l. on each contributory of the company, and among them on the bankrupt, “in respect of fifty shares, with the qualification of a certificated bankrupt not personally liable, but included in the list for the purpose of being represented by his assignees, and for the purpose of enabling the official manager to tender proof of calls in the matter of his bankruptcy in respect of fifty shares.” The Master then ordered that the official manager should attend any meeting in the matter of the bankruptcy, to prove, or tender a proof against the estate of the bankrupt, “for the balance, if any, which shall be found due from the said Jacob Jenkins Nicholas, after debiting his account in the company's books with such call upon the said fifty shares.” The official manager, in obedience to this order, tendered a proof for 3,000l.; but the Commissioner declined to admit the proof, without the sanction of the Court.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. W. M. James, for the official manager, in support of the right to prove, cited the cases of Steward v. Greaves (2) and Davison v. Farmer (3).

Mr. Roundell Palmer and Mr. Karslake, for the assignees.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—These applications, the one in the bankruptcy of Mr. Jacob Jenkins Nicholas, and the other under a winding-up order that applies to a joint-stock company, of which Mr. Nicholas was a shareholder, raise substantially this only question,—whether by the effect of the acts of parliament, called the “Winding-up Acts," the general separate creditors of a bankrupt, who happens to hold shares in a joint-stock company, which is made liable to the operation of these acts, are placed in a different position from separate creditors of any other person engaged in a mercantile partnership. The question is, not whether there ought to be an alteration, nor whether there are grounds or reasons for making it, but whether the legislature has said it shall be so, in language not to be mistaken. Now, the case stands thus: Mr. Nicholas was unfortunately a shareholder in one, I believe, of the most wretched of the joint-stock companies in its results, which stopped payment on the 6th of October 1851. At the time of the stoppage Mr. Nicholas had not become a bankrupt; he became a bankrupt afterwards, and, after that event, but before his certificate, a winding-up order was made, and, after the winding-up order was made, his certificate was obtained; it is now contended by or on behalf of the official manager of the company, that a call made in respect of the shares which this bankrupt held before his bankruptcy is to be treated for every purpose as a separate debt of the bankrupt in the administration of his estate,—a startling proposition, certainly to any person who has not his attention called to the details of these acts of parliament.

It is clear that, independently of these acts of parliament, according to all the ordinary law relating to bankruptcy, proof could not be made in competition with the separate creditors. It could not be made on behalf of the partners in the joint-stock company, because all the debts are not paid by the partners; according to the law in ordinary cases it could not be done. If, therefore, general separate creditors are to suffer, it is on the ground of a particular law created by these acts. The case seems, to myself and to my learned Brother, to turn entirely upon the 14th and 30th sections of the Winding-up Act of 1849. By the 14th section it is enacted, "That if any contributory or alleged contributory be a bankrupt or insolvent, he shall be entitled to attend by his assignees, and in all proceedings against his estate under the said act shall be sufficiently represented by such assignees."

By the 30th section it is enacted, "That where any contributory of the company is a bankrupt or insolvent, it shall be lawful for the official manager to prove in the matter of such bankruptcy or insolvency for any balance ordered by the Master to be proved against the estate of such contributory, and to take and receive dividends in respect of such balance in the matter of the bankruptcy or insolvency as a separate debt due from such bankrupt or insolvent, and rateably with the other separate creditors: Provided always, that if any creditors of the company, not being such petitioning creditor under the fiat as after mentioned, shall have proved or shall prove against the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory in respect of any debt due from the company, then the dividends received by the official manager from the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory shall be paid and distributed by the official manager, under the direction of the Master, in the first instance, rateably amongst the creditors of the company so proving against the estate of such bankrupt or insolvent contributory as aforesaid, until the debts due to such creditors respectively be fully paid, and, subject thereto, such dividends shall be applied by the official managers towards the general purposes of the winding up of the affairs of the company: Provided also, that in case any such fiat shall have been issued on the petition of a joint creditor of the said company in respect of his joint debt, and he shall have proved such joint debt for the purpose of receiving dividends under such fiat, then any dividends paid to such petitioning creditor under such proof shall be set against the dividends payable to such official manager in respect of the proof so made by him as aforesaid, so far as the same will extend." It is difficult to surmount these words; but it has been contended that this act does not apply to a case of this description, where the bankruptcy has taken place before the winding-up order. As I have already said, the word "is" cannot be construed literally; it means "shall be," or, "may happen to be." According to the construction offered on the part of the assignees, the word ought to be rather "becomes." The bankruptcy did not relieve this gentleman from his liabilities; he was as liable at the moment of the winding-up order as ever, and so is his estate now. He was liable, because he had no certificate. The estate is liable, because it was liable before bankruptcy. This act clearly changes the law of the country as to particular persons under circumstances which I do not understand; but our business is to construe it. I fear the rights of these persons are changed by the legislature. The latter clauses are, perhaps, locus communis, and afford an argument each way; but the argument preponderates in favour of the view taken by the official manager. It is true they are not provisions which seem to be well or correctly adapted to any theory or any practice that ever prevailed in the country; but it is very unsafe to rely on such words as contravene language so clear as the provisions of these sections. I feel myself, therefore, obliged to say with regret, that this demand has been directed by the law of the country to come in competition with the separate creditors, so that they are placed in a different position from any other separate creditors.

LORD JUSTICE LORD CRANWORTH.—I concur in arriving at the same result, and with the same degree of regret. Whatever the date of the bankruptcy, there is the same anomaly, if the separate creditors are put on a different footing from that in which they would have stood, if the act had not passed. It is difficult to believe the legislature intended to put them in a different position; but it is our duty to consider the language of the act, which we cannot construe in any other way.

CASES IN CHANCERY AND BANKRUPTCY,

LAW JOURNAL REPORTS,

CHANCERY.

Accountant General. See Judgment.

Accumulations—Testator gave residue of personal estate to trustees, in trust to invest and accumulate income during life of his niece, and after her death to transfer securities and accumulations to her children in equal shares, shares of male children to be vested at twenty-one, and those of females at twenty-one or marriage. Then followed other provisions with regard to what testator sometimes called "portions" and sometimes "shares" of such children, as to maintenance and education, and if trusts for benefit of children of his niece should fail, there were similar trusts for benefit of children and issue of other parties, and failing those trusts, for his own next-of-kin. Testator's niece still living, and had survived twenty-one years from death of testator. This provision not one for raising portions within 2nd section of the Thellusson Act: from expiration of twenty-one years from testator's death, trust for accumulation void; and from that time till death of niece, legal personal representative of testator entitled to accumulations. Bourne v. Buckton, 193

Acquiescence. See Injunction.

Administration of Estate—Creditors' suit coming on for further directions, fund applicable to payment of debts being small, reference back to Master to apportion it between creditors dispensed with, and apportionment directed to be made by affidavit. Creditor, who had brought action against executor of a debtor, received notice of decree for administration of his estates. After this notice, and before any application was made to stay his proceedings, he went on with action, and obtained judgment. He was entitled to costs of his proceedings after notice of decree. Bear v. Smith, 176

— Testator directed his debts to be paid out of a fund afterwards provided; he directed his real estate to be sold, and out of the produce his debts and funeral expenses to be paid, the residue to be held by trustees upon certain trusts; he afterwards gave certain legacies and annuities; and he then bequeathed his personal estate, "after and subject to the payment of his debts, funeral expenses, legacies and annuities," to the party chiefly interested under those trusts, absolutely. Personal estate the primary fund for payment of debts. Doctrine of marshalling applicable in favour of legatees and annuitants, who were, therefore, decreed to stand in place of creditors as against real estate devised in trust for sale, and payment of debts. Paterson v. Scott, 346

— In suit to administer trusts of a will, receiver was directed to pay all insurance monies and other outgoings in respect of a particular estate. Certain stables attached to the mansion-house were burned down, and as it was not thought desirable to rebuild them, the money received from the insurance office was paid into court. Petitioner, who was afterwards declared by the Court to be tenant in tail of the estate, was entitled to the insurance money, and it was not to be applied for benefit of the estate generally. *Seymour v. Alienation—If there is a valid gift over on alienation by one entitled to a life interest in personalty, it will take effect on insolvency, and the interest of the insolvent will not pass to his assignee. Rockford v. Hackman, 511

— Stock was standing in names of A. and B, mother and daughter, as trustees for A. for life, remainder for B. absolutely. B, in contemplation of marriage, assigned her interest, subject to A.'s life interest, to trustees, upon trust for herself and her intended husband, for life, and then upon trusts for issue of the marriage, and for C, a niece of B, and her issue, as B. should appoint, and in default of appointment, among them equally. And it was provided that, if there should be no issue of the marriage, or none who should attain a vested interest, then as to 5,000*l.*, part of the fund, and 600*l.* long annuities, subject to a life estate, the same should be in trust for C. absolutely, to be vested at twenty-one. A. had notice of the settlement, but was not a party to it. No transfer of the fund was made. The marriage was solemnized, but no issue was born, and the husband died. B. contracted a second marriage, and in contemplation of it she assigned her interest, subject to A.'s life interest, to trustees upon trust for her benefit for life, and then upon trusts for C. (the niece) and the issue of the second marriage, as she (B.) should appoint by will, and in default of appointment among issue of the marriage equally, and in default of issue, as to 5,000*l.*, part of the fund, for C. absolutely. No transfer of the fund was made. The marriage was solemnized, and one child was born, and then the second husband died. A, the mother, the original tenant for life, then died, and the fund was still standing in the names of A. and B. C, the niece, married, and a suit was instituted by trustees of first settlement, and by C, and her husband, against B, trustee of second settlement, and the child of second marriage, praying a transfer of 5,000*l.* to trustees of first settlement, and an injunction to restrain the transfer of the fund by B. to trustees of second settlement. Bill dismissed in court below; but, on appeal, it was held that, whether or not the first settlement was voluntary (which the Court did not decide) as to the trusts in favour of C, the niece, still it was a complete alienation of the fund by B, and the decree below was reversed, a transfer being directed as prayed. Kekewich v. Manning, 577

Annuity—Testator, by will, gave to E. L. 50*l.* per year "for she and her children, and after her decease the money shall be paid to each of them as they attain the age of one and twenty; but if either of them die, to be paid to the survivor." This a bequest of a perpetual annuity. Potter v. Baker, 11

—Testator gave an annuity of 100*l.* to his son for life, who died, leaving a child him surviving; he continued the same annuity for such child's benefit, to be paid to his or her mother. Upon appeal, reversing decision of Court below, son's child took annuity for life only, to be paid, during minority, to mother. Yates v. Madden, 24

—An annuity of 600*l.* given by a father to a son, by will, and made payable generally out of the rents of real estate, is no satisfaction of an annuity given by deed and charged upon real estate. The gift of an annuity "clear of legacy duty and every other deduction whatsoever," or "without any deduction for legacy duty or otherwise," will not authorize the payment of the income-tax out of the testator's estate. *Lethbridge v. —By order entitled in a cause and in the matter of the Trustee Act, A. was ordered to transfer a sum of money into court. Affidavit of service of this order on A. was entitled in the cause only. A. was committed for contempt for refusing to obey the order. The attachment was discharged for irregularity, on ground of difference between title of order and title of affidavit. *Mackenzie v. Banker and Banking Company—Plaintiff, being owner of an estate, employed an agent and receiver, who paid into defendants' bank rents of estate, to an account headed with name of estate, to distinguish it from his private account. Receiver's private account being overdrawn, he transferred the balance of estate account to make up the deficiency due upon his private account. Upon bill filed by plaintiff, against bankers, to refund this balance so transferred, it was held, that, according to the principles of a court of equity, a person who deals with another knowing him to have in his hands, or under his controul, monies belonging to a third person, must not enter into a transaction with him, the effect of which is that a fraud is committed on the third person; and it appearing upon the evidence that the bankers were aware that the money was the produce of the rents of the plaintiff's estate, a decree was made against the bankers, for repayment of the amount. Bodenham v. Hoskins, 864

—In April 1847, joint-stock banking company, carrying on business under provisions of 7 Geo. 4. c. 46, of which A. was a member, became indebted to B. in 5,000*l.* A. continued to be partner until his death, and died in December 1847. In April 1848 B. recovered judgment against public officer of company. In December 1848, usual decree for accounts made in a suit for administration of estate of A. B. presented a petition for liberty to go in before the Master to prove, as a creditor against A.'s estate, for 5,000*l.* and interest. Petition did not state that bank had ceased to carry on business, or that any proceedings had been taken to enforce judgment against existing partners. Petition dismissed. Heward v. Wheatley, 854

Bankrupt—Quare, as to the effect of a conditional order for protection under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, as to vesting assets of insolvent in official assignee. In re Dalton's Settlement, 681

Baron and Feme—Trusts of a bond debt due to A, a married woman, were declared to be for A. for life, for separate use, with remainder for such persons as A. should by deed, to be executed by her, in presence of two witnesses, appoint, with remainders over. B, the husband of A, was indebted to C. A. signed a letter without any attestation, which contained a declaration that she deposited the bond as a collateral security to C. for debt due to him from B, and the letter and bond were given to C. In suit to enforce C.'s lien on the bond, it was held, first, that A.'s life interest in bond was bound by letter; but, secondly, that Court would not, in C.'s favour, supply defect in execution of power. Thackwell v. Gardiner, 777

—Upon marriage of infant the husband by antenuptial settlement covenanted that upon his wife attaining twenty-one, he would join with her, if she would consent thereto, in settling upon her and children of marriage certain property to which she would become entitled for separate use. The wife attained twenty-one, and refused to join in settling the property. Settlement inoperative. In re Waring, 784

— A married woman instituted a suit against her husband in respect of property come to his hands, which she claimed as belonging to her, and tendered her evidence in the suit. Evidence not admissible. Alcock v. Alcock, 856

— A, husband of B, to whom share of residue of testator's estate had been bequeathed, assigned it to C. for valuable consideration. Stock representing this share was carried to account of B. in a suit. The proper terms of settlement of part allowed to B, by way of equity of settlement, were held to be to B. for life, with remainder to her children as she should appoint, with remainder to children in default of appointment, and in default of children, if B. should survive A, to B. absolutely; but, if A. should survive B, to C. Court has power to direct that, in last event, fund shall be at disposal of wife by will; and that in default of such disposition, it shall go to next-of-kin of B; but special case must be made for such settlement, and circumstances that B. has needy relatives not sufficient to justify it. Carter v. Taggart, 215

— Wife's equity to settlement does not depend upon her right of property, but only attaches to and arises upon her husband's legal right to present possession of property. Therefore a settlement cannot be claimed in respect of reversionary interest in property so long as such interest continues reversionary. Osborn v. Morgan, 318

— Under will of testator a married woman was entitled to 600*l.* and upwards, and a share in sum set apart to answer life annuity amounting to 346*l.* In administration suit the 600*l.* was paid to husband, with consent of wife. Husband and wife then joined in assigning their reversionary interest in annuity fund for value, and assignees procured a stop-order upon the fund. On death of annuitant, wife petitioned for settlement of fund. Wife entitled to have whole fund settled on herself and children, husband being insolvent and having made no settlement upon her; claim of wife properly raised by petition; and assignees, though no parties to administration suit, had, by obtaining stop order, sufficiently brought themselves before the Court to enable it to deal with the fund upon petition. Scott v. Spashett, 349

— Suit by feme covert in respect of her separate estate, in which her husband was named as defendant. Plaintiff proved at hearing that her husband was out of the jurisdiction. Suit properly constituted. Monday v. Waghorn, 353

— A sum of stock was vested in trustees upon trust to pay dividends to A. a married woman, for her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and, after her decease, to pay capital to B. On petition of A. and B. Court ordered transfer of a portion of the stock to B, and sale of such other portion as would be sufficient to purchase a government annuity equal to dividends of two sums of stock, and that sum thereby produced should be laid out in purchase of such annuity, to be settled on A. for her separate use, without power of anticipation. Dodd v. Wake, 356

— An heiress-at-law being a married woman cannot contract not to have a cause re-heard, nor can she by her conduct be in any way bound, nor can her consent inserted in an order establishing a will in any way prejudice her right. Petition of re-hearing restored to the file. Decree varied by striking out the consent of the heiress-at-law, and adding words reserving to her, if she should survive her husband, and to her heirs if she should die in his lifetime, the right to dispute the will; but although the decree was inoperative against the heiress-at-law to bind her inheritance, it was conclusive as against the husband as tenant by the courtesy to the extent of his estate; the decree being, in fact, a bargain that all his and his wife's costs, to which he was alone liable, should be costs in the cause, he agreeing that they would no longer dispute the will. Turner v. Turner, 422

— Deeds of gift by a wife to her husband of property over which she has a power of appointment are regarded by the Court with jealousy, and inquiries will be directed as to the circumstances under which they were executed. If such deed is afterwards impeached by the wife, the burden lies on her of shewing that the circumstances were such as ought to invalidate it, and the burden does not lie on the husband of shewing that the circumstances were such that it ought to be supported. What circumstances will invalidate such deeds. An inquiry was directed to be made by the Master; the Master made his report, which was not excepted to. The parties were held to be at liberty, at the hearing of the cause for further directions, to refer to affidavits and other materials used before the Master on his inquiry. Nedby v. Nedby, 446

— See Attachment. Costs. Deed. Legacy Duty. Payment out of Court. Solicitor and Client.

Bill—Defendant having never been in this country, and there being doubt as to the information given him, he could not be deemed to have absconded to avoid answering, or to have refused to obey the order of the Court: and an application to take the bill pro confesso, as against him, was refused. Zulueta v. Vincent, 415

Bill, Dismissal of—New next friend of feme covert having been substituted, old next friend ordered to give security for costs up to the time of his appointment, and proceedings stayed in mean time. No security having been given, it was asked that in default of its being completed within limited time, bill might be dismissed, with costs. Application refused. Payne v. Little, 718

Bill pro Confesso—An order of Court duly served on a defendant is a sufficient notice under the 86th and 87th Orders of May 1845, Ord. Can. 315, 317, to enable the Court to make a decree absolute on a bill taken pro confesso. Trilley v. Keefe, 914

Bond—Circumstances under which a bond was held to be void as being obtained by undue influence and upon a suppression of facts, and was ordered to be delivered up to be cancelled, with costs to be paid by party in whose favour it was made. Cooke v. Lamotte; Lamotte v. Cooke, 871

Bond Creditors—only entitled to prove for the amount of the penalties in their bonds. Cloves v. Waters, 840

Borough Fund. See Municipal Corporation.

Building Societies—Power of trustees to institute suit to obtain conveyance of estate purchased out of funds of society through a shareholder as their agent, though purchase alleged to be illegal and contrary to act of parliament and rules of society. Suit instituted by trustees authorising purchase, on behalf of themselves and all other members and shareholders of society, sufficient, without bringing all the members before the Court to consent to the purchase. Jurisdiction of Court of Chancery not ousted by appointment of separate jurisdiction for regulation of affairs of these societies. Mallock v. Jenkins, 65

Calls. See Winding-up Acts.

Chapel—Chapel founded in England, and services therein performed according to mode of worship in Established Church of Scotland.—Held, that no person could enjoy office of minister who was disqualified to be minister of Established Church of Scotland: and minister who had become so disqualified ordered to be removed, and trustees who co-operated with him also removed, and he and they ordered to pay costs of suit. Lord Chief Justice Cranworth dissenting from part of decree of Court below, declaring that "no minister or other person was qualified for, or competent to exercise, office of minister or pastor without being a licentiate and recognized minister of Established Church of Scotland, and in full connexion therewith." Application to suspend execution of decree of Court below, pending an intended appeal to House of Lords, refused. Attorney General v. Murdoch, 694

Charge. See Contempt. Power of Sale.

Charity—A bequest made as an inducement to third parties to convey land in mortmain, and not to take effect unless land should be conveyed accordingly, is void. A bequest which tends directly to bring fresh lands into mortmain is void. And a bequest of money to be expended in erection or repair of buildings is void, unless an intention is clearly expressed that the money is to be expended upon land already in mortmain. The validity or invalidity of deeds must for all purposes date from their execution. Trye v. Corporation of Gloucester, 81

—Construction of charitable bequest. Words "education and learning" read "education in learning." Statute 9 Geo. 4. c. 83, which provides, that all laws and statutes of the realm shall be enforced in the administration of justice so far as the same can be applied, means "reasonably applied," and the statute 9 Geo. 2. c. 36. is inapplicable to lands in New South Wales. Whicker v. Hume, 406

—Protection of the interests of a large body of persons upon application for a scheme. Ex parte the Mayor, &c. of Lincoln, 821

—Court will sanction sale of piece of land, which in 1747 was purchased by trustees with charitable funds and conveyed to them, it being plainly advantageous to the charity. It will also sanction re-investment of money in real estate; and Court will confer upon trustees powers to perpetuate themselves, as well as to lease land, there being such powers in deed conveying land to trustees originally purchasing. Ex parte Overseers of Poor of Ecclesall Bierlow, 729

—A claim to participate in charity funds, which had been appropriated for 240 years to certain parishes, ought to be brought before the Court by information and not by petition, under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act, 52 Geo. 3. c. 101. In re Magdalen Land Charity, 874

Chose in Action. See Mortgage.

Church—Rector justified in cutting timber, provided he specifically apply it to repairs of rectory-house and buildings on the glebe; but not in cutting timber and selling it. That rector had applied larger sum in repairs of rectory-house than proceeds of sale of timber cut by him, not an answer to a case made against him of cutting and selling timber, in suit instituted by the patron. Marlborough v. St. John, 381

Claims—Upon claim by equitable mortgagee against mortgagor, asking for sale, and also that several other mortgagees might be summoned before Master, or decree made to ascertain what mortgages there were, and their priorities, Court refused the order. Burgess v. Sturgis, 53

—Widow of deceased debtor having, without letters of administration, got in all the assets of her husband and compounded with his creditors, upon claim by creditor to obtain payment of a debt due to him in full, a legal personal representative of intestate ought to be made a party; leave given to amend. Crescor v. Robinson, 64

—A claim not stating all the facts of the case within plaintiff's knowledge liable to be dismissed, with costs, and if plaintiff withholds those facts and takes the chance of relief from what may turn up from the affidavits, Court will not adjudicate upon claim. Goode v. West, 127

—Errors having been committed in carrying out proceedings under original claim, leave given to file supplemental claim. Naylor v. Robson, 280 —Testator dying in the Mauritius appointed executors in that country, and left residue of his property to his mother in England. The executors in the Mauritius transmitted residue to England, but the mother of testator having died, the amount was paid to her executors, who paid all her debts exceeding the amount to which she became entitled from testator's estate. Plaintiff was a creditor of testator, and filed a claim to obtain payment of his debt, or to have testator's estate administered. The Mauritius executors were improperly made parties to this claim, and plaintiff could not have relief against executors of testator's mother without having legal personal representative of testator constituted in this country, a party to the suit. Silver v. Stein, 312

—On hearing of appeal from the whole order, made at hearing of a suit by claim, the same rule is followed as to opening as on appeal from the whole decree made in suit by bill. Sims v. Helling, 387

—At the hearing of a foreclosure claim, an issue was directed as to a question of notice, which issue was afterwards abandoned by the defendant. Before the claim could come on again for hearing, an order must be made on motion, that the issue should be taken pro confesso. Hartland v. Dancox, 449

—The joining in a claim parties whose interest is contingent, to ask for the preservation of a fund is not multifarious, or a misjoinder of parties. Quære—If an objection to a claim is to be raised by motion to take it off the file. Davis v. Davis, 543

Colonial Law—Mortgagor, resident in this country mortgaged, by deed executed in England, to mortgagees, also resident here, real estate in Demerara, and before mortgagees completed their title to mortgaged property according to laws of Demerara, mortgagor became bankrupt, and his assignees in this country sold the property and received the proceeds. Quære—Whether the rights of the contracting parties have ceased to be governed by the law of Demerara, the lex loci rei sitæ, and must be governed by the law of this country, the lex loci contractus. Waterhouse v. Stansfield, 881

Company—Plaintiff filed a bill on behalf of himself and the other shareholders in a company against the persons forming the financial committee, praying that an account might be taken of all monies received by defendants in respect of deposits upon shares, and an account of costs and expenses incurred by them, and that the amount due to plaintiff and the other shareholders, after giving credit for monies paid by them, might be distributed rateably amongst the shareholders. Upon demurrer to the bill, the fact of defendants having already rendered an account was held not to preclude plaintiff from having an account taken under authority of the Court; and that the remedy provided for these cases by the Winding-up Acts did not take away plaintiff's right to file a bill for a similar purpose. On demurrer as to parties, it was held that as all the shareholders had a common interest the plaintiff might without their consent file a bill on behalf of all, and that as the financial committee were the only persons alleged by the bill to have had power over the funds of the company, it was not necessary to make any other persons who might have acted as directors parties to the suit. Clements v. Bowes, 306

— Observations on the difficulty of applying the doctrine of acquiescence to joint-stock companies. Where partnerships, as in the case of joint-stock companies, consist of a great number of individuals, the Court will hold them in their transactions strictly to the terms of the partnership contract. In re Vale of Neath and South Wales Brewery Joint-Stock Co. ex parte Laves, 688

— Money paid into court in respect of lands taken by company from persons under disability, and with exception of a small surplus, afterwards laid out in purchase of lands settled to same uses. Court will allow surplus to be paid to tenant for life, if under 20 $\frac{1}{2}$, but not otherwise. In re Batesman's Estate, 691

Composition Deed—W. D. by deed, agreed to guarantee a composition of 8s. in the pound to all creditors of his brother who should execute a release of their debts by a day named. A, a creditor, failed to execute the release by the day named, in consequence, as he alleged, of a parol agreement between him and the agent of W. D. that he should be allowed to postpone his execution until after certain legal proceedings against third parties, the result of which might influence the amount of his debt. Upon bill by A, for specific performance, W. D. by his answer, denied any such agreement. The condition not being performed, the agreement never took effect as to A; and, further, the agreement being to pay the debt of a third person was within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and any alteration in its terms must be evidenced by writing; and no fraud being alleged, a parol agreement, if proved, would not be binding. Emmet v. Dewhurst, 497

Contempt—A party in contempt in a suit in another branch of the Court will be ordered to be brought up if wanted for examination. Hill v. Travis, 541

— Judgment having been entered up against a beneficed clergyman for a debt, the Court held it a charge upon the benefice, and that creditor entitled to have receiver of profits of benefice appointed. Another creditor of the clergyman obtained judgment upon his debt, and issued a writ of sequestration directed to the receiver already appointed. Upon motion to commit the second creditor for contempt, it was held that upon his undertaking to deal with the tithes as the Court should direct, and pay costs of the motion, no order should be made. Hawkins v. Gathercole, 617

Contract—In construing contracts, what the Court has to ascertain is the real meaning of the words of the contract, which are to be construed most strictly against the contracting party. Contracts for marriage portions cannot be enforced unless something definite or specific is mentioned as to the sum. What is sufficient evidence of marriage on the faith of a particular sum being given by will. Moorhouse v. Colvin, 177

— A father bound himself to give his daughter a marriage portion of 2,000 $\frac{1}{2}$ l., and said that she was and should be noticed in his will. He had previously made a will, giving her a lac of rupees; but afterwards he made another will, which, after giving all his property to his wife for life, and then to his two sons, gave the same, if they should die without issue, to his daughter's issue. It was held, affirming a decree below, that there was no contract by the father to give more than the 2,000 $\frac{1}{2}$ l. Moorhouse v. Colvin, 782

— Railway company, defendants in a cause, entered into agreement or undertaking with plaintiff not to do any act contrary to a then pending notice of motion, unless under authority of parliament, until hearing of cause, or further order of Court. Company subsequently obtained act of parliament, which did not by positive enactment, nor, in opinion of Court, by necessary conclusion from its provisions, take case complained of by plaintiff out of reach of undertaking, although it did not prohibit the act, and might have contemplated the act consistently with provisions of act of parliament:—Held, on motion by plaintiff, that undertaking was binding on company until further order of Court: but that company, on shewing merits, might have moved to discharge it; and Court deeming such merits to have been shewn by answer, accordingly discharged undertaking. *Stevens v. Copyhold—A bishop, lord of a manor, enfranchised certain copyhold lands held of the manor under the Copyhold Enfranchisement Act, and the consideration money was paid into court. On petition by the bishop for investment of money, it was held, that the Copyhold Commissioners had a right to appear at the hearing of the petition, and that their costs of the petition and those of the bishop were payable out of the consideration money. Ex parte the Bishop of Hereford, 608

Copyright—Prints in books containing letter-press and prints, the prints being illustrative of the letter-press, are protected by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45. Provisions of 8 Geo. 2. c. 13. as to date of publication and name of proprietor being printed on every print, apply only to prints published separately, and not to prints forming parts of books made up of prints and letter-press. Bogue v. Houlston, 470

Costs—Taxing Master has authority, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, to disallow charges for an action which he in his discretion considers to have been improperly brought. The 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, constituting Court of Appeal, not pointing out what is to be done as to costs, where, in consequence of the Judges differing in opinion, decision of Court below is affirmed, such costs follow result of the appeal. In re Clarke, 20

— A married woman cannot sue by a next friend incapable of giving security for costs. Stevens v. Williams, 57

— In suit by decree against heir-at-law to establish the will, verdict at law having been given in support of will, heir-at-law not entitled to any costs of suit or issues, but bound to pay so much of costs of suit and issues as were occasioned by his raising questions of incompetency of testator and fraud of devisee. Grove v. Young, 95

Costs (continued)—A. contracted to sell an estate to B. Before completion of purchase B. died intestate. Bill filed by A. against heir and administrator of B, praying for re-sale of estate and for application of purchase-money to payment of A.'s expenses and sum agreed to be paid by B. A. bound to pay the costs of the heir, with liberty to add them to his own. Popple v. Henson, 811

— Upon bill by feme covert by next friend, objection stated in answer that next friend in needy circumstances, and that security for costs ought to be given, cannot be taken at the hearing. Monday v. Waghorn, 353

— Where a Court of Appeal agrees with the main part of the relief granted in the court below, it will not depart from its adjudication of the costs, excepting in a very strong and clear case. Blenkinsopp v. Blenkinsopp, 401

— An order of course to tax solicitors' bills of costs, obtained by a married woman without the intervention of a next friend, is irregular, and though the solicitors hold some security from her for costs, it will be discharged, if further security is not given. In re Waugh, 567

— If a suit be instituted on the authority of a case, and the doctrine upon which the same was founded has been since got rid of, plaintiff is entitled to have his bill dismissed, without costs. The Sutton Harbour Improvement Company v. Hitchins, 568

— Direction in order upon unopposed petition, containing statements immaterial to the prayer, to the Taxing Master to have regard to such statements. Hyder v. Coleman, 592

— Where the Master of the Rolls or a Vice Chancellor has given substantial relief against a defendant, with costs against him personally, it is competent to this Court, in affirming the decree as to relief, to vary it as to costs, if its dissent from the decree as to costs is strong, clear, and undoubting. The Court being of opinion that, although the solicitor had acted contrary to public policy, whether through misapprehension or otherwise, and although his duty professionally prohibits him from assisting where there is aliud simulatum, aliud actum, and although he abetted in the composing and uttering of documents which recorded an affair as it was not, yet still as the Court had no firm impression that the decree below ought to have charged him with costs, it refused to vary the decree in this respect. Reynell v. Sprye and Sprye v. Reynell, 633

— By railway act company empowered to take lands belonging to a vicarage, and it was declared that purchase-money should be paid into court, and, that, on a petition by vicar and patron, and with consent of ordinary of diocese, it might be laid out in purchase of other lands. Upon purchase made accordingly, bishop entitled to be paid by company, not only costs of his attendance in Master's office, but also of his appearances on petitions to the Court for reference and confirmation of Master's report. Ex parte Vicar of Crech St. Michael, 677

Decree—Where errors in a decree are obvious, the Court will rectify them, even after it is enrolled. Fearon v. Desbrisay, 511

Deed—G. P. executed a document, which was attested by two witnesses, giving and granting to E. P. his wife a freehold house in which they resided. G. P. afterwards died, without having made any will, and his heiress-at-law brought ejectment to recover possession of house and premises from E. P. and obtained a verdict; upon which E. P. filed this bill. Upon motion to dissolve injunction which had been obtained,—held, that the gift was incomplete; that relationship of trustee and cestui que trust was not created; that the Court would not assist either party, but leave them as it found them; and injunction dissolved. Price v. Price, 53

— A deed executed by a husband, pending proceedings in the ecclesiastical court, for the purpose of preventing the suit, if successful, from affecting his property, declared void, and all arrears of alimony directed to be paid; but as to future payments, quære. Blenkinsopp v. Blenkinsopp, 401

— Conveyance set aside by reason of fraud and misrepresentation. Where a party has induced another to act on the faith of several representations made by him, any one of which has been made fraudulently, he cannot set up the transaction by shewing that every other representation was truly and honestly made, or was the result of innocent error. A representation, that remuneration for professional services rendered, as above stated, were customary, being untrue, is a ground for setting aside a conveyance and contract founded on it. Whether the agreement amounted to champerty, or savoured of champerty, still as the parties were not in pari delicto, and as the vendor had no legal advice but that of the solicitor of the purchaser, who adhered more to the purchaser than to the vendor, and failed in his duty to the latter, the Court considered that the vendor's suit ought not to fail, on the ground that he was a party to a contract against public policy and illegal. *Reynell v. — Testator devised estate to his daughter for life, and after her decease to all and every the children of the body of his daughter lawfully begotten (in case she should leave more than one child), their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common; but in case his daughter should have only one child, then he devised the estate to such one child in fee; but in case his daughter should die without leaving any issue of her body, then he devised the estate to all such children of his body as he should leave or have living at decease of his daughter, in fee. Testator's daughter had two children, both of whom died during her life. The two children of testator's daughter took absolute and devisable estates in remainder under the will, and their devisees were consequently entitled. In re Tooke's Trust, in re Bucks Rail. Co., 402

— Testator gave and devised all his freehold and copyhold messuages, farms, lands, tenements, hereditaments, and real estate situate at Market Rasen, to his wife for life, and then to his son, his heirs and assigns for ever. The testator had no property at Market Rasen except a leasehold estate held for

1,000 years. The leasehold estate passed under the above clause. Nelson v. Hopkins, 410

Discovery.—Bill alleged that an estate devised under power to defendant for life or until he should alienate by forfeiture or otherwise; that execution of power invalid, and that plaintiff entitled to estate in default of appointment. One interrogatory to bill was, whether defendant had not in his possession title deeds of estate, and if not in whose possession were they? Bill also asked that defendant might set forth a schedule to deeds in his possession, and that he might state in whose possession those deeds were which he had parted with. Defendant admitted that some of the deeds were in his possession, and set forth a schedule of them, and he stated that he had had other deeds, but refused to answer in whose possession they now were, as it might subject him to forfeiture of the estate. Exception which comprised the answer to the whole of the interrogatory was good, although part of it had been answered. Also, as in one event documents might assist plaintiff at the hearing he was entitled to production. And further, the estate having been given to defendant until alienation, he could not protect himself from discovery on ground of forfeiture. Hambrook v. Smith, 320

Domicile.—Circumstances under which a person who had removed all his goods from Scotland, and also his sister and only relation, and never afterwards returned, had not lost his domicile of origin. Brown v. Smith, 356

Dower.—In deed of settlement, made on marriage of E. S., an adult female, it was recited that "for providing a competent jointure and provision of maintenance for the lady in case she should survive her husband," the father of T. D., the intended husband, had paid to T. D. 3,000*l.*, and the father of the lady had paid to T. D. 841*l.* and had covenanted to pay him a further sum of 500*l.*; and that it had been agreed that T. D. should give a bond to the trustees of the settlement, conditioned for the payment of 2,000*l.* within six months after the marriage; and it was declared that the trustees should hold the 2,000*l.* upon trusts for the benefit of the husband and wife for their respective lives in succession, &c. T. D. gave the bond accordingly, and died, leaving E. S. surviving him, having paid 500*l.* only in discharge of the bond. After the marriage, T. D. acquired real estate, which he sold during the coverture. Upon bill by the wife against the purchaser, claiming dower, it was held, upon appeal, that the settlement, being expressed to be "for providing a competent jointure," must be understood to be in bar of dower; and (reversing the decision below) that the partial non-payment of the money secured by the bond, did not entitle the widow to claim against the purchaser of the husband's real estates her dower pro tanto. Equitable bar of dower depends altogether upon contract; and has no analogy to legal bar of dower under the Statute of Uses. The observations of Sir A. Hart, in Power v. Sheil, disapproved of. Dyke v. Rendall, 905

Executors.—Liability of, to co-executor for wilful default. Jones v. Morrell, 630

— Testator devised freehold estates to A, B, C, and D, and their heirs, on usual trusts for sale. He then directed that A, B, C, and D, the executors of that his will, or survivors or survivor of them, or executors or administrators of such survivor, should sell his copyhold estates. He then gave all his personal estate to same persons, and declared trusts of all monies to arise from his real and personal estate. A. died in lifetime of testator. Testator died in 1830. B. and C. sold copyhold estates in 1832. In 1851 D. executed usual deed of disclaimer. There was no evidence that D. had refused to accept executorship before sale in 1832. It was held, first, that copyholds were within 21 Hen. 8. c. 4; secondly, that, under that act, sale of copyholds had been properly made by B. and C. Peppercorn v. Wayman, 827

Factors' Act.—Plaintiff consigned pearls to a Liverpool merchant for sale, and drew bills upon him to an amount greater than the value of the pearls, which bills he accepted. The Liverpool merchant then handed the pearls to his London agent to be sold, and drew bills upon him, as an advance, upon account of the pearls. The London agent accepted the bills, having notice that the pearls had been consigned by the plaintiff for sale. The Liverpool merchant became insolvent, and the bills drawn upon by the plaintiff were not paid. The London agent sold the goods to recoup himself the bills drawn upon him by the Liverpool merchant. Upon bill by the consignor alleging fraud and collusion, and praying that the London agent might be desired to pay him the amount produced by the sale of the pearls, it was held, affirming the decree of the Court below, that the pledge was valid within the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, as made bond fide and in the ordinary course of business. Notice to the pledgee of the fact that the goods were transmitted to the consignee, with directions to sell simply, will not vitiate the pledge; secus if the pledgee had notice that the consignee was prohibited from pledging. Navulshaw v. Brownrigg, 908

Foreign Railway.—A railway company in Belgium was established as a "société anonyme." There were English and foreign directors. Deposits on allotted shares were paid into the bankers. Disputes took place between the English and Belgian directors, in consequence of which all the former resigned. In following month J. and G, two of the English directors, to whose account deposits had been paid, returned deposits to all allottees who were willing to take them, and they also purchased back some shares, which had been allotted, for benefit of the company. Accounts of all this were laid before the committee of management, and the balance remaining in the hands of English directors was paid over, and the transactions were approved by a general meeting. A shareholder filed a bill on behalf of himself and all other shareholders not defendants, against J. assignees of G, and the committee of management, praying repayment of the money returned to the allottees, and for an account, but the bill was dismissed at the Rolls, and, on appeal, the decree was affirmed; the Court holding that by the law of Belgium plaintiff was not competent to sue for such a purpose, and by the law of England he had shewn no case for the suit against the English directors.

Kent v. Jackson, 438

Foreign Law—Messrs. P. and R., plaintiff and defendant, were writers to the Signet in Edinburgh, P. being agent of the mortgagees, and R. being agent of the mortgagor of an estate in Scotland, upon which various incumbrances were existing. £2,100*l.*, part of mortgage-money, was deposited in Bank of Scotland, in joint names of Messrs. P. and R., to discharge existing claims upon estate, but this sum was subsequently drawn out by them from deposit account, and applied partly in payment of charges upon estate, and partly to satisfy other liabilities of mortgagor. Some creditors of mortgagor afterwards obtained an order from Court of Session in Scotland to arrest the money in the hands of Messrs. P. and R., and after various proceedings in Scotland an order was made upon them jointly and severally that they should deposit in Bank of Scotland the fund paid out. R. did deposit a part, and afterwards left Scotland and came to England. P. then re-deposited the whole of the fund, in pursuance of order of Court of Session, and took an assignment of the order of the Court, and after exhausting process in Scotland against R., and failing to enforce payment there, filed a bill in this court. No final judgment had been obtained. This Court would enforce a foreign judgment if final; but order made was not final, and this Court would not enforce an interlocutory order of a foreign court. Assignment of order by parties in foreign suit not render them the less necessary parties to this suit, and created no separate contract between Messrs. P. and R.; and this Court had no jurisdiction, and bill dismissed, with costs. Paul v. Roy, 361

Friendly Societies—In 1845 a society, called the Frugal Investment Society, was established, and rules framed and approved by the barrister under the Friendly Societies Act. By these rules society was to last one hundred months, and every member to pay 1*l.* a month in respect of each share held by him. Members might be paid their shares in advance upon terms of paying 8*s.* a month by way of interest in respect of each share so anticipated, in addition to subscription, and giving security for such payments. All monies paid to society, exclusive of subscriptions, were to be divided among members every year. Society consisted of 180 members. A. took shares and received amount of them in advance, and made mortgage of real estate to trustees of society, for purpose of securing sums payable by him under rules. A. paid sums to society, to an amount, however, less than sums so payable. He afterwards filed a bill against trustees, praying that, upon accounting for sums advanced to him and interest, difference, if any, between this amount and sums paid by him might be repaid to him by trustees, and that mortgaged property might be re-conveyed to him. On this bill, A. had no right to relief. Above-mentioned loans made to A., under rules of society, not usurious. Whether Society within Friendly Societies Act, or whether it was an illegal one—quære. Burbidge v. Cotton, 201

Fund in Court—Lands having been settled on A. for life, with remainders over, a railway company took part of land and money was paid into court. An eligible property being found for re-investment of part of money, tenant for life petitioned for payment of so much out of court for that purpose.

Petition need not be served on parties entitled in remainder, and order made on petition of tenant for life alone. Ex parte Staples, 251

Infant—Shares of infants in testator's estate under 20*l.* each ordered to be paid at once to the persons maintaining them. Farrance v. Viley, 813

— The Court will not give a direct benefit out of an infant's income to his father. Scheme by which an infant (whose father was living) was to be articulated to a solicitor, and to live with an uncle residing in the same place, approved of by the Court; and the uncle was appointed to act in the nature of a guardian to the infant, and to have an allowance out of his income. In re Stables, 630

— By post-nuptial settlement, income of trust monies was made payable to parents and the survivor of them, upon condition of providing for the children with suitable diet, maintenance, &c. in proportion to circumstances of parents, and expectancies of children; but that, in case of an advance to any of the children, the parents should be released from the condition. Husband petitioned Court of Bankruptcy, and, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, a conditional order was made for his protection upon payment of a yearly sum. Husband and wife afterwards mortgaged all their interest in trust fund, which was then transferred into court, under Trustees Relief Act. On petition by infant children, the Court ordered the whole income to be applied for maintenance of the petitioners. In re Dalton's Settlement, 681

— In suit by adult plaintiffs and infant plaintiffs, order obtained for changing next friends of infants, and drawn up and entered. Adult plaintiffs obtained at the Rolls an order for changing solicitor to suit, and alleged that order appointing a new next friend had not been drawn up and entered. New next friend moved to discharge order obtained at the Rolls. Order for changing solicitor irregular; motion to discharge ought to have been by the infants by their next friend, and not by next friend in his individual capacity. Application refused, but leave given to amend notice of motion. Piddock v. Boulbee, 786

Injunction—Plaintiff obtained the common injunction to stay execution in an action on the same day that the action was tried, but before the verdict was given against him. Upon motion by defendant before answer, plaintiff must pay the amount for which judgment has been signed into court within a specified time, or the injunction must be dissolved. Anderson v. Noble, 586

— Upon demurrer for want of equity to bill for an injunction to restrain bell ringing in a chapel, held that a bill may be filed by an individual alleging private nuisance, although the nuisance may at the same time be public; also, that plaintiff, having brought his action for damages in respect of the ringing of bells, though to greater extent than was subsequently practised, need not commence fresh action for every modified form of bell-ringing; but that if plaintiff had not obtained a verdict at law, that was no ground of demurrer to bill for an injunction. The demurrer was therefore overruled, and an injunction to restrain the ringing of these bells was granted so far as they occasioned an annoyance to plaintiff or his family. Soltan v. De Held, 153

— A party who has a secret in a trade and employs persons under contract express or implied, or under a duty express or implied, can restrain by injunction such of those persons as have gained a knowledge of the secret from setting it up against him. Morison v. Moat, 248

— A person having established his right at law is not, as a matter of course, entitled to an injunction, particularly where injunction would not restore plaintiff to the right he has established, and where act complained of may be compensated by pecuniary damages. What amount of acquiescence will disentitle to an injunction. Wood v. Sutcliffe, 253

— The Court will restrain a party from enforcing a legal claim where promises have been made to the person legally liable not to enforce it, upon the faith whereof obligations have been entered into. Money v. Jorden, 531

— Middle. J. W. agreed in writing with L. that, for certain considerations therein expressed, she would sing and perform at his theatre for a specified period; and that, during her engagement with L., she would not sing elsewhere without his licence in writing. Afterwards, J. W. contracted with G. to sing and perform at his theatre during the period specified in her engagement with L. Upon bill by L. praying simply that J. W. might be restrained from singing and performing elsewhere than at his theatre during the period specified, the Court granted an injunction accordingly. Where a contract contains covenants to do certain acts, and also to abstain from doing certain other acts, the Court has jurisdiction to restrain the breach of the negative covenants, though there may be no jurisdiction to specifically perform the affirmative covenants—Kemble v. Keen and Kimberley v. Jennings disapproved of. But in such cases the Court will decline to interfere where the jurisdiction cannot be beneficially exercised, as in Collins v. Plumb, or where its exercise would work injustice, as in a case where the consideration for the negative covenant of the one party is the affirmative covenant of the other party, which latter the Court cannot specifically perform—Hills v. Croll. Lumley v. Wagner, 898

— The Court below having held that a party who, by representations, had induced another to enter into irrevocable engagements, must be restrained from taking proceedings to enforce obligations and promises of the abandonment of all intention to enforce what was the subject of those representations, the decree granting a perpetual injunction to restrain such proceedings was confirmed—Lord Justice Cranworth dissenting: first, because this case was not within the principle of the cases on which the decree below was professed to be grounded, those cases depending on misrepresentation of fact, while here there was no misrepresentation of fact; and, secondly, because the promise alleged by the plaintiff was supported by the evidence of one witness only (who had since died), and which was not, in his Lordship's opinion, supported by the surrounding circumstances, and was positively denied by the answer. Money v. Jorden, 893

— See Deed. Patent. Railway. Settlement. Insolvent—Annuity awarded to country Commissioner of Bankrupts, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, passes to his assignee in insolvency; and is not within excepted cases mentioned in 56th section of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. Where insolvent refused to make requisite affidavit that he did not hold any public office or employment in terms of 58th section of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, Court allowed other evidence to be given of that fact to enable assignee to receive annuity. Spooner v. Payne, 791

Insurance—A sum of money was borrowed from an insurance company, and bond given to secure repayment. The borrower at same time insured his life as further security, and bond extended to payment of premiums for keeping up the policy. The insurance company having ceased to carry on business was dissolved, and affairs being wound up, company transferred, amongst other things, this bond and policy to another insurance company. No premiums were paid to second company, and policy allowed to drop. Surety in the bond died, and second insurance company claimed to be creditors against his estate for amount of premiums unpaid, on ground that policies ought to be kept on foot until the money due upon the bond had been paid. As regarded the premiums, this not such a contract as assignees of first insurance company could enforce, although they had a good claim against the estate of the surety quoad the amount secured by the bond. Atkinson v. Gylby, 848

Interest—When it may be claimed on a retention of balances. Jones v. Morrall, 630

— An assignment of property was executed to trustees for benefit of creditors, who were to be paid equally, and it was stipulated that any securities held by creditors might be realized and applied towards payment of their debts, and as to any deficiency such creditors were to stand pari passu with the others, but not to receive more than the principal and interest. A schedule was added containing the debts, calculated with interest up to date of deed, but there was no express contract that simple contract debts should carry interest. Upon exceptions to Master's report, it was held, this deed did not convert the simple contract debts into specialty debts, and that no right to interest after date of deed was created which did not otherwise exist. Cloves v. Waters, 840

Interpleader—G. P. the elder was owner of one-third of a ship, Messrs. S. M. & Co. of Calcutta, were owners of another third, and mortgagees of the other third, of which G. P. the younger was owner. R. I. & Co., of London, were agents of S. M. & Co., and they appointed Messrs. T. ship's brokers, who as such received freight, amounting to 2,721l. 2s. 7½d., and paid one-third, 907l. 0s. 10d. to G. P. the elder. R. I. & Co. accepted several bills of exchange drawn against this freight, and before they became due stopped payment. S. M. & Co. also stopped payment, and finally became insolvent. Claims were made upon Messrs. T. for the whole

- freight by B. I. & Co., and also by holders of the bills drawn by them, as well as on behalf of S. M. & Co. and G. P. the younger, and upon bill filed by Messrs. T, that the defendants might interplead in respect of 1,814*l.* 9*s.*, it was held, that no decree could be made in the suit to compel plaintiffs to bring entire freight into court; that as no defendant asked to have bill dismissed, Court must make decree of interpleader; and that such decree would only protect them to extent of 1,814*l.* 9*s.* Toulmin v. Reid, 391
- Investment—Land belonging to a vicarage was taken by a railway company, and the purchase-money paid into court to the account of the vicar. On a petition by the vicar, stating an agreement to purchase land particularly mentioned in the agreement, and that the title had been approved of by a barrister, and that the title deeds had been examined and found correct; and praying for a conveyance and payment of the money out of court, without a reference to the Master—the Court made the order. Ex parte Vicar of East Dereham, 677
- Order made on petition by rector for investment of money arising from sale to a railway company of part of rectory lands. Pending proceedings in Master's office rector died. New rector consenting that proceedings should go on, no supplemental order necessary—semble. Ex parte Rector of Lea, 776
- Irrelevant Matter. See Costs.
- Judgment—W. C. being in receipt of an annuity payable out of stock standing in name of the Accountant General, became indebted to F. C. who brought an action against him and obtained a judgment, upon which a fiery facias issued, but nothing was found upon which to execute it. Upon half a year's annuity falling due, F. C. obtained an order stopping the Accountant General from parting with the cheque; but upon petition, the Court declined to make an order authorizing the sheriff to seize the cheque or to direct it to be dealt with as if it was standing in the name of a trustee, and petition dismissed. Courtroy v. Vincent, 291
- A. was entitled to stock carried over to his account in a suit. B. a judgment creditor of A., obtained a Judge's order charging the stock, and then filed a claim against A. and served him with it. The claim was brought on, and A. did not appear. B. could not obtain the stock without petition to be presented in the suit, but it was not necessary to serve A. with the petition. Raece v. Taylor, 463
- Judgment Creditor—On claim by judgment creditor against his debtor in respect of certain real estate belonging to debtor, Court refused to give decrees of foreclosure. Footner v. Sturgis, 741
- Jurisdiction—A surgeon having obtained from a poor patient, on a change of circumstances, his promissory note for an amount beyond what was due for medical attendance, the Court, in absence of evidence to prove that the patient intended to pay more than what was justly due, ordered the note to be impounded, and directed an issue at law to ascertain the amount actually due. Billing v. Southes, 472
- See Building Societies. Contempt. Patent. Ship and Shipping.
- Lands Clauses Act—A harbour improvement company, in prosecution of their works, under authority of special act of parliament, obstructed access to a wharf from place of business of M. H. by which he was put to expense in loading and unloading ships. M. H. claiming compensation, gave notice and proceeded to appoint an arbitrator, under 8 Vict. c. 18. s. 68. Upon bill filed by company, injunction granted to restrain further proceedings of M. H. until he established his right at law, but on appeal injunction dissolved. Sutton Harbour Co. v. Hutchins, 73

- Lease—In carrying an informal contract for a lease into effect, the Master will be directed to regard previous leases containing special covenants, when specific performance of such contract will be enforced. Bell v. Barchard, 411
- Leaseholds—Testator gave all his real and personal estate whatsoever to his wife and son, whom he appointed executrix and executor, upon trust to permit his wife during her life to receive the clear rents, issues and profits, interests, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, subject to all outgoings; and upon death of his wife then, as to all his said devised and bequeathed freehold and residuary real and personal estate, with their appurtenances, and of which his wife was to have the clear yearly income for her life, upon trust for his son absolutely. Leaseholds belonging to testator were to be held by his widow in specie, no intention of conversion being expressed. Shortly after testator's death his widow was called upon to make good dilapidations to the leaseholds, under covenant in the lease. These expenses, which the widow had paid out of her income, properly chargeable upon the corpus of the estate. Harris v. Poyner, 915
- Renewal. See Specific Performance.
- Legacy—Testatrix gave her residuary estate, after death of three persons, upon trust to pay and assign it equally between G. B. and E. B. their executors, administrators and assigns; but if neither of them should be living at death of survivor of tenants for life, she gave same to F. H. G. B. died in lifetime of testatrix, but E. B. survived tenants for life. This gift lapsed as to moiety of residuary estate; no joint estate created between G. B. and E. B.; no right by survivorship arose by implication; event had not happened upon which gift over to take effect; and one moiety of residuary estate was undisposed of and belonged to next-of-kin of testatrix, and costs must be paid out of her estate. Baxter v. Losh, 55
- Testator by will recited that on his marriage he had entered into a bond to leave his wife 800*l.* on his death, and that he intended shortly to distribute 6,000*l.* in his lifetime amongst her relations, in lieu of any claims under the bond. Testator then directed that, in case of his death before carrying his intention into effect, the 6,000*l.* should be divided between and amongst said relations of his wife in such manner, shares, and proportions as would have been the case if his wife had died possessed of said sum a spinster and intestate. Testator's wife had died before date of his will, and had left sixteen next-of-kin, five of whom died before testator. The eleven surviving next-of-kin took each one-sixteenth of the 6,000*l.*, and the shares which the other five would have taken had they lived, lapsed, and went to testator's residuary legatees. The lapsed shares, being the only residuary property over which the Court had power, costs of petition for determining question raised upon construction of the will, were borne by them. Ham's Trust, 217
- No claim for legacy duty arises under 36 Geo. 3. c. 52, or 45 Geo. 3. c. 28, upon a transfer by wife, out of funds which had survived to her, to pay her husband's debts and legacies. Laurie v. Clutton, 226
- Testator gave real and personal estate, subject to one "clear" yearly rent-charge or annuity of 100*l.* a year to S. G. Legacy payable without any deductions for legacy duty, which was to be paid out of the real estate, personal estate of testator being exhausted. Bailey v. Boulle, 277

— The Court will not hold a testamentary disposition to be void for uncertainty if there is a reasonable degree of certainty as to testator's intention. Where testatrix bequeathed legacy to wife of a person by name of one of their daughters, an infant of tender years, they and not the daughter were entitled to the legacy, and the gift not void for uncertainty. Adams v. Jones, 352

— Testator bequeathed certain chattels to A, and afterwards insured them from loss by sea. Testator embarked with these goods in a ship, which was totally wrecked, and he and chattels perished together. A. had no interest in money recovered by executors from insurance office. Testator gave residue of his estate to B, interest to be paid to her until her first-born son should attain twenty-one; one-half of said principal sum then to be paid to her aforesaid son, other half to be paid to his mother. Should his mother die before said son, the whole to be paid to him. Should aforesaid son die before his mother, his share to go to her. B. had one illegitimate son at date of will, who was maintained by testator. This son not entitled under above bequest. Durrant v. Friend, 353

— Testator gave his residuary estate equally among his six children, and directed that sums of money appearing by his private ledger to be due from them, should in the division be brought into account. Allowance to be made for all sums appearing due, though barred by the Statute of Limitations. Rose v. Gould, 360

— Testatrix bequeathed leasehold property to R. A. absolutely during the residue of her term, subject to the payment of the rent and performance of the covenants reserved and contained in the lease; and, as to her residuary estate, subject to the payment of her debts, &c. she gave the same to J. B. absolutely. Upon appeal, reversing the decree below, R. A. took the leaseholds with liability to make good dilapidations that had accrued during life of testatrix; and R. A. has to indemnify executors against liability under covenant to repair before he was let into possession. Hickling v. Boyer, 358

— Next-of-kin ex parte materna not excluded, as filling also the character of next-of-kin ex parte paterna. "Next-of-kin" means next-of-kin at the death of the party whose next-of-kin are spoken of. Gundry v. Pinner, 405

— A bequest of 500*l.* to the Westminster Asylum for pregnant women.—Held, upon extrinsic evidence, and the context of the will, without any inquiry, a gift to "The General Lying-in Hospital." General Lying-in Hospital v. Knight, 587

— W. L., by his will, directed his executors to pay the residue of his property to M. F., but in case of her death then to pay the same to the executors or executrices which M. F. might appoint. M. F. died before W. L., and by her will gave the residue of her property to I. W., and appointed M. L. her executrix. Upon a bill filed by M. L. against I. W., M. L. did not take the residue of W. L.'s estate beneficially, but she took it as part of the personal estate of M. F., and was to hold it upon trusts and for purposes of M. F.'s will. Long v. Watkinson, and Same v. Long, 544

— Testator by will gave real and personal estate to trustees to pay debts and legacies; by codicil she devised to her sister for life, and directed it, at her death, to be sold for payment of legacies; she then gave various legacies, amounting to 50,000*l.* Upon personal estate proving insufficient to pay legacies, said estate not made primary fund for payment of legacies, and subject to life estate of sister, said estate an auxiliary fund. Wheldon v. Spode, 918

Lien—for unpaid purchase-money. See Limitations, Statute of. And see Solicitor and Client.

Limitations, Statute of—Notice by an attorney that purchase-money for property comprised in contract of sale was ready to be paid is an acknowledgment in writing within section 40. of 8 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27. A person by whom "the money is payable," means, in the case of a claim by equitable lien, the person entitled to the land on which the charge is sought to be fixed, and the acknowledgment being by devisees in trust for payment of debts is good as against the cestui que trust under same will. There being no proof as against the cestui que trust that the attorney who wrote the notice was in fact agent of devisees in trust, the Court granted an inquiry. Taft v. Stephenson, 129

— Upon application for payment of 450*l.* due upon two promissory notes dated 25th of March 1836, upon which interest had been paid up to 25th of March 1841, a letter was written by the creditor on 13th of January 1846, stating "I hope to be in H. very soon, when I trust everything will be arranged with Mrs. W. agreeable to her wishes." This a promise to pay, which would take the debt out of the Statute of Limitations, and exceptions to Master's report allowing the debt, overruled. Edmonds v. Goster, 290

— See Legacy.

Lunacy—Order that, upon allowance to lunatic being paid direct to committee of the person, instead of passing immediately through the hands of committee of the estate, committee of the person be accepted as one of the sureties for committee of the estate, the general rule, however, to remain unaltered. Ex parte Mount, 221

— L. was found lunatic as from a certain day. He presented petition to traverse, and order made allowing same. On same day order made, granting care and custody of L. and his estate to B., who never perfected his securities, and no grant made to him. On traverse jury found traverser was then of sound mind. Costs of inquisition had been ordered to be taxed. L. presented petition for supersedeas of commission and for delivering up of his deeds and papers in hands of B. or of those who had issued commission. These parties having applied for order for payment of costs out of traverser's estate, Court refused the order, first, on the ground that, independently of 6 Geo. 4. c. 53, there was no jurisdiction, either original or as delegate of the Crown; and, secondly, because 4th section only authorized Court to deal with property pending, and notwithstanding a traverse. Court also decided it had no authority to make delivery up of property dependent and conditional upon payment of costs. In re Loveday, 231

— A lunatic made defendant as one of next-of-kin of intestate. He and his committee presented petition entitled in the suit, and also in the lunacy, praying that lunatic might defend by his guardian, and that committee might be appointed such guardian. Committee prayed that, as such, he might be at liberty to prosecute claim of lunatic as next-of-kin, and that all such costs as should be properly incurred, and as should not be paid out of the estate to be administered in the suit, might be raised and paid out of lunatic's estate. Court gave liberty to committee to defend the suit, but refused to appoint a guardian as being unnecessary, or to

- make any prospective order as to costs, and directed the title in the cause to be struck out. In re Manson, 249
- Lunacy (continued)—Quere, if the Lords Justices acting in lunacy under the royal sign manual have jurisdiction to make order vesting trust estate, of which person of unsound mind, heir-at-law of deceased trustee, was seised,—the words of Trustee Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, being “the Lord Chancellor intrusted by virtue of the Queen’s sign manual.” In re Pattinson, 280
- A person of unsound mind, not found lunatic by inquisition, was entitled to sums of stock in court, income of which was not sufficient for her maintenance. The Court directed that part of one of the funds should be invested in purchase of Government annuity, in name of lunatic and for her life, to be paid to her brother until further order, he undertaking to apply the same towards her maintenance. Davies v. Davies, 419
- Party interested under deed executed ten years back was allowed to attend execution of commission de lunatico inquirendo when lunacy was alleged to have existed for period antecedent to date of deed, but upon undertaking to abide by such order as Court might make as to party’s own costs and increased costs occasioned by his attendance at inquisition. In re Richards, 739
- Lunatic died without leaving ready money to pay expenses of funeral, and there was no committee of his person or estate. The heir-at-law, who was one of the next-of-kin, petitioned that a sufficient sum belonging to lunatic should be paid out of court for such purpose; but Court directed the persons with whom lunatic had resided to proceed with funeral, and ordered petition to stand over. A petition for this purpose is necessary; a warrant from Lunatic Office is not sufficient. Re Townsend, 747
- Two committees of estate of a lunatic were appointed, one of whom died, and no new committee was appointed in his place. The estate being small, the Court permitted the income to be paid to survivor on production of affidavit of his solvent circumstances. In re Noble, 748
- A sum of money having been lost to estate of lunatic under circumstances which Court considered to be the fault of committee in not taking steps to enforce payment, the estate of committee, who had died, was charged therewith. In re Swindell, 748
- Person found lunatic by inquisition is entitled as of right to traverse finding; but before granting writ Court will be satisfied by personal examination that alleged lunatic is competent to exercise volition upon the subject, and desires to have a traverse of finding. Where personal examination of alleged lunatic by Court is impracticable, Court will adopt some other mode of inquiry—semble. Whether party may file traverse in Petty Bag Office without intervention of Court—quere. In re Cumming, 753
- Where Court thinks it for the benefit of lunatic that the care of the person should remain undisturbed, it will so direct, and will direct whole income of property to be paid to lunatic, pending a petition to traverse; although Court will confirm report of Master in lunacy, appointing a committee of the person and a committee of the estate. In re Cumming, 753
- Costs of obtaining a re-transfer of premises mortgaged to a lunatic are to be paid out of lunatic’s estate where petition for that purpose is presented by committee of the estate. If petition be presented by mortgagor, he will not be allowed costs, except in a case where the committee has refused to proceed. In re Wheeler, 759
- Solicitors, who claimed costs for taking out commission, and for other business in the lunacy, obtained order for taxation, but did not tax. Five years after order, lunatic died, leaving real estate, but no personal property. Solicitors sued committees at law, but they set up Statute of Limitations, and action failed. Solicitors now presented a petition, praying order for taxation, with view to proceedings to make real estate liable, and Court made order, but without prejudice to any question whether petitioners had any claim on lunatic’s estate. In re Hart, 810
- Where lady who had separate property married, and agreement was made that out of her income certain domestic expenses should be defrayed, and agreement was acted upon until her lunacy, and husband continued same expenses out of her property till his death; and where lady was under moral obligation to give her nephew 500*l.*, part of which she gave, and a further part her husband, after her lunacy, paid out of her property; Court allowed executors of husband to deduct all money paid for keeping up establishment after lunacy, till his death, and also the money paid by him to nephew, before paying over separate income of wife to her committee. In re Hewson, 825

- Marriage—Testator directed his executors to sell the whole of his real and personal estate, and invest the proceeds in some government annuity for benefit of his wife and M. L. to be equally divided between them, and at death of either of them her share to pass to the survivor, and in case either his widow or M. L. should marry or live in a state of adultery, then her share to pass to the other, but if they both should marry, then their shares to go to his nephew. Testator also directed his wife and M. L. out of their annuity to keep in good repair the tomb in which he was buried. This restriction upon marriage good as related to the widow, but not good with respect to M. L. who was a single woman. The direction to testator’s widow and M. L. to repair the tomb, being confined to the lives of the annuitants, not void on ground of perpetuity. Lloyd v. Lloyd, 596
- Marriage Portion. See Contract.
- Mortgage—Mortgagor, a solicitor, having prepared mortgage deed, and mortgagee not having employed another solicitor, mortgagor is to be considered to be solicitor of mortgagees in transaction of mortgage; but latter not therefore deemed to have notice of prior deposit of title-deeds by mortgagor, or of any uncommunicated fact which it was the interest of mortgagor to conceal from mortgagee. Constructive notice is knowledge imputed by the Court on presumption, too strong to be rebutted, that knowledge must have been communicated. Legal mortgage not postponed to prior equitable one, on ground of not having got in title-deeds, unless there has been fraud or gross or wilful negligence on part of legal mortgagee. Fraud or gross or wilful negligence not imputed to mortgagee who has made bona fide inquiry for title-deeds, and reasonable excuse has been given for non-delivery of them to him. Secus, if he has not made any inquiry. Hewitt v. Loosemore, 69
- G. S. insisting that J. F. owner of an agreement for building lease, had deposited it to secure to him 900*l.*, claimed payment from administrator of J. F. who had expended money out of his own pocket in finishing the houses, and had obtained leases from the lessors, and questioned the deposit and extent of advance if any had been made. Affidavits affording evidence of deposit, Court bound to act upon them; when deposit made, it gave G. S. a title to a mortgage, and he had a right to payment; and Court made decree for account and sale of houses comprised in agreement. Sims v. Helling, 76

— A mortgagee instituted a foreclosure suit, in which he was ordered to pay the costs of an interlocutory motion, but died before payment and before the hearing of the cause. His representatives filed an original bill of foreclosure without noticing or reviving the abated suit of the mortgagee. The Court refused to allow the plaintiffs their costs in the second suit unless they submitted to pay the costs of the motion in the first suit ordered to be paid by their testator. Long v. Storie, 521

— The purchase of a piece of land at an exorbitant price not allowed to stand, being the condition of a loan of money to a party whose necessities compelled him to borrow. A mortgage of a fund in court in a suit of Collett v. Maule, by W. G. C. the purchaser of the land, to secure 6,000*l.*, the purchase-money, to G. W. F. the vendor, set aside as fraudulent. Assignment of chose in action must be taken, subject to all prior claims. Sub-mortgages of the fund in court, made without noticing G. W. F. were therefore set aside, as his title was either void or subject to the prior equity of W. G. C. notwithstanding he had been induced to create or countenance such sub-mortgages. Acts of W. G. C. in joining to create the sub-mortgages not a recognition of or an acquiescence in sub-mortgages, as they were done in entire ignorance of his rights, and under the idea that the original transaction with G. W. F. was unimpeachable. Cockell v. Taylor; Preston v. Collett; Collett v. Preston, 545

— An executor borrowed money upon a representation that it was wanted for purposes of testator's estate. The money was lent upon personal security of executor, who afterwards mortgaged part of testator's property as security for the money antecedently advanced:—Held by the Vice Chancellor, the onus of proof lay on the person who advanced the money, to shew that it was applied for executorship purposes: held on appeal, there was no evidence to shew that the advances were not made for executorship purposes. The bill was filed by representative of executor, who had borrowed the money, in the character which he also filled of executor to original testator, and it sought to impeach the mortgage:—Held, by the Vice Chancellor, the plaintiff, although he was executor of original testator, in which character he might sue, could not repudiate the character of representative to the executor, who could not sue; but, contra, on appeal; and bill therefore dismissed, so far as it sought to impeach the mortgage. Miles v. Durnford, 667

— Owner of reversion in personality mortgaged it. He then mortgaged equity of redemption to second person, and then agreed to sell, subject to mortgages, to a third party. First mortgagee required to be paid off. Mortgagor in memorandum, reciting that purchaser had paid first mortgagee in discharge of her debt, out of purchase-money, agreed to execute assignment to purchaser, and until it should be executed that purchaser should stand in place of first mortgagee. It was held, reversing decree below, that debt of first mortgagee was not extinguished, and that purchaser was entitled to benefit of that security. Second mortgagee was also mortgagee of other property of mortgagor:—Held, also reversing decree below, that one mortgage could not be redeemed without the other. Watts v. Symes, 713

— A mortgaged estate in fee to B, and covenanted to pay B. mortgage debt and interest. A. died intestate, and arrears of more than six years' interest was due. A's heir not entitled to redeem, except on terms of paying principle and whole of interest due. Elvey v. Norwood, 716

— A mortgaged real estate to B. for 3,000*l.*, and died, having devised two-thirds of it to C, and one-third to D. and E, in equal moieties. By deed of transfer, after reciting that B. had required payment of debt from C, D. and E, which they were unable to pay, and that they had applied to F. to lend them the amount, which he had consented to do, on having repayment secured as thereafter expressed, B, at the request of C, D. and E, conveyed premises to F, subject to proviso for redemption on payment by C, his heirs, executors and administrators, of 2,000*l.*, and by D. and E, their heirs, executors and administrators, of 1,000*l.*; and C. covenanted to pay 2,000*l.*, and D. and E. covenanted to pay 1,000*l.* As between the real and personal representatives of D, he had not taken on himself the payment of his share of the mortgage debt. *Hedges v. Partnership—Under articles of agreement between three partners, partnership was to be dissolved by notice from any of them, on breach of articles by others or other. Notice of dissolution having been given by one of the partners, in consequence of breach of articles by another, and third partner having adopted notice, held that partnership was dissolved as to all, but without consequences to the non-offending partner which attached, under an-

- other clause of articles, to a general dissolution. Smith v. Mules, 803
- Patent—Upon plaintiff entering into usual undertaking to bring action, injunction granted to restrain foreign owners of foreign vessels whilst in this country from infringing a patent within limits of grant, unless and until they obtained proper licences from owners of patent, where invalidity of patent had been bona fide twice unsuccessfully contested at law in action brought by patentee, and once in action against him and assignees of patent, under writ of sci. fa. to repeal the grant of letters patent. *Caldwell v. One of trustees and executors died in lifetime of the other, and on death of the other trustee and executor letters of administration to his estate were taken out in the same court by A, B. and C. One of the parties entitled to a share, under will of testator, died intestate, possessed of no other property, and letters of administration to his estate were taken out by his next-of-kin in the same court. A, B. and C. paid the share into court, under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. The person entitled to the share petitioned for its payment out of court, and the same was directed, notwithstanding that prerogative letters of administration were not taken out. In re Knowles, 142
- An order for payment of money out of court will not be made except upon petition, however small the sum may be. The Blind School v. Goren, 144
- A sum of money had been paid into court to the account of female infant, a ward of Court. Infant married, and petition presented by her and her husband for payment of the money out of court to husband, upon authority of two cases cited. The Court disapproved of principle upon which those cases decided; but allowed petition on affidavits that it would be beneficial for husband to receive the money. In re Cooke, 145
- A. was entitled to a share of produce of certain chattels and of no other property. She was domiciled in diocese of L, and the chattels were in that diocese. A. died intestate. Chattels were sold by trustee, and A.'s share paid into court, under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. After this, letters of administration to A.'s estate were taken out in diocese of L, and on application, payment of this fund out of court to administrator was ordered, a prerogative administration being unnecessary. In re Spencer, 314
- See Trust and Trustee.
- Perpetuity—Family estates, subject to mortgages, were conveyed to trustees, to raise money for payment of incumbrances, and subject thereto, for A. B. for life, and then for C. D. his eldest son, for life, without impeachment of waste, but subject to power to trustees, with ultimate remainder to A. B. in fee simple. The power to trustees was during life of A. B. and after his death, with consent of C. D. if he should be the survivor, to fell timber, and apply proceeds towards paying off incumbrances so long as they should exist.—Held, that power was paramount to any authority in tenant for life without impeachment of waste, and that it was not an infringement on the law of perpetuity. Briggs v. the Earl of Oxford, 829
- See Marriage.
- Persona Designata. See Will.
- Pleading—A pending suit in a foreign or colonial court between A. and B. cannot be pleaded in bar to relief sought in a suit in Chancery in England between the same parties relative to the same matters. Ostell v. Lepage, 501
- Power—Testatrix, having general power of appointment, upon her death, over 2,000*l.*, after referring to the power, directed and appointed that said sum should, after her death, be paid to her four daughters and her two sons, John and Joseph; and appointed her son Joseph her executor, and constituted him her residuary legatee. John died before the testatrix, whereby his share lapsed. Such share passed by residuary clause in the will to Joseph, under Wills Act, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 26. s. 27. Spooner's Trust, 151
- If an intention to exercise a power be clearly shewn, a Court of equity will, in favour of a charity, give effect to informal or defective execution. A power to dispose of personality was directed to be exercised, amongst other modes, by last will and testament, &c. signed, sealed, published, and declared in the presence of two or more witnesses, and the donee, in exercise of the power, bequeathed part of the personality to certain charities by an unattested will (executed before the passing of the Wills Act), signed and sealed by the donee, but in presence of witnesses, and not published or declared. This a valid execution. The gifts being specific, the state of testatrix's property at time of her will and of her death may be looked at. Innes v. Sayer, 190
- G. P. tenant for life of real estate, with remainder for all and every, or any one or more, to exclusion of other or others of his children as he should by deed or will appoint, appointed to trustees upon trust for his son G. S. P., his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and to be conveyed to him when and as he should attain the age of twenty-three years; and in case his son G. S. P. should die before he should have attained twenty-one years, to the use of second, third, and fourth, and every other son of testator successively in tail, with remainder to daughters in tail, with remainder to his brother in fee. And after directing payment of two annual sums of money during minority of his son, he directed his trustees to invest residue of rents and profits to accumulate until G. S. P. or such other sons as aforesaid, should attain twenty-three, and on his or their first attaining that age, then upon trust to pay over all such securities and accumulations unto G. S. P., or to such other sons, his executors, administrators and assigns, for his and their absolute use and benefit. This a due exercise of the power of appointment. G. S. P. took an estate in fee upon death of testator liable to be divested in case of his death under twenty-one, and trust for accumulation valid until G. S. P. attained twenty-three. Peard v. Kewick, 456
- By post-nuptial settlement, R. M. settled policies of insurance on his own life, in trust for his wife for life, and after her death, upon trust for appointees of R. M., and in default of appointment for children of the marriage. In 1821 R. M., by deed, appointed the monies to become payable on the policies to his executors and administrators. Under an order in a suit instituted for purpose of carrying the settlement into effect, policies were sold, and proceeds invested, to accumulate during joint lives of husband and wife. In 1847 wife died. In 1828 R. M. took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and in 1845 became bankrupt. Under this appointment, the money representing the policies became part of general personal estate of R. M. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, 465

— By settlement made on marriage of A. and B. real estate was conveyed to trustees and their heirs upon trust for A. for life, with remainder for B. for life, and, after the death of the survivor, in trust to apply the rents in maintenance of all and every the children of A. and B., until such children should attain twenty-one, and, when such children should attain twenty-one, to convey to such children in such manner as A. and B. jointly, or the survivor, should appoint, and, in default of appointment, to convey to such children equally as tenants in common; and, if there should be but one such child who should attain twenty-one, to convey to such child, his or her heirs and assigns. This not an exclusive power of appointment, and, in default of appointment, all the children took as tenants in common in fee, without reference to their attaining twenty-one or surviving their parents. Strutt v. Brathwaite, 609

— A widow, upon marriage, settled her real and personal property on herself for life, and reserved to herself power to appoint by will during intended coverture, with remainder over on default:—Held, that an appointment by will, after determination of coverture, was invalid. Holliday v. Overton, 769

— Testator bequeathed certain property to A. for life, with remainder to such persons as A. should by any deed or deeds, instrument or instruments in writing, to be by her signed, sealed and delivered in presence of, and attested by two or more witnesses, appoint. A. made a will, dated after operation of Wills Act. This will an execution of the power. A., having power of appointment over consols, some leasehold ground-rents, and some shares in an assurance company, made a will, by which she bequeathed all her real estate, money and securities for money to B. and all the rest, residue and remainder of her personal estate to C. All the property subject to the power passed by the will, and B. entitled to consols, and C. to the shares and ground-rents. Turner v. Turner, 843

— See Perpetuity. Will.

Power of Sale—Testator, by will, appointed A, B, and C. his executors, in trust to dispose of his property as follows: He then directed that all his debts should be discharged by his executors, and residue of his property, real and personal, should be disposed of by them at time therein mentioned, save and except his estate at M., which he gave to A. for life, and at A.'s death to be disposed of as aforesaid. A, B, and C. had a power of sale of estate at M.; and it was not necessary for them to shew that there were any of testator's debts left unpaid. Mather v. Norton, 15

Practices—Applications to discharge orders obtained as of course at the Rolls are to be made to Court to which cause attached. Cooper v. Knox, 383

— Supplemental answer may by consent be filed after replication, without withdrawing replication already filed. Parsons v. Hardy, 400

— A party to a matter may be examined vide voce by the Master on an inquiry directed to him. Kirby's Trust, 464

— Testatrix directed her executors to pay the debt which she owed to two persons named, and for security of payment of which she had given her promissory note. The promissory note was voluntary. Whether this a good debt or a legacy was a question for a court of law, and it was not a case in which the Court could call in the assistance of a common law Judge under the statute 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83. s. 8. Longstaff v. Renshaw, 622 — Abandoned issue. See Claim.

— A plaintiff, whose case wholly fails, will not be allowed to perfect it by the gift or waiver of one defendant against another. If the case made by the bill is clear, a defendant who brought the cause to a hearing instead of demurring, was refused all costs though he succeeded. Interest on balances may be charged against an executor, though it is not prayed by the bill. Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft. Andrews v. Shakeshaft, 722

— Court will discountenance all attempts to convert offers of compromise, by letter, into admissions prejudicial to parties using them. Observations as to limited purpose for which such letters may be used. Jones v. Foxall, 725

Principal and Agent—Plaintiff consigned goods to a Liverpool merchant for sale, and drew bills upon him to amount of their value. Liverpool merchant then handed the goods to his London agent to be sold, and drew bills upon him, as an advance, upon account of the goods. London agent accepted the bills, having notice that they were consigned by plaintiff for sale. Liverpool merchant became insolvent, and bills drawn upon him by plaintiff were not paid. London agent sold the goods to recoup himself amount of bills drawn upon him by Liverpool merchant. Plaintiff then filed a bill against both firms for an account, alleging collusion, and praying that London agent might be decreed to pay him amount produced by sale of the goods. Factors Acts apply to cases where goods are pledged; no mala fides in this transaction, and it was one expressly intended to be protected by the acts. Bill for account by principal against his agent cannot be sustained in equity where transaction is single, and not tainted with fraud, plaintiff in such case having his remedy by action at law. Bill dismissed, with costs. Navulshaw v. Brownrigg, 57

Principal and Surety—A surety, upon being informed that proceedings were contemplated against himself and his principal, stated by letter his intention to pay the debt. It was determined after his decease, that the letter was a promise to pay; that his undisputed right to payment was a sufficient identity of the plaintiff, whose address was not set out in the claim; and that the forbearance to sue was a sufficient consideration for the promise. Jones v. Beach, 543

— J. W. joined in a bond as surety, and the creditor subsequently took a promissory note from principal and debtor, payable at two months, for balance due upon the bond. At the time of taking the note there was a general understanding between the principal debtor and the creditor that the remedies upon the bond should not be thereby affected. This amounted to a stipulation between the parties preventing the legal consequences that would have otherwise flowed from the transaction, and surety not released. An agreement that a dealing between creditor and principal debtor shall not operate as a discharge of the surety may be proved by parol evidence. Wyke v. Rogers, 611

Privileged Communications—Party assigned his property for benefit of creditors, one of whom filed bill to set aside deed, and insisted that particular clause inserted in it had been concealed from him. Assignor, in his answer, stated that creditor had known of clause, and in support of his case proposed to examine solicitor of creditor, as to what took place on a certain interview between solicitor and assignor with reference to deed. Demurrer by solicitor to the interrogatory, on ground that it inquired respecting matters which he only knew from confidential communications made to him by or in his agency for his client while he was acting as his solicitor, overruled. Gors v. Harris, 10

—Rule as to, between solicitor and client is not founded on ground of confidence, but on that of necessity for the rule to enable the client properly to defend, or prosecute his rights and interests. Rule inapplicable in cases of testamentary disposition, and as between parties claiming under testator. Upon question, whether executors are or are not trustees for next-of-kin, evidence of solicitor who prepared the will as to what passed between himself and testator, or his agent on subject of the will, will not be suppressed on application of executors on the ground of privilege; but all communications between executors and same solicitor, acting as their solicitor, on subject of the will of testator and after his death, are privileged. Evidence otherwise admissible will not be rejected on ground that it may disclose an illegal purpose. Semble—Existence of illegal purpose will, as in case of fraud, prevent privilege attaching; because it is as little the part or duty of a solicitor to advise his client how to evade the law, as it is to contrive a fraud. Russell v. Jackson, 146

Prochein Amy—A person whose name has been put on the record as next friend without his knowledge or sanction, who has no acquaintance with plaintiff or any of parties to the suit, and has had no means of hearing of suit, and has never heard of it until served with notice of motion to dismiss bill, is nevertheless liable to pay to defendants all costs of suit. A next friend of married woman placed on record after institution of suit is liable, not only for costs of suit incurred after his name was so placed, but for all costs of suit. Bligh v. Tredgett, 204

Production of Documents—Defendant, by his answer, denied possession of certain documents, and answer admitted to be sufficient. Plaintiff alleging by affidavit that denial of possession was untrue, and that particular documents were wilfully suppressed, moved for their production. Assuming fraud, falsehood and misrepresentation to be proved, plaintiff not entitled to move for production, but must file a bill. Reynell v. Sprye, 13

Railway—Company authorized by three acts of parliament to make distinct railways (not forming one line) with separate amount of capital for each. Another railway company, by a fourth act of parliament authorized to take lease of the three lines, and did so; and whole undertaking placed under control of joint committee of directors of all the companies. One of the three lines was sufficiently completed to be, and was, opened, and directors made calls for purpose of entirely finishing opened line, other two being abandoned. Injunction, granted at the Rolls, restraining application of money and making of calls for any purposes not authorized by the three acts, excepting only for purposes of ordinary repair, dissolved, on appeal, as being an interlocutory application, in absence of lessee company, opened line being worked under direction of joint committee. Hodgson v. Powis, 17

—Mortgagees in fee died, having devised the lands to infants, and appointed C. his executor. C. contracted with a railway company for sale of part of the lands. On petition under Trustee Act of 1850, that the legal estate might be vested in C, it was held, that the Court had no jurisdiction to make any order either in favour of, or against, the company, as to costs. In the matter of Rees' Devises, 687

—By special act of railway company certain clauses were introduced, requiring the securing to owner of certain property particular benefits by arching, making roads, &c., if that property or adjoining property were taken. By another section, no building was to be erected on part of the land required by company; and by another section, company were required to buy certain specified property. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was incorporated with special act. Company gave notice of intention to take small strip of land within boundary line of a manufactory, but not at time of passing of special act, or at time of the notice, built upon, but soon afterwards covered with buildings. It was held, first, that the land proposed to be taken formed part of a manufactory within meaning of 92nd section of Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; and, secondly, that the sections in special act were not inconsistent with 92nd section of general act. At the hearing, company produced evidence to shew that what they required could be attained by making tunnel under the land, and so not touch any part of surface; but Court held, that it was not competent for them to set up such a case at the hearing; and—semble, that such a tunnel would be taking part of a manufactory; and finally, held, that where construction of an act of parliament, which gives authority for compulsory taking of land is doubtful, it should be construed most favourably to those who seek to protect the land from innovation. Sparrow v. Oxford, Worcester and Wolverhampton Rail. Co., 731

—A local railway act enacted that the whole of certain ground in a seaport town, conveyed to the company, should be used solely for purposes of railway and buildings connected therewith, except for coke ovens or any purposes (other than necessary purposes of railway), which might cause nuisance or damage to the vendor's other property. This not restrain company from allowing part of building to be used as Custom-house, for passing luggage of passengers and travellers and other custom-house duties. Quere—Whether part of buildings could be used as sleeping rooms in connexion with an hotel built by company on adjoining ground. *Warden and Assistants of the Harbour of Dover v. Revivor—Bill filed by certain persons, as plaintiffs, for administration of personal estate of testator, and usual decree for accounts taken: Master's report made, and decree made on further directions. Suit having been neglected, Master committed prosecution of decrees to a party who had been found by the report to be a legatee. Suit afterwards abated by marriage of one of female plaintiffs. Plaintiffs having declined to take any proceedings to revive, legatee filed a bill of revivor. Demurrer to this bill by plaintiffs in original suit, allowed. Williams v. Chard, 9

Service—Where service of a bill has been made upon defendant incorrectly named in the bill, leave will be given to enter a memorandum of service upon such defendant, stating his name correctly. Witham v. Salvin, 915

Settlement—Under deed of settlement lands limited to use of trustees for 1,000 years, without impeachment of waste, upon trust, by cutting and selling timber thereon, or by demising, mortgaging, or selling premises, to raise three sums of 10,000*l.* each; and subject to said terms, to use of settlor for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to A. B. for life, without impeachment of waste, with divers remainders over. After death of settlor, A. B. entered and claimed right to cut timber for his own use exclusively. Upon bill by trustees, held, upon appeal, that upon true construction of settlement, a discretionary power was given to trustees to cut timber and apply proceeds pro tanto in discharge of sums to be raised; and that rights of A. B. as tenant for life without impeachment of waste, were subordinate to discretionary power given to trustees; and an injunction was granted to restrain A. B. from cutting timber, on the ground that his so doing would interfere with prior right given to trustees. Kekewich v. Marker, 182

—The Court will not support the re-settlement of family estates between father and son where the father obtains extensive advantages to the prejudice of the son and his family, in the absence of unequivocal proof that the whole of the facts were known to the son, that the purposes of the deed were fully explained to him, and the operation of the respective provisions known to him. But various arrangements for relief of the family estates from existing burthens, though the father obtain some advantages, were supported, on the ground that the effect of the transactions were known to the son and even acquiesced in by him. Affidavits under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35. not admitted to prove that son's marriage was entered into on faith of the re-settlement. Hoghton v. Hoghton, 482

—A charge created by C. S. upon his estates to secure the payment of a sum of money borrowed for S. H. S. is a good consideration, not only for a collateral charge upon the estates of S. H. S. to indemnify C. S. and his estate from the payment of the money borrowed, but also for a settlement of the S. estates upon his family. Recital in deed sufficient evidence of contract; and, quære, if evidence could have been received to disprove it. Ford v. Stuart, 514

—Marriage settlement omitted in an event which happened to declare a life interest in the settled fund for intended wife. The Court being of opinion that the settlor did not intend to reserve any portion of the fund for himself, declared the wife to be entitled by implication to a life interest in the settled property. Allin v. Crawshaw, 873

Ship and Shipping—A ship belonged to A. and B. in different shares, and they were registered as owners of it at port of Liverpool. In April 1849 the ship sailed from Liverpool for Sydney. In October, A. executed a power of attorney authorizing B. to sell his shares. In November A. mortgaged his shares in ship and freight to C, and the deed of mortgage was registered at Liverpool. In March 1850, B. being in Sydney (acting under power of attorney as to A.'s shares) sold the ship to D. On this occasion the old certificate of registry was given up, and the ship was registered de novo in D.'s name at Sydney. The ship, with a cargo, was put into the London Docks in February 1851, and both C. and D. took possession of it, by each of them putting a man on board. Upon the question as to rights of C. and D. in the ship and freight, it was held, that C. was entitled to A.'s shares in the ship and freight. Cato v. Irving, 875

—Where part owners of ship differ on terms of agreement to manage and charter vessel, construction of such agreement is within province of court of equity; and question of its concurrent jurisdiction with Court of Admiralty cannot be raised. Darby v. Buines, 801

Ship Registry Act—Court of equity will not enforce specific performance of contract for sale of ship or part of ship. By 34th section of statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 89. (Ship Registry Act), every sale or transfer of ship, or part of ship, must be registered, and court of equity must construe the section to extend to any contract for sale or contract to transfer. Whether under this statute an action could be maintained on contract for sale of ship or part of ship—quære. Hughes v. Morris, 761

Solicitor and Client—If a married woman acts only under the opinion of her husband's legal advisers, having no separate solicitor or counsel, the solicitor is to be deemed solicitor of wife as well as of husband; and the wife has a right to inspection of all documents which come into solicitor's possession in relation to and during that employment. Semble—Where husband and wife have distinct interests, and wife is induced, in dealing with those interests, to act under advice of a solicitor employed and paid by the husband, solicitor will be deemed to act as solicitor both of husband and wife. Wardle v. Wardle, 91

—A. contracted to buy equity of redemption of L. estate, and immediately contracted to sell part. He then mortgaged the other part and his other estates to B. for securing 10,000*l.* He then mortgaged the part of L. he had before mortgaged, to C. for securing 3,000*l.* and same part to D. for securing 1,000*l.* Legal estate in L. then conveyed by vendor to trustee for A, and term of years assigned to another trustee to attend inheritance, original mortgages affecting the same being paid off. Before mortgage for 10,000*l.* created, A. was indebted to solicitors in bill of costs, and became indebted to them for conveyance of the legal estate. On occasion of that conveyance, title deeds of L. estates were handed over by vendor to solicitors, as solicitors for A. Subsequently one of firm of soli-

- citors, having no notice of mortgage for 10,000*l.*, took assignment of 3,000*l.* and 1,000*l.* mortgages, and made further advance on same security. Deeds, if in hands of A, were subject to right of B, and were so subject in hands of solicitor. Deeds being delivered by vendor to the solicitors and not to A. and by him to solicitors, made no difference. No distinction between costs due before the mortgage to B. and costs of getting in legal estate, the solicitors in that matter being employed by A, and he alone being responsible for them. A client cannot give a lien to his solicitor of a higher nature than the interest which he himself has in deeds. Pelly v. Wathen, 105
- Solicitor and Client (continued) — J. F. a writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, employed P, a solicitor, as his agent in London, and introduced to him business of some importance, which a client of his had in England. P, by letter, promised to allow J. F. one-half of profits of all such business, so long as he should retain the same, directly or indirectly. Upon discovery of this by the client, who had obtained an order for taxation of P's bills of costs, he presented a petition, asking that taxing Master might disallow all such share of charges as P. had promised to pay to J. F. If agreement illegal, it could not be enforced by J. F. The 22 Geo. 2. c. 46. s. 11. being a penal act must be construed strictly. The business having been done, solicitor entitled to payment, and client could not avail himself of letters to refuse payment, or insist upon deducting from bills of cost what P. had promised to allow to J. F. and production of documents, relating to bills of costs, left to discretion of taxing Master; and petition dismissed, with costs. Gordon v. Dalzell, 206
- If a suit be commenced by a solicitor without the authority of his client, it will be dismissed on motion, with costs as between solicitor and client, including costs of motion to dismiss. Crossley v. Crouther, 565

- Solicitor's Bill of Costs—Solicitors in London appointed to a projected company. Other solicitors appointed as local solicitors, and directed to prepare notices to landowners, and other matters connected with local board. Errors discovered in these, and scheme ultimately abandoned. London solicitors in their bill of costs charged for preparation of these notices, and taxing Master allowed them. The Master of the Rolls disallowed the claim, and "directed" solicitors to establish their right at law, on grounds that facts disputed, and that on facts, as far as they were ascertained, there were questions of law to be decided. On appeal, claim disallowed until it should be established at law, and solicitors "were to be at liberty" to bring such action as they might be advised. In re Burdell, 236

- Special Case—After special case under Sir G. Turner's Act had been set down for hearing, a party interested in the question was born. Practice in such case as to amendment of case and setting it down again. Thistlethwaite v. Garner, 18
- Specific Performance—to enforce an agreement by a railway company to pay for residential injury, although company amalgamated with another company, who formed the railway in another direction, and did not pass through plaintiff's property. Preston v. Liverpool, &c. Junction Rail. Co., 61
- A, in a letter addressed to B, said he would let the coal at L. B. to B. on terms stated in agreement in hands of C. C. had two papers in his hands. One was called terms for letting "coals," &c. at L. B. and G. E; the other, instructions, &c. "to obtain coal in L. B." A. and another were, in fact, tenants in common in fee of the L. B. and G. E. property. B. assigned his interest to P, who filed bill for specific performance of agreement by A. and other joint owner, but subsequently bill dismissed against other owner. Prayer of bill was, that both might specifically perform agreement, or that A. might perform it if claim should fail against both. "Coals, &c." ambiguous, and it was uncertain which of the documents in hands of C. was meant. Also there being no ground of impropriety or misrepresentation by A, Court would not act against him as owner of an undivided moiety by decreeing specific performance as to that share, with compensation for other moiety which he was unable to demise. Price v. Griffith, 78
- Agreement by railway company, in consideration of landowner's opposition being withdrawn, to pay him 4,500*l.* as purchase-money of land not exceeding eight acres to be taken by company for formation of their railway, and for consequential damages to landowner's property. Railway was abandoned, and landowner filed claim for specific performance, which was decreed; but on appeal, claim was dismissed, as plaintiff had means of complete redress at law. Webb v. Direct London and Portsmouth Rail. Co., 337
- Claim for specific performance by A. against B, stating that B. had agreed by writing to demise a house to A, for a certain term, at a certain rent, and that at said time A. had agreed by parol to pay B. a premium of 200*l.* Claim prayed that B. might grant A. a lease, A. offering to pay the premium agreed on by parol. Claim dismissed, as being in contravention of the Statute of Frauds. In consideration of 200*l.* premium paid by A. a lease was granted to A. of a house at a certain rent for a certain term. This term expired. B. agreed to grant A. a lease for a certain term at a certain rent, under and subject to same covenants, clauses, and agreements as were contained in old lease. This agreement did not include term that A. should pay B. a premium of 200*l.* Martin v. Pycroft, 448
- Specific performance will not be decreed when the parties can have complete relief at law, if entitled to have any. Case in which the principle of mutuality failed and laches fatal to suit. Stuart v. London and North-Western Rail. Co., 450
- In a contract for sale lands were described as partly freehold and partly leasehold. Title deeds did not clearly define boundaries and extent of the two properties; but the uncertainty did not arise from an instrument incapable of legal construction in that respect. Such uncertainty not an objection to a decree for specific performance. Vendor of leaseholds, held under an ecclesiastical corporation, previously to his contract for sale was in treaty with the lessors for a renewal of the lease, and continued such treaty after the contract. This did not throw upon him the obligation of procuring such renewal for the benefit of the purchaser. Monro v. Taylor, 525

Staying Proceedings—A party, ordered to pay the general costs of certain suits, pending an appeal, moved for leave to file a supplemental bill in nature of a bill of review, and obtained leave to do so on depositing 50*l.* with the registrar, and he was ordered to pay the costs of the motion. He paid the 50*l.*, but not the costs of the motion, and filed a supplemental bill. Payment of the costs of the motion a condition annexed to the order giving leave to file supplemental bill, and all proceedings in the supplemental suit stayed until payment of them. If a party is ordered to pay the general costs of a suit, and also the costs of a particular motion, and then files a bill against the party entitled to all those costs, if the latter moves to stay all proceedings in the new suit until costs of the particular motion are paid, that is a waiver of any right he may have to stay proceedings until general costs of the suit are paid, and the Court will only stay the proceedings until costs of the particular motion are paid. Sprye v. Reynell, 684

Taxation—Non-compliance with an order, made upon terms at law, to tax a solicitor's bill of costs, and failure of other proceedings at law to obtain renewed orders, should be stated when applying for an order of course to tax a solicitor's bill of costs in equity; and omission to state those facts is a ground for discharging the order, though the party might be entitled to an order upon special application. How far a judgment signed at law for default will prevent the obtaining an order of course in this court: and whether such order, if granted, will not stay execution on such judgment—quære. In re Gedyce, 430 — Receiver in a suit assigned dividends to which she was entitled for life, to her sureties as security for their bond. The receiver paid balance found due from her into court, and recognisances ordered to be vacated. Sureties refused to re-assign the dividends. Solicitors of sureties delivered bills of costs incurred by them in the suit. Receiver borrowed money for her support, and for the support of her children, and had executed a warrant of attorney, upon which judgment was entered up. The creditor threatened execution, and in order to obtain the dividends receiver paid the bills of costs out of the dividends which had accumulated in hands of the trustees of the settlement, but gave notice that she did so under protest, and without prejudice to her rights. A correspondence had taken place between the solicitors of the parties respecting taxation, which ended in the receiver agreeing to pay the costs of it. Payment was made on the 14th of August 1850, and on the 7th of June 1851 the receiver petitioned at the Rolls for an order under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, for taxation of the bill, alleging that it was paid under pressure, and with protest, but the petition was dismissed; and, on appeal, the decision below was affirmed, but without costs, the authorities being conflicting.

Tithes—Receipt by rector of parish in London for some years, without objection, of fixed sum by way of tithes of particular premises, though less than the annual value, does not necessarily imply a composition. Quære—whether rule requiring six months' notice for determining ordinary composition for tithes in kind is applicable to case of composition for a money payment in lieu of tithes. Form of reference to Master to take an account of tithes due under the 37 Hen. 8. c. 12, where rent or annual value of premises is increased by means of implements or fittings not titheable let or used therewith. *Letts v. Trust and Trustee—Transfer of fund paid into court under Trustees Relief Act can only be directed by order made on petition. In re Masselin's Trusts, 53

— Trustees who improperly retain balances or cause or permit trust money to be lost, are chargeable for same, with interest at 4*l.* per cent. Where trustees have money in their hands, which they are bound permanently to invest for benefit of their cestui que trust, the rule of the Court is generally that they shall invest in 3*l.* per cents.; therefore, if they neglect to do so, and there is no express direction not to do so, or there is an express trust that they shall do so, in the latter case; and semble, as to the two former cases, it is in the option of the cestui que trust to charge them either with principal sum retained and interest, or with amount of 3*l.* per cents. which would have been purchased if investment had been made. Where trustees lend, or use trust money in trade, they are chargeable not only with the money and interest, but with profits made in the trade, the interest generally being 5*l.* per cent. Turnpike road bonds, secured by a mortgage or charge on tolls and toll-houses, are real estate, and held so to be, overruling the same decree; and although the tenant for life was declared entitled to the interest on them, the Court, considering the social changes resulting from the formation of railways, directed a reference to the Master, to inquire whether it was expedient to leave assets so invested. Robinson v. Robinson, 111

— Fund belonging to pauper lunatic was paid by trustees into court under 10 & 11 Vict. c. 96. On petition of guardians of poor, order made for payment to them out of fund of expenses incurred by parish in support of lunatic. Upfall's Trust, 119

— By an ante-nuptial settlement trustees were empowered, with consent of parties, to sell out trust funds, and invest proceeds upon real securities: By memorandum executed contemporaneously with and indorsed on settlement, parties requested trustees to advance trust monies to the owners of Vauxhall Gardens upon mortgage as first, second, or third mortgagees. "The owners" meant owners at date of settlement and memorandum, and an advance to the three owners, originally without security, and subsequent acceptance of a mortgage with a joint and several covenant from two of the three owners, one having then retired,

- a breach of trust, and trustees ordered to bring fund into court. The bill alleged that some of plaintiffs were children of another plaintiff, and that they and certain defendants were the only children of the marriage. The answer did not deny the allegation, but stated that the defendants did not know that these were all the children, and raised no objection for want of parties on this ground; no evidence was gone into to prove the relationship. The Court refused to entertain an objection, taken for the first time on the rehearing, that some of plaintiffs had not proved their title. Fowler v. Reynal, 121
- Trust and Trustees (continued)—When trustees have paid monies into court under Trustees Indemnity Acts, the remedy of plaintiff as to sum paid in can be prosecuted only under those statutes, and not under ordinary jurisdiction of the Court by bill or claim. Goode v. West, 127
- Trustee desiring to be discharged without change as to trust property, or persons with whom he was associated, and seeking aid of Court for that purpose, not allowed costs, but not compelled to pay any. Porter v. Watts, 211
- When a trustee, having good reason to doubt the validity of an appointment of the trust funds, thinks proper to act upon it, he will be affected by all the consequences which follow upon the act. The Court will not undo part only of one entire transaction. Therefore, where certain que trust sought to impeach an appointment under one deed, without seeking to impeach a subsequent appointment which was directly connected with the former, and by which they were benefited, the Court dismissed the bill, with costs, but without prejudice to a new bill being filed. Harrison v. Randall, 294
- Mortgagee in fee died intestate as to mortgaged premises, but appointed an executor. His heir-at-law could not be found or was unknown. Mortgage money still due, and not intended to be paid off, but executor, wishing to make transfer of mortgage, petitioned, under 19th section of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, the Trustee Act, 1850, for an order vesting mortgaged premises in him. Court had jurisdiction upon such petition to make the order, and the legislature did not mean to confine its authority to the case of simple "re-conveyance." Boden's Estate, 316
- A sum of stock was standing in names of A. and B. in trust for C. for life, with remainders over. A. and B. refused to pay the dividends to C. On petition presented by C. under Trustee Act, 1850, that right to receive dividends accrued and to accrue might vest in her, under 23rd and 24th sections, order made as to dividends already accrued, notwithstanding refusal of two trustees; and no order made as to future dividends. In re Hartnall's Trusts, 384
- Stock was standing in names of A. and B. upon trust for C. for life, with remainders over. By order made in cause instituted by C. against A. and B. with respect to the stock, it was ordered that A. and B. should transfer the stock to the credit of the cause. A. refused to make the transfer. On petition by C. under Trustee Act, 1850, and in the cause, praying that right to transfer might be vested in B. alone, the Court had no jurisdiction to make the order. Mackenzie v. Mackenzie, 385
- Power of surviving trustee to nominate a sole trustee to act in his place, and appointment by recital good. A receipt signed by more persons than one, that one having power to give receipts, is a valid receipt by that one. Müller v. Priddon, 421
- Trustees sold out trust stock and handed proceeds to J, their solicitor, for re-investment, who misapplied the money. In suit by certain que trust, against trustees and J, plaintiffs examined J. as a witness, and bill dismissed as against him. Decree made, notwithstanding, against trustees, on ground that J. not a necessary party to suit in order to obtain relief prayed against trustees. Quare—whether effect of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85. is to enable the Court to make a decree against a defendant in equity who has been examined as a witness in the cause. Rowland v. Witherden, 480
- Testator devised real estate to A. and B, their executors, administrators and assigns, for 500 years, upon trust to raise by sale or mortgage 2,400*l.*, and directed them to put out the same on government or real securities, and call in and replace out the same from time to time, and to pay the income to C. for life, and after her death to pay the principal to such persons as C. should appoint by will, and in default of appointment to C.'s children. The will did not contain power for trustees to give receipts. A. and B. mortgaged estate to C. for 2,400*l.*, and C. assigned mortgage to D. Power for A. and B. to give receipts implied, and D. entitled to mortgaged premises as against persons claiming under trusts of testator's will. If C. had paid the money to A. and B. he would not have been bound to see to its application; and if the mortgage deed to C. was regular on the face of it, D. would not have been affected by any breach of trust in which A. B. and C. might have been implicated. Lock v. Lomas, 503
- Testator bequeathed residue of his personal estate to his executors, in trust for his wife for life, and, after her decease, for his nephews and nieces, whereby legacy duty would be payable at death of the wife. Under 36 Geo. 3. c. 52. s. 13. the executrix of surviving executor might, during life of the widow, transfer the trust fund to new trustees of the will appointed by the Court. In re Jones's Trust, 566
- Bill filed against trustees, praying that amount of trust fund which trustees "had, or but for their wilful neglect or default might have, received, might be ascertained." At the hearing, bill dismissed as against one trustee, and amount and particulars of trust fund directed to be ascertained. Nothing was said about wilful default, nor did the trustee ask that bill might be dismissed as to wilful default. Master made his report, which stated certain facts, and referred to certain documents, from which it was alleged that it would appear that there had been wilful default. At the hearing upon further directions, decree made referring it to the Master to inquire whether trustee "could with due diligence, and without wilful neglect or default, have received" more than a particular stated fund, but upon appeal it was held, that direction as to wilful default should be struck out of decree. As a general rule, in order to obtain a direction for inquiry as to wilful default against an executor or trustee, the bill must allege a case, pray for it, and one case at least must be proved; and, semble, that if from admission or proof a suspicion arises whether wilful default has or not been committed, and it appears likely that further evidence can be obtained, the Court ought to direct an inquiry short of directing wilful default, but in such a way as to call defendant's attention to it, with the view to ground thereon a new order, at a future stage, directing an inquiry as to wilful default. Coope v. Carter, 570
- Case in which an unauthorized management of trust estate, concurred in by the certain que trust and sanctioned by the Court, and which had proved beneficial to the trust estate, was considered as binding on the cestui que trust. Neale v. Pink, ex parte Fletcher, 574

— Real estate was vested in a trustee in fee for a party for life, with remainder to her children equally. Children took life estates only, all words of limitation being omitted. Recitals will not be allowed to cut down the clear effect of the operative part of a deed. Holliday v. Overton, 769

— Trustee, at request of cestui que trust, a married woman, who was entitled for life to dividends of 4,000*l.* consols, sold out trust fund, and invested it upon railway debenture. Upon suit by her to have fund re-invested in stock, it was held, that trustee must replace stock and account for dividends as if it had not been sold; no costs given on either side; and costs of parties entitled in remainder paid by plaintiff. Mast v. Leith, 719

— Trustee of marriage settlement, who allowed 350*l.* to remain in hands of trading firm for period exceeding fifteen years after death of tenant for life, but who eventually, and before bill filed, paid principal, with 5*l.* per cent. interest, was held liable to account, with annual rests, and also to costs of suit. Jones v. Foxall, 725

— Testatrix, by her will, gave 2,000*l.* stock to two trustees, in trust for plaintiff, and after making her will, she expressed her intention of giving a further sum of 2,000*l.* to plaintiff upon the same trusts. One trustee died during life of testatrix: surviving trustee transferred two separate sums of 2,000*l.* stock, at two different times, into her own name, and gave plaintiff a power of attorney to receive dividends upon both sums. There was evidence to prove that trustee knew of the desire of testatrix to give second sum of 2,000*l.* to plaintiff, and that trustee had expressed her intention of carrying that desire into effect. Trustee afterwards became of unsound mind. It was held, that second sum of 2,000*l.* so transferred by trustee was sufficiently impressed with a trust in favour of plaintiff. Gray v. Gray, 745

— A woman, being entitled to a bond debt due to her from B, by a settlement made on her marriage, and dated in 1829, assigned it to a trustee upon trust for A. for life, for separate use, with remainders over. In 1836, a part of the debt was paid to A. and her husband. In 1842, C. was appointed sole trustee of settlement. In 1843, A. charged her life interest in bond debt in favour of D, by way of collateral security for a debt due from her husband to D. In 1843, B. died, and A. took out administration to B. Bill by D. against C. to enforce security, charging him with wilful default for omitting to get in the part of debt paid to A. and her husband, and residue of the debt due from estate of B. C. not liable, and bill dismissed. Thackwell v. Gardiner, 777

— After a wife had attained her majority, information was given by her to trustees of will under which she was entitled to property, that a bill would be filed against them charging them with breaches of trust and seeking an account. Trustees, after this notice, paid her share into court, under Trustee Act. Upon petition for payment of money out of court, trustees were refused their costs. In re Waring, 784

— In cases where new trustees are appointed under Trustee Act, 1850, real estates subject to trust ought to be conveyed to them by deed, and vesting order ought only to be resorted to when it is inconvenient to obtain a conveyance. Langhorn v. Langhorn, 860

— The Court will not, under the Trustee Act, order removal of trustee merely on ground of his having gone out of the jurisdiction. In re Maiz, 875

— A sum of money having been paid into court under Trustees Relief Act, a petition was presented by tenant for life for payment of dividends. Corpus of fund not liable to bear costs of application. Bangley's Trust, 875

Usury—It is not usury to receive interest on a mortgage debt secured on real estates at 5*l.* per cent. per annum from a day anterior to the day of actual payment of the principal, if from delay not occasioned by the mortgagee the payment of the principal is postponed, and if it was the bona fide intention of the parties to have paid and received the principal on the day from which the interest is reserved; and a fortiori, if, under the circumstances, less than the legal amount of interest has been paid. Long v. Storie, 521

Vendor and Purchaser—Real estate, including property in possession and in reversion, put up for sale by auction in lots, under condition that vendors should confirm Master's report of purchases on or before the 25th of December 1849, and that, on or before that day, each purchaser should pay his purchase-money into court, or pay interest on it at 5*l.* per cent. from that day. Through default of vendors, Master's report was not confirmed until August 1851. On motion that purchaser of a reversion should pay purchase-money into court with interest from the 25th of December 1849, ordered accordingly. Wallis v. Sarel, 717

— Bill by solicitor against his client for specific performance of contract for sale by auction dismissed, with costs; purchase being made by solicitor (who had conduct of sale) whilst his client was a minor, and sale not having been conducted with due regard to interests of client or protection of estate. Solicitor for vendor, bidding in person at sale on his own behalf, is bound to state that fact publicly, in order to exclude inference that he is bidding on behalf of estate. A reserved bidding is proper in case of sale of infant's estate; but where there is no reserved bidding, that fact should be publicly stated. Cutts v. Salmon, 750

— Leasehold property put up for sale with condition that lessor's title would not be shewn and should not be inquired into. In inquiry as to title in a reference to Master, purchaser shewed that lessors were a canal company, and that company had, under their act, power of selling the property, but not power of leasing it. Purchaser was precluded by conditions of sale from taking that objection to title. Hume v. Bentley, 780

Vendor and Purchaser (continued)—A. signed the usual agreement for purchase at an auction, and also memorandum that he had purchased as trustee for B, who was present and paid deposit. The abstract of title was sent to solicitor, but whether he acted for A. or B, or both, was disputed, and was afterwards sent by vendors to B's solicitor. On bill filed by vendors against A. and B. for specific performance, A. stated as above, but B. stated that he had bought the property as sub-purchaser from B. The contract having been entered into by the vendors with A, bill dismissed as against B, but A. not bound by any communications or proceeding which had taken place as to title or otherwise between vendors and B. Chadwick v. Maden, 878

Under contract to sell copyhold estate and timber upon it, at a certain price for the estate, and an additional price for the timber, according to the amount at which the timber may have been previously valued for purposes of sale, vendor not bound to shew any licence, custom, or grant to sell or cut the timber. Crosse v. Keene, 892

Where there is one entire contract for sale of intermixed freehold and copyhold lands and of timber on both lands, and vendor stipulates against distinguishing freeholds from copyholds, the title to the timber follows the land, and the purchaser cannot insist upon the timber growing on the copyholds being distinguished from that growing on the freeholds, although the price for the timber is in addition to that for the land. Crosse v. Lawrence, 889

Voluntary Assignment—Assignee of debt under voluntary assignment, filed claim against representatives of deceased debtor and assignor for payment of debt or administration of debtor's estate. Plaintiff no equity, and claim dismissed. Sewell v. Moxy, 824

Waste—Several persons were entitled successively to life estates in real property limited in strict settlement: they became bankrupt, and their assignees cut down timber left for ornament and shelter. Upon bill filed on behalf of H. L. then first tenant in tail in existence, who was an infant, assignees were ordered to bring the money into court; this, with accumulations, amounted to 26,133*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* Two of the tenants for life died without issue; H. L. attained twenty-one, and being still first tenant in tail, and entitled to first estate of inheritance, he presented petition for payment to him of fund and accumulations: which were ordered to be transferred to him. Lushington v. Boldero, 49

— See Church.

Watercourse—A person may by long user acquire a right to water of a stream free from pollution, though he may have no proprietorship in the stream, and may acquire a right to pour polluted matter into a stream as against all new comers. Wood v. Sutcliffe, 253

Will—upon construction of which it was held that annuities payable out of interest and dividends of money in the funds had no priority over legacies, but annuities and legacies must abate rateably; and that the annuities were not chargeable on the corpus. Miller v. Huddleston, 1

— Gift to "the husbands of my daughters" construed to mean the individuals whom testatrix knew as the then husbands. Bryan's Trust, 7

— Testator by will disposed of his own property, and then by virtue of a power in his marriage settlement, appointed trust property among six of his children, nominatim, in equal shares, and requested them "not to sink into or spend their respective shares, but to leave the same for the benefit of their respective children, and if any of them have no children then to leave the same so that their share may go in the same way as my general estate and effects are limited." These words formed no part of the appointment; but were inconsistent with the power. No trust raised for the grandchildren; no case of election arose; and children entitled to their shares absolutely. Black v. Lamb, 46

— Testator gave residue of his property, both real and personal, to his son Matthew, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with proviso that in case his son Matthew should die without leaving any lawful issue of his body, such part of residuary estate as might be in the nature of freehold, should at his death be divided into two equal parts, one half part whereof he gave to his son Charles and the other half to his daughter Frances. Testator's son Matthew took an estate in fee in freeholds, with an executory devise over to take effect in event of his dying without issue living at his death. Ex parte Davies, in re Wills, Somerset and Weymouth Rail. Co., 135

— Testator, by will, bequeathed a policy of assurance on his own life to A. and B, upon uses of letter signed by them and himself. At date of will there was no such letter. Subsequently testator addressed a note to his executors and signed a memorandum, by which he stated his wishes as to disposition of monies to be received in respect of policy. Testator kept policy in his possession until his death. No trust created by memorandum, and policy formed part of residue. Johnson v. Ball, 310

— Trusts, substituting issue for parent after youngest child attained twenty-one void for remoteness; trusts of estate, after death of last survivor of children of M. G. void for remoteness; and trusts of produce of residue of real estates directed to be sold after decease of last surviving child of M. G. void for remoteness. Gooch v. Gooch, 238

— Testator directed trustees to set apart sufficient stock to produce 700*l.* a year, and pay, among others, an annuity of 200*l.* a year to his brother Thomas for life, and after his decease to continue it amongst his brother's children then living, in equal shares, during their lives, and at the decease of any of them, the stock from which the 200*l.* a year arose, to be sold, and produce divided equally amongst children of him or her so dying, as they should severally attain twenty-one, with interest in mean time to be applied for their benefit; and he said, "I give them vested interests therein; and if any of his brother's children should at his decease be dead, and have left issue, such issue should be entitled amongst them to the money they would eventually have been entitled to had their parent outlived his brother. If any of parties anticipated the payment, or sold his interest before due, it was declared to be forfeited, and applied as if such parties had died before legacy fell due. Testator then appointed his trustees executors and residuary legatees. 23,333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* was set aside to answer the 700*l.* a year. Testator's brother Thomas died, leaving six children, of whom Richard was one, living at date of will, and he, after decease of his father until his death, received an annuity of 36*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, being one-sixth of 200*l.* a year. Richard died, leaving three children surviving, one of whom was born in lifetime of original testator. The children of Richard not entitled to money representing the annuity to which he was entitled, it fell into testator's residuary estate. Greenwood v. Roberts, 262

— Testatrix by will gave to S. P., whom she appointed her sole executrix, 3,000*l.*, and like sum of 3,000*l.* in addition for the trouble she would have in acting as executrix; and she gave all the residue of her personal estate to S. P., her executors, administrators and assigns, "well knowing that she will make a good use and dispose of it in a manner in accordance with my views and wishes." Among the papers of testatrix were found some memorandums in writing made since 1 Will. 4. c. 40. and unattested, specifying certain charitable and other bequests which testatrix desired to be made, one of which was addressed to S. P. S. P. by her answer denied all knowledge of the "views and wishes" of the testatrix previously to her death. S. P. not take residue beneficially, but a trustee for next-of-kin. Quere—if the unattested papers were admissible in evidence to explain intentions of testatrix. Briggs v. Penny, 265

— Under bequest for all and every the "issue" of E. living at decease of her and her husband, but if any of issue of E. should die in lifetime of survivor of E. and her husband leaving issue, the issue of such issue so dying should take the share his parent would have been entitled to. "Issue" meant children, and if the testator had intended to express descendants, words "issue of issue" would have had no meaning. Pope v. Pope, 276

— A specific enumeration of articles after bequest to J. E. K. of "all and everything I die possessed of," followed by declaration, "I leave everything I die possessed of to J. E. K. for her entire and sole use and benefit," is a general residuary bequest. In re Kendall, 278

— Testator gave 25,000*l.* upon trust to pay the income to his daughter for life, and after her death to pay the capital to the children of his daughter equally, on their attaining twenty-one; the interest of their shares until their becoming entitled to the principal to be applied for their maintenance; and in case any of the children should die before being entitled in possession to his, her, or their shares, the shares of those so dying should go to the survivors. Testator's daughter had two children living at his death, who both attained twenty-one; one of whom died in the lifetime of her mother. Representatives of deceased child entitled to moiety of fund. Yates's Trust, 281

— Testator bequeathed interest of 3,000*l.* at 5*l.* per cent. to his daughter for life, and after her death, he gave the 3,000*l.* in trust for all the children of his daughter, share and share alike, to be paid to sons at twenty-one and daughters at twenty-one or marriage, with interest in the mean time on their shares for their maintenance and education, and benefit of survivorship, in event of any of said children dying without issue. Testator's daughter had five children living at his death, one of whom attained twenty-one and died in her lifetime without issue. Representatives of deceased child entitled to his share. Tribe v. Newland, 276

— Testator at his decease left a widow and three children all of whom attained twenty-one and survived the wife. By his will he gave real and personal estate to trustees "to transfer to each of his children their share after the death of his wife, or as soon as they arrived at twenty-one years, but if one of the three children should die leaving no children, his or her share should be equally divided between the other two, and their heirs for ever." One of testator's children married, and died, leaving no children, but leaving his wife surviving. He took a vested interest in his share of testator's property not liable to be defeated upon his afterwards dying without leaving a child surviving. Edwards v. Edwards, 324

— Revocation of, as to mortgaged estate, and estate contracted to be purchased before date of will, by re-conveyance of mortgaged estate and conveyance of purchased estate to uses to bar dower. Testator's heir, who claimed these estates by descent, not put to his election. Plowden v. Hyde, 329

— Testator bequeathed all his property to his widow, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for her sole benefit, in full confidence that she would appropriate and apply same for benefit of his children. This a gift of an estate for life to the widow, with power of appointment in favour of the children, with gift in default of appointment to the children as joint tenants. Wace v. Mallard, 355

— Testatrix directed trustees to pay dividends arising from personal estate invested at her decease in or upon any stocks, funds, or securities whatsoever, yielding interest to certain persons mentioned in her will. Testatrix, at her death, left a balance in hands of her banker, who was in the habit of allowing his customers interest upon the amount standing to their credit on a particular day in the year. This balance did not come within terms used by testatrix, but undisposed of by the will. Archibald v. Hartley, 399

— Testator bequeathed all rents and arrears of rent, with timber felled, and other annual profits due to him at time of his decease, from his Berwick Hill estate, unto person or persons who should be entitled to the freehold "and" inheritance of the same estate in possession at his decease. On death of testator, his brother became tenant for life of his estate. The words "freehold and inheritance," read "freehold or inheritance," and tenant for life entitled to the rents, &c. specified in above clause. Also tenant for life entitled under this bequest to rents payable from last quarter-day up to day of testator's death, and also to certain bricks, tiles, and brick-earth being upon the estate at death of testator. Stapleton v. Stapleton, 434

— Testator bequeathed to his son William dividends, interest and annual produce to arise from sum of 3,000*l.* 3*l.* per cent. Bank annuities for his life; and after his decease he gave said principal sum of 3,000*l.* to all and every the child or children of his said son, to be equally divided between them, or if only one child, then the whole to such only child, to be paid on their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one; interest in the mean time to be applied for their maintenance and education. Testator gave two further sums of 3,000*l.* to another son and daughter in similar terms; and upon the death of either of his said sons and daughter without issue, then he directed interest, dividends and produce so given to him, her, or them so dying to be paid to the survivors and survivor in equal shares and proportions. Testator's son William had one child only, who died an infant during his father's lifetime. Infant took a vested interest in the 3,000*l.*, liable to be divested by the death of his father without leaving issue living at his death; and that event having happened, gift over took effect. Westwood v. Southey, 473

— Testator gave leasehold house, let for twenty-eight years, to trustees to pay rents and profits for benefit of his five children, whom he named, or the survivors or survivor of them, in equal shares and proportions, share and share alike. The words "survivors or survivor" referred to death of any of them in his lifetime and the words "share and share alike" referred to those children who should survive him, and created a tenancy in common, and the interest vested in the children on death of testator. Ashford v. Haines, 496

Will (continued) — Cases illustrating the rules governing the cases in which one legatee in case of death is substituted for another, whether they are prior legatees or legatees specifically named, or whether it is one of a class to be ascertained. Coulthurst v. Carter, 555, and Ive v. King, 560

— An estate was settled to such uses as W. D., a feme covert, should by deed or will appoint. W. D. devised the estate to R. D., her husband, with power to sell and dispose of the same, and to raise any sum or sums of money thereon by mortgage or otherwise as he should think proper, but with this proviso, "Provided, and these presents are upon this express condition, that such part of all and every sum and sums of money as aforesaid raised by the said R. D. either by sale or mortgage, as shall be unexpended at my (his) decease shall be charged upon the houses belonging to the said R. D., situate at, &c., to be disposed of immediately after the decease of the said R. D.; that is to say, that that sum shall be paid to my four nieces, share and share alike." And in case the estate should not be mortgaged to its full value, the testatrix devised the reversion to her said four nieces; and in case the estate should not be sold or mortgaged by R. D., she devised the same to her four nieces, and their heirs, as tenants in common. R. D. mortgaged the estate, and died without having made any charge of the mortgage-money or any part thereof upon his houses. This condition not a condition precedent, and the mortgages made by R. D. valid. Watkins v. Williams. Haverd v. Davis, 601

— Testator directed trustees to pay the interest of 1,000*l.* to A. for life, and after her death, to divide the principal between the child and children of A., and if there should be only one child, then the whole to such child, to be a vested interest or vested interests on their respectively attaining the age of thirty years, and directed that, if any child should die under thirty years, without lawful issue, the share of him or her so dying should go to the survivors or survivor, and become vested at the same time as their original shares. B., one of the children of A., died in the lifetime of A. under thirty years of age. The gift to B. as one of the children of A., a valid bequest, and the gift over on death of B. without issue, void for remoteness, and therefore the representatives of B. entitled to a share of the fund. Taylor v. Frobisher, 605

— Testator bequeathed all his property of whatever description to his wife, her executors, administrators and assigns, to and for her and their own use and benefit, upon the fullest trust and confidence reposed in her that she would dispose of the same to and for the joint benefit of herself and his children. Widow entitled to have entire residuary property transferred and paid to her for her own use and benefit. Webb v. Woods, 625

— Testator, a mortgagee in fee of real estate, gave and bequeathed to A. all his monies, securities for money, and all his goods, chattels, personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, to hold to A., his executors, administrators and assigns, he paying thereout all his debts. The legal estate in the mortgaged property passed to A. King's Estate, 673

— Testator, a mortgagee in fee of real estate, gave and bequeathed to A. and B. all and singular his household furniture, goods, plate, linen, and utensils whatsoever, and all and every other his goods and chattels, stock-in-trade, monies, debts, and securities for money, and all and every other his personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, upon trust to get in his debts and to sell his personal estate, and hold the money arising therefrom upon the trusts therein mentioned. Under these words, the legal estate in the mortgaged property passed to the trustees. Walker's Estate, 674

— Testator, by his will, bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate to his executors, upon trust to pay his wife the income and profits thereof, so long as she should continue his widow. A part of personal estate of testator, at his death, consisted of a debt of 12,000*l.* payable by annual instalments of 1,500*l.*, with interest at 5*l.* per cent. from the death on the debt or such part as for the time being should remain unpaid. Tenant for life entitled to 4*l.* per cent. on debt or such part as should remain unpaid, and the other 1*l.* per cent. to be invested for benefit of tenant for life and those entitled in remainder. Meyer v. Simonson, 678

— Testator devised real estate to A. in fee, charged with an annuity to B. for life, and directed that after death of B. estate should be charged with payment of 100*l.* a-piece to X, Y. and Z. and that the same should be paid to them respectively within six calendar months after death of B. or such of them as should be then living. X. died in lifetime of B. Legacy to X. had not vested, and was not payable to his representatives. Goodman v. Drury, 680

— Testator directed three trustees to raise fund sufficient to pay annuity to one of them, and gave power to resort to residue if the fund should become deficient. Trustees invested more than enough on mortgage, and on mortgage being paid off, the annuitant (a trustee) received the money, and misapplied it. Annuity had been assigned, and the assignment recited the appropriation. Purchaser filed bill against all the trustees. It was held, that there had been an appropriation: that recital was binding on purchaser as to appropriation, and that he had no claim upon residue. Barnett v. Sheffield, 692

— Residue, including railway shares, bequeathed to certain persons for their lives, and after decease of survivor to religious societies. It was held, that railway shares must be sold and produce invested in stock. Thornton v. Ellis, 714

— Testator gave his freehold estate and "property whether real or personal" to M. S. for life, and after her decease he gave all his said freehold estate and property to S. H. and his wife for their lives, and after their decease he gave all his said freehold property to their children in fee simple; but in case none should attain twenty-one, he gave his freehold estate and property to W. M. in fee simple. He charged his personal estate with payment of several legacies, and the residue of what he should die possessed of was to become the property of M. S. M. S. entitled to the personal estate, and S. H. his wife and children took no interest in the personal estate. Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft. Andrews v. Shakeshaft, 722

— A. devised freehold and leasehold estates to B. and C., their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, with power for B. and C., or survivor of them, his heirs, executors and administrators, to sell the devised property. A. survived B. and died, leaving C. his heir-at-law, and having by his will devised all his trust estates to C. and D. and appointed them his executors. Neither C. alone, nor C. and D. together, had the power of selling estates devised by A. Wilson v. Bennett, 741

— Testator gave to his wife all his stock in trade, working jewellery and implements, and all his book debts, ready cash, money in the funds, bills, bonds, notes, or other securities whatsoever, for her life, if she should so long continue his widow; but at her death, or second marriage, he gave the said stock in trade, monies, debts and assets, and also all his household furniture, to be equally divided among the children he then had, or might thereafter have. But in case his wife should not marry again, then testator bequeathed to her, all and every his personal estate and effects whatsoever for her life, and same to be equally divided amongst such of his children as should be living at her decease, share and share alike. It was held, that first clause in will was not intended to be a specific bequest, and the last a residuary bequest; but that both clauses were intended to deal with the whole property, and were applicable to different events: the first applying to testator's widow marrying again, the latter to her dying without marrying again, and the latter event being the one which happened, the children living at her death became entitled, to exclusion of the representatives of those who had died. Wiggins v. Wiggins, 742

— Testator after giving directions for maintenance and education of his sons M. and N. during their minorities, declared that when they should have attained twenty-one years, his trustees should pay the then residue of his estate unto his two sons, provided that they should be in the opinion of his trustees, of competent understanding to take due care thereof. M. and N. were both lunatic at time of their attaining their majority. Qualification as to sons being of competent understanding not make gift to them conditional, and testator's estate vested in them absolutely. Wright v. Wright, 775

— Testator directed investment of personal estate sufficient to pay 2l. a week to J. W. during his life; and after his death, capital to fall into residue. He directed that when his youngest child attained twenty-one, residue of his personal estate should be divided equally among his (testator's) children, except J. W. and in like manner, on the death of J. W. to divide fund invested for annuity among all testator's other children then living, and issue of such as were then dead, equally. Residue was invested, and was not sufficient for payment of annuity. Annuitant entitled to his annuity in full, and to have arrears and future payments made good by sale, from time to time, of capital of appropriated fund. Wright v. Callender, 787

— Testator gave to trustees a sum of money on usual trust for investment, and directed them to pay income to A. for life, and, after his death, to divide principal between children of A. who should be living at time of his (A.'s) death, and issue of such as should be then dead, leaving issue, so that issue of such child so dying should take part which their deceased parent would have taken if living, to be paid to such children and issue, upon their attaining, and in case they should live to attain, twenty-one. A. had a child B. who died in his lifetime, leaving four children. Two of these children died in their infancy, in lifetime of A. Class to take was all the children left by B. and the gift vested absolutely in all those children. Barker v. Barker, 794

— Testator, by his will, gave to A, a married woman, annuity for life for separate use, and by codicil, gave to A, in addition to legacy mentioned in his will, the sum of 800l. No legacy had been given to A. by will. A. entitled to 800l. for her separate use. Warwick v. Hawkins, 796

— Where real estate is contracted to be purchased, and purchaser then makes a will devising all his real estate which he had contracted to buy, and subsequently takes conveyance to ordinary uses to bar dower, conveyance operates as revocation of devise of this estate. Where estate stood limited to ordinary uses to bar dower, and owner mortgaged it in fee, with proviso that on payment estate should be conveyed to mortgagee, his heirs, appointees, or assigns, or to such uses as he or they should direct, and then made his will, devising all his real estate upon trust for sale, and afterwards mortgagee reconveyed to mortgagor to ordinary uses to bar dower, it was held, reversing decree below, that re-conveyance was not revocation of will as to this estate. Plowden v. Hyde, 798

— Testator gave residue of his estate to trustees upon trust to pay dividends of 1,500l. consols to A. for life, and, after his death, to divide dividends equally between E. B. and F. R. and survivor of them. Testator gave all the residue of his estate to E. B. for life, with remainders over. F. R. died. It was held, that E. B. was entitled only to life estate in the 1,500l. consols, and not to the principal. Testator gave residue of his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay legacies, and then, as to all residue of his freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates, and all other his effects, upon trust to pay dividends, interest, rents, profits and annual produce to his wife for her life. Testator at his death was possessed of leaseholds, shares in companies and Dutch bonds. It was held, that widow was entitled to enjoyment of leaseholds in specie, but not of shares or Dutch bonds. Testator directed his debts to be paid, and gave all his real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay certain legacies, and then declared certain trusts of residue of his estates. Personal estate primary fund for payment of debts and legacies; and real estate only charged with them as subsidiary fund. Blane v. Bell, 811

— Testator appointed A. and B. to be his executors, to receive all monies in his possession, or due to him at his death, to be invested in the funds or otherwise on security, and interest thereof to be paid to his wife for life, and after her death the monies to be divided between his two nieces. Testator had at his death only a small balance at his bankers, and 1,200l. consols. Consols were disposed of by will under term of monies. Waite v. Combes, 814

— Testator recited in his will that he had nine children, whom he named and described, and he bequeathed the income of his estate to his wife for life; and after her death, the capital to be divided among his children by his wife then living, and issue of them who should be then dead. Various other trusts were declared by the will, and among them that trustees should pay interest during life of such of his "said children" as should be a daughter in a particular manner. One of the daughters was illegitimate:—Held, (Lord Cranworth laying great stress on the latter clause, but the Lord Chief Justice considering the will sufficient without it,) that intention of testator was on the will manifest that illegitimate daughter should take a share with the legitimate children. There is no inflexible general rule that illegitimate children cannot participate in a gift to children. Owen v. Bryant, 860

Wills Act, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 26, s. 27. See Power.

Winding-up Acts—Member of provisional committee of projected railway company, who after an abandonment of the concern attended a meeting, at which, under the impression that they were personally liable, the provisional committee came to certain resolutions as to contributions among themselves in respect to expenses incurred, and who afterwards took an active part in carrying out the resolutions—not liable as a contributory. In re Direct Exeter, &c. Rail. Co., ex parte Tanner, 212

—Members of completely registered company are not liable for preliminary expenses, unless they have expressly or impliedly rendered themselves liable; and bill of costs being so framed that it was impossible to distinguish preliminary from subsequent expenses, the Master right in allowing the whole bill as a claim only. In re Independent Assur. Co., ex parte Terrell, 222

—The 38th section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45. does not give the Master authority to exclude contributories from meeting held for purpose of fixing a reserved bidding. In re Imperial Salt and Alkali Company, 224

—A. signed a deed by which he and other parties agreed to pay all expenses incurred and to be incurred, with a view to the formation of a projected railway company, such expenses to be assessed rateably on the sums subscribed. Some expenses were incurred, but the undertaking was abandoned, and the company ordered to be wound up. The Master made a list of contributories, in which all parties to the subscription contract were included. It appeared that a suit and an action were in prosecution by and against the official manager, and that the official manager had no assets in hand, and that it was necessary that some funds should be supplied. The Master made a call on all the subscribers to subscription contract. This was resisted by some subscribers on the ground that the managing committee, who were included in the list of contributories, had received large sums which they had not accounted for, and that these sums ought in the first instance to be obtained and applied. In answer to this, evidence was given that the persons forming this committee were not in solvent circumstances. Under all these circumstances, Master had authority to make the call, and had properly exercised his discretion in making it. In re London and Birmingham Extension and Northampton, &c. Rail. Co., ex parte Gay, 284

—An association was provisionally registered, but no deed of settlement executed, and it was ordered to be wound up. Master, by his report, found that the only contributories were provisional and managing committee-men, who had agreed to take shares, and thereby became liable equally among them to expenses of forming the concern and to expenses of its being wound up; that greater part of expenses had been paid by means of calls and other payments; but for paying all remaining expenses, costs of winding up, &c., which he estimated at a certain sum, money must be raised by a call of 60*l.* on each contributory. He accordingly made an order for a call, dated same day as his report. Each contributory liable to pay the call; principle on which Master had proceeded correct; no objection to call that if all contributories paid, more than sufficient would be raised; and it was unimportant whether liabilities liquidated or unliquidated. Also, the call, being founded on a report, which contributories had an opportunity of questioning, but which they did not question, could not be impeached on ground of invalidity of report. Ex parte Dale, in re Wolverhampton, &c. Rail. Co., 341

—A person who has only conditionally accepted shares is not a contributory if condition could not be performed. Ex parte Manwaring, 416

—Provisional committee of projected railway company passed a resolution that fifty shares should be offered to each provisional committee-man. A, a provisional committee-man, applied for fifty shares. A. stated on affidavit that no reply was given to his application, and that he never received any communication respecting it, and that he never attended any meetings, and did not pay anything by way of deposit or call. No evidence of any allotment of shares was given in opposition to A.'s statement. A.'s case differed from Upfill's case, and he was properly excluded from list of contributories. Ex parte Conway, 461

—A. purchased fifty shares in banking company from directors. No deed of transfer executed, as required by deed of settlement, but directors gave him certificates of the shares, and he received the dividends on them from time to time. Upon order for winding up, A. properly put on the list of contributories in respect of these shares. A. purchased of B, a shareholder of the company, thirty shares. No deed of transfer executed, as required by deed of settlement, but directors gave A. certificates, and he received dividends on them. Formality waived, and transfer complete; and A. properly put on list of contributories in respect of the shares. In re North of England Joint-Stock Bank Co., ex parte Bernard, 468

—Costs of obtaining an act of parliament for winding up a company, are not a charge against the company, not being authorized by deed of settlement or by individual shareholders. In re St. George Steam-Packet Co., ex parte Cropper, 503

—At meeting of managing committee of provisionally registered railway company, at which A. and B. were present as members, it was resolved that 500 shares should be allotted to each member of managing committee under head of "reserves." In fact 100 shares only were allotted to and accepted by A. and B. respectively, and for that number only they signed parliamentary contract. On winding up of company,—Held, that A. and B. were liable as contributories in respect of 100 shares only; and not for 500. In re Oxford and Worcester and Chichester Junction Rail. Co., ex parte Sharp, 767

—A, a shareholder in joint-stock company, was made bankrupt in October 1841. In November 1850, company ceased to carry on business, and was shortly afterwards ordered to be wound up. Assignees disclaimed the shares. Master put on list of contributories the assignees of A, in respect of losses incurred before bankruptcy, and A, in respect of losses incurred after the bankruptcy. The Court ordered name of A. to be erased from list of contributories. In re Liverpool Marine Assurance Co., ex parte Greenfields, 773

—An extraordinary general meeting of a company passed a resolution authorising directors to purchase shares of any member who would lend company a sum of money equal to purchase-money of his shares. The notice calling the meeting did not state the specific object of meeting. At subsequent general meeting directors were authorized to give further time to members who had not yet complied with terms of the resolution. W. L. then sold his shares to a trustee for company upon the terms stated in the resolution, and died before transfer effected; and directors, at instance of his executor, completed requisite formalities of the transfer. Resolution of extraordinary meeting invalid for want of due notice; and subsequent ratification inoperative, as in excess of powers of general meeting; and executor of W. L. retained on list of contributories without qualification. In re Vale of Neath and South Wales Brewery Joint-Stock Co., ex parte Laves, 688 — Decision of the Court below, 19 Law J. Rep. (N.S.) Chanc. 391 affirmed. In re Borough of Marylebone Joint-Stock Banking Co., ex parte Busk, 688

— In July 1849 A. gave B, the secretary of a joint-stock company, in course of formation, a power of attorney authorizing him to execute deed of settlement in the name of A, for five shares. In August a correspondence passed between A. and B. to this effect: A. desired to terminate all connexion with the society; B. requested A. to pay the calls; A. hoped directors would excuse him, and B. stated that directors would not release him. Nothing further took place between A. and B. In October company was completely registered, and B. executed deed of settlement in the name of A. Company was wound up. It was held, that A. had not revoked power of attorney, and was properly placed on list of contributories of company, in respect of five shares. Whether A. could revoke the power of attorney—quære. In re the Sea, Fire, and Life Assurance Society, ex parte Burton, 781

— Directors of one railway company passed resolution to lend money to directors of another company on their personal responsibility, and money was so lent, and some of the directors signed guarantee for repayment. Under order for winding up company, the directors of which borrowed the money, claim was carried in on behalf of lending company, but was disallowed; and on appeal, it was held,—affirming decision of Master,—that where a company or association is ordered to be wound up, Master has no jurisdiction under order to take cognizance of claim not alleged to be due from company, but only from individual members of it, and that it made no difference that money was applied for purposes of company. Ex parte Wryghte, in re Great Western Extension Atmospheric Rail. Co., 807

— Joint-stock company overdrew its account with its bankers, and was subsequently ordered to be wound up. Amount of debt was disputed, and public officer of bank (also a company) carried in claim before Master, who refused to admit it as a claim until debt was proved at law. The Court on appeal admitted claim, and gave public officer of bank liberty to bring such action against such person or persons as he should be advised. Ex parte the East of England Bank Co., in re Norwich Yarn Co., 822

— A. was holder of shares in joint-stock company, the members of which had by covenant, not binding their heirs, engaged that partnership should continue for ninety-nine years; that there should be no right of survivorship, and that shares should be deemed personal estate. A. died in 1838, having, by his will, devised his real estate to B, and appointed C. his executrix. At his death company were solvent, and all the then existing liabilities were afterwards discharged. C, after A.'s death, was treated as proprietor of the shares: and for five years received dividends upon them as executrix. Company became insolvent; and, it appearing that testator's personal estate was exhausted, B.'s name was put on the list of contributories, in his character of devisee of real estate. B. rightly placed on list of contributories. In St. George

Steam-Packet Co., ex parte Hamer's Devises, 832

— A railway company was formed, and a large number of shares in it was allotted, and a considerable sum paid in respect of deposits. A managing committee of the company was appointed, and five of its members were appointed a finance committee, with power to draw cheques. By direction of managing committee, large sums, part of company's funds, were employed in purchasing shares in the market. The Master to whom the winding up of the company was referred, charged the members of finance committee with these sums, on the ground that managing committee was implicated in the breach of trust. Master's order overruled. In re London and Birmingham Extension, and Northampton, &c. Rail. Co., ex parte Carpenter's Executors, 835

— A. subscribed the deed of settlement of a joint-stock company, instituted for purposes of granting assurances on ships, for 1,000 shares of 25*l.* each. By deed of settlement it was declared that deposit of 2*l.* 2*s.* should be paid on each share, and that further call of 2*l.* 2*s.* might be made by directors, but that no further call should be made without a previous resolution of shareholders assembled at a general meeting. Company granted several policies. Company was afterwards made bankrupt, under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, and debts were proved against it to amount of 70,000*l.*, and upwards. It was afterwards ordered to be wound up. Master placed A. on list of contributories, and made an order that he should pay 25,000*l.* Motion, that the order as to the call should be discharged refused. In re Merchant Traders' Ship, Loan, and Assurance Association, ex parte Talbot, 846

— A joint-stock company was completely registered, and a person applied for and accepted shares and paid deposit on shares allotted to him. Company's deed required that on its execution names of parties executing should be entered on list of shareholders, and be returned to Stamp Office, &c., and thenceforth they should have privileges and be subject to liabilities of shareholders. In this instance deed not executed, but directors entered and returned, &c. the name. Nevertheless, the name of this person properly placed by Master, under winding-up order, on list of contributories to debts and liabilities of company. Ex parte Yelland, in re the Port of London Shipowners' Loan and Assurance Co., 852

— Seven persons were elected the managing committee of a company, and performed acts in that character. The scheme proved abortive. Actions were brought against one of the seven, and he obtained an order for winding up the company. Others of the seven had made a similar attempt, but were not in time to do so before the order was actually obtained. An official manager was appointed, and the order was prosecuted with the concurrence of all seven. Four of the seven appealed from the order for winding up, and also from an order for a call to pay the costs and expenses and the debt; but it was held, first, that whether the order for winding up were rightly or wrongly made, the four could not move to discharge it; and, secondly, that the order for the call was properly made on the seven members of the managing committee. *Ex parte Woolmer, in re Direct Exeter, Plymouth and Devonport Rail. Witness—A commission directed to issue for examination of witnesses, upon the certificate of the Master, having miscarried by reason of defendant being deprived of an opportunity of cross-examining plaintiff's witnesses, a new commission was directed without further certificate of the Master. Forreth v. Ellice, 590

Witness (continued).—Testator gave residue of his property to be held in deposit for purpose of inquiring whether there were any relations of his blood living, and if so said residue to be divided equally among them. Upon reference to the Master to make inquiries in conformity with above residuary bequest, Master reported that a commission ought to be sent to Venice to examine witnesses as to who were the next-of-kin. The Court, upon the application of the executors, made an order for a foreign commission, and also directed what sum should be allowed out of testator's property for expenses. *Heath v. Act of Bankruptcy—Non-payment after summons. See Adjudication.

Adjudication and Advertisement—Under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 104, notice of application to suspend the advertisement having been given within seven days after the adjudication, the Commissioner has power, after the expiration of the seven days, to suspend the advertisement and extend the time.

— A creditor, a wholesale dealer, issued a summons under section 78. of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, demanding payment of money due from a retail dealer in the same line of business, and described the items in the particulars of demand as "goods." This described with sufficient certainty the wares supplied, so as to prevent the annulling of the adjudication on the ground of uncertainty. The situation of parties and nature of demand are to be considered in determining what is convenient certainty. A doubt on the legal validity of an adjudication is not sufficient ground for annulling it. Ex parte Bower, in re Bowers, 61

time to decide whether they would discharge the solicitors, or would themselves retire from their office, and at the time appointed the assignees refused to do either, whereupon the Commissioner removed the assignees, the Court, upon appeal, refused to interfere, and dismissed the appeal, with costs. Ex parte Bates, in re Williams, 20

Certificate of Conformity—Bankrupt was refused his certificate by Commissioner for an offence not enumerated in section 256. of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, namely, for systematically buying goods at a small price and short credit and immediately selling the same at still lower prices. He was also refused any protection, except pending an appeal. On an appeal, certificate refused, but order made, by consent of assignees, giving protection for person of bankrupt, but leaving his property liable. Creditor who had not given three days' notice of opposition under section 198, and who was, therefore, refused a hearing, not allowed to appear before the appeal Court on motion to discharge above order. In re Holthouse, 3

— Railway stock is within the 201st section of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, which enacts, that no bankrupt shall be entitled to his certificate if he shall within one year before his bankruptcy have lost 200*l.* by any contract for the sale or purchase of "any Government or other stock." Ex parte Matheson, in re Matheson, 18

— Quere—whether the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to refer back the question of certificate after the Commissioner has refused it. Quere—whether the grant of the certificate by the Commissioner, after he has once refused it, would be valid. Ex parte Whitaker, in re Whitaker, 25

— Bankrupt, having had his certificate refused, was taken in execution, and lodged in gaol. Ground of refusal of Commissioner was a fraudulent preference within section 256. of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. Court of Appeal being of opinion that charge not sustained, granted a certificate of the third class, and directed release of bankrupt from prison on a given day. Ex parte Hunt, in re Hunt, 29

— Bankers who, upon evidence before the Court must be taken to have been, and to have known that they were, deeply insolvent, continued to receive deposits, and to issue notes for eighteen months, during which time their assets would not pay more than 5s. in the pound; on adjudication of bankruptcy, Commissioner refused them any certificate or protection. On appeal, the Court affirmed the refusal of certificate on above ground; but, upon consent of assignees and of opposing creditors, granted protection to their persons. Certificate a benefit to which bankrupt may entitle himself by good conduct. Quare,—whether after refusal of certificate, grant of protection of any avail against common-law right of creditors who do not come in under the bankruptcy. Ex parte Rufford, in re Rufford, Ex parte Wragge, in re Wragge, 32.

— Authority of Commissioner under section 198. of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, to appoint a sitting for consideration of grant of certificate to a bankrupt, although the bankrupt does not make the application himself. Ex parte Sherlock, in re Sherlock, 36.

— A, a tallor-broker in business with B, became bankrupt, and on application for his certificate had the same suspended for two years, and then to be of the third class. The case of suspension was supported by Commissioner on two grounds: first, that bankrupt had fraudulently induced a creditor to forbear enforcing payment of a certain sum by withholding information known to him and not known to the creditor, and which, if known would have induced creditor to enforce payment; the other case was for receiving money for goods alleged by the bankrupt to have been purchased, and then re-transferring the goods to the person of whom he bought them, so that the creditor did not receive the goods, and lost his money. The Lords Justices were of opinion that the withholding of information, or the silence of the bankrupt regarding that information, was not dishonestly intended in the one case, and the act by which the goods were re-transferred and the money lost in the second case was, upon the evidence before the Court, not fraudulent so far as petitioner was concerned, and they granted an immediate certificate of the first class. Ex parte Gull, in re Gull, 43.

— E. M. and H. M. purchased a business of their brothers, but it was not paid for. E. M. attended to the accounts, so far as they were attended to, and H. M. performed the duties of traveller. E. M. and H. M. on various occasions raised money by deposits of goods and paid 60% per cent. for discount. H. M. ordered goods one day and pledged them on the next. The brothers, vendors of the business, sued for the purchase-money, and issued execution on a judgment in the action. Both E. M. and H. M. were adjudicated bankrupts, and the Commissioner refused them their certificates or protection on the ground of not keeping proper books of account (as to E. M. destruction of books), obtaining goods for the purpose of pledging, and pledging them, and fraudulent preference to the brothers who sold the business. H. M. appealed, and swore that he pledged the goods to meet a sudden demand for payment of bills falling due; that he believed he was solvent when the goods were bought, and that he had nothing to do with the keeping of the books, and he produced a witness who swore that the goods were ordered because they were wanted in the stock. The Lords Justices being of opinion there was no wrong intention as to the books or the pawning, and that there was pressure by the vendors, and, acquitting the appellant of fraud, granted him a second-class certificate, to be dated eight months after the adjudication. Ex parte Martyn, in re Martyn, 46.

— Bankrupt, who had twice before compounded with his creditors, made false and fraudulent entries in his books, consisting of fictitious accounts in particular names. He stopped payment, being at the time able to pay 12s. in the pound, and soon after offered 11s. in the pound. Commissioner refused him his certificate and all protection, excepting for twenty-one days; and on appeal, the Lords Justices, acting under discretion given by 198th section of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, dismissed petition of appeal, with costs, affirming decision of Commissioner, and refusing any protection whatever. Ex parte Curteis, in re Curteis, 53.

— Before a bankrupt can ask for his certificate he should have conformed to the bankrupt law since his bankruptcy. If a trader obtains money by fraud, though not in the course of his trade, or in matters connected with his business, it is, on a question of certificate, conduct as a trader, within the meaning of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106; and if a case comes otherwise within the act, it is not the less so because the conduct complained of took place before the passing of the act. Ex parte Staner, in re Staner, 56.

Inspection of Documents—A creditor, who had proved his debt, applied by his attorney, under section 232. of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, for leave to inspect the affidavit of debt, the proof of the act of bankruptcy, and other proofs filed in court, on which adjudication founded, with a view to impeach the adjudication. On appeal, it was held, that this was not a "reasonable" request, within the meaning of the statute, and the appeal was dismissed, with costs. Quare—whether above-mentioned documents and proofs are within the language of section 232. Ex parte Rimell, in re Brewer, 27.

Official Assignee—Section 54. of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. having enacted that certain amounts, not less nor greater than specified amounts per cent. on gross produce from time to time should be paid by official assignees to "Chief Registrar's Account," amount to be fixed by senior Commissioner, with approval of Lord Chancellor; and chief Commissioner having fixed the sums, with such approval, Court refused to interfere to alter the same; but Commissioner having made such allowances to official assignee as, according to amount of bankrupt's estate and nature of duties performed, were, in his opinion, just and reasonable, the Court differing from opinion of Commissioner, and official assignee not requesting the Court to fix amount of allowance, the matter was, on this point, sent back to Commissioner for re-consideration. Ex parte Glyn, in re Ashlin, 49.

Payment of Debts in full—Money which, by rules of friendly society, ought to have been deposited with treasurer, was paid directly to bankers of society. Bankers adjudicated bankrupts, and society, under section 167, of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, claimed to be paid in full, and in support of the claim filed an affidavit, swearing that the bankers were "employed in the office of treasurer." Petitioners not entitled to payment in full. Ex parte Oxford, in re Rufford, 31

Payment out of Court—The primary jurisdiction in Bankruptcy being, by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, a. 12, transferred to Commissioners, and the jurisdiction of Vice Chancellor under that act having been exclusively appellate and transferred to the Court of Appeal by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, the Court of Appeal cannot order payment of money out of Bankruptcy Court, unless application be made by way of appeal from Commissioner. In re Cheetham, 5

Proof of Debts—An insolvent trader about to marry, the intended wife being ignorant of the insolvency, entered into covenant with trustees to pay them a moderate sum of money, interest to be paid to wife's appointment, and, in default, to intended wife for life for her separate use, then to husband for life, and the capital to be in trust for the survivor absolutely. Property of the wife was also agreed to be settled upon same trusts. The husband having become bankrupt, it was held in a special case that the trustees were entitled to prove for the amount. Ex parte Mac Birnie's Trustees, in re Mac Birnie, 15

—A. B. was a shareholder in a joint-stock banking company, which stopped payment. He became bankrupt, and afterwards, before he obtained his certificate, an order for winding up the banking company was obtained, and subsequently, he obtained his certificate. Under the 14th and 30th sections of the Winding-up Act of 1849, official manager entitled to go in, and prove for the amount of calls in competition with his separate creditors. Ex parte Nicholas, in re Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire Banking Co., 64

Protection—granted by Court of Appeal though certificate of conformity refused. In re Holdhouse, 3

—Under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, the Commissioner may refuse protection to a bankrupt for other causes than for the commission of any of the offences enumerated in section 256. The issue of certificate of penalty, under section 257, depends upon the refusal of protection generally, and is not limited to such refusal for either of the offences enumerated in the preceding section. The discretion vested with the Commissioner by this statute in granting or withholding protection is very large, excepting in the cases enumerated in section 256, in which cases his functions are merely ministerial, and he is bound to refuse protection. So held, by the full Court of Appeal, Knight Bruce, L.J. dubitante. Ex parte Stanton, in re Stanton, 7

—An order under section 211, of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, granting protection until a day certain, exceeding two months from its date, is irregular, and will not protect the debtor. Quære—whether, after an order granting protection under the 211th section, a creditor can proceed under the 78th section. Ex parte Bowers, in re Bowers, 13

Railway Stock. See Certificate of Conformity.

Solicitor—not a scrivener. See Trader.

Trader—A solicitor was adjudicated bankrupt as a scrivener, on evidence clearly establishing the fact; on appeal against the adjudication, he was examined, and the Court being satisfied that, upon the additional evidence, he was not a scrivener within the meaning of the bankrupt law, annulled the adjudication; the Lord Chief Justice expressing his agreement in the decision only on the authority of cases determined by Lord Eldon and Lord Chief Justice Gibbs. Ex parte Dufaur, in re Dufaur, 38
